Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

THE LIBRARY OF

CLASS 050
BOOK A c 12

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

THE ACADEMY

JULY—DECEMBER

1912

VOLUME LXXXIII

PUBLISHING OFFICE

CANNON HOUSE, BREAMS BUILDINGS, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

CONTENTS OF VOL. LXXXIII

ART

Art at the Dowdeswell Galleries ... 121
Christmas Exhibition at the Baillie Gallery 805
Exhibitions at the Grosvenor and Leicester Galleries 643
London Salon, 1912, The 121
Painters in Water Colours 806
Paintings at the Chenil Gallery ... 121
Royal Society of British Artists, The 708
Whistler and Legros at the Tate Gallery. R. E. N. 152

ARTICLES.

A Churchill! A Churchill! Cecil Cowper 788
Andrew Lang and His Work. Robert Steele 117
Animals at Fault. F. G. Aflalo ... 287
Antoninus. Cecil Cowper 500
Apotheosis of Mrs. Humphry Ward, The 178
Art and Imitation. John Rivers...198, 246
Art and Life. Haldane Macfall 489, 549, 836
Artists. M. P. 664
Aspects of Ireland. Darrell Figgis 608, 802
At St. Stephen's Shrine. By A Regular Devotee, 22, 54, 88, 118, 149, 183, 488, 519, 550, 582, 613, 644, 679, 710, 742, 773, 806, 838.
Autumn Books 469
"Babu" English. George Cecil ... 380
Bedside Books 834
Black and the White of Butterfly, The. Haldane Macfall 38
Booksellers' Provident Institution, The 709
Bore, The. Wilfrid L. Randell ... 364
Boy and His Book, The. Wilfrid L. Randell 228
British Government in East Africa. Major Piers W. North ... 418, 453
By-ways of Brittany. R. A. J. Walling 52
Cards and Calendars 738
Cattle of the Andes, The. W. H. Koebel 215
Celluloid Danger, The. Walter F. Reid 148
Christmas Assembly, A. Wilfrid L. Randell 820
Christmas Books 734
Cornish Sketch, A. Harold Wintle 378
Correspondence with Mr. Andrew Lang, A. H. C. Minchin 182
Cossacks and Their Value to the Russian Army, The. A Cossack of the Don 740
Cynic, The. W. L. R. 692
Dawn of Women's Influence in Germany, The. Ed. Bernstein ... 37
Deserted Village, The. Darrell Figgis 312
Developments in Photography. Haldane Macfall 343, 365
Dogmatism of Cobbett, The. F. G. A. 756
Doom of the Turkish Army, The F. G. Aflalo 662
England Does Not Love Coalitions. Cecil Cowper... 4
England's Frenzy. G. M. S.... ... 809
English Character Seen Through Italian Spectacles. Professor Herbert Strong 83, 113
Fleet at Sea, The. E. Ashmead-Bartlett 86
Foreign Reviews, 19, 146, 288, 421, 452, 547, 707
Gaelic Play, A. Darrell Figgis ... 502
General Nogi. E. Ashmead-Bartlett 422
Genial Gossip, A. Haldane Macfall 6
Germans Abroad. C. V. 249
Grammar for Futurists 152
Grey of the Morning, The. Late H. D. Lowry 516
Henley: A Memorandum. Francis Bickley... 197
Hereford Festival—Leoncavallo, The. Alfred Kalisch... 377
Hokku. Yone Noguchi 57
Honest Brokers. Cecil Cowper ... 596
Horse and War, The. R. J. Turner 486
Idealist, The. Wilfrid L. Randell... 660
Imitation Critic, The. Wilfrid L. Randell... 396
Indian Reviews ... 21, 151, 421, 515, 581
Individual Reader, The. Alex. J. Philip 283
In the Wilderness of Votes. Cecil Cowper 196
Intimate Books. C. V. 51
Is Christendom Satiated? Cecil Cowper 724
Is Jesus an Historical Personage? Frank Harris... 101
Job—and its Consequences, A. Cecil Cowper... 260
John Payne and His Work. Thomas Wright... 351
Jubilee International Stamp Exhibition, The 519
Kate's Fall. Eden Phillpotts 821
Keeper of the Gate, The. A. G. W. 114
Lafcadio Hearn Appraised. W. G. Blaikie Murdoch 245
Language and Character. Prof. Herbert Strong 661, 725
Leaders Galore. Cecil Cowper ... 468
League for the Defence of the Constitution and the Union 769
Legends, Rhymes and Stories ... 736
Letters and Life. D. M. J. 262
"Levrak Beyuk." F. G. Aflalo ... 350
Literary Inquest, A. A. G. W. ... 513
Literary Traveller, The. W. H. Koebel ... 285, 316, 349, 382, 426, 450, 487, 517, 545
Literary Values. F. Hadland Davis 347
Lost Sir Massingham, The. Cecil Cowper 132
Magazines, The. 84, 216, 320, 518, 678, 771
Major and Minor Poetry. Francis Bickley 438
Marc Lescarbot. Bernard Muddiman 281
Martyr of Empire, A. 180, 199
Massenet and His Operas. George Cecil 229
Meeting of Parliament and After, The. Cecil Cowper 436
Melodrama versus Music-Drama: A Protest. John Rivers 580
Menagerie of Travel, The. F. G. Aflalo 610
Mind, a Myth. Sir Charles Walpole 383
Morris Dancers, The. Darrell Figgis 579
Muse and the Kitchen, The. Wilfrid L. Randell 68
Musical Anarchy. A. Kalisch ... 342
Music at Prague. C. W. James ... 376
Music of Venice, The 566
Napoleon the Third. E. Ashmead-Bartlett 317, 346
National Reflection, A. Cecil Cowper 532
National Reserve, The. R. J. Turner 112
New Editions 16
Novels of Thomas Love Peacock (1785-18666), The. R. E. N. ... 165
On Contradicting. Wilfrid L. Randell 100
On Lucidity in Prose. H. Belloc... 501
On the Eve of War. From a Correspondent 533
On the River. Punter 214
On Translation. H. Belloc 301
Our Public Schools and Their Critics. Professor Herbert Strong 344
Our Village Carolling. Wilfrid L. Randell... 725
Oxford Letter, An. Young Oxford... 383
Picture Books 736
Picture Habit, The. F. C. M. ... 706
Pictures of Passing Islam—I. The Selamlik. Herbert Seabury ... 768
Pilgrims and Pilgrimage. Guy Kendall 18
Pipe Dreams. Bernard Muddiman 821
Playing with Fire. E. Ashmead-Bartlett 115
Poetry and the Public. Wilfrid Thorley 5
Politics and Pelf. Cecil Cowper ... 628
Posterity and Boswell. Henry Stace 179
Psychology of Error. F. H. M. ... 144
Reader's Complaint, A. Yone Noguchi 313
Richard Jeffries. W. A. R. 261
Romance. W. L. R. 164
Royal Horticultural Society's Summer Flower Show at Holland House, 1912 57
Samuel Coleridge-Taylor 315
Satiated Public, A. 230
Schools and the Man. R. 30
Secret of Romance, The. A. G. W. 769
Shining Pen, The. Wilfrid L. Randell 565
Smoking. F. G. Aflalo 835
Some Christmas Books 612
Some Christmas Issues 737
Some Early Arrivals 471
Some Irish Types. Darrell Figgis 143
Some New French Books. Marc Logé 611
Some Recent French Books. Marc Logé 82
Some Tolstoyan Exhibits 249
Spell of the Duchess Anne, The. R. A. J. Walling 103
Stones of Waterloo Bridge, The. Walter Johnson 457
Story of a Great Crime, The. E. Ashmead-Bartlett 50
Stratford Shakespeare Festival, The. Darrell Figgis 248, 286
Style and the People. W. L. R. ... 300
Three Irish Poets 663
Three Pairs of Spectacles 102
Thrill of a Tarpon, The. F. G. Aflalo 133
To St. David's. Edward Thomas... 166
Travelling Moments. W. L. R. ... 564
Turkey's Treasure House. R. J. Turner 693
Two Futurist Manifestos 603
Unheard Melodies. Guy Kendall ... 533
University Extension 145
Verona. Martin D. Armstrong ... 803
Viceroys of Ireland, The. Historicus 631
Viennese Spectacle, A. C. W. James 437
Vote of Mid-Lothian, The. Cecil Cowper 332
When the Boats came Back. Late H. D. Lowry 630
Work of Mr. Algernon Blackwood, The. H. Belloc 629

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Pages 31, 63, 95, 127, 159, 191, 222, 255, 295, 327, 359, 391, 430, 462, 494, 527, 558, 590, 622, 654, 686, 717, 750 814, 846.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Admission, An 429
Aeneid II, 255 846
Anglo-German Relations, 61, 158, 221
Antoninus 500
Appeal, An 191
Art and Life 558
Bacon is Shakespeare, 459, 494, 556, 589, 620, 652, 685, 716, 781, 813, 844
Beethoven Relic, A. 295
Bioscope, The 30
British Boys' Training Corps, The. 460
Children's Country Holidays' Fund 254
Children's Holiday Fund 29
Children's Holidays 93
Christmas Hampers and Clothing for Little Cripples 621
Christian Science, 461, 525, 587, 653, 685, 750, 780, 845
Conflicts of Usage in the Pronoun... 717
Coopers and John Hoskins, The ... 222
Dictionary of National Biography," "The 526, 589
Dock Strike—Freedom the Clear Issue, The 157

Digitized by Google 126013 Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Domestic Servants' Insurance Society, The 716
Earl of Macclesfield's Basque MSS., The 620
Edwin Drood 749
Force a Play 30
Garrotting and the Lash 686
German Péril, The 30, 62
Germans Abroad 294
Germany and Great Britain 125
G. Jerment on the Baskish New Testament 191
Grammar and Christian Science ... 493
Greatest Service, The 428
Grosvenor Gallery, The 557
Have You Read Baruch? 254
Indian Reviews 428
Insanity and Crime 748, 779
Jonas Hanway 222
Jottings for the Word-Books 846
League for the Defence of the Constitution and the Union 843
Leigh Hunt's House 93
Louis XVII and Other Papers ... 814
Love-Seeker," "The 557
Mr. Howard's Constituency 461
Mr. Wright and a Critic ... 390, 429
Mystery, A 126
National Reflection, A 621
Necessitous Ladies' Holiday Fund, The 127
Need 293, 326, 359, 390, 429
Of That Ilk 254
On Lucidity in Prose 590
Our Relations With Germany, 30, 94, 126
Passing of a Great Master, The ... 94
Philip Massinger 29
Phonetic Spelling 430
Poetry and the Public 95, 158
Point of Grammar, A, 429, 461, 526, 590, 750
Political Query, A 93
Questionable Policy 159
Relatives and Interrogatives ... 814
Replace 327
Richard Jefferies 359
Right to Work, The, ... 494, 686, 716
Riks, The 326, 391
Romance Versus Reality 222
Simplification of English, The ... 461
Sir Henry Howorth's Constituency... 814
Sir Henry Stanley's Grave 621
Society of the Theatre, The 526
Strindberg's Work 654
"Tacitae" and "Silentia" in Aeneid, 255 ... 525, 589, 685, 717, 782, 814
Talented and Talentueux 253
Territorial Imposture, The 748
"Than" and "As" 493
Trade Disputes Act, The 779
Turkish Debacle and the National Reserve, The 651
Unsatiated Public, An 294
Wirral Division of Cheshire, The ... 717
Yule-Tide Association, The 494

FINANCE.

By Raymond Radclyffe.

Pages 28, 59, 92, 124, 156, 189, 220, 252, 292, 324, 358, 388, 427 458, 492, 524, 555, 586, 618, 650, 684, 715, 747, 778, 812, 842.

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

By Lancelot Lawton.

Balkin Peril, The 454
China's Finances 386
China's New Loan 425
China's Peril 840
Chinese Loan, The 455
Crisis, The 776
Dawn of the Meiji Era—Some Reflections, The 154
Decisive Battle, The 616
European Crisis, The 648
European Situation, The 355
Far East, The 617
Fate of the Ottoman Empire, The ... 584
Future of Tibet, The 322
Future Storm Centre, A 250
Great Britain and China 290
Great Britain and Russia 425
Growth of Socialism in Japan—II, The 26
International Deadlock, The 744
International Situation, The 713
Italy and Turkey—Peace in Sight... 218
Japan in Korea 219
Japan's Difficulties 356
Mikado, The 122
Modern Camp-Follower, The... ... 553
Naval Strength 123
Open Door in America, The ... 90
Peace Conference, The 810
Peace of Europe, The... ... 186, 682
Triple Entente, The 58
War in the Balkans, The 490

LITERARY RETROSPECTS.

July 27, 1912.

Articles.

"Inhumanity" of Art, The. (Literature, June 4, 1898) 4
Mikado," "The (March 28, 1885) ... 8
Note (July 29, 1899) 8
Perishable Books. By Leslie Stephen (Literature, November 27, 1897) ... 1
Thoughts on Style. J. P. Mahaffy (Literature, November 13, 1897)... 6

Poetry.

Love's Pilgrims. Evelyn Pyne (November 23, 1889) 6
Sonnet. Henry Norman (January 20, 1883) 6

Reviews.

Hawthorne. Henry James, junr. Reviewed by Professor Saintsbury (January 17, 1880) 2

August 31, 1912.

Articles.

Andrew Lang on "She" (January 15, 1887) 274
Carlyle. By Lionel Johnson (September 10, 1892) 278
Colloquy on Criticism, A. By Augustine Birrell (Literature, February 12, 1898) 279
English Academy, An. (Literature, November 27, 1897) 273
Madame Guilbert. By Henry Harland (Literature, June 4, 1898) ... 275

Poetry.

Among the Tombs. Michael Field (January 15, 1887) 277
Ballade of August, A. G. A. (August 6, 1881) 277
She is My Lady, O She is My Love! Michael Field (January 15, 1887) 277
Two Poems (January 15, 1887), Michael Field... 277

Reviews.

"She." Reviewed by Andrew Lang (January 15, 1887) 274
Thomas Carlyle. Reviewed by Lionel Johnson (September 10, 1892) 278

September 28, 1912.

Articles.

George Eliot's Poetry. By J. A. Noble (September 5, 1885) 415
Hack, The. (Literature, September 3, 1898) 415
Marius the Epicurean. By J. M. Gray (March 21, 1885) 413
Morality in Book Collecting. By W. Roberts (Literature, October 8, 1898) 412
Paradox of Literature, The. By Arthur Macher (Literature, August 27, 1898) 409
Walter Savage Landor. By E. D. Morshead (September 3, 1881) ... 410

Poetry.

Sonnet: Light and Love. Walter W. Skeat (January 26, 1884) 414
Two Sonnets after Bion. John Addington Symonds (March 28, 1885) 414

Reviews.

George Eliot's Poetry, and Other Studies. Rose Cleveland. Reviewed by J. A. Noble 415

MOTORING AND AVIATION.

R. B. H.

Pages 27, 91, 123, 155, 188, 219, 251, 291, 323, 356, 387, 426, 450, 491, 523, 554, 586, 617, 649, 683, 714, 745, 777, 811, 841.

MUSIC.

Pages 16, 48, 243, 376, 408, 677, 704, 767, 800, 833.

NOTES AND NEWS.

Pages 25, 56, 90, 122, 153, 186, 217, 250, 289, 321, 354, 385, 424, 454, 522, 552, 584, 615, 647, 681, 712, 772, 808, 839.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Pages 3, 35, 67, 99, 131, 163, 195, 227, 259, 299, 331, 363, 395, 435, 467, 499, 531, 563, 595, 627, 659, 691, 723, 755, 787, 819.

POETRY.

"And you must love him ere to you." Max Plowman 724
Autumn on the Downs. A. G. W. 788
Becalmed. Max Plowman 200
Canoeing. Douglas Goldring ... 100
Change and Eternity. W. P. R. Kerr 68
Child Joy. Max Plowman 36
Choice, The. W. P. R. Kerr ... 600
Dans Les Bois. Gwendolen Talbot 300
Earth Dreams. . Phil. J. Fisher... 500
From Victor Hugo 4
Love in the Hills. Ethel Talbot Scheffauer 500
Man's Bargain, A. G. M. Hort ... 364
Notre Dame. R. 596
Pan. James A. Mackereth... ... 756
Paradox, The. G. M. Hort 628
Patriot, The. Phil J. Fisher 692
Remembrance. R. 332
Return, The. James A. Mackereth 532
St. Gabriel. Dorothy Margaret Stuart 132
Satyr, The. Martin D. Armstrong 164
Song of a Good-for-Nothing. Wilfrid Thorley 596
Soul 788
Spirit of the Summit, The. Phil J. Fisher 564
Sunset. W. G. Hole 228
To Poseidon. Dorothy Margaret Stuart ... ...
Violets. Bertha Harrison 820

REVIEWS.

Across Australia. Baldwin Spencer... 270
Adelaide Anne Proctor. Ferdinand Janku and F. J. Gillen 440
Algiers, the Sahara, and the Nile. Rachel Humphreys 641
All Manner of Folk. Holbrook Jackson... 307
Also and Perhaps. Sir Frank Swettenham... 303
American Diary of a Japanese Girl, The. Yone Noguchi 829
American Girl at the Durbar, An. Shelland Bradley 512
American Government, The. Frederic J. Haskin 541
Among Congo Cannibals. John H. Weeks 575
Among My Books. Frederic Harrison 666
Amor Vincit. Mrs. R. S. Garnett... 449
Anglais et Français du XVIIe. Siècle. Charles Bastide 108
Anglo-American Memories (Second Series). G. W. Smalley 167
Anglo-Indians, The. Alice Perrin... 341
Anima Fanciulla. Stanhope Bayley 201
Anna Strelitz. Low Lathen 15
Anthropological Papers, Mostly on Parsee Subjects. Jivanji Jamshedji Modi 335
Antiques and Curios in Our Homes. Grace M. Vallois 480
Archives d'Etudes Orientales. Vols. I., II., III., IV. 310
Arthur Hugh Clough. Paula Lutonsky 440
Art of Golf, The. Joshua Taylor ... 172
Art of the Orator, The. Edgar R. Jones 271
Aspects of the Irish Question. Sydney Brooks 102
Athenian Critic of Athenian Democracy, An. Translation of the "De Republica Atheniensium," by Francis Brooks... 542
At the Sign of the Reine Pédauque. Anatole France 10

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Australian Native's Standpoint, An. W. J. Sowden 732
Aus Wissenschaft und Leben. Adolf Harnack... 107
Autobiography of a Working Woman, The. Adelheid Popp ... 9
Bachelor's Buttons. Edward Burke 641
Ballads Weird and Wonderful. With 25 Drawings by Vernon Hill ... 672
Baskish Verb, The. E. S. Dodgson 74
Bataille de Tripoli, La. F. T. Marinetti 208
Battle of Life, The. T. E. Kebbel 569
Battle of Waterloo, The. Hilaire Belloc 205
Bayreuth and the Wagner Theatre. Anna Bahr-Mildenburg and Hermann Bahr 443
Beauty and Ugliness and other Studies in Psychological Æsthetics. Vernon Lee and C. Anstruther-Thomson 209
Beyond that is Within, and other Addresses, The. Emile Boutroux 333
Big Fish, The. H. B. Marriott Watson 240
Big Game Hunting in Central Africa. J. Dunbar-Brunton 139
Biographies of Scientific Men. A. B. Griffiths 311
Blinds Down. H. A. Vachell ... 373
Bohemia in London. Arthur Ransome 604
"Bookman" Keats-Shelley Memorial Souvenir, The 76
Book of Short Plays, and a Memory, A. Mrs. De Courcy Laffan ... 307
Bountiful Hour, The. Marion Fox 577
Brain Book and How to Read It, The. H. C. Donovan 233
Brain of the Nation, and Other Verses, The. Charles L. Graves... 13
Brain Side of Games, Sports, and Pastimes, The. H. C. Donovan ... 474
Bright Shame. Keighley Snowden ... 702
Britain's Dilemma. M. de P. Webb 170
British Empire Shakespeare: A Midsummer's Night's Dream. Edited by Howard de Walden and Acton Bond 604
Broad Walk, The. Leonie Aminoff... 544
Broom. Mills Whitman 577
Brothers Karamazov, The. Fyodor Dostoevsky 448
Browning's Teaching on Faith, Life, and Love. W. Arthur Hind ... 604
Building of the Alps, The. Professor T. G. Bonney 505
Bunch Grass. H. A. Vachell ... 832
Byzance. Pièce en trois Actes traduit du Hongrois de François Herczeg 211
Cæsar Borgia. John Leslie Garner 69
Cairn Lodge. Antoine Le Borovski 77
Cameos of Indian Crime. H. Hervey 368
Campaigns on the North-West Frontier. Captain H. L. Nevill ... 72
Camp and Kitchen. Lucy H. Yates 495
Carteggio di Alessandro Manzoni ... 404
Castle Building, and Other Poems. Guy Kendall 538
Caught in the Chinese Revolution. Ernest H. Borst-Smith 140
Charmides and Other Poems. Gascoigne Mackie 442
Chats on Cottage and Farmhouse Furniture. Arthur Hayden ... 44
Chats on Old Jewellery and Trinkets. MacIver Percival 369
Cheerful Way, The. Lady Doughty 175
Cheiro's Memoirs: The Reminiscences of a Society Palmist 43
Chess for a Stake. Harold Vallings 798
Chief Commissioner, The. Hilda M. Swabey 141
Chief Constable, The. Vincent Brown 177
Child of His Adoption, The. George Evans 341
Child's Empire Picture Annual, The 176
China's Revolution, 1911-1912. Edwin J. Dingle 473
Chinese Poems. Translated by Ch. Budd 796
Christmas Garland, A. Max Beerbohm 636
Christusmythe, Die. Arthur Drews 101
Chronicle of Friendships, A. Luther Munday 403
Chronique de l'An, 1911, La. Mermeix 238
Church of Armenia, The. Malachia Ormanian 541
Clay's Revenge, The. Helen George 642
Clouds, The. Charles M. Doughty... 400
Collected Works of Henrik Ibsen, The. Translated by A. G. Chater 176
Colour in the Home. E. J. Duveen 441
Combined Concordance to the Bible, A 575
Comedy of Catherine the Great, The. Francis Gribble 70
Confessions of a Fool, The. August Strindberg 405
Co-Respondent, The 15
Cornish Coast and Moors, The. A. G. Folliott-Stokes 208
Correspondence of Sarah Spencer, Lady Lyttelton, 1787-1870, The. Edited by the Hon. Mrs. Hugh Wyndham 635
Courts of the Angels, The. Justus M. Forman 241
Creative Revelation: Four Lectures on the Miraculous Christ. J. G. Simpson 371
Crime of 1812 and its Retribution, The. T. Dundas Pillans 205
Crock of Gold, The. James Stephens 763
Crowns. Winifred M. MacNab ... 449
Cup and the Lip, The. Stephen Knott 374
Damsel Dark, The. Clara Turnbull 178
Dans l'Atlantique. Henri Deherain 508
Dante Gabriel Rossetti and German Literature. L. A. Willoughby ... 176
Daphne in the Fatherland 271
Darnely Place. Richard Bagot ... 543
Daughter of Fate, A. Edgar Leigh 374
Daughter of the Morning, A. Hugh de Selincourt 447
Dawn in Darkest Africa. J. H. Harris 828
Day Before Yesterday, The. Richard Middleton 761
Debrett's Peerage, Baronetage, and Companionage for 1913 796
Decline of Aristocracy, The. Arthur Ponsonby 695
Défense de la Poésie Française à l'Usage des Lecteurs Anglais. Emile Legouis 136
Democratic Mistake, The. A. G. Sedgwick 700
Depths of the Ocean, The. Sir John Murray and Doctor Johan Hjort... 338
Derelict Empire, A. Mark Time ... 109
De Stamboul à Bagdad. Hakki-Bey 14
Deutschen in Russland, 1812, Die. Paul Holzhausen 791
Devoted Sparkes. W. Pett Ridge... 373
Diana of Quebec, A. Jean McIlwraith 407
Diana Weston. Ralph Dexter ... 111
Diary of Frances, Lady Shelley, 1778-1817. Edited by her Grandson, Richard Edgcumbe 536
Dictionary of Argot (French-English), A. W. von Knoblaugh 575
Dictionary of Dates, A. ... 14, 481
Dictionary of Quotations, A. Colonel Philip Hugh Dalbiac 481
Dieux Ont Soif, Les. Anatole France 73
Divorce. Earl Russell 45
Doctor and His Work, with a Hint of His Destiny and Ideals. Charles J. Whitby 638
Doctor Brown's Partner. Ianthe Cavendish 544
Dogs and Their Masters. Compiled by Marion Chappell 670
Drake in California. Herman Scheffauer 538
Dr. Tuppy. Stephen Townesend ... 764
Du Rythme en Français. Robert de Souza 136
Early History of the Christian Church from its Foundation to the End of the Fifth Century. Monsignor Louis Duchesne 542
Écrits de Musiciens (XVe—XVIIIe Siècles). J. G. Prod'homme ... 827
Edinburgh. R. L. Stevenson ... 701
Elements of Child Protection, The. Sigmund Engel 661
Elsie Lindtner. Karin Michaelis ... 78
Embarras de l'Allemagne. Georges Blondel 597
Empires of the Far East. Lancelot Lawton... 603
Emporium, The. Alec Holmes ... 449
Empress Eugénie and Her Circle, The. Dr. E. Barthez 698
England and the Moslem World. Syed H. R. Abdul Majid 46
English Apprenticeship and Child Labour. O. Jocelyn Dunlop ... 282
English Idioms. James Main Dixon 14
English Literature, 1880-1905. J. M. Kennedy... 366
English Lyrical Poetry. Edward Bliss Reed 168
Englishwoman's Year-Book and Directory, 1913 794
Englishwoman, The. Alice and Claude Askew... 15
Enthusiasts of Port Royal, The. Lilian Rea 760
Epochs of Chinese and Japanese Art. Ernest Fenollosa 600
Essentials of Poetry. William Allan Neilson 264
Etain the Beloved. James Cousins ... 663
Ether Vivant, et le Réalisme Supra-Nerveux, L'. Paul Richard ... 340
Ethical and Religious Value of the Novel, The. Ramsden Balmforth 604
Eugenics Review, The... 141
European Years. Edited by G. E. Woodberry 173
Eve's Second Husband. Corra Harris 407
Exeter. Sidney Heath 732
Fairy-Faith in Celtic Countries, The. W. Y. Evans Wentz... 608
Fall of the Mogul Empire, The. Sidney J. Owen 139
Faustula. John Ayscough 642
Favourites of Louis XIV, The. Le Petit Homme Rouge 640
Fires, Books II and III. W. W. Gibson... 825
First Signs of Insanity, The. Bernard Hollander 667
Five Little Plays. Alfred Sutro ... 307
Fly on the Wheel, or How I Helped to Govern India, The. Lieut.-Col. T. H. Lewin 402
Following the Drum. Horace Wyndham 671
Four Men, The. H. Belloc 75
Fourteen Years of Diplomatic Life in Japan. Leaves from the Diary of Baroness Albert d'Anethan ... 234
Fra Angelico. Alfred Pichon... ... 304
From Mendelssohn to Wagner. Compiled by Henry Davison 75
From the Angle of Seventeen. Eden Phillpotts 512
From Theatre to Music-hall. W. R. Titterton 308
From the Black Mountain to Waziristan. Colonel H. C. Wylly ... 601
From the Forest . W. Scott Palmer 42
Fugitive Years, The. Katharine Simpson 47
Future of Poetry, The. F. P. B. Osmaston 106
Gates of the Dolomites. L. Marion Davidson 542
Gathering of Brother Hilarius, The. Michael Fairless 447
George Borrow, the Man and His Books. Edward Thomas 572
Germany and the German Emperor. Herbert Perris 597
Germany in the Nineteenth Century. Five Lectures by J. H. Rose, C. H. Herford, E. C. K. Gonner and M. E. Sadler 44
Geschichte der Freien Stadt Frankfurt, A.M. (Vol. II—1814-1866). Richard Schwemer 239
Girlhood of Queen Victoria, The. Edited by Viscount Esher 633
Girls' School Year Book, 1912 ... 77
Glamour. Bohun Lynch 544
Goodly Fellowship, The. Rachel C. Schauffler 512

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Gospel of Freedom, The. Henry D. A. Major 509
Great Initiates, The. Edouard Schure 790
Great Postponement, The. J. G. Sieveking 484
Green Overcoat, The. H. Belloc ... 75
Grey Terrace, The. Mrs. Fred Reynolds 78
Grip of Life, The. A. and E. Castle 831
Grit Lawless. F. E. Mills-Young ... 483
Grundzüge der auswärtigen Politik Deutschlands. Paul Arndt ... 597
Guiana: British, Dutch, and French. James Rodway 309
Guide Book and the Star, The. Ruth Lindsay 111
Guide to Books on Ireland, A. S. J. Brown 445
Guilelmus Neubrigensis ein Pragmatischer Geschichtsschreiber des Zwölften Jahrhunderts. Dr. Rudolf Jahncke 109
Guilty Man, The. Helen Ruth Davis 578
Hampton Court. Walter Jerrold ... 732
Handbook of Idiomatic English as Now Written and Spoken. John Kirkpatrick 575
Hans Sachs and Geothe. Mary Cacy Burchinal 506
Heralds of the Dawn, The. A Play by William Watson 235
Hercules Brabazon Brabazon. C. Lewis Hind 503
Her Majesty the Flapper. A. E. James 447
Heroine in Bronze, The. James Lane Allen 764
Her Sacrifice. Arthur Applin 47
Hidden, Fear, The. James Blyth ... 141
Hill of Vision, The. James Stephens 663
His Lordship's Baby. Hope Protheroe 341
Histoire de la Maison de l'Espine. Yves Blanc 15
Histoire des Arabes. Clement Huart 540
Histoire du Peuple Anglais au XIXe Siècle. Elie Halevy 568
Historical Sketches of Glamorgan ... 507
History of Divorce, A. S. B. Kitchin 271
History of English Literature from "Beswulf" to Swinburne. Andrew Lang 117
History of European Nations, from the Earliest Records to the Beginning of the Twentieth Century, A. Angelo S. Rappoport 510
History of Preston in Amoundderness, A. H. W. Clemesha ... 371
History of the British Army, Vol. VII, 1809-1810, A. Hon. J. W. Fortescue 478
History of the British Nation, from the Earliest Times to the Present Day, A. D. Innes 576
Hocken and Hunken. "Q" ... 672
Hoffman's Chance. Wm. Caine ... 797
Holiday Round, The. A. A. Milne... 448
Homeland and Outland. Song and Story. H. J. White 201
Home Rule from the Treasury Bench: Speeches during the First and Second Reading Debate 601
House of Life, The 701
Idle Hands. W. Clinton Ellis ... 764
Immortality and Life Eternal. W. P. Robertson 790
Impertinent Reflections. Cosmo Hamilton 312
In Camp and Kitchen: A Handy Guide for Emigrants and Settlers. Lucy H. Yates 405
In Defence of America. Baron von Taube 46
Indians of the Terraced Houses. C. F. Saunders 796
Industrial Punjab, The. A. Latifi ... 13
In Forbidden China. Vicomte D'Ollone 268
Inghilterra d'Oggi, L'. Signor Bevione 83, 113
Inheritance. Stuart Martin 484
In Portugal. Aubrey F. G. Bell ... 173
Instinct and Experience. Professor C. Lloyd Morgan 478
International Whitaker, 1913, The... 794
In the Garden. Margaret Cameron 140
Intimate Memoirs of Napoleon III. Late Baron D'Ambes ... 317, 346
Into Thy Hands. Arthur Applin ... 212
Introduction to the Poets. W. F. Rawnsley 264
Iscariot, The. Eden Phillpotts ... 201
Isochronisme dans le Vers Français, L'. Paul Verrier 506
Isochronisme en Musique et en Poésie, L'. Paul Verrier 506
Italians of To-day, The. Richard Bagot 337
Italy's War for a Desert. Francis McCullagh 50
Jean Cameron. William Otterstoun 605
John Graham, Sub-Lieutenant, R.N. Fleet-Surgeon T. T. Jeans, R.N. 110
John Hungerford Pollen. Anne Pollen 670
John, Jonathan and Company. James Milne 831
Johnsonian Gleanings: Part II.—Francis Barber, The Doctor's Negro Servant. Aleyn Lyell Reade ... 508
John. Strahan Richards 606
Journal of a Sporting Nomad, The. J. T. Studley... 210
Joyous Adventures of Aristide Pujol, The. W. J. Locke 734
King: A Tragedy in a Continuous Series of Scenes, The. Stephen Phillips... 399
Knickerbocker Days. Harris Tweed 212
Knightly Years, The. W. M. Ardagh 312
Lady Dorothy's Indiscretion. Arthur Applin 141
Lamora. Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick ... 342
Landmarks in the History of the Welsh Church. Rt. Rev. A. G. Edwards 823
Last Legitimate King of France, The. Phœbe Allen 730
Last Resort, The. H. F. Prevost Battersby 16
Leading Figures in European History. R. P. Dunn Pattison... 574
Leaves of Prose. Annie Matheson, with Two Studies by May Sinclair 9
Lectures and Essays of William Robertson Smith. J. S. Black and G. Chrystal 729
Left in Charge. Victor L. Whitechurch 576
Legends. August Strindberg ... 604
Legends of the Gods. E. A. Wallis Budge 169
Letters of George Meredith. Collected and Edited by his Son 565
Letters to Myself. A Woman of Forty 140
Life and Times of Rodrigo Borgia, Pope Alexander VI. Arnold H. Mathew 309
Life in the Indian Police. C. E. Gouldsbury 571
Life of Benjamin Disraeli, Earl of Beaconsfield, The. A. F. Monypenny 727, 789
Life of Cesare Borgia. Rafael Sabatini 69
Life of Edward Mountagu, The. F. R. Harris 202
Life of Sir Howard Vincent, The. S. H. Jeyes 696
Life of William Morris, The. J. W. Mackail... 439
Life of William Robertson Smith. J. S. Black and G. Chrystal ... 729
Life's Great Adventure. Francis Stopford 303
Life Understood from a Scientific and Religious Point of View. F. L. Rawson... 790
Light Side of London, The. E. B. d'Auvergne 672
Lions of the Lord, The. Harry Leon Wilson 210
Listeners, and Other Poems, The. Walter de la Mare 307
Little Aversion, A. C. T. Martin ... 178
Little Songs of Long Ago. Alfred Moffat... 736
Lords and Ladies of the Italian Lakes. Edgcumbe Staley 700
Lord Ripon in India. Nrisinha Chandra Banerjee 671
Lord Rutland est Shakespeare. Celestin Demblon 824
Lost Interest, A. Mrs. George Wemyss... 15
Louis XVII, and Other Papers. Philip Treherne 730
Love Gilds the Scene and Women Guide the Plot. Agnes and Egerton Castle 178
Love of Nature Among the Romans During the Later Decades of the Republic and the First Century of the Empire. Sir Archibald Geikie 334
Lovers, The. Eden Phillpotts ... 666
Love's Pilgrimage. Upton Sinclair 407
Love-Seeker, The. Maud Churton Braby 446
Love's Victories. M. M. Lee ... 372
Lower Depths, The. Maxim Gorky 76
Luke Shepherd. Dr. Friedrich Germann 440
Lure of the Sea, The. J. E. Patterson 201
Lushei Kuki Clans, The. Lieut.-Col. J. Shakespear... 601
Mafulu Mountain People, The. R. W. Williamson 236
Maids in Many Moods. H. Louisa Bedford... 46
Maitres de l'Art, Les. Louise Pillion 304
Making of Ireland, and Its Undoing, The. A. S. Green 802
Making of Poetry, The. Arthur H. R. Fairchild 505
Malta and the Mediterranean Race. R. N. Bradley 509
Manchester Politician, 1750-1912, The G. B. Hertz... 302
Manifeste Technique de la Littérature Futuriste. Signor Marinetti... 152
Marble Aphrodite, The. Anthony Kirby Gill 342
Marius, Saturninus und Glaucia: Beiträge zur Geschichte der Jahre 106-100 v. Chr. Dr. Frederick Walter Robinson 639
Marooned in the South Seas. F. L. Langdale 240
Marriage. H. G. Wells 372
Mary in the Market. H. Maxwell... 673
Mary Pechell. Mrs. Belloc Lowndes 511
Mary the Mother of Jesus. Alice Meynell... 830
Mary Wakefield: A Memoir. Rosa Newmarch 105
Masterpieces of Music. Edited by E. Hatzfeld 445, 831
Matriculation Directory, June, 1912... 77
May I Tell You a Story? Helen Mar 398
Mayor of Casterbridge, The. Thomas Hardy 535
Meilleure Part, La. Emile Poiteau... 404
Mes Souvenirs, 1848-1912 J. E. F. Massenet 443
Member of Tatt's, A. Nat Gould ... 212
Memories of James McNeill Whistler, the Artist. Thomas R. Way... 38
Men and Manners of Modern China. Rev. J. Maggowan 572
Mightier than the Sword. Alphonse Courlander 241
Mines of Isaiah Re-explored, The Rev. J. K. Cheyne 732
Miniatures. George A. B. Dewar ... 175
Miscellany of Men, A. G. K. Chesterton 762
Mission of Victoria Wilhelmina, The. Jeanne Magoun 702
Modern Democracy. Brougham Villiers... 231
Modernismus. O. Schultzky 142
Modern Market Place, The. "Coronet" 606
Molière du xxe Siècle: Bernard Shaw. A. Hamon 827
Mollie the Handful. Florence Warden 47
Morituri; Roses. Hermann Sudermann 826
Morocco in Diplomacy. E. D. Morel 108
Moscow. H. M. Grove 728
Mrs. Lancelot. Maurice Hewlett ... 482
Mrs. Humphry Ward, Her Work and Influence. J. Stuart Walters ... 178

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Mundas and Their Country, The. Sarat Chandra Roy 370
My Escapes. A Bachelor 272
My Life at Sea. Commander W. Caius Crutchley 233
My Life in Prison. Donald Lowrie 759
My Lord the Felon. Headon Hill ... 448
Mystery of Francis Bacon, The. William T. Smedley... 370
Naked Soul, The. Louise Heilgers 448
Napoleon's Son. Clara Tschudi ... 757
Narrative of the Visit to India of T.M. King George V and Queen Mary. Hon. John Fortescue ... 758
Nature's Nursery Tales. Rev. S. N. Sedgwick 699
Neighbours of Mine. R. Andom ... 272
Nelson's Encyclopædic Library ... 481
New Editions 16
New Essays, Literary and Philosophical. James Lindsay 106
New Humpty-Dumpty, The. Daniel Chaucer 510
Night in the Luxembourg, A. Remy de Gourmont 207
Nos Hommes d'Etat et l'Œuvre de Réforme. François Maury ... 267
Œuvres d'Horace-Satires. Paul Lejay 174
Off Beaten Tracks in Brittany. Emil Davies 52
Old Brent's Daughter. Helen C. Roberts 576
Old Gardens of Italy, The. Mrs. A. Le Blond 830
Old Irish World, The. A. S. Green 802
Omar Kheyyám traduit en Vers Français d'après la Célèbre Version Anglaise de Fitzgerald. J. H. Hallard 136
Omens and Superstitions of Southern India. Edgar Thurston ... 265
One of Us. Gilbert FranRau ... 204
One Welshman: A Glance at a Great Career. Whitelaw Reid 795
On Nature's Trail. F. St. Mars ... 699
On the Backwaters of the Nile. A. L. Kitching 207
Ordeal of Silence, The. By a Peer 578
Origines Diplomatiques de la Guerre de 1870-1871, Les. 76
Our Aky. M. E. Francis 764
Our Future Existence. Fred G. Shaw 790
Our Old Nursery Rhymes. Alfred Moffat 736
Our Reproach in India. H. P. K. Skipton 206
Outfit and Equipment. Sir Harry Johnston and Others 405
Outlines of the History of German Literature. J. G. Robertson ... 444
Oxford Country Described by Several Authors, The 139
Pair of Blue Eyes, A. Thomas Hardy 535
Palestine Exploration Fund Annual, 1911 401
Pan's Garden. Algernon Blackwood 446
Parsifal. T. W. Rolleston 732
Path of Social Progress, The. Mrs. George Kerr 337
Pavements and Pastures. Thomas Burke 538
Pearl of the East, The. M. T. Hainselin 607
Pension Kraus. Agnes Blundell ... 484
Pentateuchal Studies. H. M. Wiener 830
People of the Wild. F. St. Mars ... 699
People's Books, The 446
Permanent Uncle, The. Douglas Goldring 373
Persian Literature. Claude Field ... 797
Philippe II, Roi d'Espagne. Charles Brath 240
Photograms of the Year 1912. Edited by F. J. Mortimer 732
Picture Books 736
Picture Tales from Welsh Hills. Bertha Thomas 544
Pierre Rosegger. A. Vulliod ... 310
Pillars of Smoke. Mrs. Stanley Wrench... 449
Plato's "Apology" and "Crito," or "The Defence of Socrates" and "The Drama of Loyalty." A new Translation by C. L. Marson ... 540
Play Hours with Pegasus. A. P. Herbert 46
Play-Making. William Archer ... 40
Plays and Players in Modern Italy. Addison McLeod 269
Plutus of Aristophanes, The. Translated into English verse by Sir William Rann Kennedy 480
Poème Anglo-Saxon de Beswulf, Le. Hubert Pierquin 509
Poems and Songs. Richard Middleton 761
Poems. Clifford King... 397
Poems. Seumas O'Sullivan 663
Poems. W. E. Lutyens 538
Poems. William Sharp 138
Poems of Love and Earth. John Drinkwater 825
Poet and the Poetic Principle, The. L. Conrad Hartley 106
Poet's Chantry, The. Katherine Bregy 367
Poets of Ireland, The. D. J. O'Donoghue... 445
Politique Musulmane de la Hollande. Four Lectures by C. Snouck Hurgronje 14
Posthumous Essays of John Churton Collins, The. Edited by L. C. Collins... 134
'Prentice Days and Other Poems. H. J. White 201
Présences. P. J. Jouve 701
Price She Paid, The. David Graham Phillips... 482
Printing Papers: A Handbook for the Use of Publishers and Printers ... 481
Promised Land, The. Mary Antin... 637
Psychology and Crime. Thomas Holmes... 237
Quest of the Golden Rose, The. John Oxenham 512
Race of Circumstance, The. H. R. Campbell 607
Râma and Homer. Arthur Lillie ... 236
Rambles in the Park. Wm. J. Claxton 140
Random Notes and Reflections. Joseph Harris... 45
Ravageurs, Les. J. H. Fabre ... 699
Recollections of a Court Painter. H. Jones Thaddeus 6
Recollections of a Great Lady: Being More Memoirs of the Comtesse de Boigne... 266
Rei Lear, Lo. Translated by Aufos Par 671
Religious Experience of Saint Paul, The. Percy Gardner 268
Religion of Sciences, The. James W. Lee 311
Religions of the Ancient Celts, The. J. A. MacCulloch 608
Reminiscences of a Blackwall Midshipman. W. J. Downie 210
Republican France, 1870-1912. "Le Petit Homme Rouge" 665
Retrospect, The. Ada Cambridge ... 271
Return of Peter Grimm, The. David Belasco... 673
Revelations. Robert Bryant 576
Ridge of the White Waters, The. William C. Scully 339
Rogues in Arcady. Sir William Magnay, Bart. 406
Roman Anglais Contemporain, Le. Firmin Roz 171
Romance of Bayard, The. Lieut.-Colonel Haggard 544
Romance of Sandro Botticelli woven from His Paintings, The. A. J. Anderson 404
Romance of Submarine Engineering. T. W. Corbin 481
Romances of the French Theatre. Francis Gribble 472
Romance of the Impossible, A. Paul Bookham 111
Romance of Wills and Testaments, The. Edgar Vine Hall 336
Romantic Trials of Three Centuries, The 795
Rusted Hinges. St. Clair Harnett ... 543
Saimi Tervola. Hilma Pylkkanen ... 406
Sally. Dorothea Conyers 576
Samphire. Lady Sybil Grant... ... 830
Savetier des Fées, Le. Adapted by E. Magee 212
Scottish Prose of the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries. John Hepburn Millar 340
Sculpteurs Français du XIIIe. Siècle, Les. Louise Pillion 304
Secret of Germany's Expansion, The. "44" 597
Secret of the Pacific, The. C. Reginald Enoch 333
Selected Essays by Ahad Ha'Am. Translated from the Hebrew by Leon Simon 12
Sensations of Paris. Rowland Strong 403
Shadow Show, The. J. H. Curle ... 9
Sheep and its Cousins, The. R. Lydekker 825
Sheila Vedder. Amelia E. Barr ... 407
Shoreless Sea, The. Sybil C. Lethbridge 407
Signal, and Other Stories, The. W. M. Garshin 47
Sign, The. Mrs. Romilly Fleddon ... 449
Simon Brandin. B. Paul Neuman ... 578
Sin of Youth, The. Leslie Mortimer 407
Sixty Years of Progress and Fiscal Policy. Earl Brassey 175
Social Guide, 1912, The. Edited by Mrs. Hugh Adams and Edith A. Browne 77
Social Insurance in Germany, 1883-1911. W. Harbutt Dawson ... 337
Some Christmas Books 612
Some Christmas Issues 737
Some German Women and Their Salons. Mary Hargrave 37
Some New French Books. Marc Logé 82, 611
Some Poems of Lionel Johnson. Introduction by Louise Imogen Guiney 201
Song in September. Norman Gale 538
Songs at Random. Oliver Davies ... 201
Songs of a Syrian Lover. Clinton Scollard 397
Songs of the Open Air. George A. Greene 397
Songs of the Prairie. Robert J. C. Stead 397
Songs Out of Exile. Cullen Gouldsbury 538
Sonnets and Ballate of Guido Cavalcanti. With Translations of them and an Introduction by Ezra Pound 542
Sorcery Club, The. Elliott O'Donnell 798
South America: Observations and Impressions. Rt. Hon. James Bryce 639
South America. Painted by A. S. Forrest. Described by W. H. Koebel 672
Spes Vitæ and Other Poems. Robert Calignoc 640
Spring Days. George Moore ... 511
Star Dream, The. Ellen M. Dobinson 830
Star of the East, A. Charles E. Pearce 483
St. Lô. Dorothy M. Stuart ... 605
Stories Old and New 212
Story of Jerusalem, The. Colonel C. M. Watson 401
Story of Saint Elizabeth of Hungary, The. W. Canton 830
Street called Straight, The. Author of "The Inner Shrine" 733 Street of the Flute Player, The. H. de Vere Stacpoole 577
Streets of Ascalon, The. Robert W. Chambers 641
Strother's Journal. Edited by Cæsar Caine 209
Studies and Appreciations by William Sharp. Selected and Arranged by Mrs. William Sharp 138
Studies in Arcady. R. L. Gales ... 176
Studies in Jacob Böhme. A. J. Penny 8
Sunshine Sketches of a Little Town. Stephen Leacock 238

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Superman in Being, A. Litchfield Woods 311
Supremacy of Public Opinion in a Constitutional Empire, The. "Quisque" 175
Survey of English Literature, 1780-1830. Oliver Elton 792
Syndicalism: A Critical Examination. J. Ramsay MacDonald 203
Syndicalism and the General Strike. Arthur D. Lewis 203
Syrische Barbara-Legende, Die. Dr. Wilhelm Weyh 510
Temple of Dreams, The. Paul Bo'ld 241
Things That Pass. Alice E. Robins 733
Things That Women Do, The. Florence Warden 212
Thirteen Years of a Busy Woman's Life. Mrs. Alec Tweedie ... 476
Thorn-bush near the Door, The. Sophie Cole 311
Thoughts of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius Antoninus. Translated by George Long 599
Through Dante's Land. Mrs. Colquhan Grant 541
Through Greece and Dalmatia. Mrs. Russell Barrington 307
Through Holland in the "Vivette." E. Keble Chatterton 507
Through the Ivory Gate. Reginald Farrer 513
Told by the Ayah. Advena Hearle 543
Top Farm, The. Algernon Gissing... 177
Touchstone of Fortune, The. Charles Major 177
Tragedy in Stone, and Other Papers, A. Lord Redesdale 306
Tramp's Sketches, A. Stephen Graham 637
Traveller's Tales. "The Princess" 11
Treasure of Thule. B. D. Steward 484
Trespasser, The. D. H. Lawrence ... 449
Triuniverse, The. By the Author of "Space and Spirit" 511
Troisième Puissance, La Roman traduit du Hongrois de Géza Gárdonyi 211
True Temper of Empire, The. Sir Charles Bruce 42
True Traveller, The. W. H. Davies 339
Tudor Drama, The. C. F. Tucker Brooke 10
Two Kings. Cosmo Hamilton ... 606
Two on a Tower. Thomas Hardy... 535
Tyranny of Trade Unions, The. One Who Resents It 177
Unbearable Bassington, The. H. H. Munro 702
Unseen Friends. Mrs. William O'Brien 793
Until that Day. Harold Wintle ... 605
Upas Tree, The. Florence L. Barclay 577
Ush: The Revelation of Bandobast Wilderness. "Adelphos" 213
Vagrom Men. Alfred T. Story ... 42
Vale: A Book of Verse. Leonard Inkster 397
Valserine, and Other Stories. Margaret Andoux 540
Value of a Maimed Life. Extracts from the Manuscript Notes of Thomas Wedgwood 270
Vancouver to the Coronation. J. J. Miller 670
Vicar's Secret, The. C. E. Jeffery... 141
Viceroys of Ireland, The. Charles O'Mahony 631
Vie Politique dans les Deux Mondes La (October, 1910—September, 1911). Edited by A. Viallate and M. Caudel 210
Virgin Royal, The. Mrs. Donald Shaw 484
Voice of One Crying, The. E. Gibson Cheyne 762
War and the Private Citizen. A. Pearce Higgins 237
W. B. Yeats. Jethro Bithell ... 340
Waster, The. Mrs. Henry Tippett ... 342
Wearing of the Shuttle, The. C. H. Cautley 702
Web of the Golden Spider, The. Frederick Orin Bartlett 240
What Diantha Did. Charlotte Perkins Gilman 272
What the Judge Saw. His Honour Judge Parry 634
Whitaker's Almanack, 1913 794
Whitaker's Peerage, Baronetage, Knightage, and Companionage, 1913 794
White Ashes. S. R. Kennedy and A. C. Noble 512
Whitman's Print-Collector's Handbook. Additional Chapters by Malcolm C. Salaman 574
White Knights, The. T. G. Wakeling 831
Who's Who, 1913 794
William Hone: His Life and Times. F. W. Harkwood 794
William Morris: A Critical Study. John Drinkwater 439
William Morris, His Homes and Haunts. Countess of Warwick ... 9
Windyridge. W. Riley 512
Wings of Love. C. Ranger Gull ... 78
Wirtschaftlichen Grundlagen des Modernen Kunstgewerbes in London, Die. Dr. Bruno Ranecker 639
With Dante in Modern Florence. Mary E. Lacy 239
Witnesses to the Historicity of Jesus, The. Arthur Drews 101
Woman Between, The. Edmund Bosanquet 77
Woman's Suffrage. Heber Hart ... 337
Woman Wonderful, The. Wilfred Hemery 111
Woodlanders, The. Thomas Hardy... 535
Wooing of Margaret Trevenna, The. Roy Meldrum 544
Works of Francis Beaumont and John Fletcher. A. H. Bullen ... 830
Writers' and Artists' Year Book, 1913 794
Writing the Short Story. J. Berg Esenwein 762
Zola Dictionary, A. J. G. Patterson 137
1913, and Other Essays. Alfred Edward Carey 9
'Ορατίου ᾠδαί, κατὰ μετάφρασιν Πανεμμόλπου. Τόμου ά τεῦχος ά 796

THE THEATRE.

Adventure of Aristide Pujil" at the Haymarket Theatre, "An 703
"Aladdin" of the Follies at the Empire 799
"Art and Opportunity" at the Prince of Wales Theatre 375
"Autumn Manœuvres" at the Adelphi Theatre 142
"Beastie" at the Little Theatre ... 800
"Ben-my-Chree" at the New Prince's Theatre 48
"Birthright" at the Court Theatre... 79
"Captain Brassbound's Conversion" at the Little Theatre 547
Charity Matinee at the St. James's Theatre, A 766
Coliseum, The 418
"Curios" at the Coliseum 766
Dancing Mistress" at the Adelphi, "The 607
"Dolly's Little Bills" at the Hippodrome 142
"Doormats" at Wyndham's Theatre 485
"Drake" at His Majesty's Theatre 318
Dumb and the Blind" at the Prince of Wales' Theatre, "The 740
Earl's Court Tourney, The 80
"Echo and Narcissus" at the King's Hall Theatre 80
Eldest Son" at the Kingsway Theatre, "The 738
Empire, The 452
"Everywoman" at Drury Lane Theatre 374
"Family Failing" at the Court Theatre 24
Girl in the Taxi" at the Lyric Theatre, "The 352
Golden Doom" at the Haymarket Theatre, "The 703
Good Hope" at the King's Hall, "The 608
Grass Widows" at the Apollo Theatre, "The 353
Great John Ganton" at the Aldwych Theatre, "The 408
Harem Lily" at the London Pavilion, "The 799
"Hedda Gabler" at Clavier Hall ... 740
"Honour Thy Father" at the Little Theatre 800
Ideal Wife" at the Vaudeville Theatre, "The 112
"If We Had Only Known" at the Little Theatre 798
Imaginary Conversation" at the Prince of Wales' Theatre, "An... 739
"Instinct" at the Duke of York's Theatre 675
Irish Players at the Court Theatre, The 24, 78
Little Caffe" at the Playhouse, "The 451
"Little Miss Llewelyn" at the Vaudeville Theatre 319
Malingerers" at the Prince of Wales' Theatre, "The 740
Marriage of the Soul" at the King's Hall, "The 80
Masqueraders" at the St. James's Theatre, "The. 142
Master of Pageantry at "Shakespeare's England," A 80
Miss Margaret Morris and Her Dancing Children at the Kingsway Theatre 739
Mr. Frohman's Triple Bill 242
New "Revue" at the New Alhambra, The 579
"Officer 666" at the Globe Theatre 642
Only Way" at the Hippodrome, "The 578
Open Door" at the Lyceum, "The 514
"Overruled" at the Duke of York's Theatre 546
Penny Bunch" at the Vaudeville Theatre, "A 643
Pioneer Players at the Little Theatre, The 800
Price" at the Aldwych Theatre, "The 766
"Ready Money" at the New Theatre 213
"Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm" at the Globe Theatre 320
"Riders to the Sea" at the Court Theatre 78
"Rosalind" at the Duke of York's Theatre 546
"Sandy and His Eliza" on Tour 607
Scrape o' the Pen" at the Comedy Theatre, "A 353
Some New French Plays. Marc Logé 676, 804
"Sylvia Greer" at the Queen's Theatre 704
"Tantrums" at the Criterion ... 578
Thumbscrew" at the Little Theatre, "The 800
Tide" at the Queen's Theatre, "The 832
"Troilus and Cressida" at the King's Hall, Covent Garden ... 799
Turning-Point" at the St. James's Theatre, "The 484
"Twelfth Night" at the Savoy ... 674
Venetian Night" at the Palace Theatre, "A 643
Visit of the King" at the Palace Theatre, "The 766
Voysey Inheritance" at the Kingsway Theatre, "The 354
Waldies" at the Haymarket Theatre, "The 764
"Where the Rainbow Ends" at the Garrick Theatre 833
"Where There's a Will—" at the Criterion Theatre 765
Widow of Wasdale Head" at the Duke of York's Theatre, "The ... 546
Winter's Tale" at the Savoy Theatre, "The 417
Younger Generation," at the Haymarket Theatre, "The 703
Young Man's Fancy" at the Criterion Theatre, "A 451
"Zaza" at the Queen's Theatre ... 546

Published for the Proprietor by WM. DAWSON & SONS, LIMITED, at Cannon House, Breams Buildings, London, E.C. Branches in Canada: Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg; in South Africa: Capetown, Johannesburg, and Durban.
Printed by BONNER & Co., The Chancery Lane Press, Rolls Passage, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

CONTENTS

	PAGE
Notes of the Week	3
From Victor Hugo	4
England does not love Coalitions	4
Poetry and the Public ...	5
A Genial Gossip	6
Reviews:
A Seventeenth Century Mystic	8
Various Studies	9
Anatole France at his Best	10
The Springs of English Drama	10
A l'Américaine	11
A New Philosophy of Judaism	12
A Great Property	13
Shorter Reviews	13
Fiction	15
New Editions	16
Music	16
Pilgrims and Pilgrimage ...	18
Foreign Reviews	19
Some Indian Reviews ...	21
At St. Stephen's Shrine ...	22
The Theatre:
The Irish Players	24
Notes and News	25
Imperial and Foreign Affairs	26
Motoring and Aviation ...	27
In the Temple of Mammon...	28
Correspondence	29
Books Received	31

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C., where all communications to the Editor should be addressed.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Notes of the Week

WE publish this week two excellent letters—one by a Radical and one by a Tory—on the Anglo-German position. We do not, of course, accept responsibility for every phrase or sentiment expressed in either, but—in essentials—they confirm the editorial view expressed in our issue of April 27 last, in which we advocated the cessation of the senseless antagonism—based on no vital considerations—which has long prevailed between Germany and Great Britain. We protested then—as we protest now—against the eternal theory of the necessity of bribes. We heartily acquiesced in the position maintained in an able article in the Contemporary Review:—"Assuming that good-will and good-faith exist on both sides, a permanent accord could be struck up with ease and promptitude." There is no real quarrel, no fundamental cause of hostility, but there are clouds of prejudice and misunderstanding to be dispersed. Will the great German diplomatist who is now with us succeed in completing a task which we believe is already far advanced towards a solution?

Away on the coast of Cornwall, Poldhu, a little spot unheard of by Londoners before the era of wireless telegraphy, has recently been the scene of a notable gathering. For a short time the most important countries of the world "rang up" Poldhu and expressed good wishes to the International Radio-Telegraphic Convention there assembled; Canada, Spain, Italy, New York, all sent their messages through the air to this tiny corner of the West Country, and as Mr. Marconi himself was present to explain matters to the visitors the occasion was one of exceptional interest. We are becoming so accustomed to wonders that these applications of science and discovery to ordinary life cease to surprise us; but it was not so very long ago that the telephone came into general use. And, by the way, it will not be so very long before the telephone becomes an antiquity, if the "right number" continues to evade our wistful call in its present aggravating manner. Soon it will be easier and quicker to send a wireless message to the other side of London than to "ring up" our friends with the instrument of perversity which adorns our walls and desks and devastates our tempers.

Let us not take too seriously Lord Rosebery's sweeping indictment of those two irrepressible friends of our earlier days, Mr. Bob Sawyer and Mr. Benjamin Allen, as "the vilest specimens of the human race." In spite of his assertion, we venture to say that very few people "grew to manhood under the impression that medical students were composed" exclusively of Sawyers and Allens; and although he expressed his disbelief that they ever existed, they existed for us in the pages of "Pickwick," and surely that is enough. In his zeal for the noblest secular profession in the world, a profession that fights death continually yet without hope of conquering in the long run, Lord Rosebery grieves us by trimming his sails to a side-wind of fancy. Probably Dickens never meant for a moment that the lively Bob and the mournfully sentimental Ben should be taken as representatives of the doctors of those days; as for us, we may be content to accept them gratefully for the sake of the laughter they have caused. There are moods when "Pickwick" is more welcome than any other book, and then "Sawyer, late Nockemorf," is part of the fun.

We should like to compliment Messrs. Charles Knight and Co. on the production of their handy Insurance Cabinet, which is cheap at the price of one shilling. The case can stand comfortably on a desk. It is divided into compartments for contributors' cards, etc. The same firm have sent us their householders' help to the National Insurance Act, 1911, which is extracted from their excellent "Everybody's Guide." Personally we think that only heaven can help people immersed in this gruesome mess called legislation, but we do not blame Messrs. Knight for endeavouring to scale the supernal heights.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

From Victor Hugo

"Oh! quand je dors. . . ."

OH! While I sleep come near my resting-place
As Laura came to Petrarch's dreams erewhile,
And let thy breath in passing touch my face,
Then all at once my lips
Shall half unclose and smile.

Over my brow, where darkly brooding lies
Some long-drawn gloomy vision of the night,
Let but thy look, like some clear planet, rise,
And all at once my dream
Shall turn to something bright.

Last on my lips, where trembles the new bliss,
The fire electric, pure from Heaven above;
Angel no more, but woman! lay one kiss
And all at once my soul
Shall waken up to love.

[1888. Translated by the late Canon Ellerton. As far as is known, hitherto unprinted, and published in THE ACADEMY by special permission.]

England does not love Coalitions

IN 1852 Mr. Disraeli enunciated the proposition that England does not love coalitions. During the half century since the words were uttered, coalitions have been infrequent. The most honourable and the most memorable has been that to prevent the grant of Home Rule to Ireland as a concession to dynamite. The days of 1886—never to be forgotten by those who were closely concerned in them—must ever be a record of the dauntless courage and inflexible resolve of those members of the Liberal Party who faced probable assassination and certain obloquy from those with whom their ties were of the closest, rather than betray the trust which their country reposed in them. The great meeting at the Opera House, when Lord Salisbury, Lord Hartington, Lord Cowper, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Plunket, and Mr. Rylands—Radical of Radicals—met on the same platform to denounce the craven surrender to outrage can never fade from the memory of those who were privileged to be present at it. That Coalition has, after an endurance of twenty-five years, eventuated in amalgamation with a no less worthy object than that which initiated the original partnership.

The country is again in danger. A coalition of a totally different character threatens, and has in one instance shattered the bulwarks of stable government and the fundaments of national prosperity. It is a pitiful and a sordid spectacle, viewed at a time when the orator of Empire is exclaiming:—

> It is not only the Empire, but it is the world itself which has need of all the character, all the honesty, and all the ability which it contains, developed or undeveloped, to carry it on without the danger of anarchy and chaos.

All the character! All the honesty! O, tempora! O, mores! A Coalition Government has for six years been flouting the will of the people, overturning the Constitution of the realm, truckling to violence, and pandering to the meanest passions of the flotsam and jetsam of the population. The Unholiest of Unholy Alliances—the vital interests of the nation have been put up to auction first to the Irish ally, and next to the tyrants who hold honest labour in thraldom.

> Let them not taste the hire
> Of their iniquitie.

That, alas! is what they not only taste, but what they habitually batten on.

At last a rift is apparent. The ignoble compact, like other monstrous creations, had not the element of permanence in it. There is no finality to blackmail.

The Liberal Party are now warned off the course at Hanley and Crewe. Hanley is claimed as a Labour seat, a somewhat cool contention when it is borne in mind that Mr. Enoch Edwards was defeated in a straight fight by a Conservative as recently as 1906. Crewe never has been a Labour seat, and the claim to it is fantastic. The degradation of the Government is absolute. The Irish members, having little enthusiasm for the Home Rule scheme, and little belief in the will or the power of the Government to ensure its passage into law, are very unreliable attendants in the House of Commons; they have only one bribe to claim, and they see pretty clearly that they have been cajoled. The Socialist Labour man is insatiable. He "wants it all," and judging of the fibre which the Government have displayed he has little doubt that he can obtain his demands if he threatens sufficiently loudly.

Crewe and Hanley. It is a brutally brazen demand, but it is eloquent of the estimation in which the Government is held by its camp-followers.

We have no desire to immerse ourselves in the morass of political chicanery, but we should like to ask the people of this country whether they still cherish the illusion that they are being governed under a representative system. We can see nothing but the tables of the money-changers, and the methods of the huckster.

In the name of decency will the Government at last make a stand, and refuse to sacrifice the Paschal lamb of reputation to rapacious mercenaries?

We think not. We think they will pass beneath the yoke, and retain their offices and their salaries.

CECIL COWPER.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Poetry and the Public

IT would be interesting to know what the leading lights of the intellectual world would reply to the following two questions: (1) Why has poetry steadily lost prestige since the death of Wordsworth (1850), so that it has now generally ludicrous connotations in the mind of the ordinary man? (2) What must our present-day poets do to regain the respect due to it? If one refrains from gathering a symposium on the subject it is due to the fear that the eminent few are themselves tainted with the same cynical views that now pervade the million, so that the majority of answers would run: (1) Because no great poets have appeared since that date. (2) Write great poetry.

While believing that this first statement is true so far as it goes, probably the inferences which would be drawn therefrom would be wholly unjustified. That since 1850 no personality has arisen as a mouth-piece of that "natural piety" which is the common basis of our emotions, and, in a healthy state (whether individual or social), has the ordering and guidance of our likings and aversions, is unhappily true enough. In an age of unfaith it is difficult to find any common basis for appealing to the emotions, since the arrogant reason is always ready to flout all sincere feeling as the mere self-indulgence of those whose intellect is not keen enough to mark either the source or the purpose of the passions that waylay them. This, is, indeed, the one and only theme of Mr. Shaw's plays, and is symptomatic of an age when the fine arts have become utterly divorced from life, and are no longer the handmaidens of the social instincts, either trivial or serious. In so far as any present-day poetry is allied to social instincts, it generally speaks with a voice of protest, dismay, or despair utterly inimical to the "pure religion breathing household laws" so cherished by our grandparents. The poetry of Wordsworth's generation expressed the general aspirations of a vast bulk of people, as is now clear from a philosophic survey of that period. Scott rendered articulate the sentiments vaguely felt in what we now know as the "Gothic revival," the alliance between man and the hills that overshadow him and the homes that shelter; in Byron the same feeling of pious awe for nature as the arena for heroic exploits or the stern corrector of mean ones is implicit throughout, while Wordsworth himself, in whose work all this is equally inherent, lifts it to another plane by an omission, in general, of any insistence on the purely grandiose elements in men's history (such as battles and the pomps of kingship), insisting on the "natural piety" that creates its own transcendent world from the commonest elements and the lowliest duties. Shelley's faith in the latent possibilities of man led him "to fear himself and love all human kind," and to hail "Earth, Ocean, Air" as one "beloved brotherhood."

The generation that succeeded Wordsworth, undermined by industrialism and evolution, added nothing to our store of beauty as regards any conception of our relation to the universe in which we live. It added enormously in metrical accomplishment, sheer virtuosity reaching its final apotheosis in Swinburne, where the poet, at first holding the hounds of rhyme and alliteration well in leash, is finally dragged clean off his feet by the tugging pair. The poetry of this period is almost wholly the poetry of introspection and self-analysis varied by occasional word-painting of extreme fineness. The self-questioning of sincere men who want to do the right but confess they do not know it, whose tragic lot it is to be endowed with instincts for beauty which have outlived their power of trusting the old sanctions and prohibitions in whose fulfilling it was once to be found—we have that on the one hand; and on the other is the poetry of nervous sensations, which convey a serious import only to people of tender years, often impelling them to dire lamentation or revolt over a life as yet unseen in focus. Neither category of song conduces to the idea of an apostolate in the singer, since the first insists on our incurable wretchedness and the second insists only on joys that cannot survive a cold in the head or a twinge of neuralgia.

Poetry to win respect from the ordinary man must be by way of an affirmation. Rightly or wrongly to the normal English mind, poetry stands or falls by its effect as a help or hindrance to living, and hence by its insistence on "man's unconquerable mind." "But," the reader may object, "to appraise poetry thus is to mistake and misjudge the whole nature and meaning of æsthetic endeavour." That may or may not be so; we merely notice the phenomenon without ratifying the opinion.

> I am the master of my fate,
> I am the captain of my soul.

is one of the few affirmations of "man's unconquerable mind" made in our own time that has achieved instant and assured popularity. But an age that is seriously asking whether—since man is a product of heredity and environment and his thought and conduct necessarily conditioned by these—he can have an "unconquerable mind" has oftener produced a poet "tired of myself and sick of asking"; or another who hopes wistfully—> that good shall fall

> At last far off, at last to all
> And every winter turn to spring.

or a third who astonishes us with the agile shuffling of "Bishop Blougram's Apology" (though he wins our popular acclaim with his "Epilogue" and "Prospice"); or a fourth who > strives to build a shadowy isle of bliss

> Midmost the beating of the steely sea, seeking that "escape from life" (which only a modern critic could have proffered as an excuse for art), by re-telling old tales that are utterly remote from life as we know it.

If we recall some of the best-known lines of standard English poetry and the strong and noble affirmations lying behind them, such as those to which the following are an index:—

> The expanse of spirit in a waste of shame—
> It is not growing like a tree—

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The glories of our blood and state—
When I consider how my light is spent—
The World is too much with us—

we see at once that our past poetry has enshrined an ethical sentiment which has come home to the hearts and bosoms of men without descending to the tameness and obviousness of writers, such as Ella Wheeler Wilcox, who now usurp the throne and receive the tribute due to the authentic singer.

WILFRID THORLEY.

A Genial Gossip*

By HALDANE MACFALL.

THE author of this gossip volume disarms criticism by frankly confessing himself what his enemies—if so genial a fellow have enemies, except the enemies of all success—will undoubtedly call him, a lover of the great ones. Yet a snob in the worst sense he cannot be. He makes no disguise of his real name being Jones—which he wisely changed for Thaddeus, realising that a name should be a label. This is typical of the sound commonsense of the man throughout his life; so far as the years have already taken him. A downright snob would have buried Jones at midnight in the coal-cellar, and left him there hidden for ever. The frontis-piece, a quick, deft self-portrait, reveals the man to be much what the pen thereafter completes as portrait, a soldierly-looking, shrewdly diplomatic, forthright fellow, "bound to get on," with no neck for servility, but liking the great ones so be that their company did not compel humiliations upon him. Such is stuff for the making of a good gossip; and Mr. Thaddeus's volume is jolly reading. 'Tis true he has the flaw of journalese; and to drink a glass of whisky is to "pour out a libation upon the altar of Bacchus," even donkeys become "steeds," and "the former" and "the latter" do most hideously abound. Mr. Thaddeus opens well; plunges a header into the stream; and except for somewhat empty letters from the very highly placed, never wearies with the tedious stuff that makes the reading of the average biography so dull an adventure. He had the good fortune to win early in life the favour of the Royal House of Teck; and his genial gifts soon made him a wide circle of friends. He has his weaknesses—like most of us he considers the best critic to be that man who speaks well of him; but we may drop as of poor value his support of such allies; his word in such matters is of no account. Therefore let us to the sub-stance of his volume, though one shrewdly suspect he is a better talker than writer.

Of Irish stock, the young Thaddeus had the good luck to begin his training at ten in the art school of Cork, and with a breezy description of that school his book opens. By fourteen the lad had so well mastered drawing from the antique that he was made assistant-master. At seventeen the youth crossed the Channel and went to the historic school in London called Heatherley's, that picturesque old master being still lord of the school. Heatherley figures in a delicious story. The mild old man, with long white flowing beard, and arrayed in dressing-gown and skull cap, if he knew little of art, at least insisted on a lofty attitude towards the models, whom he arranged on Monday mornings, whilst the students waited outside the doors. Now each student set his palette and laid it on his allotted chair before retiring beyond the door; and Thaddeus tells of the girl model who, becoming tired owing to the long and tedious arrangement of the foreground draperies by old Heatherley, took a rest and sat down on one of the set palettes. The prim old man was feverishly trying to get off the paint when the students, grown restive, broke into the room to find the distracted Heatherley scraping with palette-knife and rubbing with turpentine the painted lady. The scene of wild laughter that fol-lowed may be well imagined. And, be it remembered, these were the students of the late 'seventies, when the wild devilments of students, art and medical, and Sand-hurst cadets, to say nothing of the 'varsities, used to make "the Pav." music-hall a place of reckless and foolish riot of a Saturday night.

Young Thaddeus was soon in the literary set; and at nineteen made for Paris, which he, of course, calls "the gay city." Of the student life in "the Quarter" he gives a somewhat disappointingly sketchy survey marred by the "fine writing" that overwhelms even good story-tellers when they "take up the pen"; for instance: "It culminated in an orgy with my boon companions which terminated with the morning light illuminating our tottering footsteps as we sought our respective abodes." Mr. Garvin could not beat that. Our author seems to have had his eyes always on the road of convention; for, from Paris, he went inevitably to Pont-Aven, and thence to Concarneau. Thereafter he met Edmond de Goncourt and Alphonse Daudet, but seems unable to give any impression of them. At twenty-two he shakes the life bohemian from him and makes for Florence—which he, of course, calls "the Cradle of European Art." After a punishing introduc-tion to mosquitoes the young fellow settled in a studio that had once belonged to the loathsome order of the Murati, or walled-in nuns. The Guelphs and Ghibel-lines, by the way, were somewhat more complicated than Mr. Thaddeus's neat and clear definition states—at the same time it is quite true that the Renaissance nobility of Italy were not Italians at all, but Goths and Germans, as the fair type reveals; whilst their hereditary foes, the Guelphs, were the wealthy Italian merchant class. Nor can one well speak of the "virility" of a horse.

At last our artist, being now twenty-three, was intro-duced to the Duke of Teck, who seems to have taken a fancy to him and thereby established his fortune. Mr. Thaddeus becomes quite Italian in his description of the royal couple, and we get little nearer to the per-sonality of the amiable and widely loved duchess than the bland compliments and exaggerative phrases in which the characters of the royalties suffer drowning. This is the more the pity since the Duchess of Teck was a remarkable woman whose personality was well worth recording; but our author proves, long before we reach the middle of his volume, that he is not greatly endowed with the literary gift of portraiture. Indeed, halfway through the book came an alarming uneasiness; for we are given long dreary details of visits which bore us as solemnly as they must have bored those who took part in them—whilst the lists of grandees at tea-parties become as wearisome as the Gazette, or Bankruptcy lists.

* Recollections of a Court Painter. By H. JONES THADDEUS. Illustrated. (John Lane. 12s. 6d. net.)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

However, the Duchess of Teck had opened to him the gates to success; and he returned to London full of introductions to the great. An interesting flashlight is given here and there, as in the Home Rule tendencies of the Duchess of Cambridge as against the solid opposition of the whole of the rest of the royal family. But for the most part we travel in trains—luncheon details are given with solemn unction—and "the Duke and myself" go to sleep, or, as Mr. Thaddeus has it, "fall into the arms of Morpheus." But he shows, between the lines, that even the German royalties are very human, simple folk, unspoilt by splendour most of the time, and wonderfully tame when treated kindly. Here and there his quick observation reveals itself, where he does not feel hampered by the friendship of the great; and his deft description of the break-up of society at Florence owing to the Czar's recall of the Russian grandees who were grinding down their peasants in absentee landlordism to maintain their lavish Florentine hospitality—and his picture of the Florentine grandees making a great outward show of fine carriages and dresses, but going home to their gloomy palaces to "partake" (oh, Mr. Thaddeus! partake) of their grim dinners of macaroni or tripe—all this has much tart Irish humour in its convincingness.

Lady Orford's receptions, as that wonderful old lady smoked cigars and overlooked moral weaknesses in the amusing rips of her English salons, are clearly put before us, and her ladyship is a quick pen-portrait of which one desires more. Queen Natalie of Servia, who used to walk about the streets bareheaded, her dark hair down her back; Mr. Livingstone, with his coach and sixteen horses; the pearl-loving Princess Wornzoff; the jewel-bedecked Jewess, Countess de Talleyrand; her bald-headed Count de Talleyrand, with his large range of wigs of different length, and the necessity of the fashionable to beg the name of his barber on the days when he commenced to wear the shortest, these are all sketched with gossip skill. The care taken to make the Royal Academy accept the painter's portrait of Queen Mary of England makes amusing reading.

In the spring of 1887, before leaving Florence, the painter made his well-known portrait of Gladstone, which brought forth Mrs. Gladstone's whispered caution: "Above all things, my dear, agree with him in everything he says." At Cannes he again met and gives a fine account of the noble-soul'd Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin; and a first-hand account from the lips of the Grand Duchess Vladimir of the hair-breadth escape of the Czar and the Court in St. Petersburg, due to the unique act of the Czar in being a few minutes late for dinner—a fact which foiled the anarchists, who blew up the dining-room of the palace just as the imperial party reached the door, who, kneeling in the darkness whilst the Czar called to prayer, praying until the palace was relit, found a gaping abyss before them—banquet and banquetting hall, servants and floor, all vanished into the void. This awful incident is unrelieved by the humour of the Irishman who entertained the earthquake: all Nice had rushed from the houses into the public square, clad in night apparel, at the first shock; when, huddled in crowds trembling with panic, they heard a piano strike up in a great deserted restaurant and a rich baritone brogue sing, "We won't go home till morning." We get a glimpse of our artist's own cool head and resource in time of danger in his adventure whilst painting in Algeria—an ugly situation saved by his Irish pluck and genial commonsense.

Of Rome and the Romans Mr. Thaddeus gives one of his best pictures, and by the time he reaches London his pen runs more fluently. There is an excellent story of two diplomats with handsome wives—the two men who sit up late and forget their rooms, to which our Court Painter guides them after midnight—but one must not spoil one of the best stories in the book. The extravagances of Jan van Beers, the conceit and pettiness of Whistler, the difficulties of painting Irish M.P.'s before the subscribers had changed to deadly enemies; Du Chaillu of gorilla fame; Lord Cromer; Lord Dufferin's donkey race with Lord Charles Beresford—these are among our painter's best descriptions.

I am just returned from looking upon Lord Ronald Gower's "Shakespeare Group" at Stratford-on-Avon, and it reveals that our Court Painter is a poor authority on statuary. Of Egypt, of the foul rule of Ismail, of the purification of the land by Lord Cromer, of the dire result of the Queen's not understanding the Oriental mind; of Society taking the waters at Homburg, including the American woman-climber to titles; of the breach between Edward VII and the Emperor William; of the serious Australian problem of the destruction of child-life; and on all subjects concerning religion Mr. Thaddeus is worth reading.

For one who has passed his career largely in "villas replete with every luxury," as our author puts it, Mr. Thaddeus cannot be expected to frame his phrases in a simpler style; it would not go with the plush hangings; but whilst one suspects that the shorthand writer would have made a better book from his talk, one must pay him the tribute of witness that his painted portraiture shows the man's real gifts, and simplicity and directness are not the least of these. The outer man he records with shrewd observation; and one or twice he discovers to us the deeper inner man. The brush is more limited than the pen—its range a lesser range—and when the pen is in his hand our Court Painter has not the unamiable courage of too frank an inquisition into such as have done him royal service, the which, perhaps, is as it should be.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

REVIEWS

A Seventeenth Century Mystic

Studies in Jacob Böhme. By A. J. PENNY. Illustrated. (John M. Watkins. 6s. net.)

JACOB BOHME, who was born in 1575, was a shoe-maker of Görlitz, in Saxony. In the year 1600 we learn that "he was first consciously overtaken by the Spirit of the Light, which loved him exceedingly."

This remarkable and ecstatic phenomenon took place one day in the fields, when, as he said, "in one quarter of an hour I saw and knew more than if I had been years together at an university, ... for I saw and knew the Being of all beings, the Byss and Abyss, also the birth or eternal generation of the Holy Trinity; the descent or original of this world, and of all creatures through the divine wisdom; I knew and saw in myself all the three worlds, namely the divine, angelical, and paradisical world; the dark world; and the external or visible world, being a procreation or extern birth. . . . I had a thorough view of the universe as in a Chaos." Böhme was right. A whole lifetime at a university fails to give such profound knowledge as this.

Euripides once wrote: "ὁ Θεὸς ὡς ἔφυ τι ποίκιλον καί δυστέκμαρτον," and, for centuries since, the most profound philosophers have echoed this aphorism.

Böhme waited some ten years before he gave in his "Aurora" the "unsought riches of revelation" to his friends—and enemies, for in that age it seemed particularly unorthodox and unauthorised that an illiterate should write "as he was moved by the Holy Ghost."

The authorities of Görlitz, headed by the Primate, Gregory Richter, raised such a disturbance, and so persecuted Böhme, who was condemned for heresy, that for the sake of peace he retired to Dresden, where he died, after a short illness, in 1624. There most of his works (thirty-one in all) were written, between the years 1618 and 1624. Mrs. Penny claims that "from his writings, Sir Isaac Newton in England, and Hegel in Germany, drew what the French call les idées mères, to which their own fame has been largely due."

Hegel probably borrowed ideas from Böhme, as he did, without acknowledgment, from Duns Scotus, though Hegel's system of Ontology is diametrically opposite to Böhme's ideas of Revelation. Yet in Böhme, as a mystic philosopher, we trace the same assurance of the possession of absolute truth as in the empirical philosophers. "Truly, we are the whole world; with us wisdom shall die," in effect say Hegel, Nietzsche, Haeckel and others. Böhme had some excuse—the possession of a direct revelation. He consciously identified his "inspiration" with the Eternal Omnipotent Creative Wisdom, he himself being merely the mechanical agent. Yet Mrs. Penny actually justifies her rejection of certain of his teachings and deductions by the extraordinary statement that "doubtless the spirits he associated with were sometimes ignorant."

Here mystic meets mystic, not on common ground, but with a temporary lapse into practical commonsense. The same allegation might be brought against Swedenborg, Madame Blavatsky, Mrs. Eddy and others—a scarcely acceptable explanation of failure, although mystics admit the existence of evil and lying spirits, and Böhme himself assures us that they are "fond of 'jugglery.'" The difficulty must be in deciding what is truth, hence the position of the transcendental mystic, on his own showing, differs little from that of the scientific philosopher. But Böhme had the singular advantage of a trance of many months' duration, during which he became cognisant of the World-Soul and of other world-souls. This trance may perhaps be explained as a prolonged meditation on the doctrines of the ancient pagan philosophers, concerning the Mundane or Universal Soul. This Cosmic Spirit "captivated Adam and introduced its substantiality into his imagination, viz., his untoward gross body." "The World-Souls of the universe exist in pairs, male and female."

Madame Blavatsky's "Astral Light, or Anima Mundi," dual and bi-sexual, is found in Böhme's theory that before his sleep Adam was a man and also a woman, and yet neither of them distinct, and that the woman Eve was given to him after his fall, which caused his sleep. We give this example to illustrate the kind of speculation of which Böhme was capable.

In his view of the origin of nature, Böhme seems almost to have been a monist. "If the seven spirits of nature had not been from eternity then there would be no angel, no Heaven, also no earth have come to be." (N.B.—He means eternal nature, as all the rest of his teaching proves.) These forms of Eternal Nature are the seven spirits of God, "generating God," hence the saying of Isaiah xlv, 7: "I create evil," is strictly true. There is much in these essays which shows the more profound side of Böhme's philosophy. On the continuance of evil, he says: "Nothing without contradiction or opposition can become manifest to itself. The evil or contrary will causeth the good, viz., the good will, that it presseth again after its original, viz., after God."

Böhme interpreted the scriptures in the deepest spiritual sense, in the light of what he believed to be direct revelation. Many of his interpretations are highly original. Poiret credited him as one "qui avec une pénétration toute centrale des choses théologiques et surnaturelles, ait aussi connu d'origine les vraies principes de la philosophie, tant de la métaphysique, que de la vraie physique." But his mysticism is too transcendental for the many. His writings are only for the few. There may be much that is lacking in modern popular Christianity, yet taken as a whole it is at least practical.

Those who take pleasure in speculative mystic theosophy will find much to interest them in Böhme's spiritual mysticism, and an unexpected light thrown on many difficult problems, even though his own claims and those of his admirers are often beyond acceptance. Mrs. Penny, whose essays in Light are reprinted in this volume, was one of his greatest admirers. She was herself a mystic of the type of Swedenborg, a deep thinker, and gifted with a profound faith in things spiritual. For nearly forty years, till her death in 1893, she had made Böhme her constant companion and was familiar with the whole range of his writings, as well as with those of the students of his philosophy, Freber, Martensen, and many others.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Various Studies

William Morris, his Homes and Haunts. By the COUNTESS OF WARWICK. Illustrated. (T. C. and E. C. Jack. 1s. 6d. net.)

1913, and Other Essays. By ALFRED EDWARD CAREY. (Thomas Burleigh. 2s. 6d. net.)

Leaves of Prose. By ANNIE MATHESON, with Two Studies by MAY SINCLAIR. (Stephen Swift and Co. 5s. net.)

The Shadow Show. By J. H. CURLE. With Frontispiece. (Methuen and Co. 5s. net.)

The Autobiography of a Working Woman. By ADELHEID POPP. Translated by F. C. HERVEY. With Introduction by AUGUST BEBEL and J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, M.P., and Two Portraits. (T. Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d. net.)

THE most noticeable thing in Lady Warwick's kind-hearted book about William Morris is the twice-repeated story that Morris once told Burne-Jones that "poetry is tommy-rot." Lady Warwick admires this because it seems to her to show that Morris was not a "mere poet." Whereas, if it meant anything at all, it meant that he considered it a poor thing to be a "mere poet," and perhaps that he felt himself in danger of being one. Physical strength and violent language are no infallible safeguards, and Lady Warwick herself finds "an abstract of his philosophy of life" in a scene from "The Roots of the Mountains" where the men and the Bride rest at midday and eat. This abstract is "work first, because it is the most lasting of pleasures; then rest on the green slope with a strange medley of onions and beautiful women singing old-time songs." Whether this is poetry or not, it is not far from being "tommy-rot." There is no doubt that Morris was essentially a decorator. He spoilt a tobacco-pipe in "News from Nowhere" by irrelevant ornament. With one or perhaps two exceptions his poems are the most purely poetical ever written: no others were ever so decorative. And so he threw a stone out of his glass house and said poetry was "tommy-rot."

Mr. Alfred Edward Carey expresses the same discontent with his times. "The rising generation of artists are tailors' models, frock-coated or dress-jacketed. Who amongst them would venture to revive the Bohemianism in which Thackeray and Du Maurier delighted? Absurd, no doubt—the long hair, the mighty pipe, the garb in defiance—but how real." Yet Time's wingéd chariot is bearing hither a critic who will adore these stern and spotless men in frock-coats or dress-jackets—they never troubled to be superficially different from the multitude, but looked like millionaires or military men; they regarded the extravagant garb and the long hair as so much poetry or nonsense. They lived, it will be said, when a poetess—Miss Annie Matheson—was not ashamed to write a sonnet on the election of the London County Council:—

> Now let your great traditions guard your heart,
> Brave city of Milton, Shakespeare's capital!

They wore frock-coats, but they were anxious to preserve individuality underneath. Even for pauper children Miss Matheson desires "more home-life, with all its variety of give and take and rough and smooth; less of that safe, machine-like, inflexible institution-routine, which, from its very perfection and inevitableness, deadens character, creates spontaneity and injures health. Courage, resource, originality—what chance is there of these where childhood is governed in the aggregate and humanity is adjusted to the average?" She wishes to multiply interference in order to destroy the effects of interference. She would have strife without brutality. Nature lying down with Art and producing an impossible harmony, as in the "Faerie Queene," of winds and waters, birds, human voices, and instruments.

Miss Matheson quotes with admiration Clagh's review of Alexander Smith's poems, where he said—

> These poems were not written among bodes and burts, > nor yet
> By shallow rivers, to whose falls
> Melodious birds sing madrigals;

for they were full of "images drawn from the busy seats of industry." Mr. J. H. Curle is one who has listened to melodious birds and factories without any impressive effect on style or character. He has seen so much that he has time only for a catalogue and some downright prejudices. He is most amusing when he calls up before his memory the women of the globe to appraise them:—

> My affinity lies in the Gothic North; Austrians, Russians, Germans, and Scandinavians are the women of my dreams. A wintry landscape, with a fairish woman in her furs, is civilisation's masterpiece.

He has been everywhere, and it has left him probably as it found him, blatant and cocksure, but not a writer. He may be better with the sword or the shovel; his words do not create the image of such a one, but only of one who esteems himself such a one.

Frau Popp has not travelled, nor troubled about the proper subjects of poetry, or about the relative positions of life and literature; but no doubt books like hers are encouraged by the revolt of the reading middle-class against "mere poetry" and life at second-hand. Frau Popp's book is one of the most simple and modest of its kind. It was originally to have appeared without her own name, since she did not regard her narrative as of individual importance, but as representing the lot of hundreds of thousands of the women and girls of the working-class.

She writes definitely for this purpose, and as one who has come to certain conclusions about the position of the working woman. It aims at being rather a tract than a work of art. But it is far from being only a heartrending summary. It abounds in such things as where, in the house of a Duchess to which she had gone for charity, she saw a girl like herself, in a similar shawl, green frock and wooden shoes, with the same eyes and dark hair, without knowing that it was herself in a mirror. It is probable that she could have written a longer book that would also have been better. Her business is with the main outlines of her earlier life and the reflections which led her to become a Socialist. She has no poor opinion of literature. It is probable, indeed, that only a writer who wished to show himself above his trade would call poetry or any other form of literature, except the bad, "tommy-rot."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Anatole France at his Best

At the Sign of the Reine Pédauque. By ANATOLE FRANCE. A Translation by MRS. WILFRID JACKSON, with an Introduction by WILLIAM J. LOCKE. (John Lane. 6s.)

MR. JOHN LANE, of the Bodley Head, is publishing what may rightly be described as an édition de luxe of the works of Anatole France, although in price it appears as an ordinary series of volumes, and the latest to be added to the collection is the "Rôtisserie de la Reine Pédauque," which has been described as "perhaps the most characteristic example of that elusive point of view which makes for the magic of Anatole France." A collected edition of this writer's works would indeed be incomplete without the inclusion of the present volume. On the other hand the book might properly be published by itself if only as an introduction of its author's work to English readers. There can be no doubt that this view is widely recognised, for the present is the second translation of "La Reine Pédauque" which has been issued to English readers within the last few months. The story under notice cannot be considered a novel in the ordinary sense. It may more properly be designated a chronicle, or, still better, a parable. There is no particular plot; it is in effect a sketch of two or three characters with half-a-dozen others brought in to fill the interstices. In this form the fullest opportunity is afforded for the display of the delicate art and irony for which the author is rightly famous, which makes the present volume a delight to the reader.

Every author loses something by translation, and Anatole France above all is untranslatable in many of his aspects. His genius is so closely akin to that of the French language that no other medium is adequate to interpret it. Thus the English translation must necessarily fall below the original. Yet Anatole France even in English is so delightful, that Mrs. Jackson's translation deserves and should receive a wide and cordial welcome. The nature of this particular work lends itself to the casual reader. The volume can be opened at any page and enjoyed. The reader is independent of the slight shadow of a plot which strings the narrative together. The style, the wit, and the learning without a trace of pedantry, conveyed in delightful manner, are sufficient attraction. The book can be read merely for the delight of reading Anatole France. Its gentle satire amuses all and can hurt none. But it is necessary to issue one word of warning. It is not suitable virginibus puerisque.

Quotation can give no adequate impression of the work, yet to cull one or two passages needs no excuse. One is reminded of the apology of our own Charles II for taking so long about his dying, by the Canon, who, when in extremis, was visited by his Bishop. "Alas!" said the Canon, "I ask pardon of your Lordship for unavoidably dying in your presence." "Go on, go on, do not mind me," replied Monseigneur kindly. The mad alchemist whom our author has created is amusing, but he is much more than that. Anatole France is sufficient of an artist to leave to his readers' imagination the feelings of the gourmand Abbé when he was gravely informed that "The next thing will be to nourish ourselves on extracts of metals and minerals suitably prepared by physicians. Have no fear, the taste will be delicious and its absorption wholesome. Cooking will be done in retorts and in alembics, and we shall have alchemists as master-cooks. . . . Nature . . . . suffers nothing useless to exist." The Alchemist looked even farther ahead. He foresaw the time when mankind would exist on no more substantial food than sunbeams. "It is a mere question of rendering potable the beams of the sun. If ever some sage attains this goal, mankind will equal the Sylphs and Salamanders in intelligence and beauty. . . When we feed as we ought our teeth will be replaced by some ornament like the Salamander's pearls. Then we shall be unable to imagine how a lover could have looked without horror and disgust on the dog-teeth in his mistress's mouth."

The Springs of English Drama

The Tudor Drama: A History of English National Drama to the Retirement of Shakespeare. By C. F. TUCKER BROOKE, B.LITT.(Oxon.) (Constable and Co. 6s. net.)

THE drama is one of those perennial topics which lends itself to every man who has a theory to ventilate or an innovation to introduce. The modern tendencies and theories of this art have become so numerous, and, to tell the truth, often so foolish, that it is desirable that those who have some new extravagance to air, or who are about to overthrow some of the older canons, should be compelled to study the history and try to get at the groundwork of their subject. Herein lies the value of the volume under review. He who thoroughly assimilates this history, discovering for himself the dramatic principles involved, and the lines of development and laws of growth which are implicit in it, will be better fitted to estimate the true worth of modern movements.

The book before us, a well-written and very thorough piece of work, should prove of the greatest value to literary students who wish to get a complete understanding of the rise of English drama. It would form an admirable text-book, though it is not by any means composed in the dry-as-dust manner which so many writers of text-books affect. Its author, although a scholar of an English University, is now instructor in English at Yale. He is fully aware of the kind of quibbling criticism which may be made concerning his title, and the way in which he has been forced to overstep its exact limits; but we are willing enough to concede to him all the liberty he requires in this matter, for divisions into periods are always an artificial device which can never be wholly satisfying, convenient though they often may be.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The earlier chapters deal with that fascinating time when the drama gradually emerged amid the many-coloured life of the fourteenth and two succeeding centuries. How the modern play had its almost protoplasmic forerunner in connection with the Church, how in its development this forerunner gradually shook itself free from religious influences, and gained an independent life, are matters familiar enough to all students of literary history. They are retold here with a fulness and clearness that make these pages perhaps the most interesting in the book. The stiffness and didacticism of miracle play, morality, and interlude were gradually outgrown: John Lyly is the first dramatist of a newer order. This is how Professor Brooke speaks of him:—

> John Lyly is the first dominating personality that confronts the historian of the English drama. . . . Hitherto, the playwrights of two centuries, figures often nameless and generally obscure, present themselves to the student normally and properly as exponents of one strain or another in theatric evolution. Henceforth, it is rather the play, in the most conspicuous and important cases, which becomes subsidiary to the reflection of the personality and character of the poet. Thus judicial interest in the dramatic species gives place ordinarily to appreciation of the individual dramatist.

From this point our author takes up the various types of drama in succession—tragedy, comedy, the heroic play, romantic and pastoral comedy, the history play, and others—and writes about each with a true critical insight into the complex growth of these forms. There are times, of course, when this work must necessarily be pedestrian, consisting chiefly of a description of one play after another, but through all there are gleams such as this:—

> Successful tragedy, when it came, resulted, not from the effort to pack a sensational story upon the slender and ill-articulated frame of the interlude, but from the thorough adaptation of the more resourceful Latin model to national uses and traditions.

The disintegrating influences which finally brought this splendid period to barren days are well indicated, and show how deep and abiding is the connection between art and life at all times. The first of these was the rise of Puritanism, which, by its fierce antagonism to the stage, created so strong a division in the national life as to vitiate the springs of dramatic inspiration. The other great influence was more academic, and was due to an attempt to impose literary canons of a classical kind upon the dramatist, and so to hedge him about with limitations as to make the free practice of his art almost an impossibility. In the course of this discussion Professor Brooke has some illuminating things to say:—

> During the age of which we are treating, dramatic literature and established religion were infinitely more than the narrowly defined and essentially unrelated phenomena they are at present. Each had potentially, at least, if not in actuality, a scope so enormous as to include within itself the entire social, political, and intellectual import of the national life; and that would probably be no very distorted conception of history which should regard the Elizabethan impulse toward dramatic self-expression and the great Puritan movement as the protagonists in a struggle, where the prize of victory was nothing less than the power of shaping the ideals and interests of the English people.

A word of praise must be added for the very full and excellent bibliographies which are appended to each chapter, and also for the comprehensive index.

A L'AMÉRICAINE

Traveller's Tales. By "THE PRINCESS." (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 8s. net.)

THE substance of the papers of which this book is composed first appeared in the pages of the Springfield Republican. Perhaps Springfield likes its infinitives split. If so, it must have in "The Princess" an author after its own heart. Frankly, the style of this book is such as to invite execration. It fairly bristles with "and whiches," and similar grammatical—or rather ungrammatical—atrocities. Here is a sample of "The Princess" at her very worst. She is writing of a Quentin Mastys at Munich:—

> To me, perhaps because of the Oberammergau influence, she is a gem of gems, this beautiful sorrowing mother, whose face is so exquisitely expressive of love, worship, and tenderness, and which stands out so vividly in distinction to the dead helplessness of the crucified, against a lovely background of blue.

Nor do "The Princess's" delinquencies end here. On page 67 we are gravely informed that the people at Interlaken are followers of Zwingli, "a form of Calvinism." It is scarcely necessary to add that Zwingli is not "a form of Calvinism," but the name of a Swiss reformer. The name of Neill Gow is misspelt on page 107, while on page 146 the name of the Rev. W. F. G. Sandwith, the vicar of St. Bartholomew-the-Great, Smithfield, appears as the Rev. H. G. Sandwith. "The Princess's" explanation of the origin of the "grille" in the House of Commons has at least the charm of novelty:—

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

> The grating, I was . . . told, had been there for a great many years, and was put up because the bright eyes and sweet smiles of their feminine friends caused such havoc in the hearts of the members as to prevent them from properly attending to business!

So easy is it to impose upon the credulity of a Princess—particularly when that Princess happens to be an American!

Style (or its absence) apart, the book is one of vivid human interest. It is the record of a prolonged tour in Europe, told in a series of letters. "The Princess" is, happily, free from those objectionable elements which make the American tourist so often an object of curiosity rather than of admiration. She has a receptive mind, and her comments are invariably both shrewd and stimulating. She has crowded enough experience into these pages to provide material for at least a dozen books of travel. Her recollections range from Pitlochry to the Pyrenees. She has mixed with dukes in Scotland, and with dévotes at Lourdes. She has seen a coronation in London, a funeral in Paris, a passion play at Oberammagau, and a bull-fight at Madrid. She has visited Goethe's house at Frankfort, has heard the chimes at Nuremburg, and wandered, enchanted, through the art galleries at Munich. And all these experiences have stirred in her something more than a mere vulgar curiosity. The sight of a religious procession in Bruges induces reflections on the attraction of the Catholic Church. She has a genuine respect for old institutions, a wholesome dread of the levelling influences of democracy, a fondness, which is evidently far from affected, for things European. She writes sympathetically of Paris, and almost rapturously of London. And her pages are at all times relieved by a pretty and quite feminine sentiment. There we must leave "The Princess." The art of writing good English is by no means an easy one, and "The Princess" has not acquired it.

A New Philosophy of Judaism

Selected Essays by Ahad Ha'Am. Translated from the Hebrew by LEON SIMON. (The Jewish Publication Society of America, Philadelphia.)

FOR something like two thousand years Hebrew has for all practical purposes been a dead language. By a few isolated groups, settled in out-of-the-way districts of the Turkish dominions and neighbouring countries, it has been retained as a spoken language, but among the bulk of the Jews of the world, Hebrew, centuries ago, gave way to the languages of the Diaspora; so that the language of the Jews, inasmuch as it differed from those of the peoples among whom they dwelt has been Jüdisch-Deutsch, an old German dialect, in Central Europe and the regions colonised thence, and Ladino or Espanol, a language which bears a similar relationship to mediæval Spanish, among the descendants of Spanish Jewish refugees who settled under the protection of the Mohammedans. Hebrew has survived throughout all those centuries only as a language of prayer, in a sense an artificial language divorced entirely from life, an apparently dead language which has stood still for centuries. Within the last generation, however, it has been found that the language was after all not yet dead: it had only been sleeping. The revival of Jewish nationalist feeling which followed the outbreak of anti-Jewish atrocities in Russia just thirty years ago carried with it a revival of the ancient language of the Hebrews. Hebrew spread outside of the Synagogue, and was adapted to the uses of the larger literature. First the world's classics began to be translated into the Hebrew tongue: soon the language itself was used as the vehicle of original composition, and Hebrew works appeared in all the branches into which human literature is divided. To adapt itself to this new use the language which had lain dormant for centuries had to spread and extend its vocabularies in many directions. Thus the Neo-Hebrew differs in many respects from the language of the Bible, just as modern Greek is a descendant of, not the same language as, the language of Homer and of Alexander.

Ahad Ha'Am, a selection of whose essays translated from the original Hebrew, is presented in the volume under notice, is the most scholarly and most cultured of the writers of this modern Hebrew. He is, moreover, in the forefront of modern Jewish philosophers. He has evolved a new philosophy of Judaism, according to which the hope of the future rests not in the mediæval Judaism of the Ghetto, nor in the modern Judaism of the lands of emancipation and assimilation, but in a via media which he has designated Moral Zionism. This Moral Zionism, otherwise known as Ahad Ha'amism, parted company long ago from the better-known Zionism which the late Theodore Herzl brought into being. Ahad Ha'Am and his disciples have no desire to create a Jewish political state in Palestine: their object is to safeguard the future of Judaism by assuring it of a spiritual and moral centre in its historic land, whence the Jews of the Diaspora and their faith may from time to time draw reinvigoration. In furtherance of a double purpose, an exposition of Ahad Ha'Am's philosophy and an illustration of the remarkable medium he has made of Hebrew as a means of expressing modern thought, Mr. Simon has made an excellent selection from the writings of his author. By concentrating on the former object he has not sacrificed anything of the latter, for all of Ahad Ha'Am's writings show how perfectly and artistically he has moulded his practically self-created medium to his pen. But Mr. Simon is not a mere translator and editor. He also is a philosopher; and those who are anxious to find in convenient form an exposition of a philosophy of modern Judaism could hardly do better than to read the illuminating introduction which the editor contributes to these essays. In fact the author has been fortunate in his translator and editor, and the latter has also been fortunate in his subject.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

A Great Property

The Industrial Punjab: A Survey of Facts, Conditions, and Possibilities. By A. LATIFI, I.C.S. (Longmans, Green and Co. 4s. 6d.)

THE people of England are hardly aware of the immense property the nation possesses in its Eastern Dependency, and of its capacity for almost unlimited development. Plenty of information is available, in official and non-official literature, if anyone cares to seek it. This book, prepared under the authority of the Local Government is a survey of the Facts, Conditions, and Possibilities of the Punjab, considered as a field for industries, that is, for its manufacturing industries, in which the raw material is appreciably altered by human skill or labour, but it does not include the mineral, agricultural and forest products of the country. Of the 315 millions of the population of India, the Punjab contains only 20, of whom 56 per cent are supported by agriculture. The artisans form only 20 per cent. Education is so backward that skilled artisans are few; difficulties in respect of labour and capital completely dominate the larger or factory industries, which are yet in an elementary stage. Much remains to be done in the encouragement of village industries, and finally in the extension of the means of distribution.

Mr. Latifi's official inquiry showed that, in spite of all impediments, the various industries, from cotton to glass, separately treated in his twenty chapters, already employ a considerable number of workers, and that if certain difficulties can be surmounted a great future is possible for them. It is the old story of want of capital and of confidence. As usual in India, Government assistance is the remedy suggested to supply the deficiencies of private enterprise. Industrial education conducted by Government is the first proposal, culminating in a well-equipped Technical College. We had not heard before that "factories in Europe are most unwilling to teach possible rivals," and the statement to this effect can hardly be accepted without corroboration. The fact remains that numerous students do come to Great Britain, and even visit America, for their industrial and technical training. Further, Government is expected to give more direct inducements in the shape of guarantees and subsidies to special industries, and is asked to send a Commission, suitably selected, to the countries whose economic development bears some analogy to that of India. The little State of Wurtemberg in Germany, and Japan, are the two examples held up for imitation.

Such inquiries and books have their value, but they are not enough, without further action. It is essential that they should be utilised by commercial men with an eye to business. The Punjab, like the rest of India, is progressing, though the ravages of plague and malaria are appalling; but the pace of progress is slow and immediate results cannot be attained all along the line. It is for the people to help themselves and employ their own capital, whether through Companies or Co-operative Societies or individual undertakings, rather than wait for European capital, which may properly be invested in the larger projects, but can hardly be forthcoming for the smaller industries requiring local knowledge and minute attention. The apathy and want of enterprise of the Indian industrial classes are obstacles to advance which have to be overcome.

FROM STEPHEN SWIFT'S LIST.

The Italian Government has recognised this work as the best and most authoritative exposition of the Italian point of view, and has purchased a large number of copies for distribution among its Consulates and Embassies. The Italian Prime Minister has himself written to Mr. Lapworth expressing his thanks and congratulations.

TRIPOLI AND YOUNG ITALY.
By CHARLES LAPWORTH, in collaboration with HELEN ZIMMERN. Fully Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

WATERLOO.
By HILAIRE BELLOC. 1s. net.
The NATION says: "To everyone who wishes to join in the controversy or even to understand what the discussion is all about we earnestly recommend Mr. Belloc's brief monograph. Let everyone before entering the society of military men, three years hence, get this little book almost by heart."

A NIGHT IN THE LUXEMBOURG.
By REMY DE GOURMONT. Translated, with a Preface and Appendix, by ARTHUR RANSOME. 5s. net.
"An audacious excursus of fancy pierced together with the fertile skill of a consummate artist."—THE ATHENÆUM.

ENGLISH LITERATURE: Pater, Wilde, and After.
By J. M. KENNEDY. 7s. 6d. net.

LA LITTÉRATURE ET LES IDÉES NOUVELLES. By ALEXANDRE MERCEREAU.

6/- FICTION.

SHADOWS OUT OF THE CROWD.
By RICHARD CURLE.
"Mr. Curle's pungent liquor," says the MANCHESTER GUARDIAN, "is amazingly good. In particular, 'Disordered Minds' is hardly to be beaten in prose for a masterful account of madness."
"The author has a wonderful analytical faculty for laying bare the secrets of the human heart."—SCOTSMAN.

AN EXCELLENT MYSTERY.
By COUNTESS RUSSELL.
"Undoubted vividness and freshness"—MORNING LEADER.
"Gift for character drawing."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.
"Only a little inferior to some novels which are quite famous."—IRISH TIMES.

A complete catalogue can be obtained gratis on application.
STEPHEN SWIFT & CO., LTD., 16, KING STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

Shorter Reviews

The Brain of the Nation, and Other Verses. By CHARLES L. GRAVES. (Smith, Elder and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

THERE is a genuine flavour of Punch about these witty verses of Mr. Graves, and we are not surprised to learn that some of them have made their appearance in that paper. From his eyrie in Wellington Street the author sees the humorous side of life, possibly, as a welcome relaxation; at any rate, most of the work in this small volume was worth doing, and worth publishing in book form. If we were to call Mr. Graves a poet, he would probably smile, but in more than one instance he comes very near to deserving that title; his charming use of place-names in "Norfolk" carries with it something better than mere rhyming:—

> Yours are the truest names in England—
> Overy Staithe and Icknield Way,
> Waveney River, Ringmere, and Ringland,
> Wymondham and Wormegay.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Land of windmills and brown-winged wherries
Gliding along with the gait of queens;
Land of the Broads, the dykes, and the ferries,
Land of the Sounds, the Brecks, the Denes.

Most of his stanzas, however, run on the lines of gentle remonstrance or sarcasm at the expense of persons who are, we must say, generally well-deserving of the "celestial hail of thwacks" which Mr. Graves deals out to them; the "Journalistic Apologue" is an example, and the concluding verse will give the cue to readers:—

His predecessors plied the pen
Of gentlemen for gentlemen;
Now other times bring other ways,
And peacocks pontify to jays.

The best thing in the book is probably the "Valedictory Ode" to Dr. Hans Richter, as, knowing Mr. Graves' musically inclined brain, we might expect:—

Beloved at once by amateurs and pro.'s—
Like W. G., whom ev'rybody knows,
The other Doctor famed for scores,
Who, like you used to count in three and fours. . . .

Mindful of dignity in ev'ry action—
Unlike those virtuosi who on outré vesture
Rely, or on extravagance of gesture,
Or mainly on capillary attraction—
You let no affectation mar your mien
Grand, leonine, serene;
But swayed your hearers by the triple dower
Of sympathy, simplicity, and power.

And the wickedest pages in the book are those devoted to the compiler of the "Great Thoughts" of Ella Wheeler Wilcox, where the spirit of sly sarcasm revels. We cannot quote more, but we can advise all who want an hour's thorough amusement with one who not only rhymes neatly, but spices his rhyming with the best of wit, free from the slightest suspicion of ill-feeling, to get this book and enjoy it as we have done.

De Stamboul à Bagdad: Notes d'un homme d'Etat Turc. By HAKKI-BEY. Illustrated. (Ernest Leroux, Paris.)
Politique Musulmane de la Hollande. Four Lectures by C. SNOUCK HURGRONJE. Illustrated. (Ernest Leroux, Paris.)

THERE is considerable divergence in the points of view of the authors of these two brochures, though they are both writing under the same auspices. The first is the account of a journey made by the Turkish statesman, Hakki Bey, from Stamboul to Bagdad—or rather to Basra—and is filled with his national aspirations, mostly, we cannot but feel, of the kind sometimes known as pious. The lawlessness of the tribes, the fecklessness of the authorities, and the "menées" of other powers on the skirts of the Ottoman realms fill Hakki Bey with indignation and with the desire to instil some energy into the rulers of his native land. But he is unable to indicate the means of action. As a book of travel, his work is entertaining, and not without the elements of excitement.

Dr. Snouck Hurgronje has given a series of lectures for the "Revue du Monde Musulman," which may be recommended to any reader anxious to understand the international workings of Islam. He devotes a great deal of attention to this general aspect of his thesis, and seems to use the great Dutch colonies more as illustrations than as a main subject. He is no friend to Mahometanism, and, in certain aspects, wishes it to be resisted and confined. But this is mainly an account of the political basis of Islamism; the universal Caliphate is the bane of the system. Dr. Hurgronje views it somewhat in the same light as a devout Elizabethan Protestant regarded the Papacy. Its ethical force should be allowed free play; its dangers, which are great and many, should be and will be exorcised by the magic of education. But the task must be taken in hand before it is too late. Islam is a huge but blind force, which, like the lightning, can be directed into harmlessness.

English Idioms. By JAMES MAIN DIXON, M.A., F.R.S.E.
A Dictionary of Dates. Vol. I. A—Engineers. ("Nelson's Encyclopædic Library." T. Nelson and Sons. 1s. net each vol.)

OF the making of cheap popular series of books there appears to be no end, and one of the most useful of these, inaugurated quite recently, is undoubtedly "Nelson's Encyclopædic Library." It is founded on the firm's well-known "Encyclopædia," and the series is to include two types of volume—specialised works of reference, such as dictionaries and concordances of various kinds; and volumes, in an encyclopædic form, dealing with special subjects, such as Engineering, Agriculture, Economics, Science, etc. The volume of "English Idioms" is arranged in alphabetical form, and an initial letter indicates the category to which each phrase belongs: Prose, Conversational, Familiar, Slang. Many authorities have been consulted in the compilation, and we are pleased to see that several foreign phrases in use in everyday conversation and writing have been included, as this adds considerably to the value of the volume. "A Dictionary of Dates" aims at providing "a clear, systematic, and accurate record of the most important events in the world's history." It is, of course, arranged alphabetically, and the publishers boast that "a fuller system of cross-referencing has been adopted than can be found in any other work of the kind." In instances where long lists occur—as "Abbeys," "Battles," "Clubs," etc.—the arrangement is alphabetical instead of chronological, which is a distinct advantage. We are surprised to notice, however, that with very few exceptions only the year of the battle is given, and not the day on which it was fought, which, in the vast majority of instances, might easily have been added to the same line, as there is space for it. We observe one error which should be rectified in a future edition. Under "Cape of Good Hope" one is informed that it was discovered in 1488 and a settlement established in 1452. The latter date is clearly wrong. The volumes are appearing monthly, and Messrs. Nelson are to be congratulated on having produced another of their popular series, cheap in price, handy in form, easy to consult, exhaustive, and up-to-date.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Histoire de la Maison de l'Espine. By YVES BLANC. (H. Daragon, Paris. 3 fr.)

THIS is less a novel than a collection of detached episodes. M. Blanc has attempted, with some success as we think, to get the atmosphere of the early years of the "Grand Siècle." Swashbucklers, Petits-maîtres and Précieuses are the puppets that enliven his scene, and he makes large drafts on the traditional vocabulary of the period. If he acknowledges the inspiration of a master, it is surely that of Mérimée. Some of the episodes are more than suggestive of such a debt.

Fiction

A Lost Interest. By MRS. GEORGE WEMYSS. Illustrated. (Constable and Co. 6s.)

CLEVERNESS in a book is, more often than not, a sin, since it leads to boredom rather than the mental pleasure which reading is supposed to excite. Here is an exception which assists in proving the rule, for this book is clever in the extreme, yet every line of it is worth reading, and the principal feeling left by the last page is regret that one of the best books of the year no longer awaits perusal. This may appear high praise in view of the present big fiction output, but such dainty, delicate satire, such clear-cut pictures of life and character, such insight into motives and causes, as are here displayed will not soon be excelled in any novel. There are refreshing sparkles of real wit here and there throughout the book, and its really brilliant cleverness is made more fascinating by an underlying quality of kindliness and sympathy, which finds implication rather than expression.

The "lost interest" is Dick Egerton, sent out to Africa in the first three months of his married life, and the story is mainly concerned with the other interests, more or less dangerous, of his grass widow's life. Thanks to Georgina, Lady Blatherwake, Mrs. Egerton is able to "look her husband straight in the face" when he returns, and of the dozen or more cleverly drawn characters of the book, we like Georgina Blatherwake best, for, cynical old sinner though she is on the surface, there is a big heart behind the cynicism.

But every character is worth knowing, and we welcome a book like this for its truth and—more than cleverness—its wisdom, as well as for its engrossing interest.

The Co-Respondent. By the Author of "The Terror by Night." (Murray and Evenden. 6s.)

SOME parts of this book are very well written, and a few of the characters are life-like; but its subject is not a pleasing one, and we already learn, through newspaper reports, far more than enough about matrimonial infidelity and the resultant divorce-court proceedings. The much-tried heroine of the story is married to as big a cad as ever figured in any work of fiction, a most repulsive man of the world without a single redeeming trait in his character, and we should have been more inclined to believe in his existence had the author painted him somewhat less blackly. On the other hand, the co-respondent is delineated with greater fidelity to human nature. There are times when he seems rather too goody-goody, but he has his moments of weakness, which we can understand. Let us add that the charge preferred against him and the heroine collapses in the divorce-court, where his suspicious behaviour is accounted for by the fact that he is addicted to walking in his sleep! This curious defence is the one really novel thing in a somewhat long volume. As we have already indicated, the author is not without ability, and if he will only choose some less unsavoury subject than that of "The Co-Respondent," and bear in mind that nobody is wholly good or wholly bad, he may well be able to produce more commendable work.

The Englishwoman. By ALICE AND CLAUDE ASKEW. (Cassell and Co. 6s.)

THE story we have before us in "The Englishwoman" is based upon the utter unsuitability of a marriage between a European and an Oriental. Lucy Travers, rejecting the advances of her old playmate, Hugh Seymour, becomes infatuated with a certain Prince Jotindra, heir to an Indian native State. Within a week of meeting one another they become engaged; very shortly afterwards they are married, the Prince having to hasten back to his own people on account of the illness and ultimate death of his father. The scene now changing to India, the authors have good opportunities of portraying the very great difference that exists between the working of the Eastern mind and that of the Western—how the one is subtle, crafty and cunning, and has very little code save its own self-preservation at all costs, while the other, at its best, is capable of any sacrifice for the sake of honour and duty. Poor Lucy is brave, and remonstrates in her calm English way with her hot-headed young husband when he contemplates the murder of his brother, who he imagines will aspire to their father's throne, but West and East do not blend, and the book ends amid a tragedy unthought of by any concerned. The story is fascinating and well told, and the mysticism of the Eastern surroundings adds greatly to the interest of it.

Anna Strelitz. By LOW LATHEN. (John Long. 6s.)

THIS is the love story of Anna Strelitz, a young Jewess who turned Christian; of Henri, her cousin; and of many other people; for the stage is rather overcrowded, and the play of the book a trifle mixed. Anna, after having given all her love to Henri and confessed her affection, sends him away for the sake of her belief, and takes him back too late, for he dies in the end. Both the renunciation and the tragedy appear forced and unnatural events devised for the sake of interest rather than reasonable happenings; thus they defeat their own ends. As a whole, the book is written with considerable power; but it is also possessed of a number of defects. The scene is mainly South African, where a Dutch or Kaffir story is invariably a "Winkel" and not a "Winkle," as the author misspells it. This, of course, is but a trifle, but it is one of a number that go to make the descriptions of South African scenery stagey and unreal. Again, the English of the book is far from faultless—among the numerous societies formed for various objects there is room for one which would teach young authors the value of "different from" and the marring effect of "different to." Such little things as these detract from the value of a book, and, though neither Anna nor her cousin fails to interest, the book is written too sketchily, and with too slight a sense of the value of restraint, to make really enjoyable reading. It is immature, rather careless work, though—as already noted—the story is not without power or interest.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Last Resort. By H. F. PREVOST BATTERSBY. (John Lane. 6s.)

LOVE and adventure are combined in about equal portions in this clever novel. Major Sarrol, British Resident at a small African coast station, wishes for assistance from home in the shape of a strong force to put down native rebellion; he is sent for by the authorities to explain matters, and the story of his experiences in London, his vexatious delays, and his love affair with Laura Burgoyne—a fine and finely-drawn character—forms the first portion of the book. Then, with the scene changed to the tropical African settlement, the interest becomes intense, and with the attack in overwhelming numbers by the infuriated army of natives a climax is reached equal to anything of the kind that we have read in the pages of a novel. The secondary love-story of Laura's brother Armyn with a girl from a Knightsbridge shop, who proves, in emergency, to be a real heroine, adds greatly to the fascination of one of the best stories we have seen for a long time. Mr. Battersby is to be congratulated on his management of a fairly difficult plot, and on the infusion of a neat humour with a story that otherwise might have been too strenuous in its action to pass the test of the critical reader.

New Editions

THE latest additions to Mr. John Long's popular series of copyright novels at 6d. net are "Hypocrites and Sinners," by Violet Tweedale, "The Silent House," by Fergus Hume, "By Right of Purchase," by Harold Bindloss, and "The Other Sara," by Curtis Yorke. The volumes have been previously issued in more expensive form, but considering the standing of the authors as writers of fiction they cannot fail to secure a far larger circle of readers at the present reduced price. They are pocket size, each novel consisting of some 300 pages, printed in clear type, with a frontispiece; and the volumes are now bound in limp cloth instead of paper covers as hitherto, which is a decided improvement. Occupying such little space, these handy books will be found pleasant companions to anyone on a journey, or when weather-bound at holiday time, and judging by Mr. Long's complete list there is good variety to select from.

Two recently issued volumes of Messrs. Blackie and Son's dainty "Red Letter Library," at 2s. 6d. net each, are "Plays and Poems by Oliver Goldsmith," selected by Thomas Seccombe, and "Poems by John Dryden," selected by R. Brimley Johnson. The Goldsmith selection consists of two plays, "The Good-Natured Man" and "She Stoops to Conquer," and Miscellaneous Poems. The Dryden volume contains 422 pages of a very representative selection, and Notes. In addition each work has an Introduction and a Portrait Frontispiece.

Mr. Werner Laurie has now included "The Uncounted Cost," by Mary Gaunt, in his "Cheap Reprints of Popular Books," at 1s. net.

Messrs. Thomas Nelson and Sons' "Œuvres Complètes de Victor Hugo" series, under the general editorship of Mr. Charles Sarolea, of Edinburgh University, is growing apace. There have already been issued seven volumes of novels, five of poetry, one of history, two of dramas, and two of travels. The latest additions that have reached us are a volume of poems: "Dieu" and "La Fin de Satan"; and a volume of dramas: "Le Roi S'Amuse" and "Lucrèce Borgia." Each volume is embellished with a coloured frontispiece, is well printed and tastefully bound in cloth, and costs but one shilling net. The "Collection Nelson" of standard French authors, also one shilling net, now comprises some forty volumes, the last ones received by us being "Eve Victorieuse," by Pierre de Coulevain, and "Chronique du Règne de Charles IX," by Prosper Mérimée. The series is similar in get-up to the Victor Hugo one, and it contains also French translations of the works of leading foreign authors.

Music

THE fact that another "Handel Festival" has been organised and carried out with success at the Crystal Palace will serve, no doubt, to confirm the belief fixed in the minds of so many ignorant foreigners (who should be ashamed of "babbling what they do not know"), that Handel's is the only music really loved by the British public. The number of German, French, Italian musicians who come here is very considerable; they cannot but know that the walls of London concert-rooms, at any rate, resound chiefly to the strains of modern music. But when they return to their own countries, they do nothing, apparently, to spread the news that England's ear opens readily to hear music which is neither Handel's nor Beethoven's. The prevailing opinion abroad is still that the innate conservatism of England prevents her from surrendering her heart to any other than that old god, Handel. Fifty, nay, forty, years ago such an opinion was not altogether groundless. It was true, then, that the average music-lover did not question the supremacy of Handel. The composer of "The Messiah" was regarded as holding the position of a musical Shakespeare, with Mendelssohn ranking as a Tennyson. Wagner is the man who changed all that, more than anyone else. When the more cultivated amateurs began to be enthusiastic about "Ring" Festivals, and the inhabitants of country halls and parsonages took tickets at their local Triennial Festival for the Wagner Selection day rather than for "Judas Maccabæus," the tide had turned. We can remember when the monster music-meeting at the Crystal Palace agitated the breast of all musical England; when, for months before it was due, its delights were the subject of common conversation. This year it happens that we have not heard it mentioned by a single person, and it is also the case that we have not known a single person who has attended the last three or four Handel Festivals (for we have not the honour of acquaintance with Mr. Arthur Balfour) unless he was obliged to go "in the way of business."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Reports from the country show that what London thinks to-day in matters musical the provincial towns think to-morrow. Handel's oratorios are no longer demanded from the local choral societies. Even the "Messiah" in the Cathedral does not bring together the immense crowd that Bach's "Passion" draws to St. Paul's. We are of those who love our old Handel, and do not pretend not to regret that England is unfaithful to him, for unfaithful she is, the Crystal Palace Festival notwithstanding. He is an old friend from whom in days gone by we received many kindnesses. We can no more forget him, or what we owe to him, than we can forget the friends who "tipped" us at school, or the books which once we sat up all night to read. We do not now want to have those dear old gentlemen (they were not, perhaps, as old as we thought them) or those exciting novels for constant companions, to the exclusion of younger and more sympathetic fellowship, but we would always welcome them heartily when Fortune chose to bring about a re-union. Society is so large, whether in books, human beings, or music, that it is impossible with most people to "keep up with everybody," as we say. But because we do not see all our friends every day, or even every year, we need not forget them or be ungrateful to them, or insist that they are dull, and the newer acquaintances much nicer!

The generation now growing up is probably as ignorant of Handel as the past generation, in its youth, was ignorant of Bach. We comfort ourselves, therefore, with the hope that some day they will re-discover Handel, and hand him on to their successors, as we in our day found Bach and spread his fame. And we have no intention of blaming our nephews and nieces who were brought up to lisp Wagner from their cradles because they cannot see the splendour of Handel. The people we are inclined to be impatient with are those who in their early days were brought up on Handel and delighted in him, who now declare him to be dull and tiresome. They need not go to hear him unless they like, and they would do better to be silent and spare their sneers about a great man. Fortunately there are still some faithful ones left. Mr. H. H. Statham, taking Handel as his text, wrote an article in the Nineteenth Century not long ago, and boldly maintained that oratorio was a higher form of art than opera. He thinks that "the drawback to all serious opera, professing to represent the tragedy and pathos of human life, is that feeling of unreality which is inseparable from it, arising partly from the incongruity in the representation of men and women expressing their feelings in a medium so far removed from the realities of human life; partly from the puerile suggestiveness of stage machinery." Legend, he rightly says, provides the most suitable subjects for opera, and Wagner was wise to recognise this, but "when one hears people talking of this kind of production (the "Ride of the Valkyrie") as if it had a deep moral and poetic significance, one can only regard them as so many grown-up children." When we quit legend, and come to the problem of the musical treatment, by voices and instruments combined, of epic or dramatic narrative of serious significance, "Oratorio comes to the rescue, and furnishes the opportunity for the painting of incident and the expression of character, ... freed from the prosaic yet incomplete realism of the stage."

It is very well that serious writers should discuss these and similar subtle points as to the respective rank to be accorded to the different forms which musical art may take. Of one thing, however, we may be sure, that neither Mr. Statham nor anyone else who prefers oratorio to opera will ever find he can convince the opponents who prefer opera. For the public these are "academic" questions, and the people who enjoy and who pay will go to that form of entertainment they like best, without inquiring whether it is higher or lower. For ourselves, we venture to doubt if the finest oratorio existing is, as a work of art, finer than the best operas of Mozart, operas which England seems quite happy to do without. At present the vogue of the theatre, and consequently of opera, is greater among us than it has ever been. Unless, then, Fashion comes to the aid of oratorio, that form of art must be content to rank second in popular favour. There was a time when careful people thought opera wicked. We can remember when young ladies were not allowed to witness "Faust"

JUST PUBLISHED. 40 Pages. Boards, 1s. net. Postage 1d.
SONNETS: By A. Pelham Webb
"The Times" says: "These are the work of an accomplished sonnetteer, with a finely pictorial imagination and a happy, though sometimes too artificial, gift of phrase."
LONDON: A. C. FIFIELD, 13, CLIFFORD'S INN, E.C.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

or "Don Giovanni." Nowadays the youngest of them may see "Scheherazade," so that oratorio has lost one of its props. Who can doubt that if any town in Great Britain were offered the choice between one performance of an opera and one performance of an oratorio, an honest ballot would result overwhelmingly in favour of the opera? We must have incident, we must have excitement; if it is a symphony which we are to hear, we desire that it should be stirring and highly coloured, that it should vividly suggest action, or at least the highly-wrought movements of the mind. This accounts in great measure for the comparative indifference to "chamber music" and to the symphonies of Haydn and Mozart. We enjoy Beethoven still, because he is dramatic, but, to tell the truth, we find Strauss the most stimulating of them all! Oratorios are not exciting enough for us.

When Mr. Statham says "that Handel is the great light in oratorio, supreme above all others, no sound criticism can deny," he is probably right. There can be but few who could enter the lists with him on such a point, for the simple reason that there are so few who know anything about Handel's oratorios! Many amateurs, but by no means all, have heard the "Messiah"; some have heard "Israel in Egypt," and in some of the provincial cities it may be that "Judas Maccabæus" and "Samson" are still performed at intervals. Members of the "Handel Society" know a little about the other oratorios perhaps, but not much. Ordinary folk like snippets in music as well as in literature, and are content if they know one air out of a Handel oratorio. To sit through a long oratorio was too great a strain even for that sturdiest of Handelians, Edward Fitzgerald. He loved to play Handel to himself —"My admiration for the old giant grows and grows, this is the music for a great active people." Yet, again, and he is pitying his friend Donne for "undergoing those dreadful oratorios. . . . I never heard one that was not tiresome and in parts ludicrous, even Magnus Handel, even Messiah!" This was towards the end of his career, and it confirms one of his earliest recorded sayings about music. "I am rather liable to be overset by any weariness, and where can any be found that can match the effect of two oratorios"?

We suspect that more of us are secretly of Fitzgerald's opinion than might be supposed from the sight of the interested-looking throngs that filled the transept of the Crystal Palace last week at the Handel Festival, or of those who go to hear oratorios at the great provincial festivals. It is not the sole attraction of the music which brings people together on these occasions. We could not profess to feel any great regret if the Handel Festival of the year proved to be the last of its kind. It provides a few magnificent moments, when one does hear a rush of sound not possible at other performances, but it is neither more beautiful nor more thrilling than the sound which can be heard at Leeds or Birmingham. Handel is not "in fashion" just now, neither is Milton, Pope, nor Byron. But their place in Literature is firmly fixed. So is Handel's in Music.

THE third performance of "The Children of Don" at the London Opera House, on Thursday evening, June 27, conducted by Mr. Holbrooke himself, was, of course, too late to receive comment in our last issue. In noticing it briefly we may say that several slight alterations were made which may be considered as in the nature of improvements. The opera was shortened by about half an hour, and the resultant concentration was all to the good; the rather too heavy gloom of the stage, which made for monotony, was lightened, consequently the inevitable strain to the eyes of watching intently a dimly illuminated scene was minimised. The enunciation of the singers, too, had become more clear than it was on the previous occasions, and, although we see no reason to change our already expressed opinion of the opera as "an arduous intellectual exercise," it was obvious that by certain judicious modifications the pleasure of listening was enhanced. A work on such a scale cannot possibly be heard at its best until several performances have been given, and future settings of "The Children of Don" will gain by the experience of these past weeks. Mr. Josef Holbrooke had his large orchestra well in hand; to conduct the work, even though it is his own, after Herr Nikisch, is an ordeal which he might well have shrunk from, but very few critics could have found fault with his method, and the audience awarded him a hearty reception.

Pilgrims and Pilgrimage

THE other day I was examining the little crosses carved on the stone in Compton Church in Surrey. They say that the pilgrims used to turn aside from the Pilgrims' Way, where it runs along the south edge of the Hog's Back, to worship at some shrine or before some image of peculiar sanctity in the little Norman church; and there they have left for us, not their names, as the twentieth century pilgrim is wont to do, but the signs of their sacred profession, carved on the drums of the pillars, plain for posterity in a less believing age to see.

Scarcely anything in the customs and institutions of the Middle Ages is less intelligible to the modern mind than that sense of duty which led streams of pilgrims to visit far-off shrines at whatever loss or inconvenience to themselves. We understand, more or less, the object of pilgrimages to Lourdes. There is definite advantage to be gained there. But the mediæval pilgrim expected no less to gain advantage by his visit to Canterbury or Winchester or to the more distant and difficult goals of Rome or Palestine: only the benefit was rather spiritual than bodily. It is true that the distinction is not always plain. There is a bodily flavour about the remission of so many years of purgatory in the next world or of so much penance in this. But the mere attainment of the object was not sufficient. It depended on the manner and the spirit in which the pilgrim conducted his journey. To have ridden in a carriage would have conferred less benefit. To go bare-foot conferred far more. Besides, we may reasonably expect that, as in so many similar cases, the indirect benefits were more than would have been admitted at the time. It is a commonplace of history that the Crusades, though they failed in their ostensible object, were of use to European civilisation by bringing it into closer contact with the ways and manners and merchandise of the East. Similarly, Chaucer's narrative makes it plain that something more than the professed reason of the pilgrimage made it attractive to the members who joined it. It was above all things a social undertaking. Knight met trader and parish priest fraternised with friar, and there was no doubt much rounding of social corners in the course of their association.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Perhaps there was yet more than this. The turning aside from the ordinary paths of worldly occupation, the devotion of days and weeks, and may be even months and years, to the pursuit of a wholly unworldly object, the communing with Nature, the freedom, the respect paid to the devotee—all these things must have been the cause of a peculiar exaltation, a stimulating of the inner spirit, a lowering of the wall which separates earth from heaven. Of course there were superstition and selfishness and hypocrisy mixed up with it all. The highest undertakings are rarely quite pure in motive. But the great significance of the custom, the thing which is so alien to the modern spirit, so unintelligible, so ridiculous to the man of to-day, is the protest against materialism, the denial that the bread-winning aspect of life is the true one, the claim of the unworldly to a conspicuous place in the life of the world; for this was the fundamental meaning of pilgrimages, and the visitation of holy places.

If the custom of pilgrimage was characteristic of the mediæval outlook on life, there is a daily increasing practice among ourselves which distinguishes us no less from the ages of faith, and which may in some measure be the counterpart of the other,—the custom of taking extended holidays. The holiday habit resembles the pilgrimage in this respect that we are not wholly sincere in the motive which we ascribe to it. We worship at the shrine of health and drag in the fetish of physical science to justify our wholesale pleasure-seeking. Sometimes we plead our intellectual advantage where the mediæval pilgrim would have named the spiritual. We go to Venice or Bayreuth for their educational value. "My girls talk to me of self-realisation," said a well-known college teacher, "and when I ask them what they mean by it, they say 'going to Italy.'" Nevertheless the true pilgrim spirit does survive; in some cases it might be said to be purer, in that there is no conscious idea of any self-advancement. I have seen on a bank holiday, when the villages of the Lake District were filled with roystering holiday-makers, reverent groups of poetry-lovers of all classes gathering silently round Wordsworth's tomb by "Rotha's wave." Perhaps the nearest approach to the real pilgrim-spirit is to be found in the mountaineer. His object is sublime, quixotic, spiritual. Professedly he sets out to conquer virgin peaks in order that he may make new entries in the roll of Alpine records. But in reality he is in quest of spiritual exaltation. Nothing else could make him face such imminent dangers for the sake of so immaterial a reward.

There is, however, one feature of the pilgrimage which I find it impossible to match with any of its modern survivals. Nowhere do we see the person of the pilgrim held in reverence. He neither claims nor wins any reputation for sanctity. We admire the man who tramps across the Alps rather than join in the scramble of personally conducted tourists, but we do not consider him worshipful. When we are bent on the same quest we avoid our fellow tourists with a shudder, and thank heaven that we are not as other men are. We applaud the enthusiasm which fills the columns of the Stratford register with American names, but secretly resent it a little. We think that the signatories are seeking an undeserved reputation for culture, and asserting an unreal superiority over Shakespeare's own countrymen. The last thing that we should call them would be holy persons engaged on a mission which raises them spiritually above their fellows.

There are people who predict for us a return to the barbarism of the Middle Ages. A religious journal recently expressed a fear that the spirit of law and order, which we boast as the chief product of modern civilisation, shows signs of dissolution, and that the result will be an increased insecurity of human life, recalling the lawless conditions of the Dark Ages. It might be added that we see signs also of a return to their naïve immaterialism and disregard for what we have come to name economic law, with a corresponding raising of spiritual values. The same journal consoled itself with the reflection that such a relapse into barbarism as it apprehended might be accompanied by a revival of that devotion to the one religion which was perhaps the best feature of the Middle Age. May we not conjecture that with it would doubtless return the cult of the Pilgrims' Way, and the zeal that imprinted a sacred symbol where men now commonly leave the memorial of self-assertive vulgarity?

GUY KENDALL.

Foreign Reviews

"DIE DEUTSCHE RUNDSCHAU."

IN the June number progress is made with Frau von Bunsen's Neckar tour, with the novel "Stephana Schwertner," and with the delightful letters of Annette von Droste-Hülshoff to Elise Rüdiger. Colonel von Kurnatowski contributes a most informing article on those very paradoxical subjects, the effect of war or mobilisation on national finance, and financial preparation for war. Dr. Hubert Ermisch traces the history of the various branches of the Oldenburg family, in connection partly with the Schleswig-Holstein question; having the control of the archives of the family in his hands, he has the command of much original information. Herr M. von Brandt gives a clear survey of the history of the Chinese Revolution. Dr. Julius Schiff discusses Goethe's interest in ancient and modern chemistry, and the chemist friends who helped him with his researches.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

"LE MERCURE DE FRANCE."

June 1.—M. Jean de Gourmont contributes a highly interesting paper on the physiological bases of "L'Art et la Morale." He concludes that there is an essential antagonism between the two conceptions; the former is "une échappatoire à la vie," and leads logically to annihilation; the latter "est bien une affirmation de la vie, et il y a vraiment incompatibilité entre l'art libérateur et la morale, qui est une manifestation vitale." Morality favours the race, art the individual. M. Schinz analyses Rousseau's conception of virtue, and finds that it varied greatly with the circumstances of the discussion. M. Maybon gives the data of the Chinese Revolution very clearly.

June 16.—Rousseau continues to be a centre of attraction; M. Bazaillas discusses him as a creative genius, and concludes that his very sensibility, wedded to his marvellous mental activity, resembles a "force de la nature." M. G. le Cardonnel writes of Louis Dumur, one of the originators of the modern Mercure, and a representative of its tendencies. M. Marcel Coulon continues the discussion of J.-H. Fabre and Transformism. M. Philippe Champault gives his reasons for being quite certain that the Pharacians lived at Ischia, and that Odysseus found them there. M. André Fontanas discusses the "Iphigénie" of Moréas.

"LA REVUE."

May 15.—M. Jean Finot, editor of La Revue, knew Mr. W. T. Stead better than anyone else, and his article "Le Roi des Journalistes, le Meilleur des Hommes" is one of the best things we have ever read. It is compounded of history, anecdote, sound psychology, and daring intuitions. M. Finot never shuns the risks attaching to an imaginative treatment of his subject. His account of the relations between Cecil Rhodes and Stead recalls the circumstances which produced the "Heroic Symphony"; we are told how Melchior de Vogüé tried to enshrine the two English Imperialists in a novel, and how M. Finot introduced Stead to this essay—"Le Maître de la Mer." Then, when Stead staked on the Anglo-American alliance, M. Finot and La Revue countered with the first draft of the "Entente Cordiale," and "nous prîmes même un malicieux plaisir à parier sur le chiffre de désabonnements que nous vaudrait chaque article de la série." We have no space for the anecdotes, but we may perhaps be allowed to recall Stead's "réponse légendaire" to the Sovereign who had offered him a decoration—"On condition that you accept mine, Sire!" M. Finot was not always very sympathetic for Stead's "Ghosts"—his failure to understand inspired his friend with a "tristesse affectueuse"— but he appears to believe that the murder of the Servian Royal Family was really prognosticated. M. Finot's comparison of Stead with Marcus Aurelius is suggestive.

Among other contributions we will note a disquisition by M. Faguet on "les Humoristes Français," and some health statistics for French colonial wars, compiled by M. Mury. He quotes Admiral Véron as saying, "En Angleterre, pour conserver les hommes, on ne se borne pas à les soigner, on les gâte." From the final article on Flaubert's last years, we will quote this pregnant saying: "Mon roman est fini, il ne rest plus qu'à l'écrire!"

June 1.—M. Finot writes what has proved to be an obituary notice of Frédéric Passy, "Le grand vieillard." M. de Tarlé analyses Lord Haldane's Anglo-German studies. M. Faguet has some excellent badinage on the "Theories of M. Paul Bourget." We cannot help quoting from it the possibly well-known phrase of the Abbé de Saint-Pierre, in which the courtesies of debate are extended "jusqu'au raffinement"—"Monsieur, je ne suis pas encore de votre sentiment." M. Aguilera discusses "L'Espagne actuelle," M. J. Mancini the South-American Revolution at the dawn of the nineteenth century, and M. Cim gives a number of amusing literary gaffes.

June 8.—"L'Album de Madame Victor Hugo," supplies a number of "inédits." Extracts from the last pages of the diary of "Père Hyacinthe" are given. Dr. Gottschalk discusses "la Question des Viandes." M. Faguet continues to address M. Bourget, in connection, this time, with the monarchical ideals of the famous novelist. M. Nicolas Ségur notices the new historical novel of M. Anatole France, "Les Dieux ont soif."

"LA REVUE BLEUE."

May 18.—More letters of Berlioz and a poem by M. Richepin. M. Jules Harmand writes from first-hand knowledge of colonial protectorates; he dislikes the kind of protectorate that leaves too much liberty to native princes, and he denounces home interference with distant colonies. M. L. Maury writes an appreciation of M. Thureau-Dangin's book on Newman: M. Maury thinks that the great Cardinal would have missed his fame but for an unusually long life—"Vivez donc le plus longtemps possible; la vie a de ces revanches."

May 25.—M. Emile Boutroux contributes a fine essay on "L'Essence de la Religion." M. Gustave le Bon lends a chapter of his forthcoming book on the French Revolution, which promises to be interesting through the morals drawn in it. M. Lanson writes about an academical entente with America, M. Paul Louis on the German Socialists, and M. Paul Gaultier on M. Bouglé's life of Proudhon. There are some letters of Rachel, and, under the title "Le Mauvais Roman," M. Jacques Lux gives a very appreciative résumé of a recent article in THE ACADEMY.

June 1.—A melancholy interest attaches to one article in this number, "Ma Carrière," by M. Frédéric Passy, who died only two or three days after its publication. M. le Chatelier complains of the opportunist Moroccan policy of his Government. M. Paul Flat writes of the portrait painter, Gustave Ricard. M. Lucien Maury discusses M. Barrès' book on "Il Greco."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

June 8.—Souvenirs of childhood form a great part of this number: M. Paul Hervieu is philosophical and seeks for the origin of his earliest political opinions; M. Flat reinforces M. Barrès' appeal for the preservation of the village churches—"ces monuments de famille"; and a portion of M. Edmond Gosse's autobiography is given. M. Jacoubet recounts a journey in Corea, made by him in 1907, when he saw with deep disfavour the signs of Japanese triumph.

June 15.—This number celebrates the jubilee of the Revue Bleue and the Revue Scientifique. The most important item is an account of the jubilee banquet, with the chief speeches delivered at it. M. Paul Flat admirably epitomises the position of the Revue Bleue, which is, he says, an "organe, non de libre pensée, ... mais de pensée libre, ce qui est fort différent." M. Maurice Donnay spoke wittily, and MM. Moureu and Lippmann dealt with the scientific side of the venture. M. Guist'hau represented the Government and M. Poincaré.

M. Joussain discusses M. Bergson and music; M. Dumont-Wilden tells the story of de la Merveille and the Ostend Company, while M. Lucien Maury genially banters M. Henry Cochin and his book on Lamartine.

"L'ACTION NATIONALE."

To the June number Mr. E. D. Morel contributes a denunciation of the project for converting the "Entente Cordiale" into a definite alliance. He is afraid of such an alliance proving too chauvinistic, or being directed exclusively against Germany, which country, we learn, was entirely in the right in the troubles of last summer. Mr. Morel by no means spares the susceptibilities of his French readers, denouncing the conduct of their Government and Press with regard to the Congo, and using exceedingly plain language about M. Tardieu. General Lebas criticises the organisation of the garrison artillery.

"LA REVUE CRITIQUE D'HISTOIRE ET DE LITTÉRATURE."

May 25.—M. Picavet notices the seventeenth volume, by M. J. Hanoteau, of the "Recueil des Instructions données aux Ambassadeurs et Ministres de France." The volume deals with the relations of France with the Papacy from 1688 to the end of the Regency.

June 1.—"My" and M. Biovès are the principal contributors, and each dispatches a large number of books. The former deals with Herr Ernst Schmidt's work on the migrations of classical divinities, and with Herr Mueller's essay on the gods in Greek tragedy. Among the English books noticed by M. Biovès are Sir Sidney Lee's "Principles of Biography," Mr. Bernard Shaw's reply to Dr. Nordau's "Degeneration," and the work of Messrs. Rowntree and Lasker on unemployment.

June 8.—There is so much Comparative Religion in this number that recourse is had to a division of labour, M. Loisy is severe for Mr. Boxall's translated book on Religion and Science, but finds much good in M. Vacandard's third series of "Etudes," while M. Alfaric does justice to two works with whose principles he is not in agreement: M. Tixeront's "Histoire des Dogmes dans l'Antiquité Chrétienne," and Professor Hunziger's "Das Wunder." M. Pichon praises the first volume of M. G. Michaut's "Histoire de la Comédie Romaine." M. Driault's "Austerlitz et la Fin du Saint-Empire" is commended, though it is accused of somewhat inadequate documentation.

June 15.—M. Chuquet reviews several works on military history. M. Loisy strikes a curiously personal note in discussing the anonymous publication of some disillusioned French Catholics, "Ce qu'on a fait de l'Eglise," and he pays homage to the new edition of Herr Kittel's "Geschichte des Volkes Israel." M. Courby notices at considerable length and with considerable appreciation the third volume, entitled "Les Rythmes artistiques," of M. Deonna's "L'Archéologie, sa Valeur, ses Méthodes." The theory of the "éternels recommencements de l'art" is admitted, even pressed, but there is some criticism of detail.

Some Indian Reviews

A GLANCE at the five May numbers of the Wednesday Review (Trichinopoly) will give the reader a general idea of Indian journalistic opinion on current topics. The editor is independent and consistent, blaming alike the Madras Provincial Conference and the officials. He denies the existence of any considerable public opinion against the exclusion of religious instruction from schools and colleges, and he opposes sectarian Universities as resulting from the estrangement between Hindus and Mahomedans; also, he protests against party struggles and personal animosities in public life, a vain protest, as he will find. In each issue there is a paper on English Life through Indian Eyes, always by the same contributor, who presumably corresponds from England. In England these papers would have little effect, but among Indians, who know no better, they may be regarded as containing gospel truth. The editor's criticisms on the new Government Department of Commerce and Industry are worthless, and characteristic of Indian methods. The Government are charged with neglecting, say, Trade and Commerce. They appoint an officer to take charge of a bureau, as in other countries. He becomes merely another target for the critic's arrows. A demand is promptly made for his extinction. This periodical relies largely on extracts from English magazines and reviews, and we notice with pleasure its reprints of articles from THE ACADEMY.

The (Calcutta) Collegian for May shows the educational progress made in the Native State of Mysore. The over-production of literary inefficients will cause future trouble. The institution of a school of tropical medicine at Calcutta deserves support, as also the proposed Young Chiefs' College for Bengal, and the improvement and extension of the Veterinary College at Lahore. Such outlets for educated youths are much more beneficial than an institution at Benares for Vedic studies. A proposal has been made for a Central Institute in England, to include both Indian youths under education, and selected English youths preparing for an Indian career. Enormous difficulties will be encountered before such a proposal can materialise. The subscriptions to the projected Mahomedan University are still 20 lakhs (i.e., £133,000) short of the promised amount. "Some Facts About Malaria" should be useful, if properly studied.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Rajput Herald for April-May, a monthly illustrated magazine, devoted to Rajput History, Antiquities, Literature and Art, is well got up: though it is published in London, apparently all the contributors are Indians. The editor writes on "The Ancient Relationship between Persia and India," on the assumption that ancient Persia and ancient India were one in thought and sentiment. The object appears to be to establish a better feeling between Hindus and Parsis. "How to Save the British Empire" is used as a text for advocating the claims of Indians to equal treatment with Englishmen, even up to the Prime Ministership or a Governor-Generalship. When Indians become possessed of other essential qualifications (which they now lack) besides intellectual ability, it will be time to consider the matter. "The Regeneration of India" opens up large questions which are discussed from the social, industrial, and political standpoints; more action, and less writing and talking would be an improvement. The glorification of the country and its inhabitants is the theme of a long paper: their backwardness is the result of their characteristics, and cannot be remedied by a stroke of the pen.

The Journal of the Anthropological Society of Bombay (for 1910-11) has a ponderous treatise on "National or Racial Psychology as a subject for anthropological research, illustrated by a comparison of English and Indo-Aryan traits," which might well have been compressed or summarised. The "Spirit Basis of Belief and Custom" is shorter, but equally full of serious matter. "Anthropological Scraps" are lighter, and sometimes really laughable. The list of papers read in 1910 shows the genuine interest of certain members in the aims of the Society.

At St. Stephen's Shrine

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE.

ON Wednesday Runciman took the floor with the Agricultural vote, and the large majority of the Members listened with Queen Alexandra's roses in their buttonholes. Some men came down in the hopes of a further scene with Lansbury, but nothing happened; he seems to have spent his force for the time, and the Prime Minister was loudly cheered from both sides of the House. Everyone felt that he had not been fairly treated. The general impression was that Runciman did very well. He certainly seemed more genial and at ease than when he was at the Board of Education.

Another clever Minister did his turn on Thursday. Lulu Harcourt is a man well worth watching. Some people allege that it was "young Harcourt" who was responsible for the undoing of Lord Rosebery. He was his father's secretary then, and by all the rules of the game Sir William Harcourt ought to have succeeded the Grand Old Man—but did not, simply because that imperious personage left Lord Rosebery as his political heir. All this is ancient history. After long years of political training behind the scenes Lulu quietly slipped on to the stage and at once showed his capacity. He was an excellent man at the Office of Works. He persuaded wealthy men to go down to posterity as donors of frescoes for the walls of Parliament and invented a great improvement without mechanical means in saving the time wasted in taking divisions. His ingenuity again came to the fore. In an excellent speech of two hours he gave a bird's-eye view of the whole of the Crown Colonies, not only mentioning the places where things were wrong, but dwelling more particularly on places where things were right and were prospering. Like Lloyd George, he seemed to have turned Imperialist, and we listened with pleasure to his admirable survey.

There are four people in the running for the reversion of the Premiership—Lloyd George, Winston, Harcourt, and Seely; and quite a number of men think that when they get round Tattenham Corner and are "in the straight" that the quiet, suave Harcourt will come out of the crowd and win by a neck. We shall see.

Gilbert Parker, who takes a deep interest in the Imperial Trade Commission, attacked the Government for not allowing us to discuss it after promising to do so, and blamed them for appointing Lord Inchcape as the chairman because it was well known he was opposed to any idea of preference; but the vote was not seriously opposed.

Various groups have been hungering for McKenna's blood, so Asquith thought he would break the force of the attack a little by artfully giving them Friday, "the earliest possible day." Now Friday is only a half-day, and the Labour men were suspicious that was all they were going to get, but Asquith reassured them—they should have another day as well for the Home Office vote.

The rank-and-file of the House are getting a little tired of the Suffragettes. They lost a good many good friends when they smashed harmless tradesmen's windows in the West End; people could not see the sense of it. Then again they all swarmed like bees in St. Stephen's Hall the other day, and sent in shoals of cards for various members who are supporters. When the members came out they were reproached by wild-eyed women for not doing more: Why had only 38 stood up for the adjournment when 40 would have carried it and yet over 100 voted for it in the Lobby when they knew it would not be carried? The women said it was cowardly perfidy!

The Labour men had not a look in about the strike—the Woman Suffrage debate occupied the whole five hours.

Lord Robert fiercely attacked McKenna and weakened a strong case in the opinion of some by referring to his "past." The mistakes of the Archer-Shee case and the Swansea Church Schools were rubbed in relentlessly. John Fletcher, the mild but devoted member for Hampstead, who is an old and experienced member of the local Bench, thought McKenna ought not to have any salary at all—because he was so constantly interfering with the sentences of judges. Sir John Rolleston, amid shouts of laughter, pictured the Ulster resisters, Lord Londonderry and Sir Edward Carson, being forcibly fed in an Irish prison.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The House is very fair with all its faults, and executes a kind of rough and ready justice; after punishing McKenna for a fortnight they listened to his defence and agreed that he had made out a good case on the whole. He hinted that he could not tell all he knew.

There was a large Society function connected with the Unionist Party going on this afternoon. Lord Londesborough gave a garden party to the much-criticised Percival Hughes, the late Chief Agent, who had taken the helm at the nadir of the party's fortunes and steered the ship until a fair haven was in sight. The Radical Whips got hold of the idea this was going to be used as a blind; they knew the Labour men would probably vote against them, and although the voting could not be on the usual party lines, yet on the whole it looked as if it were a favourable opportunity for a "snap." So at four o'clock the Radical benches were crammed to repletion (as one member at the bar said, "they were sitting as close together as fowls roosting"), looking somewhat ill-tempered at losing their week-end trains. But it was evidently another false alarm, because only 69 voted in favour of the reduction of the Home Secretary's salary, whilst an appreciable number of Unionists voted with the Government. It was intended as a hint to the Suffragettes to abandon their recent methods.

On Monday the Home Rule debate was difficult to follow. There is a clause in the Bill declaring the supremacy of the British Parliament. Now this does not appear in any of the Constitutions of the great Dominions, and the Unionists said it was meaningless and only put in for the consumption of timid Liberals: it was a fraud and a sham. Walter Long made a capital speech and the Prime Minister had to admit that the phrase was a platitude, but he felt sure that the Irish would govern themselves well without any interference. This was not the question, but the sub-section was retained after a division. Then came the other side of the question. If it was desirable to state that the British Parliament was supreme, it was surely equally necessary to declare that the Irish Parliament was subordinate. This the whole forces of the Coalition resented. We got Redmond on his feet at last: It was a "deliberate insult to the Irish Parliament." Then, said Bonar Law, "why did you say that the aim of the Home Rule Bill was to tear up and trample under foot the infamous Act of Union?"

I may be misjudging him, but John Redmond looked as if he would deny the words if he could; but the little red washing-book with its deadly chapter and verse was to be seen bulging behind Bonar Law's breast pocket. "I stick by my words," he went on, after a pause, "but I want to put in place of the old Act a readjusted Act of Union accepted by the Irish in perfect good faith which will bring a real unity between the two nations. Besides, England can always assert her supremacy." "How?" queried half-a-dozen back benchers; but John Redmond was too wary: "I cannot go into that now." The closure was applied, and again the Government figures dropped to the figure 69.

In the evening O'Grady, the Labour man, pleaded for a meeting of the disputants of the Dock Strike. The employers had issued a carefully drawn statement claiming that there was nothing to discuss; the men had brought the quarrel on themselves—they had struck because of one man, and they were now seeing that they had been misled by their leaders and were crowding back to work. The employers had been vilified on Tower Hill, and they were not inclined to do anything. Mr. Asquith found himself in a tight place; he had publicly declared that it was not the duty of the Government to interfere in these matters.

Bonar Law moved an amendment approving the words of the Prime Minister, "that the constitutional and usual attitude of the Government should be one of complete detachment." It was gall and wormwood to the Prime Minister to be praised by the Opposition, and, as he knew, very dangerous.

"How are you going to vote?" said Bonar Law bluntly across the table; and then came the astounding announcement that the Prime Minister did not intend to vote at all. He had not the courage of his convictions. He intended to run away, and did so, followed by some of his principal lieutenants, whilst the rest of the Cabinet placated the Labour men as much as possible by voting with them.

"How much shall we drop on Seely's majority?" asked the Liberals in the smoking room after dinner. A thousand at least, said one; we could not expect to retain a 4,000 majority in these times. It was therefore somewhat of a blow when 11.30 struck and it was found that the majority at Ilkeston had gone down by 2,800 votes. The Unionists cheered and ironically inquired of the Chancellor if this was on account of the new "Back to the Land" campaign he had started on Saturday night at Woodford.

The Government have met with another misfortune. It is common knowledge that the Agricultural Department in Ireland under T. W. Russell is badly manned—too many "Dowbs," some people say. However, the terrible scourge of foot-and-mouth disease has broken out in England, the contagion spreading from Ireland, where it was (some allege) deliberately concealed, or at least not discovered for a fortnight. Members are saying if this happens under the Union won't the dangers be much greater under Home Rule.

The Home Rule debate continued during the whole of Tuesday. After 11 Eddy Turnour, Earl Winterton, drew attention to a savage attack by a body of the

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Ancient Order of Hibernians on a party of Sunday School children near Belfast. Their only crime seemed to be that they were carrying a Union Jack. Birrell was not able to dispute the facts, and while some of the Government men tried to laugh it off, he looked serious —as well he might.

To crown all, the Labour men are not satisfied with the recent behaviour of the Government, and swear they will run a man at Crewe if the Liberal candidate is not withdrawn at Hanley—and take all their men away to aid in the battle. I will deal with this next week.

The Theatre

The Irish Players

IF the Irish Players have a failing more than another it is that the work they do is too much dependent on comedy. One would like to see it rather more imbued with a spirit of adventure, and strike out on to a higher reach of work. Even the work they have in their repertory that is of this kind is all too frequently neglected. There are Mr. Yeats's plays, which, though they are not so much dramatic as dream-products, are yet of the kind of work we mean. Then there is Synge's "Deirdre of the Sorrows," which is altogether neglected. This is, to be true, in past work. There is room for newer work of this nature.

Yet the humour that they do is seldom broad. It makes for laughter truly enough; but it seldom asks for the stout guffaw. There is only one of their writers who appeals to just this kind of mirth; and that is Mr. William Boyle. Last, year, we remember, his "Mineral Workers" was of this kind, and the humour was not alone broad but well procured and well sustained. This year the play that was produced of his was not so successful in scheme or in sustainment. The choice of a title is one of the most difficult problems that an author has to face. And when Mr. Boyle elected to call his play "Family Failing" he struck on a title that gave the solution a peculiar humour all of its own, but he also enabled one to divine with fair ease what that solution was to be all along the course of the play. Which was in itself one of the causes of the play's peculiar failure; for it imposed a task on him that he did not quite seem to realise, and which he therefore did not accomplish.

The household of the Donnellys is composed of two brothers and a sister: Dominic, who spends his days sitting with a pillow in an armchair reading his paper; Joe, who can only arouse himself to energy when it is a question of following the hounds; and Maria, who is the drudge to these two, and whose lack of energy shows itself in a reluctance to do anything more resolute than busying herself in that perpetual groove, and who finds excuses for herself in protecting and excusing her brothers. Moreover, it appears that she once had some money left her; but that has now been consumed in running the household in its fackless kind of way; and they are all now reduced to such a pass that the latest intimation is that the tradesmen will no longer give them any credit. There is a tradition in the family that a certain ancestor of theirs used up all their energy, and that, since then, they have one and all earned for the name of Donnelly the epithet of "do nothing." All their lands are gone, being practically in the hands of one Tom Carragher, who has married a cousin of theirs. In a month or so there is no doubt that he will close down on the land; when they will have nothing between them and the workhouse.

It is to this household that Robert Donnelly comes. He is an uncle from America and is reported to be of great wealth. When he arrives he tells them how he set his will to overcome the family failing, and how, thus, the very failing was turned to advantage inasmuch as it gave him a strong will and determination. At once the desire is to persuade him of their worthiness. He has commented on the fine appearance of the farm, saying that Dominic must have worked hard to have established so excellent a condition of things. Even Tom Carragher, whose work it all is, of course, is persuaded to join in the conspiracy; and he does so in a grim humour, never thinking that either Dominic or Joe will ever rise to any display of energy.

Robert Donnelly, however, starts Dominic digging out the foundations of a new house, and, since he would not do this unless he were obviously going to pay for its erection, Dominic is forced to the work by Mrs. Carragher in spite of Maria's anxiety that the work will be the death of him. Joe, even, gives up sport, and joins in the work; and Mrs. Carragher keeps them all at it. She it is who is responsible for it all; and she even at last manages to persuade Maria into the belief that her brothers are, in Biblical phrase, "sons of Belial."

All this is the proper business of one act. But Mr. Boyle mars the humour of it considerably by drawing it out into two acts. The result is that the play hangs considerably—which is a very fatal thing for humour to do. But in the third act a change comes. For Dominic, quite unaccountably, becomes enthusiastic in his work. He talks of nothing, and thinks of nothing, but plans for the recovery of the farm, and its cultivation on the lines of intensive culture. All this he outlines to his uncle Robert, who listens to him from the folding bed that he bears about with him on his travels, and says nothing. Tom Carragher begins to get really alarmed, for he had been counting on the farm as his in a month or so. He upbraids his wife for the mischief she has brought on her own husband and children, and in the end he and Dominic fall out. But, when he has gone, Dominic continues to talk about projects for the cultivation of the farm, and plans innumerable campaigns, counting, of course, on his uncle's money, since that uncle has now decided to continue to stay with them indefinitely. Then the long-foreseen transpires. For it appears that the uncle has also the family failing; that he has lied to them of his energy; and that he is as poor as they, and determined to be a parasite on them. At this Dominic bids him rise from his bed. One half expects a scene. Instead of which, they solemnly shake hands; and Dominic tells his sister that now she has three of them on her hands.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

As we have said, humour that is long drawn out is disastrous; and there is more than the hint of this in the play. But there are deeper faults of draughtsmanship. For example, that there should be so great a change in Dominic in the last act as contrasted with the first two may be forgiven, in spite of the fact that it is so very emphatic; but the change in Robert Donnelly is a different matter. The one, however unlikely, has a motive; but the other is too obviously part of the structure of the play. A man who has spent two acts hustling about the farm is not very likely to spend the third act sitting half asleep on his bed. But likely or not, it is unpermissible without some kind of a motive in the character of the man. Instead of which the only motive is in the machinery of the play. Nor was this only to do with the acting; for the words demanded it, although Mr. O'Donovan would probably have been wiser had he himself smoothed one end of the part into the other. There is a humour that arises from a situation, and we call it farce. There is also a humour that arises from character, and that we call comedy. But when a dramatist sets out to write the one, and then makes it dependent on the machinery of the other, one cannot but feel uneasy in watching it.

Nevertheless, there was big, round laughter in the play, and it is perhaps too much to ask of it that all the parts should cohere together. It was certainly not the artistic success of "The Mineral Workers," where the humour was very happily contrived out of character. Mr. Sinclair as Dominic had a part for which he was obviously fitted; and he was inimitable in the scene where Dominic is aroused and full of plans. Mr. Morgan as Joe had a quieter and smaller part; and though he said little, it was wonderful how much he made of the part in his sincere, unostentatious way. Miss Eileen O'Doherty as Maria was admirable; as, too, was Mr. Kerrigan as Tom Carragher. One noticed a newcomer in Violet McCarthy, who played Mrs. Carragher. She was obviously nervous, and consequently underacted and underspoke her part several times; yet, with her musical speech and natural manner, she should be a considerable acquisition to the company.

On the Monday previous, "Birthright" was represented. Of this we propose to speak more fully next week, as in our opinion it is one of the most noteworthy things that the Irish Players have done for some time. Suffice it now only to say that the four actors who took the only parts of consequence, Miss O'Doherty, Messrs. Morgan, Kerrigan and O'Donovan, deserve the highest praise for strong, unstrained and poignant acting. Miss O'Doherty and Mr. Morgan, particularly, gave the play moments that we must consider some of the highest we have experienced in the theatre.

Notes and News

Mr. Arthur F. Bird has nearly ready Mr. Charles Klein's novel, "Find the Woman," on which the successful play produced by Mr. Arthur Bourchier at the Garrick Theatre is founded.

The "Nobodies" Club is now established at 109, Regent Street, and the Secretary will be pleased to explain the aims and objects of the Club to anyone wishing to join, between the hours of ten and six daily.

We are informed by Messrs. George Philip and Son, Ltd., that her Majesty the Queen has been graciously pleased to accept a copy of their recent publication, "The Sea Road to the East," six lectures prepared for the Visual Instruction Committee of the Colonial Office, by A. J. Sargent, M.A.

On Thursday, July 18, "Bunty Pulls the Strings" will celebrate its first birthday at the Haymarket Theatre. Produced last July in what is supposed to be the worst time of the year from the theatre point of view, "Bunty" immediately took the town by storm, and has proved one of the most successful comedies of modern times.

The Summer Shakespeare Festival at Stratford-on-Avon will begin this year on August 3, and last for four weeks, the date being specially arranged for the convenience of visitors from abroad and for those in England who take their holiday during the summer months. An effort is made to combine the pleasures of a country holiday with a course of useful study, and special terms are offered to teachers and students.

Messrs. John Long will shortly publish two new novels; one, from the pen of Mrs. Henry Tippett, entitled, "The Waster," gives a study of the sentimentalist; the other, "The Ordeal of Silence," is by that popular author who hides his identity under the sobriquet "A Peer." The same firm has in hand a new work entitled, "Pheasants in Covert and Aviary," by Frank Townend Barton, M.R.C.V.S., lavishly illustrated with numerous half-tone pictures from photographs in addition to four fine coloured plates specially drawn for the work by H. Grönvold. The price of the book is 10s. 6d. net.

In accordance with the decision of the second international congress of archæology, held at Cairo in the spring of 1909, the third congress will take place at Rome from October 9 to 16, 1912, under the presidency of Commendatore Corrado Ricci, Director-General of Antiquities and Fine Arts. The tenth international congress for the history of art will be held from October 16 to 21 (in accordance with the decision of the ninth congress held at Munich in 1909) under the presidency of Professor Adolfe Venturi. Further information can be obtained from the Secretary-General, Dr. Roberto Papini, Via Fabio Massimo 60, Rome.

In connection with the University of Cambridge, the Local Lectures Summer Meeting of 1912 will begin on Saturday, July 27, and end on Tuesday, August 20. It will as usual be divided into two parts: Part I will extend from Saturday, July 27, to Thursday, August 8, inclusive; Part II from Thursday, August 8, to Tuesday, August 20, inclusive. For the first time the new University Examination Halls and Lecture Rooms will be used. These are centrally situated and provide ample and convenient accommodation for Lecture and Reception Rooms under one roof. The Inaugural Address will be given at noon on Saturday, July 27, by the Right Hon. the Earl of Selborne, K.G., Hon. LL.D.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

In his inaugural Presidential Address to the English Goethe Society on June 25, Dr. A. W. Ward, Master of Peterhouse, took as his theme "Goethe and the French Revolution," and proved how the agitations and influences of the great Revolution were clearly reflected in Goethe's writings, and how in all these we never lose sight of the revolutionary movement and the significance of the revolutionary age. Among those present were Professor Breul, one of the Vice-presidents of the Society, Dr. L. T. Thorne, Professor Gollancz, Baron von Schleinitz, Dr. Holland Rose, Mr. R. G. Alford, Mr. Hermann Meyer and the veteran Secretary, Dr. Eugene Oswald, who made a short speech in support of the vote of thanks. Among the interesting exhibits lent for the evening by Mrs. Ludwig Mond were many relics of Lotte Buff, recently acquired by her from Lotte's sole surviving grand-niece.

The friends of the late Miss Rosa Morison (Lady Superintendent of Women Students at University College, London, 1883-1912) desire to raise a Memorial as a tribute of the affection and respect in which they held her, and as a means of commemorating her work. To give effect to this desire, some of those associated with Miss Morison, together with some of her personal friends, have formed a Committee: President, the Right Hon. Lord Reay, K.T., G.C.S.I., LL.D.; Chairman, T. Gregory Foster, B.A., Ph.D. (Provost of University College); Hon. Treasurer, Lady Lockyer. It will greatly aid the work of the Honorary Secretaries if those who wish to take part in this Memorial will communicate with them forthwith. Communications should be addressed to the Honorary Secretaries, Rosa Morison Memorial Committee, University College, London (Gower Street, W.C.).

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

BY LANCELOT LAWTON.

THE GROWTH OF SOCIALISM IN JAPAN.—II.

JAPANESE students who, at the time of the inception of Western reforms, went abroad to France and the United States, were influenced in no small measure by Republican teachings. Many of these are now prominent leaders of public opinion, and while they have discreetly modified their views in accordance with the exacting requirements of Japanese patriotism, or else have refrained from giving expression to them, it must not be imagined that they have wholly discarded the principles of their early teachings. But to suggest that they are Socialists, in any sense of the term, would be ludicrous. For example, Marquis Saionji may hold views that are favourable to the aims of democracy, but he is first and foremost a courtier. Invariably, however, the Japanese are incapable of viewing things in true perspective. During the war everybody who had a single good word to say for the Russians was looked upon as an enemy of the country. Likewise everybody who wishes to see representative government established in reality, and not in name, as at present, is accused of showing Socialistic tendencies. The real danger to the State lies not in the enlightened agitation of scholarly politicians, but in the possibility of the extreme Socialists taking advantage of the widespread dissatisfaction with economic conditions to foment strife against the constituted authority of the land. Although the lawless elements are at present limited both in numbers and in influence, the policy of the Government in sacrificing social reform to the raising of armaments is surely preparing a way for a struggle which may have disastrous and far-reaching consequences.

The extreme Socialists first excited public attention at the time of the Russo-Japanese War. To ventilate their views they established two journals, one of which was issued daily. Both these ventures failed because of the lack of financial support. Dissension split the party into small groups, each of which subsequently confined its activities to organised disturbances of the peace. From time to time numerous arrests were made, and terms of major imprisonment ranging from thirty months downwards, as well as heavy fines, were imposed.

One well-known Japanese publicist has declared that under the pretence of preserving industrial peace the Government suppresses all parties aiming at the reform of society, and that it hinders labour movements at every step instead of providing for the protection and elevation of the working classes. "In these respects," added the same writer, "our Government is certainly fifty years behind the Russian Government." Perhaps the most authoritative utterance upon the subject was that delivered by Mr. Yukio Ozaki, M.P., the Mayor of Tokyo, who declared that "Socialism was the gravest internal problem that confronted the country, and would prove the greatest menace to Japan's fundamental principles of government." The alleged discovery of a plot against the life of the Emperor, and the trial, under the shadow of secrecy, of twenty-six conspirators, followed by the infliction of the death penalty in some cases and of life sentences in others, came as a shock to the guardians of Japan's destiny. Who among them, a few years ago, could have believed it possible that the life of their Emperor would be placed in peril by reason of any action on the part of his subjects? It had ever been their proud boast that of all the nations of the earth Japan was the favoured inasmuch as in the implicit recognition that the throne of the Mikados was sacred and inviolable lay rooted the loyalty and devotion of the masses.

As I have already implied, the time is not altogether inopportune for the sowing of the seeds of Socialism. It is urgent that the Government should take measures to ameliorate the conditions of the labouring communities. Otherwise the doctrines of Socialism will find ready acceptance, and the violent remedies advocated by agitators will arouse those fanatical instincts which latter-day civilisation, far from eradicating, has only kept in check. And it must not be forgotten that in much higher circles there are a number of prominent men imbued with the principles of democracy, and in some instances of what might be termed scientific Socialism. Japan is now represented at all international Socialist conferences in Europe. Singularly enough, owing to the need for replenishing the Treasury, the Government, in creating monopolies, has been compelled to go a long way in the direction of State Socialism. Already the question is being asked: Will it go still farther, and thus anticipate a dangerous movement? Apart from economic conditions, other important factors are preparing the way for the assertion of Japanese democracy. The demand for a Government that shall be responsible to the people is shaping itself. Nor are the army and navy so contented as some admirers of Japan would have us believe. A Japanese newspaper, the Sigi, has declared that fears are entertained that Socialism will spread to the military forces, and that the best measure of precaution is to take steps to prevent the ill-treatment of soldiers and blue-jackets by superiors. The future of Japan certainly presents many problems of extreme gravity. To-day, industrial advancement is being made at the expense of the individual welfare of the people. Herein lies the opportunity of Socialists. If statesmen are wise, they will be content with a less ambitious programme of expansion than that which they are now pursuing. They will, in short, frustrate the aims of Socialism by adopting the practice of Social Reform.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Motoring and Aviation

LIKE the other motoring associations, the A.A. and M.U. has had its share of unpleasant criticism from motorists who prefer cheap petrol to scouts, and who can see no reason why their representative bodies should not at once enter into successful competition with the monopolist corporations which control the petrol supply; but its popularity shows no signs of diminution, and almost every month shows a record in additions to membership. The main reason for this is the incessant activity of the A.A. Committee in devising fresh schemes for its members' benefit. The latest of these—and one of the most important—is the inauguration of a complete roadside telephone service along every main road in the country. Patrol sentry boxes are to be erected at intervals of several miles, and in each box will be installed a telephone in communication with the nearest exchange. At each box a patrol will be on point duty, and his services will be available for the purpose of receiving or transmitting messages for members, entirely free of cost. Only in the case of trunk calls will any charge whatever be made, and then only the ordinary trunk fees, a schedule of which will be exhibited in each sentry box.

This extension of the A.A. and M.U. road organisation is obviously an innovation of the greatest practical utility. It will not only be of special value in case of accident or breakdown, but it will also enable members to keep in constant touch with their private and business affairs, to communicate with their destination, and to order meals or accommodation at hotels while en route. In fact, it will render them "get-at-able" from any point on the main roads, and be of service to them in many other ways too numerous to mention. The work of organisation is being pushed forward with characteristic A.A. rapidity, and it is hoped that the system will be installed on most of the main roads round the various centres in the course of the next two months. The Secretary and Committee of the Association are to be congratulated on having evolved an excellent and thoroughly useful scheme; but one cannot help wondering how long they will remain in undisturbed possession of it. Doubtless the R.A.C. will soon realise its possibilities, and begin to consider the ways and means of adding it, or some imitation of it, to the other schemes they have from time to time annexed from the younger and more enterprising organisation.

The official certificate relating to the recent long-distance road trial—London, Land's End, John o' Groats, London—of the 59.9 h.p. six-cylinder Napier has just been issued by the R.A.C., under whose supervision it was conducted throughout. The document states that the total distance covered was 1928.75 miles, and that with one exception the whole of it was done on top speed. The exception was Berriedale Hill (from John o' Groats), when the driver, on his first attempt, found it necessary to change speed for three seconds. The car returned to the foot of the hill and climbed it successfully "on top." The car was oiled and greased before the start each day, and apart from this no work of any kind was done to it. The average speed was 19.74 miles per hour, and the petrol consumption averaged 23.918 miles to the gallon. In the subsequent speed test at Brooklands the car covered the flying half-mile at the rate of 77.104 miles per hour. No comment is required on such figures as these, beyond the remark that they stamp the performance as the finest top-speed run ever accomplished by any car in the history of motoring.

Wire wheels are so frequently referred to as "steel

"EVERY DROP LUBRICATES."
"Champion" Motor Oil
is the best for all types of Cars.
If not already using "Champion" send for trial tin to
S. BOWLEY & SON,
Wellington Works,
BATTERSEA, LONDON, S.W.
Established 200 years.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

wheels," and in France as "roues métalliques," that misconception may arise as to the cause of the fatality which occurred in the recent Grand Prix race, and wire wheels be unjustly discredited in consequence. The fact is that the accident in question was due to the disintegration of the wheel itself near the hub, and the resulting liberation of the hollow spokes, the rim, and the tyre. The wheel was not in any sense a wire or a suspension wheel, but was a built-up steel wheel made after the ordinary wooden pattern.

If the weather be propitious—and at the time of writing this appears a very necessary saving clause—this afternoon's flying meeting at Hendon should prove the most interesting of a very interesting season. It will be held under the auspices of the Women's Aerial League, and will be unique in respect of the prominent part to be taken in the competitions by lady aviators, of whom there are many more than most people imagine. The proceedings commence at 3.30 p.m., with a cross-country passenger-carrying handicap, over a distance, out and back, of about 16 miles, for men pilots who must each carry a lady passenger. At 4.15 p.m. there will be a "quick-starting" competition, open to all types of aeroplanes, but confined to lady pilots only. Exhibition and passenger flights by lady aviators commence at 5 p.m., and at 5.45 p.m. there will be a "grand speed handicap" in which lady pilots will be allowed to participate at the discretion of the stewards. From 6 p.m. onwards exhibition and passenger flights will be given by Mr. Grahame-White and the competitors. The Women's Aerial League, which has taken a keen interest in the development of aviation in this country from its inception, is presenting five very handsome trophies and some substantial money prizes to the successful competitors of both sexes. R. B. H.

MIDSUMMER MEETING AT HENDON.

Hendon without Mr. Claude Grahame-White is like "Hamlet" without the Prince. The vision of that artist of the air executing figures-of-eight with an ease and security that fascinate the most cold-blooded landsman is undoubtedly one of the greatest of the many attractions of the aerodrome at Hendon. On Saturday, June 29, the occasion of the Midsummer Meeting, Mr. Grahame-White, as all the world knows, was engaged upon another, and we hope a less risky, venture. Two races took place, and Mr. B. C. Hucks, of whom rumour said that he had forsaken Hendon for a new appointment, brought off a fine double event. In the sixteen-mile cross-country handicap Hucks, on his 70-h.p. Blériot monoplane, was scratch, but overtook the limit man in the aerodrome and won by 30 seconds. For the six-mile handicap Hucks was again scratch and won by 1 4-5 seconds. There were only three starters in each race. The frequent paucity of the competitors is perhaps the greatest disadvantage of these aviation meetings.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

AS usual when an account has ended, business brisks up, but I doubt whether it will last. It is difficult to get people to speculate during the summer months. True, we once had a boom in August, but that was many years ago. Yet the Stock Exchange has never forgotten it, and it is continually prophesying another August boom. Yet I do not observe that the prophets stop in London and wait for the boom they say is so certain to come. I do not see any chance of a revival in business before the autumn.

The directors of the Synthetic Products Company have decided only to spend £5,000 on what must be an experiment, while the calling of the shareholders together shows that the whole thing is visionary.

The Tulsa Oil Company is another concern to be avoided. The working expenses are under-estimated, no allowance is made for depreciation, and in any case there is such a keen demand for good oil properties in the United States that had the land been good there would have been no necessity to offer it to the London public. No oil man would be attracted by the prospectus.

The British India S.S. Company 4½ per cent. debentures are a good shipping security, in view of the past dividend record of the company.

Aerators Limited is now a well-managed concern, but its offer of shares did not appear to me particularly cheap.

Whiteaway, Laidlaw and Company, a well-known Eastern house, is extending its business, and offers 50,000 ordinary shares of £1 each at a premium of 5s. Ten per cent. was paid for 1912, and the three previous dividends were at the rate of 8 per cent. No doubt the company will get its money, although it seems to me that the price is high.

A big Russian company is coming out in a few weeks, with some important names upon it. It is to develop the oil resources of the Russian Empire. Some of the most important bankers in Russia are on the board. This company is supposed to be responsible for the rise in Urals.

The Sissert, another Russian company from the same stable as the Kyshtim, is to be offered. The Tanalyk, which was privately subscribed and cleverly marketed, is at a big premium.

MONEY.—There appear to have been a few unimportant failures in Berlin, but no serious trouble is anticipated. The banks there are making great efforts to cut down speculation, and it is believed that they will succeed. Here there is plenty of money, and in Paris, although there is a speculative account in Russian Industrials and Tintos, there is no lack of money.

FOREIGNERS.—Italians have been sold short, and the "bears" are being squeezed. There is no further news with regard to the Chinese Loan. The bankers profess to consider the matter at an end. They laugh at the idea of China refusing to accept the money. As Chinese stocks are strong, perhaps the bankers are right. The public appear to be buying both the new Danish and Moscow issues, which it will be remembered were left in the hands of the underwriters. They are both cheap and sound. The Tinto market was weak on speculators closing down, but the actual strength of the Copper Market was not affected by the shake-out. It was just a temporary reaction.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

HOME RAILS.—There is a feeling that the fall in Home Railways has been overdone. All of them can be bought to pay 5 per cent.; all are gilt edged. It is true that at least half per cent. will be cut from most of the dividend distributions, but the Stock Exchange has more than discounted the reduction. Chathams and South Easterns would appear to come out better than most of the lines. Great Northern have not done as badly as one would have expected. The greatest sufferer from the strike is Great Central. Midland and North Eastern are also serious losers. Great Western and London and North Western are cheap.

YANKEES.—There is some talk of a revival in the American Railway Market. Probably a Democratic President will be elected. Woodrow Wilson would be a good choice, and he is an honest man. The Taft party are despondent. A purchase of Unions, New York Central, or Pennsylvania, not as a gamble but as an investment, will probably show a profit before the end of the year. Notwithstanding the horrifying stories of secret supplies of copper, the big houses in New York appear to be confident that they can maintain the quotation. Messrs. Mertons, who lead the Syndicate in London, are also quite confident. Perhaps we may get a reaction, but unless there is any violent speculation, prices will steadily rise.

RUBBER.—Prices on the Rubber Market have been weak and even to-day some of the best shares are at an attractive quotation. Federated Selangor, Cicely, and Batu Caves look reasonably priced. The Prye report was very disappointing, and once again the MacLaren group attempted to place large sums to capital account, but on this occasion the auditors called attention to the proportions relegated to capital and revenue.

OIL.—Oil shares are looked upon in the Stock Exchange as the most likely gambles for the coming autumn. Shells have such a huge fighting fund that Standard will probably make peace. There is not much chance of Urals getting to serious work before the end of the year. But I hear well of the property. If there were not a big "bull" account it would be safe to buy the shares. They will be a good investment at from 40 to 50 shillings. The Spies shareholders should take up the offer of new shares, for the future of this company looks good. British Maikop is now turning out 5,000 poods a day, and will soon have another well on oil. When it has half a dozen wells going it will be within sight of a dividend.

KAFFIRS AND RHODESIANS.—There are stories going about that the Goldfields report will be bad, very bad. I am not surprised. They say that the dividend will be cut 2s.

BROKEN HILLS.—The big rise in lead has caused people to buy Broken Hill shares, and in addition to this I hear that insiders are buying with a view to amalgamating the various properties, and so save working expenses. Prices appear high, but those behind the scenes talk them much higher.

TIN.—Despite the efforts of the Tin crowd, the public declines to buy. It has lost its money, and lost it quicker than it has ever done before. It will be a long time before it forgets. No doubt some of the alluvial propositions that have been moderately capitalised will pay dividends. Pahangs have had a little rise, and I am told that the Willink section is turning out well.

MISCELLANEOUS.—Waring debentures jumped as I anticipated they would, and it is now officially announced that a scheme is on foot to purchase the assets and carry on the business. Marconis have been put up in view of the meeting. It is expected that a new issue of shares will be made. The company wants money badly. I still think Indo China ordinary shares worth buying.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

PHILIP MASSINGER.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Of a genius such as Massinger, so remarkably unknown in all that concerns his personal history, the least trifles should perhaps be gathered up, since it is impossible to say which trifle may provide useful clues to further discovery. The chief outstanding feature of Massinger's history is perhaps his impecuniosity, and this is usually presented as beginning in 1606 as a result of the death of his father (Morley). One does not know, indeed, who his father was, but it seems not improbable, subject to correction, that he was Arthur Massinger, Esquire, of the parish of S. Dunstan in the West, London, where he dated his will, which was proved in 1604; P.C.C. (5, Harte.) If that be so, then his father's death did not, in fact, precipitate the termination of Philip's university career, a point which may or may not have its bearing upon his supposed Roman obedience. If, however, Arthur Massinger's position be considered, it seems unlikely that Philip's poverty was due purely to misfortune, but rather that his relatives would not assist one of the old faith, a pervert who could at least make his offensive views attractive, to a degree, indeed, not as yet comprehensible. This Arthur Massinger had married, before 1582, Anne, first daughter of William Crompton, a rich mercer of Stafford and London, who by his will, proved July 5th, 1582 (P.C.C., 31, Tirwhite), directed his burial to be in the Chancel of S. Mary's, Stafford, beside his father. The mercer's eldest son, Thomas, was already an M.A. of Oxford, and his second son, Anthony, was at the same university; his eldest daughter, Anne aforesaid, had already borne to Arthur Massinger a daughter Elizabeth. The mercer's third son, William, was in 1582 already apprenticed to a London mercer, and he appears to be the same William Crompton who, with a son-in-law, was, about 1600 or so, paying some £3,000 for the Stone Priory lands, being himself already perhaps in possession of Stone Abbey, Staffs. He seems to have been Sheriff of Staffs. in 1597, and to have died about the same time as Arthur Massinger, his will also being registered in the same year, 1604. (P.C.C., 53, Harte.)

William, the mercer, had still two more younger sons and two younger daughters; others of the family were highly prosperous; it seems incredible that among all these, if they were in truth his near relatives, Philip Massinger could not have found even the lowly crust and generally bitter fare of dependence, if he had chosen to accept it, unless he had committed himself to some enormity. Such a cause might provide an explanation; his alleged reversion to the lately rejected faith may have been an enormity not to be overlooked by these flourishing tradespeople, marrying into the ranks of the ancient gentry, and perhaps unduly careful not to offend the current conventions; they may have dropped as quite impossible this Philip the penman, whether he were a heaven-inspired poet or a gutter dramatist, or a lord chancellor's understrapper. I am, yours, etc.,

Tunbridge Wells. HAMILTON HALL.

CHILDREN'S HOLIDAY FUND.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Following the happy precedent set by previous Chairmen of the London County Council, I venture to appeal to your readers for contributions to the Children's Country Holidays Fund.

Last year, as the result of a similar appeal, the Fund was able to send 45,170 poor and invalid children to enjoy the refreshing and health-giving atmosphere of the country. Strenuous efforts are being made to send 50,000 children away this year, but, to enable the Fund to do this, £25,000 is urgently needed to carry out the season's programme.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

As Chairman of London's Education Authority, I have a special interest in asking for contributions to the Fund, as most of the children are taken from our schools during the summer vacation. Many of these children have never had an opportunty of breathing the fresh air of the country; at most they can only remember a pleasant day spent in some park or open space, with the usual "Keep off the grass" notice worrying them at every turn. For the sum of 10s. some poor little child's fortnight in the country can be assured, free to roam without the constant dread of being run over in our busy London streets, and able to enjoy, without stint, the charm of the country.

All contributions, large and small, should be sent to the Earl of Arran, Treasurer of the Fund, 18, Buckingham Street, Strand, W.C. Faithfully yours,

CHEYLESMORE,
Chairman of the Council.

OUR RELATIONS WITH GERMANY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I cannot tell you how much I admire the sound arguments expressed by Mr. Immo S. Allen in your last issue and in his former letter that appeared on the subject on May 25. Would to God the general public in England would realise that she plays a dangerous game! She forgets it is not a question of the number of ships she can put against the German fleet, which latter is likely to surprise the world as much as the German Army did in 1870. Apart from this, I think it is a poor policy on our part to link ourselves to a decaying nation like France and a corrupt nation like Russia. Why not let Germany have a little elbow room—we cannot prevent it—and give up the dog-in-the-manger policy? This is what is most resented in Germany. I am as convinced as I am of my own existence that neither we nor Germany want war, but notwithstanding we are drifting fast towards it. Peace can be maintained for good, and millions upon millions can be saved, if a friendly understanding with Germany is arrived at instead of this insane rivalry to outdo each other in building huge fleets. No one in his senses will deny, it is a condition sine quâ non that England should be and remain the Mistress of the Sea, and Germany will not dispute it if she is not hampered in her just desire to have a place in the sun. Yours very truly,

WM. H.

THE GERMAN PERIL.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I observe from your last week's correspondence column that a shipping gentleman from Hamburg has apparently successfully been pulling the leg of your West Hartlepool correspondent. We are all familiar with the button the pressing of which will release 6,000,000 German soldiers, but what can the directors of the Hamburg-Amerika and N.D.L. Companies be thinking about in these booming times of shipping to have tonnage capable of transporting 250,000 men lying idle in German ports on the off-chance of an invasion of this country?

The Germans, like ourselves, are essentially a business people, and without casting any reflection upon their patriotism, I cannot imagine that the shareholders of these companies would stand that sort of thing.

A perusal of the interesting articles appearing in the Nord und Sud would show your correspondent that the leading minds of the Fatherland do not run in the same groove as his shipping friend from Hamburg. They are quite alive to the fact that the pressing of the six-million button would spell ruin for Germany, whatever might be the result to England; and on that account alone I venture to predict that the button will never be pressed. The statesmen of both countries may be trusted, like sentimental Tommy, to find "a way oot" of the present tension for which gentlemen of the class quoted by your correspondent are in no small measure responsible. Meantime, both sides can keep their powder dry, and refrain from circulating mythical stories of "the day," while extending a warm welcome to Germany's distinguished Ambassador. Yours, etc.,

July 2, 1912. R. J. TURNER.

THE BIOSCOPE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—The last "Matinée" of the Bioscope Education Cinematograph Demonstrations at Cinema House, 225, Oxford Street, was a most successful one. The attendance was good, and the preliminary lecture short and to the point. As these demonstrations appealed chiefly to children, it is a pity that there should have been so few of them present.

The first film was, "Roaming through India." The glimpse portrayed by the cinematographer was vivid. The insufficiency of the ordinary text-book lesson of geography, compared with this living method, is glaring. If, however, a competent teacher of geography had been present to give a verbal complement of the lesson, it would have been a life-long bequest to the children in attendance.

The Pathé films, "Birds in their Nests," "The Sedge Warbler and the Cuckoo," and "The Birth of a Dragon-fly" were highly appreciated.

Mr. Cherry Kearton's "Marvels of Nature" was not only valuable as a remarkable chapter of animate natural history, but also as a vivid topographical study. An involuntary shudder of terror seemed to seize upon everyone at the sight of that living tiger walking to and fro within a few yards of the hidden photographer.

All the other films were quite as good as those that I have mentioned, and they went far to prove once more how the cinematograph allows us to pry into the secret ways of Nature, a thing which no human, unaided, ever could do.

In conclusion, I sincerely hope that the time is not far distant when, between two sets of education cinematograph demonstrations, a few practical hints may be given by some lecturer in connection with the language of every-day life in England, in order that all those errors that have been allowed to come down to us from generation to generation, for centuries, may gradually receive their death-blow. I have the honour to be, sir, your obedient servant,

A WELL-WISHER.

"FORCE A PLAY."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In the Prologue to Act II of Shakespeare's "Henry V" occur the following two lines, admittedly defective:—

> "Linger your patience on, and well digest
> The abuse of distance . . . force a play."

For some reason or other the Globe edition and the Oxford edition think fit to put in a "we," the former in the first line (by changing "well" into "we'll") and the latter by inserting "while we" in the lacuna in the second line. There seems to me no necessity for either emendation. The piling up of three imperatives (linger, digest, force) may be paralleled from the first Prologue:—

> "Piece out our imperfections with your thoughts:
> Into a thousand parts divide one man,
> And make imaginary puissance."

Both prologues are an earnest appeal to the audience to exert their "imaginary forces."

But what does "force a play" mean? Frankly, I do not believe it means anything, in spite of commentators' efforts to explain it away. What I would suggest is that the imperative might still be preserved, and intelligible sense secured, by changing "force a play" into "force apply," i.e., the force of imagination referred to in the first Prologue. The lacuna still remains to be filled. If the Oxford edition put in "while we," I venture to claim

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

the privilege of putting in "well your," so that the passage runs :—

"Linger your patience on, and well digest
The abuse of distance; well your force apply."

Incidentally my emendation would go to prove that Shakespeare's Londoner was a true Cockney, capable of regarding "play" and "ply" as identical sounds. Yours faithfully,

O. H. T. DUDLEY.

Poona,
June 14.

BOOKS RECEIVED

MISCELLANEOUS.

Taxation of Land Values as It Affects Landowners and Others. By John Orr, M.A. (P. S. King and Son. 1s. net.)

The Lower Depths. A Play in Four Acts by Maxim Gorki. Translated from the Original Russian by Laurence Irving. With Portrait Frontispiece. (T. Fisher Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.)

From Theatre to Music Hall. By W. R. Titterton. (Stephen Swift and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

Life's Great Adventure. By Francis Stopford. (Duckworth and Co. 5s. net.)

A Blind Alley. By E. W. Savi. (Digby, Long and Co. 6s.)

Shall This Be? A Tract for the Times. (Polsue, Ltd. 1d.)

Maurice Harte. A Play in Two Acts by T. C. Murray. (Maunsel and Co. 1s. net.)

Root and Branch: A Seasonal of the Arts. Edited by James Guthrie. (The Pear Tree Press, Flansham, Bognor, Sussex.)

The Likeness of the Night. A Modern Play in Four Acts by Mrs. W. K. Clifford. (Duckworth and Co. 1s. 6d. net.)

Cricket (Batsmanship). By C. B. Fry. Illustrated. (Eveleigh Nash. 2s. net.)

The Depths of the Ocean: A General Account of the Modern Science of Oceanography based largely on the Scientific Researches of the Norwegian Steamer "Michael Sars" in the North Atlantic. By Sir John Murray, K.C.B., F.R.S., and Dr. Johan Hjort. Illustrated. (Macmillan and Co. 28s. net.)

A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles. Edited by Sir James A. H. Murray. Vol. IX. Sleep-Sniggle. By W. A. Craigie, M.A., LL.D. (Henry Frowde. Double Section, 5s.)

Municipal Art Galleries and Art Museums: Their Scope and Value. By Bernard Douglas Taylor. (J. E. Cornish, Manchester. 6d. net.)

Medical Education in Europe: A Report to the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching. By Abraham Flexner. With an Introduction by Henry S. Pritchett. (Carnegie Foundation, N.Y. City.)

Archives d'Etudes Orientales. Edited by J. A. Lundell. Vol. I.—Etudes phonologiques sur le Dialecte arabe vulgaire de Beyrouth. By Emanuel Mattsson. Vol. II.—Etudes sur le Culte d'Ichtar. By Nils Nilsson. Vol. III.—Sur la Formation du Génitif pluriel en Serbe. By Anton Karlgren. Vol. IV.—Les Débuts de la Cartographie du Japon. By E. U. Dahlgren. (Ernest Leroux, Paris. 5 fr. 25 c.; 1 fr.; 2 fr. 75 c.; and 2 fr. 75 c. respectively.)

Mary Broome. A Comedy in Four Acts by Allan Monkhouse. (Sidgwick and Jackson. 1s. 6d. net.)

Notes on the Text of the Corpus Tibullianum. By Monroe E. Deutsch. (University Press, Berkeley, California, U.S.A. 50 cents.)

A Dictionary of the Biloxi and Ofo Languages. By James O. Dorsey and J. R. Swanton. (Government Printing Office, Washington, U.S.A.)

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS.

Mrs. Humphry Ward: Her Work and Influence. With Portrait. (Kegan Paul and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

A History of Divorce. By S. B. Kitchin, B.A., LL.B. (Chapman and Hall. 7s. 6d. net.)

The American Government. By Frederic J. Haskin. Illustrated. (J. B. Lippincott Company. 4s. 6d. net.)

The White Slave Market. By Mrs. Archibald MacKirdy and W. N. Willis. With a Frontispiece. (Stanley Paul and Co. 5s. net.)

The Early History of the Christian Church, from Its Foundation to the End of the Fifth Century. By Monsignor Louis Duchesne. Vol. II. (John Murray. 9s. net.)

"The Bookman" Keats-Shelley Memorial Souvenir. Illustrated. (Hodder and Stoughton. 1s. net.)

La Vie et les Œuvres d'Antoine d'Auvergne, Dernier Directeur de l'Opéra Royal (1713-1797). By Baron Du Roure de Paulin. Illustrated. (H. Daragon, Paris. 2 fr.)

Grattan's Parliament Before and After. By M. McDonnell Bodkin, K.C. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

A Chronicle of Friendships. By Luther Munday. Illustrated. (T. Werner Laurie. 12s. 6d. net.)

Pierre Rosegger, l'Homme et l'Œuvre. By A. Vulliod. (Félix Alcan, Paris. 10 frs.)

The Manchester Politician, 1750-1912. By Gerald B. Hertz, M.A., B.C.L. With a Preface by Sir Alfred Hopkinson, K.C. (Sherratt and Hughes. 2s. 6d. net.)

Italy's War for a Desert, Being some Experiences of a War-Correspondent with the Italians in Tripoli. By Francis McCullagh. Illustrated. (Herbert and Daniel. 10s. 6d. net.)

FICTION.

Brass Faces. By Charles McEvoy. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

Wayfarers. By Lenore van der Veer. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1s. net.)

Inheritance. By Stuart Martin. (John Ouseley. 6s.)

The Great Postponement. By I. Giberne Sieveking. (John Ouseley. 6s.)

The Works of Thomas Hardy in Prose and Verse: The Wessex Novels—Vol. V, The Life and Death of the Mayor of Casterbridge; Vol. VI, The Woodlanders. With Prefaces and Notes, and a Photogravure Frontispiece and Map of Wessex to each Volume. (Macmillan and Co. 7s. 6d. net each.)

VERSE.

Poems. By Clifford King. (Kegan Paul and Co. 5s. net.)

Lyric Leaves. By S. Gertrude Ford. (C. W. Daniel. 2s. 6d. net.)

Omar in Hades. By F. S. Doctor. (D. B. Taraporevala Sons and Co., Bombay. 1s.)

Songs Out of Exile: Being Verses of African Sunshine, Shadow, and Black Man's Twilight. By Cullen Gouldsbury. (T. Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d. net.)

PERIODICALS.

The Girls' School Year Book (Public Schools), 1912; Cornhill Magazine; Fortnightly Review; All the World; Conservator, Philadelphia; Garden Cities and Town Planning; Cambridge University Reporter; Revue de Métaphysique et de Morale; St. Nicholas; The Antiquary; Bookseller; London University Gazette; Literary Digest, N.Y.; The Collegian, Calcutta; Hindustan Review, Allahabad; Revue des Etudes Napoléoniennes; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; Revue Bleue; M.A.B.; Oxford and Cambridge Review; Publishers' Circular; Educational Times; Nineteenth Century and After; Blackwood's Magazine; Moslem World.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Twelve years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO . . AND THROUGH CANADA . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service via Vancouver.

For further particulars apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH AND EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Vià the SUEZ CANAL:

Calling at GIBRALTAR, MARSEILLES and NAPLES

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE
PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

. . . Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

• • •

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports.

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, 102, Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours.

R.M.S.P. PLEASURE CRUISES.

To	Fare	Length of Tour	Sailing	From
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £22.	Days 23.	Every Thursday Fortnight.	London.
THE AZORES.	£17†	19.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£12.	8 upwards.	Weekly.	Southampton & Liverpool.
WEST INDIES.	From £40.	From 34.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
NORWAY.	From £1 a day	13 upwards.	June to August.	Grimsby & Leith.
BALTIC & RUSSIA.	From £1 a day.	24.	August 24.	Grimsby.
MEDITERRANEAN, HOLY LAND & EGYPT.	From £1 a day.	10.	September to November.	Southampton & Marseilles.

† Including Hotel Accommodation.

For further particulars apply:—

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY, London: 18, Moorgate St., E.C., or 32, Cockspur St., S.W.

FEARLESS CRITICISM

In support of principle
In exposure of humbug
In scorn of cant

THE COMMENTATOR

A Weekly Review of Politics, Art, Music, Literature, and the Stage.

ONE PENNY WEEKLY of all Newsagents—or sent direct from the Publishers, for 6s. per annum (post free) or 3s. for six months.

COMMENTATOR, Ltd., 31, Essex St., London

Published by the Proprietor at Cannon House, Breams Buildings, London E.C. Office for Advertisements, 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C. Printed by BONNER & Co., The Chancery Lane Press, Rolls Passage, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

CONTENTS

	PAGE
Notes of the Week	35
Child Joy	36
Schools and the Man ...	36
The Dawn of Women's Influence in Germany ...	37
The Black and the White of "Butterfly"	38
Reviews:
The Art of Play-making...	40
The Wayside of Philosophy	42
The New Imperialism ...	42
A Plea for Palmistry ...	43
The Land of the Kaiser ...	44
Shorter Reviews	44
Fiction	46
The Theatre: "Ben-My-Chree" at the New Prince's Theatre	48
Music	48
The Story of a Great Crime	50
Intimate Books	51
By-ways of Brittany	52
At St. Stephen's Shrine ...	54
Notes and News	56
The Royal Horticultural Society's Summer Flower Show at Holland House, 1912	57
Hokku	57
Imperial and Foreign Affairs	58
In the Temple of Mammon	59
Correspondence	61
Books Received	63

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C., where all communications to the Editor should be addressed.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Notes of the Week

WE deeply regret that the visit of the King and Queen to South Yorkshire should have been marred by the catastrophe at Cadeby Colliery. The existence of the colliery, situated just below Conisborough Castle—midway between Wentworth and Doncaster—has never commended itself to the artistic sense of those who would like in imagination to re-people the old castle which Ivanhoe has endeared to us, but it has been remarkable as a hive of human industry, and it is sad to think that on an occasion which should have been auspicious, mourning has usurped the position where rejoicing appeared to be firmly installed.

That which was obscure is now made manifest. Many of us did not know until Sunday last the secret of the cement which stuck Canada to the Empire and led to victory in the struggle for Imperial unity. The momentous decretal is now published to the world—"The situation was saved by the union of the Observer with the Pall Mall Gazette." In certain quarters it is apparent that "small matters win great commendation."

There is a rumour to the effect that a "High-speed Luncheon Syndicate" is to come, see, and conquer London—of course, from the United States. We do not object to the speeding-up of London's traffic, within reason, but really we hardly see what benefits can come from the acceleration of the food-traffic, if we may so put it, in this desperate manner. After a year or two of bolted mid-day meals our sombre dreams picture a bent and irascible afternoon citizen, doing his business with weary eyes and corrugated brow, gradually reaching that sad stage when he is frightened at a sandwich, shudders at the sight of an omelette, and is ready to collapse at the mere thought of good roast beef; a citizen, in fact, enchained in dour bondage to the fiend of indigestion. A little later, no doubt, we shall achieve the tabloid stage of existence, when, with a nut-pellet for breakfast, a lozenge for lunch, a capsule for tea, and a headache for dinner, we shall drag our mournful days from a concentrated childhood to a pill-pervaded manhood, and an old age that (if it comes) will be as genial as cranks and chemists can make it. No; leave us our leisurely lunches and dinners, and we will undertake to be healthy, happy, and as wise as we can.

America, having standardised steel, lobsters, pork, and for all we know a good many other things, is now rather worried as to why somebody does not standardise the English language, both in its spelling and pronunciation. But why reduce a language, which is a living thing, ever fluent and subject to change, to the iron bonds of rule and regulation? We are antagonists to the "Nu Speling," it is true, and we would not hold to varieties of pronunciation so various as that which allows the young experimentalist to call Psyche "Fish," but danger of deliberate sacrifice of beauty lies in a desire for the perfectly inflexible word, the irrefragably rigid rule. The "American language" is English from its birth, curious though it may sometimes seem; but there are bound to be variations of speech among a people so extremely energetic in the manufacture of the word for the occasion—otherwise known as slang; and we may as well realise that fact at once, leaving them to their linguistic diversions, merely watching carefully that not too many of the impromptu variations take root on this side of the water.

The "Holiday Course for Foreigners," held in connection with the University of London, begins this year on July 15, and finishes on August 9, under the direction of Professor Walter Rippmann. We note that those who propose to attend this Course of Lectures are expected to have already acquired the English language to an extent that will enable them to take part intelligently and to join in the conversations upon the various topics. Professor W. H. Hudson will lecture on Carlyle and Matthew Arnold, and there will be attractive discourses on Historic London, on Architecture, and on other subjects of general interest suitable to the student from abroad. These gatherings have been of great use in the past as regards the appreciation of English life and affairs, and the removal of possible prejudices among those to whom our ways may be strange, and it is to be hoped that this season's meetings and classes will be well supported.

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Child Joy

(After Blake's "Infant Joy.")

Sweet Joy,
Canst stand alone?
Born to a throne,
How soon art tumbled down!
A look, a frown,
Doth all thy pretty merriment destroy.

Love is thy nurse, sweet Joy;
She folds thee to her breast:
There, tears waste as the dew
When sunshine comes anew,
And thou dost rest;
But oh, sweet Joy, when thou art fully grown,
Sun, moon and stars shall bow before thy throne.

MAX PLOWMAN.

Schools and the Man

ABOUT thirty years ago, if we remember correctly, the question of "What shall we do with our Boys?" became acute, and was dealt with assiduously in volumes which varied from the "One Thousand Ways to Earn a Living" type to books written specifically to expound one particular method of self-support. The excitement in due course died down, and it was discovered that society stood in no need of drastic remodelling, but was merely slowly turning, planet-like, a fresh face to the new gravitational influences in process of development; that boys, in short, would solve the problem sooner or later in the usual way by becoming men with no less (if not much more) commonsense than their fathers.

During the last week we have been reading certain words by Mr. Cosmo Hamilton, some wise and witty, some not so wise, but still witty, on "Father and Son," in a series of articles in the Daily Mail, which formulate what seems to be in many ways an aspect of the same problem. To him the lure of Oxford and Cambridge is a snare to the ambitious father. The boys go to the public school, and come home for the holidays to find everything, including their parents, "frightfully suburban"; they "slack about" envying people better off than themselves, shuddering at the word "office," and behaving generally as only unspeakable cads could behave. Proceeding to the University, they run into debt, and "return home, hungry, bored, supercilious, useless, unambitious, decorative persons, knowing only what collars to wear, and the exact shade of socks that are right for the hour." We will not pursue their miserable fate, lest the uncalled-for tear should emerge from our mournful eyes. The father, on the other hand, is a kind of bogey-man, "a spoil-sport, a wet blanket, a drill-sergeant, a sort of plain-clothes policeman." We gather from Mr. Hamilton's pleasant arguments that most fathers should be prosecuted, and that most University men finish up by addressing envelopes, or selling evening papers at the entrance to Tube stations. And the schoolmasters, dealt with in the third article, appear as a rule to be graven images, vitalised into a spasmodic series of movements, victims of a deadly "system," unsympathetic automatons.

Naturally there is something seriously wrong with a tirade such as this, and we are driven to remember that the man who feels strongly nearly always over-argues his case, and consequently weakens it. Nothing in the world can take the place of a University education, and nothing can equal its value from a social point of view. Lessons are learned there which find a place in no stated curriculum; knowledge of how to hold one's own, knowledge in judging character that is invaluable; and if at times "sport" ousts Latin and Greek, are we not a nation of sportsmen? Let us not grudge the fine-framed youth his college "blue," nor forget that many a stroke and bow in the Boat Race has taken honours.

Into the gap, like a true sportsman, Mr. A. C. Benson has stepped; public school master for twenty years, and for eight years Fellow and Lecturer of Magdalene College, Cambridge, he speaks with a weight of authority that commands respect. And here we are compelled to note the significance of his admissions. He is all for a sounder instruction in French and German, with not so much sacrifice to the standard of classical culture. Reasonably enough, we think; for it is pathetic to realise that hundreds of men with a college education behind them are at a hopeless loss when they desire to chat to a friend of these neighbouring nations in his own tongue. With the raising of the level of the modern side, and a "liberal choice of alternatives," probably one-half of Mr. Cosmo Hamilton's argument would be cut away. As it is, he seems to be extending the few special cases of failure which have no doubt come under his notice into generalisations which are of little use save as foundations for witty epigrams and sparkling satire; for which, of course, we are duly grateful, but which are far too sweeping to be of genuine service in an inquiry into the faults of our present educational system. His fourth article, "The Way Out," we await with keen anticipation; for if he writes as urgently upon any well-considered synthesis as he has done on his partially considered analysis, it will be an exceptionally important contribution to the discussion.

R.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Dawn of Women's Influence in Germany

IN speaking of women's influence in a country one does not allude to the spiritual relations which may exist between mothers and their children, wives and their husbands individually. On those nearest to them women have exerted some such influence as long as humanity exists. It is different with the sway over the thought of important sections of a nation, or of the nation as a whole. In this respect we can distinguish between countries where women have comparatively early and often played a rôle in politics or literature, and others where only late and seldom women have been more than the guardians and embellishers of domestic life. To the latter sort of countries Germany must be reckoned. There were centuries when hardly a handful of women have in one way or the other made some mark in the life of the German nation. That great upheaval, the Reformation, tells of no woman as the inspirator of its fighters, and not before the seventeenth century had nearly passed do we meet in Germany a woman who can be compared to the grand, enlightened ladies of the French and Italian courts of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Sophie Charlotte of Prussia, the friend of the great philosopher and polyhistor Leibnitz, remains for generations rather a solitary star on a dark sky. The first half of the eighteenth century produces in Louise Gottsched a woman of considerable gifts who contributed greatly in the literary education of the nation, and the period of the great German classical poets and thinkers exhibits a number of women who acted either as Egerias or as Cornelias on its representative geniuses. But their influence remained on the whole individual; there is very little of circles round one or some ladies of inspiring power; and the Weimar Court under the Duchess Amalia was more of a protector than an instigator of literary creation, most of its women mere receptive mediocrities.

But the reacting influence of the light focussed in Weimar and Jena, the seats of the German Olympians, together with the liberating spirit of the whole literature of the eighteenth century and the political movements, originated in England and France, against the traditional powers in State and Society, brought forward at the time of the coming of the new century a new type of educated and educating women—women to whom literature was not a mere means of feeding the spirits, but a conveyance of spur to social action on a wider scale. Of these new women Rahel Varnhagen-Levin was the most attractive, Caroline Schlegel-Boehmer the most erratic representative.

Their modernism had, however, little in common with political ambition. Some of these women took, on the contrary, a very moderate and only occasional interest in politics, whilst others would even on principle have kept outside of political movements at all. At a time when in Germany representative institutions were yet in vain striven after by men, the desire for political power could only play a very insignificant part in the heart of the most courageous German thinkers of the other sex. If we look out for German women who in those days influenced palpably the politics of their country, we must seek them in the narrow circle of the crowned heads, that is to say, in spheres where the exceptional position made the exceptional activity possible, sometimes even a necessity. The general social position of women was much too inferior to allow of any direct participation in the guidance of the nation. The most pressing need for high-minded women was not political power, but social freedom. And, consciously or unconsciously, all the really notable German women of the beginning of the nineteenth century were fighters for the emancipation of their sex.

To express it in the words of an English writer who has just published a book* on the subject: "The minds of intellectual women were stirred, they became more conscious of themselves, more philosophic, more independent." Miss Mary Hargrave calls her book, "Some German Women and Their Salons," and devotes to each of the women she deals with a separate chapter. But her heroines belong, with one exception, to one and the same generation, and have, with another exception, lived under the spell of the same spiritual current taken up by them differently, according to their different temperaments and education.

The two exceptions are Elisabeth Goethe, the happy and cheerful mother of the great Jupiter of German literature, and Queen Luise of Prussia, the ingenuous wife of one of the most philistine kings of his time. The inclusion of Goethe's mother is easily to be defended. If she was not of the stuff the Rahels and the Bettinas were made of she was at least connected with them through the medium of her son, in whom they all recognised their foremost teacher. Besides, she was in her ways as enlightened and liberal-minded as the wife of a patrician of the proud city of Frankfort could have been. As regards views of life she could be called one of the progenitors of the Rahels, if not the Caroline Schlegels.

It is quite different with Queen Luise. Apart from that she was a contemporary and a member of their sex, she had very little in common with these female intellectuals, and her influence on the thought of her time was nil. She enthused people through her misfortune as a queen and a certain amount of bravery, but neither was she in fact the centre of a salon, nor was she spiritually important enough to be capable of forming one. There were many women of the time more entitled to rank with the other heroines of the book than this royal ingénue. Her inclusion by Miss Hargrave is a concession to shallowness if not snobbishness that can only be regretted.

Otherwise the book has its merits. It is based on the study of a number of the best German works on the subject, and is written in very pleasant easy style. It is not a scientific work. The basic economical, political and spiritual conditions of German life at the beginning of the nineteenth century are only superficially touched, the environment of the described forerunners of the leading modern women is not sufficiently brought home to the reader to make him fully appreciate their value. The two remarkable Jewesses, Rahel Lewin and Henriette Herz, were as much Berlin growth as they were daughters of a race longing for political emancipation, and he will consequently only understand them half who is not well informed on the spirit of middle-class Berlin at the time of their mental development. Such exceedingly informing books as Ludwig Geiger's history of the intellectual life of the Prussian capital seem to have escaped Miss Hargrave's knowledge. But amongst her authorities are writers of renown to whom those sources were known, and thus the reader is by incident given glimpses into that life on which the Rahels and Henriettas grew and which made their salons possible.

* Some German Women and Their Salons. By MARY HARGRAVE. Illustrated. (T. Werner Laurie. 7s. 6d. net.)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

It was a time of religious and ethical scepticism, mixed, in the better minds, with a longing for a new moral world and new gods. Berlin was in a high degree a town of unbelievers. But with the mass of the latter doubt was here not the impulse for the search of new truths, but the father of shallow nihilistic cynicism, which made Bettina von Arnim, that woman with the heart of a child and the enthusiasm of a believing soul, cry out one day: "In Berlin wird Alles ruppig"—(In Berlin everything becomes coarse). A bit of the negating spirit of the Berliners one notices also in Rahel, but turned to better account by her warmth of feeling, her belief in evolution and her deep interest in social and political reform. When she boasts, "I kill pedantism (it is not quite to be seen why Miss Hargrave translates pedanterie "priggishness") thirty miles round me," we hear through it something of the wanton Berlin mind. On the other hand, one believes to hear one of the advanced ethical revolutionists of our day when one reads words like: "I have never regretted anything which I did gladly, only and always what I did reluctantly." And how much judgment is revealed in the sentence: "For me, the difference between people lies in their manner of asking questions; they all answer in the same way!"

Rahel was certainly in breadth of conception, sense of proportion and personal charm the most fascinating of the women presented by Miss Hargrave. But remarkable, interesting women they all have been. And all, Queen Luise not excepted, compare very favourably with their husbands. If they were their inferiors in learning they surpassed them in mental solidity. They were not all as Charlotte Stieglitz, who could not stand her husband's mental inactivity and committed suicide in order to set his mind free for creative work; but they shared this sentiment for spiritual activity. As far as they were connected with Romanticism, they represented its better side, its fight against conventionalism, strictness and nihilistic scepticism. They are worth knowing, and if Miss Hargrave has missed some notes about their time, she has succeeded in giving a vivid picture of their personalities and the kind of eminent people they knew how to attract and influence. This well-printed and finely illustrated book is throughout very readable.

Berlin, July 2. ED. BERNSTEIN
(Member of the Reichstag).

The Black and the White of "Butterfly."*

BY HALDANE MACFALL.

OF the heavy literature springing up about the erratic genius of Whistler this, at least, is one of the volumes that cannot be ignored—it will be a necessary part of the evidence for every collector concerning that gay, bitter, fantastic soul. And "Butterfly" has won into the minds of literary folk as much as into the homage of painters. The overweening conceit of the man set up before the public view a whimsical dandified figure behind which he screened whatsoever was noble and lovable at the real core of him; and no man bore more false witness against whatever may have been of lofty quality in him than did James McNeill Whistler—and all, fantastically and pathetically enough, with the idea that he was setting up the devil of a fine fellow before the eyes of the world! He baffled his friends as he baffled his enemies. Friendship with Whistler ever meant bitter enmity in the end. I have known men read morning prayers who gave tongue to the miserable sentiment that "a man should always treat his best friend as though, one day, he might become his enemy." The text had a wide vogue with Whistler's generation, and was, likely enough, a text of his boyhood. Be it so or not, he lived his life to the bitter refrain; and a sorry adventure it must have been, if we may judge by what we read between the lines of his own testimony, supported by the witness of the wreckage of broken friendships that lay thick as seaweed in the Sargasso Sea along the wake of his voyaging from youth to lonely old age.

This book sets out with the intention of paying homage to the ardent craftsman; but here, too, we have the testimony to his pettiness of mind. Always that bitter in the cup! It is so utterly unlike most books that essay to show Whistler the hero or tomfool, the wasp or the wit, the enigma or the fop, that it carries a compelling conviction from its very restraint. It is the solemn unhumorous tribute—if so unemotional an attitude can be called tribute—of a plain man, who, seeing with grey eyes, honest and sincere, but grey, writes without coloured ink of this prince of posers. That so inventive and imaginative a nature as that of Whistler should have the scantiest appeal to one who scarcely ever betrays the imaginative sense may seem a quaint paradox; yet the very interest of this volume lies in the fact of the writer's plain honest mind. Hence there rises before us—what is most convincing—the slow building and creation of the pose of the eventual Whistler. At first the pose is tentative, feels its way. It set and hardened probably earlier than the writer realised; but the signs and proofs of its slow emergence are abundantly evidenced by the simple grey eyes of his biographer. The writer is never carried away with wild enthusiasms either for or against the acts of Whistler—he baldly states the acts that were perpetrated before his eyes, and gives his opinion concerning them without a shade of bias. Conviction ensues. One doubts, 'tis true, whether the writer be largely enough gifted to estimate the genius of the man, but as he rarely attempts it, and sticks to his last (the estimate of Whistler as lithographer), he does not put himself upon trial.

* Memories of James McNeill Whistler, the Artist. By THOMAS R. WAY. Illustrated. (John Lane. 10s. 6d. net.)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

It fell to my lot to write a swift impression of "Butterfly" and his achievement in the few days that passed between his falling into his long sleep and the progress of all that remained of his mortal being to the grave. That impression was written by a fellow-craftsman in art and letters, who met him but rarely, and then only when the mocking figure had been set up, behind which he hid what gentle and tender humanity there may have been in the real man. Fawned upon by many whom it benefited to fawn upon him, but whom the keen wits of the man likely enough despised even whilst he strutted in their adulation, he was probably as little understood by them as aforetime he had been misunderstood by such as stoned him. It was natural that I should see him as the complete Whistler—yet perhaps I understood him the better for standing at focal distance from him—he said that I did—maybe his very witness proved that I did not. But whether so or not, this volume reveals to me a Whistler in the making that I guessed at, but did not wholly know. Still, I wonder if the writer saw quite round about the Whistler in the making. I doubt it. But of one thing he convinces me—the Whistler that he did see, so far as he could see, is recorded with a truthful sincerity, if it be somewhat the mere outside of the man. It reveals a Whistler moving, like the bishop, slowly into his oblique place upon the chessboard of his fantastic adventure as a man—and it lifts the veil from Whistler the craftsman and shows his untiring and dogged search after exquisite craftsmanship. When all's said, this is what the writer alone set out to do; and that he achieves his object no one can deny.

Undowered with the artistic gift of words—Mr. Way even adds "as it were" after a simile—therefore driven back upon a simple narrative statement, our author records his testimony with the plain, straightforward, passionless witness of a man upon his oath, careful of praise or blame, solemnly unbiassed. By consequence, what is lacking in fire at least is not lacking in convincingness. Mr. Way realises that "what the soldier said is not evidence"—always there is that sense of the plain honest man in the witness-box. And with every desire to give Whistler homage, the evidence proves the black in the "Butterfly" to have been as paltry and contemptible as the white of his high craftsmanship was pure and unspotted. It was not the blackness of a tragic grandeur, but the paltry blackness of a petty intention. The writer and his father, two of the most consummate craftsmen in lithographic printing in Whistler's generation, who both yielded up the secrets and mysteries of their craft to him which they had been wholly justified in using to their own sole advantage, who both toiled and moiled for him and served with loyal unselfishness, who both gave fully and freely of their unique experience, without which "Butterfly" must have wrought on stone at handicap, to both of whom he owed a prodigious debt of good-fellowship as well as craftsmanship—even these men Whistler treated with high-handed conceit and treacherous guile when he found that he could gain profit in gold by the betrayal! Even this man, who served him so well, was chided for giving his knowledge of craftsmanship to other artists! Even he cannot rid Whistler's life from the shabby stain that "Butterfly" had as mean a soul as was ever granted to great gifts. The writer's father, who had bought in Whistler's mutilated portraits at "Butterfly's" bankruptcy, with other paintings, and had given those portraits freely back to him in the after years, was to know the base commercial ruthlessness of this man who was wont to sneer at commercialism in art, when, having become famous, and America being suddenly grown passionately desirous of securing his work, "Butterfly" tried to jockey his old and loyal friends out of their pictures that he might sell them again to the rich across the seas who had left him to neglect in the years of his fierce struggle for fame. Whistler's wayfaring was littered with friendships broken for an epigram; but as shabby an act as any of which he was guilty was the dishonest intention that made him discard the Ways, father and son.

So much for the black. As regards the white of "Butterfly's" wings. Whistler was a purist in craftsmanship to a pitch that came near to that womanishness which formed so essential a part of his character. Of this purism Mr. Way seems to hold a higher opinion than I do; for he naturally judges an artist as a craftsman before all, whereas I judge an artist as artist before all. But granting, for argument's sake, the value of purism in craftsmanship as of first importance, even here "Butterfly" is not wholly above suspicion. To employ pastel over water-colour is about as bastard purism as could well-nigh be achieved. But more than this; if Whistler found a large etching to be beyond his range, he at once laid down a law that a large etching was bastard art. There is no limit whatever to art; and the fact that a large etching is or is not art is wholly dependent on the fact whether an artist has the genius to create art on a large plate. And genius has done it. Much of what is written upon Whistler's etching is the veriest academic drivel. Whistler in lithography, in my opinion, which agrees in this with that of Mr. Way, reached as high achievement as in his etchings. But the critical cant that has arisen about his lithographs is as exaggerative as about most of his achievement. Whistler has been far out-distanced in lithography by Steinlen and others, to whom the critics give scant tribute.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Mr. Way obviously does not realise that Whistler, in every single advance in his achievement, was deeply indebted to others. His visit to Valparaiso did not discover the Japanese intention to him; it was discovered to him in Paris—was part of a wide movement. Whistler did not discover Velazquez; he was the disciple of Manet, and to Manet he owed most of all that was best in him; but he kept his mouth discreetly shut upon Manet's influence, as he did on most of his indebtedness. Whistler was wont to sneer at prettiness in art; but his etchings and lithographs often hold a threat of prettiness. His greatness lay in his exquisite sense of colour; never in his draughtmanship, which was always his weakness. He was essentially a great mass-impressionist in the school of Manet. And the most interesting pages in this valuable testimony to his habits of craftsmanship are those in which we see him at work holding his long yard-length brushes by the extreme end, and painting the brush-strokes upon his portraits at arm's length added thereto, just as Gainsborough did before him, and as Velazquez is said to have done.

Mr. Way adds to the value of his volume with (amongst other treasure) a fine reproduction of the delightful first lithograph made by Whistler—his favourite model, Miss Maude Franklin. Only once does the writer strain our credulity, when he tells us that he cannot see Whistler's influence in the works of Mr. Greaves. There is a good and characteristic touch of Whistler in the story of the hat—Whistler, being in a sorry state of want and shabbiness in Venice, had torn his battered soft hat, and on finding it secretly stitched up by a friend, he ripped the stitches out with: "A darn is premeditated poverty, but a tear is the accident of a moment"! Give a man a reputation for wit, and the world guffaws every time he opens his mouth. Mr. Way brings crumbling to the ground the witty intention of the printer's error in the title for the catalogue of the pictures "kindly lent their owners." It was the printer's unintentional waggery, and annoyed Whistler.

Whistler mastered the craftsmanship of every art that he essayed; and in writing his "Ten o'Clock" he laboured the words until he bent them to exquisite rhythm; but that famous address was about as vile and false teaching of art as was ever written, the which Mr. Way seems never to have realised, lulled to nodding by the exquisite employment of its prose. No more false estimate of Art, no more incompetent statement of its aim, its essence, or its significance was ever so beautifully gemmed to bedazzle and thereby to cast a blight upon creative endeavour in the studios of youth.

REVIEWS

The Art of Play-making

Play-Making: A Manual of Craftsmanship. By WILLIAM ARCHER. (Chapman and Hall. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE literary aspirant, at some time or another, is strongly advised to write a play. It may be that he accepts the proffered advice, and after much labour produces a tragedy or a comedy, and sends it round to the various theatrical managers. After a few months associated with registration, sealing-wax, and postmen's knocks, the novice is painfully aware of the fact that Sir Herbert Tree's opinion does not, after all, tally with his own—in short, that his play is chiefly remarkable for its boomerang qualities. Having suffered defeat, he may rail against the deplorable state of the English drama, and ascribe the total lack of royalties to the fact that we live in a democratic age. But if the literary aspirant really possesses the dramatic gift, there is no need for him to bemoan his fate, for it is to such an one that Mr. William Archer comes to the rescue with a helping hand.

Mr. Archer is one of our leading dramatic critics, and from his rich experience in regard to the merits and faults of innumerable plays he is able to extract material of much value to the would-be playwright, and, be it observed, the playgoer should derive considerable benefit from these pages, too. If it is true that we live in a democratic age, it is equally true that we also live in an age when every profession and business has its expert instructor, who, with much claptrap and much noisy and flamboyant advertisement, asserts his ability to cram his client with the cream of specialised knowledge, and to lead his terribly credulous patron through a short cut to fame and fortune. Mr. Archer makes no such absurd promise in this excellent book, for he is the first to recognise that success in any direction depends on competence, combined with any amount of hard work. The book before us does not supply ready-made plots for plays. Its value lies in the fact that it shows the playwright how to make the best use of his material by observing the canons of dramatic art and by noting the value of form and construction. Mr. Archer writes:—

> One thing is certain, and must be emphasised from the outset; namely, that if any part of the dramatist's art can be taught, it is only a comparatively mechanical and formal part—the art of construction. One may learn how to tell a story in a good dramatic form; how to develop and marshal it in such a way as best to seize and retain the interest of a theatrical audience. But no teaching or study can enable a man to choose or invent a good story, and much less to do that which alone lends dignity to dramatic story-telling—to observe and portray human character.

"A play," writes Mr. Archer, "is a more or less rapidly developing crisis in destiny or circumstance, and a dramatic scene is a crisis within a crisis, clearly furthering the ultimate event. The drama may be called the art of crises, as fiction is the art of gradual developments. It is the slowness of its processes which differentiates the typical novel from the typical play." Later on Mr. Archer observes that "the playwright should not let himself be constrained by custom to force his theme into the arbitrary mould of a stated number of acts. Three acts is a good number, four acts a good number; there is no positive objection to five acts. Should he find himself hankering after more acts, he would do well to consider whether he be not, at one point or another, failing in the art of condensation and trespassing on the domain of the novelist."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Mr. Archer has analysed and shown us the construction and craftsmanship of various famous plays, and most especially those of Shakespeare and Ibsen, in order that we may observe the points he wishes to demonstrate. The number of references to Ibsen exceed those referring to Shakespeare. It is a pity that Ibsen in this country is "something of a coterie-poet," for this regrettable fact is apt to mitigate against the value of his plays to the general reader, to say nothing of the lessons the would-be playwright is invited to draw from them. But the idea of laying special emphasis on two great dramatists is excellent because it makes for unity of purpose and design. Mr. Archer, however, is very far from inferring that Shakespeare and Ibsen alone can reveal all the niceties of play-making. They cannot, and their craftsmanship is supplemented by the craftsmanship of Pinero, Sardou, Maeterlinck, Henry Arthur Jones, Bernard Shaw, Granville Barker, and numerous other well-known playwrights. The whole gamut of the dramatic art is revealed in a number of poignant illustrations that cannot fail to benefit those who are sane enough to realise that their plays have failed principally because they did not pay sufficient attention to form and construction. We are shown the intricate machinery associated with play-making, and little by little, step by step, we are made to appreciate the value of the various parts. Mr. Archer discourses on the subject of choosing a theme, the routine of composition, pro and con the use of scenarios, the dramatis personæ, the point of attack (in no way associated with villains), tension and its suspension, the full close, character and psychology, etc.

Most of us have experienced in the theatre a good deal of annoyance from that objectionable individual the late comer, and we are sorry that Mr. Archer has pointed out in this book that the average play really lends itself to this trying delinquent by failing to attract vital interest till ten minutes after the rise of the curtain. We have sometimes been so utterly crushed and battered by a late comer as to render the play unenjoyable even in the second or third act, when wit abounds or when virtue triumphs over the villain's misdeeds. Mr. Archer writes:—

> So long as the fashion of late dinners continues it must remain a measure of prudence to let nothing absolutely essential to the comprehension of a play be said or done during the first ten minutes after the rise of the curtain. Here "A Doll's House" may be cited as a model, though Ibsen, certainly, had no thought of the British dinner-hour in planning the play. The opening scene is just what the ideal opening scene ought to be—invaluable, yet not indispensable. The late-comer who misses it deprives himself of a preliminary glimpse into the characters of Nora and Helmer and the relation between them; but he misses nothing that is absolutely essential to his comprehension of the play as a whole. This, then, would appear to be a sound maxim both of art and prudence; let your first ten minutes by all means be crisp, arresting, stimulating, but do not let them embody any absolutely vital matter, ignorance of which would leave the spectator in the dark as to the general design and purport of the play.

In the chapter entitled "Dramatic and Undramatic," Mr. Archer gives an amusing example of what he aptly calls a "mere picture-poster situation":—

> There is a drama—I have myself seen it—in which the heroine, fleeing from the villain, is stopped by a yawning chasm. The pursuer is at her heels, and it seems as though she has no resource but to hurl herself into the abyss. But she is accompanied by three Indian servants, who happen, by the mercy of Providence, to be accomplished acrobats. The second climbs on the shoulders of the first, the third on the shoulders of the second; and then the whole trio falls forward across the chasm, the top one grasping some bush or creeper on the other side; so that a living bridge is formed, on which the heroine (herself, it would seem, something of an acrobat) can cross the dizzy gulf and bid defiance to the baffled villain.

Mr. Archer, however, does not concern himself very much with pointing out the follies of crude melodrama, for he is chiefly concerned with examining those plays that have contributed to literature. His quiet enthusiasm for the best traditions of the English stage gives a freshness and interest to his careful work. Mr. Archer admits quite candidly that he has been unable to write a play himself, but his very inability to do so has enabled him to appreciate the many difficulties that beset the path of the playwright. In this volume, so lucidly written and so well arranged, he has certainly succeeded in revealing the mechanism of a host of plays. The literary aspirant, so pathetically referred to in the commencement of this review, would do well to take out his pigeon-holed manuscript and furbish it up again in the light of one who knows all that is to be known in the art of play-making. It is to be hoped that, after revision, due to the guiding hand of Mr. Archer, he may have the good fortune to get his play accepted, for then, like Richard Plantagenet, he will be able to exclaim:—

> Now is the winter of our discontent
> Made glorious summer . . . .

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Wayside of Philosophy

From the Forest. By W. SCOTT PALMER.
Vagrom Men. By ALFRED T. STORY. (Duckworth and Co. 2s. 6d. net each.)

IT is not easy, after a little while, to distinguish Mr. Story from Mr. Palmer, or either of them from the author of "The Roadmender." Doubtless the covers of their books have something to do with the resemblance, but they have other things in common, above all, a tranquil and retiring geniality, and a love of the little, the humble, the unworldly and the other-worldly. When Mr. Palmer thinks of people at the seaside

> Strolling beneath the so-called Panama,
> Beside the so-called sea,

he regrets that he does not know them, but does not conceal the fact that "as to real sympathetic understanding they might be passing callers from another planet." We conclude that he knows only the real Panama, and the real sea. Elsewhere he tells us that with two guineas he could feed himself for a fortnight and "moderately tip a moderate butler." He has also said that he is old and frail, and not confident of lasting long enough to see that time—"when we all wash both much and often and have fresh clothes at our command"—which would enable him to live with all sorts of men as brothers. He sits by the wayside of philosophy and rejoices at the beginning of a new age, for "the centre of gravity in thought has shifted from matter to spirit"; rejoices, too, at a copse in May "that Fra Angelico might have noted as a pattern for his floor in Paradise"; rejoices in an uncommon character such as the poor neighbour who reads Morning Prayer to his infirm parents and later "celebrates his sacrament by spending a good part of Sunday afternoon carrying water for an old woman near by, and doing odds and ends about her cottage." Last summer was too hot for him even at Ashdown Forest; nevertheless he wrote his little essays, reflecting on the "plagues of Egypt" let loose in the slums by heat, and enjoying what he terms "the susurrus of a multitude of little birds" at daybreak. Among other things that he enjoys are the poems of Father Tabb and the plays of John M. Synge. He does not always or very powerfully communicate his enjoyment, and, though he uses a professedly rambling and comfortable form, strikes us as being by no means one who "pipes but as the linnet sings." In brief, he has the current essayist's manner and plenty of delicacy and restraint, but little that is purely his own either in his matter or his arrangement of it. For those who regret that "The Roadmender" is no longer than it is, however, "From the Forest" will be a Godsend.

Mr. Story is not so old and frail and comfortable, nor has he such a love of soap as to keep out of almshouses and inns. "The Almshouse" is a characteristic collection of odd characters, "Ambrose L——," and so on. One of the inmates is named St. Crispin, and calls the almshouse "my little place, earned by a life of toil and quiet neighbourliness. There I live till I die, if God spares me." What will happen if he is not spared is not quite clear. But no matter. The slip, if such it be, is due to the fact that Mr. Story's writing is a little removed from life. We mean that he might well have made it all up. He describes a worthy couple going to see a decayed gentleman at the workhouse, and this is the opening sentence: "Donning their best clothes, therefore, and taking with them a pigeon-pie which Mrs. Poult, a heaven-made cook, had specially concocted for his tooth, they paid him a ceremonial visit." Well, a certain unreality prevails over all Mr. Story's grace and care. That he has grace and care no one will deny, but he runs great risks, with such sentences as:

> Herein we have the simple of simples—the secret of which, when once appropriated, lasts in one like the scent of woodruffs in your clothes-press, sweetening and nourishing the dim apogees of life and filling them with swathes of freshness, as of lenten bird-songs and the country green. . . .

This leads him on to a rhetorical regret that "we moderns" have lost the "primal secret" of the open air. The youth of the age, he says elsewhere, is being ruined by "council schools, Carnegie novel dispensaries, and the like"—he recommends the "old books," but with the less force that he is unable to persuade us that he knows either the new books or their readers. The people he knows are such as St. Crispin, and the beggar who jumped out of his skin with delight at the thought: "Pay off your score by making the world more beautiful wherever you can," and did so by sowing seeds here and there, after the manner of one of Mr. Hewlett's heroes, among others. He—or his father—compares an old gentleman's smile and the tear escaping from beneath it to "an April sunbeam that laughs on the edge of a shower." Those who like the signs of grace and care will be continually delighted by Mr. Story: those who do not will not think them wasted, but will look forward to seeing them more fitly employed than in these decorations, where Mr. Story has already reached a kind of perfection.

The New Imperialism

The True Temper of Empire. By SIR CHARLES BRUCE, G.C.M.G. (Macmillan and Co. 5s. net.)

THE greater part of what Sir Charles Bruce writes is concerned with different aspects of this dogma, which we take from the first essay in this volume:—

> The new Imperialism is dominated by two main ideas, closer union with the Dominions in the temperate zones and the economic interdependence of the Dominions with the tropical Crown Colonies and India. The international struggle for the control of the tropics has brought home to us that no aggregate of nations in temperate zones can constitute a self-sufficing and self-contained Empire.

It is natural for a man who has governed several

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Crown Colonies to lay great emphasis on the tropics, on their products and their natives, and on the many problems to which they give rise. If the effect of most of these essays is to suggest that the really pressing questions of our time for Englishmen are those concerned with the treatment of various sorts of native peoples in various parts of the world, this effect is probably intended. At the same time the fact that the Imperialist propaganda has more or less hung fire during the last half-dozen years or so, and that racial questions have been overshadowed by the need for settling the relations of the "masses and classes" at home, indicates in our opinion that this is a period of social and constitutional rather than racial difficulties. This is not to say that Sir Charles Bruce ought to have written about strikes, for a man must write of what he understands best, but we think he has tended to ignore home affairs too much. He has not pointed out for one thing that a consistent Imperialist policy can only be the result of a strong Imperialist feeling in England. As a matter of ordinary observation the mass of the population of England just now seems to care very little what happens in the Transvaal, say, for the labouring classes have revolted, and until their revolt is settled one way or another Imperialism is rather a side-issue.

Sir Charles Bruce is a very sound writer, and one who is not afraid of being dull. His reasoning is always lucid and his language has a suave, official restraint about it. He quotes as his authorities either documents or honoured names to which all men bow, and, of course, his own experience of the art of governing and the meaning of Empire goes without saying. His statements on general subjects are not always unimpeachable perhaps. It is hardly correct to say that the great empires of antiquity were "displaced by inferior races revolting against the methods by which the claim of superiority (on the part of the governing race) was enforced" (p. 58), since the inferior races revolted in vain as long as the ruling races were not drugged with pride and enervated with luxury; and the successful revolts commonly took place when the methods of enforcing the claim of superiority were of the mildest.

Rome, for instance, did not fall by mismanaging her dependents, but by mismanaging her home affairs, and it is likely that all empires that fall will fall for the same reason. It is precisely for this reason that we think Sir Charles Bruce's message is robbed of a good deal of its force by taking too little account of our own home affairs. We wonder, also, what he means by lamenting on p. 74 that "in 1908 the Imperial Parliament, by the Union of South Africa Act, abandoned" the modern conscience and its attitude to the subject races, and then saying, on p. 100, that "King Edward lived to see the crowning glory of the Union of Africa." The three best essays in the book are those on "The Modern Conscience," a fine broad account of the gradual change of civilised man's attitude to his political dependents; on the British Indians in the Transvaal, a determined indictment of recent British policy; and "Ireland's Place in the British Empire," in which Sir Charles Bruce proclaims himself a non-party man by advocating as the solution of the Home Rule difficulty some measure which should create in Dublin an assembly having the same relations to the Imperial Parliament as the provincial Legislatures of Canada have to the Dominion Parliament.

A Plea for Palmistry

Cheiro's Memoirs: The Reminiscences of a Society Palmist. Illustrated. (William Rider and Son. 7s. 6d. net.)

WHATEVER may be the feelings with which the story of "Cheiro's Memoirs" is received—whether it be looked upon as the revelations of a prophet, or merely as the vapourings of a charlatan—it is certain that the author himself has no doubt whatsoever as to the power he conceives to be in him. And the pleading he puts forward is not without a certain amount of justification. To succeed in any profession, he says, a man must have "the necessary temperament, the patience to study for years, and the courage to withstand the thousand and one disappointments that assail him on every side." If this maxim applies to the artist, he continues, why should it not equally apply to the students of human nature? Those who are not able to follow "Cheiro" to the utmost extent of his teaching will at least be able to allow that there is a great deal to be said for the statement that as a general rule the shape of the hands betray something of the character of their possessor. This is always taken into account by the palmist when he goes further and studies the extent of the lines on the palm of the hand. It has been pointed out that a criminal must be exceedingly well versed in crime in order that the movements of his hands do not betray him when he is at last brought to justice. A man can control the muscles of his face far easier than he can force his hands to remain absolutely immovable. Those of us who have attended amateur theatrical performances cannot have failed to notice the great air of uncertainty that always hovers over the amateur actor or actress as to what shall be done with those extremities which are used by a professional with so much skill, and add so greatly to the realisation of the play.

If, then, in cases of excitement or great mental strain the hands play such an important part, and it is recognised by the most talented actors and actresses that they must be used rightly and so help to betray the emotions, it naturally follows that excitement or strain must leave its marks on the hands, and as the average person's life is a series of events through each of which he passes with the same thoughts and ideas animating him—unless or until a crisis is reached, when his original principles may be diverted or reversed—the marks and lines on the hands naturally extend or deepen, and it is not difficult for a person who studies and is well versed in the art to determine the chief characteristics of the person whose hands are placed for examination. When it comes to foretelling events that are to happen in the future, however, it is an entirely different affair, and it is then a case not of coming events casting their shadow, but their lines, before them.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Cheiro pleads "that there is a natural position on the face for the nose, eyes, lips, etc., so also on the hand it was seen that there was a natural position for what became known as the Line of Head, Line of Life, and so on," but the position of one's nose, eyes, lips, etc., are not as a rule considered to determine what one's lucky number will be or the particular date upon which an important event will happen, and this Cheiro claims to do after studying closely the hands of an individual.

The author is anxious that the study of palmistry should become much more general, and is of opinion that when developed into a science it would be most valuable in foreseeing tendencies towards insanity, etc. Like all modern pioneers, he imagines that prejudice alone stands in the way of the adoption of his ideas. It is not always prejudice that hinders all modern movements meeting with success. There are people who well weigh and consider things before giving their judgment, and even if in their own individual case they would be perfectly willing to adopt this or that particular innovation, yet for the good of the community at large they refrain from doing so, believing that it is best for the majority to be temperate in all things and not to rush pell-mell into untried reforms on the recommendation of over-zealous and deeply earnest partisans.

During his career Cheiro has met and "read the hands" of some of the greatest in the land, and has been of great service to many of his poorer brethren.

The book is deeply interesting and well written. There is no wearisome insistence with regard to the author's notions. He is an artist who knows how to handle delicately his materials and not to spoil his picture with clumsy or revolting representations.

The Land of the Kaiser

Germany in the Nineteenth Century. Five Lectures by J. H. ROSE, C. H. HERFORD, E. C. K. GONNER, and M. E. SADLER. (Sherratt and Hughes. 2s. 6d. net.)

IN these days of constantly increasing national rivalry between ourselves and our German friends, it goes without saying that it cannot fail to benefit us as a nation to study the main factors in that progressive development which has rendered the future of Germany a matter of such vital interest to us. "German and British education have much to gain from a closer understanding," we read in the essay upon the history of education: we would fain add, "and German and British politics and economics still more." For ourselves, we are confident that, did we pay a little more heed to historians and a little less to politicians, we should not be quite so apt to be swept off our feet by the vapourings of scare-mongers. From this point of view we accord a very ready welcome to this, the thirteenth volume of the historical series published by the University of Manchester.

The work starts with an admirable summary of the contents. With regard to the individual essays, "The Economic History" is a model of lucidity. With Dr. J. Holland Rose, the author of "The Political History," the only serious fault which we have to find is his somewhat excessive indulgence in metaphor. "Napoleon the fiscal experimenter ruined Napoleon the new Charlemagne" cheek by jowl with "The symbol of the Hohenzollerns should be the phœnix, for in the death agonies that followed they found new life," is almost too rich fare for digestion at a single meal. We should like to have seen it pointed out, in justice to her late Majesty Queen Victoria, that, when she "objected to the pro-Danish proposals of Palmerston" in 1864, she did so for the lasting good of her country. The resulting "discredit to Great Britain" was as nothing compared with the discredit which would have befallen her had the Minister overruled the Sovereign. Upon the other hand, the author hastens to do justice to the memory of Bismarck by giving that significant parenthesis which, as he points out, is generally omitted, to the destruction of the meaning, "It is not by speechifying and majorities that the great questions of the time will have to be decided—that was the mistake in 1848 and 1849—but by blood and iron."

The essay upon "The Intellectual and Literary History" naturally consists largely of generalities, such as, "If Buckle was excessively preoccupied with man as he eats and drinks, Burckhardt, far more just to all the constituents of civilisation, yet made it turn essentially upon what he thinks and feels." Apothegms of that nature are, no doubt, palatable to one who happens to be familiar with both Buckle and Burckhardt. But the author of this essay has certainly succeeded in bringing home to us the German "union of consummate mastery of the facts with brilliant power of co-ordinating them," and that "indomitable personality of the primitive Teuton," which is the chief factor of the progress here depicted. In all these essays we see clearly the effects of State control, of the ever-present agrarian elements, of Germany's late arrival in the markets of the world, and of her struggles to overcome her lack of capital. Those who have any desire to learn something of our friends' national evolution would do well to expend the modest sum of half-a-crown upon this volume.

Shorter Reviews

Chats on Cottage and Farmhouse Furniture. By ARTHUR HAYDEN. With a Chapter on Old English Chintzes by HUGH PHILLIPS. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.)

THE above volume is the latest addition to Mr. Unwin's "Chats" series, so appreciated by collectors and all lovers of the antique, bric-à-brac, etc. Mr. Arthur Hayden is a well-known authority on old furniture, prints, and English china and earthenware, which subjects he is intimately acquainted with, writing on each with sound taste and thorough knowledge. The present work forms a companion volume and a supplement to his "Chats on Old Furniture," and deals very exhaustively with this collateral branch of a fascinating subject.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The craftsmen who made this class of furniture formed for themselves special types, displaying very fine workmanship, which were never made by the London cabinet-makers; as, for instance, the Jacobean gate-table, the Lancashire wardrobe, the dresser, and the windsor chair, which have styles peculiarly their own. The origin of the latter name appears to be associated with the Farmer King, who, seeing a chair of this design in a humble cottage near Windsor, ordered some to be made for the royal use. Farmhouse furniture exhibits the work of various districts strongly marked by an adherence to traditional forms and intensely insular in its disregard of prevailing fashions. "It is," says Mr. Hayden, "as English as the leathern black-jack and the home-brewed ale."

> The sublime indifference to passing fashions is astonishingly delightful to the student and to the collector. . . . The bacon-cupboard, the linen-chest, the gate-table, the ladder-back chair and the windsor chair, were made through successive generations down to fifty years ago without departing from the original pattern of the Charles I or the Queen Anne period.

The country cabinet-maker's work knew no sequence of ages of oak, walnut, mahogany, and satin-wood. His native trees furnished his material, which was chiefly oak, intermingled here and there with elm and yew-tree and beech, and one or two others. It may, indeed, be said that his chairs came straight from the hedgerows. Whole districts retained similar styles for centuries, and the end came only in the last decades of the nineteenth, when the village craftsman was wiped out by the rapid advance of factory and machine-made furniture. Mr. Hugh Phillips contributes an interesting chapter on Old English Chintzes, and the work is fully illustrated with many remarkably fine specimens of the village craftsman's art.

Random Notes and Reflections. By JOSEPH HARRIS. (Published by the Author at 17, Lancaster Avenue, Sefton Park, Liverpool. 2s. 6d., post free.)

THE author, who is an Israelite, left Russia at a very early age, and came to England. In clear, simple, and yet forceful language he tells his life story in the first part of this little book, and furnishes yet another proof of the Jewish capacity for "getting on" in spite of disadvantages. Part II is taken up by a brief exposition of the five books of Moses, and some very hard—albeit just—things are said about the sectarian controversies which disfigure Christianity. Since the author is by nature a kindly man, his objections to the Christian religion are worthy of persusal.

Throughout the book Russia and its ways form a sort of King Charles's head, popping up when least expected. Mr. Harris has a word to say on the militant Suffragettes, whom he loathes; and another on the subject of strikes and strikers, in which connection he remarks that those who cause strikes not only injure the whole community, but help its foreign opponents, a fact which cannot be given too much prominence. He has also a few very strong words to say with regard to money-lenders, whom he condemns as "financial Anarchists" and fathers of crime.

His dissertation on the first five books of the Bible is an illuminating piece of work, and well worth reading both by Jew and Gentile Bible students. Though the book as a whole is made up of "random notes," it is the work of a thoughtful, sincere man, with a long and varied life behind him to add weight to his words. With no pretence at literary style or didactic "preachiness," he has embodied a sound moral lesson in a modest little book.

Divorce. By EARL RUSSELL. (Wm. Heinemann. 2s. 6d.)

EARL RUSSELL, in this book, besides setting out in considerable detail and commenting upon the present state of the law relating to divorce and matrimonial causes, has given a résumé of his evidence before the Royal Commission which sat in 1910 to consider this subject, and has greatly amplified the views then expressed by him. He has approached his subject from points of view, historical, sociological, and moral, and has omitted scarcely a single argument which can be adduced in favour of an amendment of the existing law upon any of those grounds.

As to the proposed remedies for the evils acknowledged upon all hands to exist, Appendix III contains a draft of the Bill introduced into the House of Lords by Earl Russell in the year 1902, and the proposed changes are fully discussed in the text. Shortly stated, the grounds upon which, were that Bill to become an Act, a party to a marriage would be entitled to petition the Court for dissolution are (a) that the other party has committed adultery; (b) has been guilty of cruelty; (c) is undergoing penal servitude for not less than three years; (d) has been found or certified to be of unsound mind; (e) that for three years the parties to the marriage have lived apart without any intention on the part of one or other of them of resuming cohabitation, or (f) that for one year the parties have lived apart, and that neither wishes to resume cohabitation. The greatest stress is throughout laid upon the expediency, both moral and social, of abolishing the decree of judicial separation. Chapter V deals shortly with the practice in other countries.

The whole case in favour of reform is so succinctly and convincingly stated in this small work that we are fully at one with the noble author when he says in his Preface: "Should a second edition of this work ever be called for, I should hope to deal fully with the report and recommendations of the Royal Commission, which I believe may be expected in the coming summer."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Play Hours with Pegasus. By A. P. HERBERT. (B. H. Blackwell, Oxford. 1s.)

LAUGHTER is a splendid thing, and we are indebted to Mr. Herbert's delightful rhymes for a half-hour or so of genuine laughter. His verses are in the best style of Punch's cherished "Dum-Dum"—in fact, his stanzas of introduction are very reminiscent in spirit and in rhythm of Captain Kendall's prelude to "A Fool's Paradise." From page after page we are tempted to quote, but must be content with a sample from the conclusion of a satire on "Literary Advertisments—Voice-production." After describing his tremendous performances in the way of melody, the renewed vocalist remarks:—

> . . . . My inward springs
> Of song, my glottis, and my vocal strings
> (Have you a glottis?—jolly little things),
>
> All these have risen in a month or less
> To unknown heights of vigour and success.
> What is the reason for it? Can you guess?
>
> You can't? Then listen. When the people dote
> On the perfection of my every note,
> Tell them it's Pinker's Pastilles for the Throat!

Other specimens of sarcasm at the expense of certain "boomsters" are excellent, and the humorous occasional verses were well worthy of rescue from the columns of the various periodicals in which they first appeared.

England and the Moslem World: Articles, Addresses and Essays on Eastern Subjects. By SYED H. R. ABDUL MAJID, LL.D. (The Yorkshire Printing Co., York. 5s. net.)

THIS book is a collection of lectures, articles, etc., which deal almost entirely with Mohammedan topics. The contents are divided into three classes: Political, Legal, and Social. The first section of the book is for the most part an advocacy of an alliance between the two largest Mohammedan Powers in the world—the British and the Turkish. Into this alliance the author would bring the other Mohammedan Powers—Persia, Afghanistan, and Morocco. Most of the papers of which the book is composed have been rendered out of date by the recent march of events, and the solution of the problem which the author places before his readers needs, therefore, revising in many particulars. In principle, however, the solution is the aforesaid alliance between England and Turkey, and en passant the former power is warned to put no trust in Russia. "I should only tell you that you cannot afford to rely upon Russian promises," says the author. "When she did not scruple to violate the provisions of such treaties as that of Paris and of Berlin, it can hardly be disputed that she will not respect the convention recently concluded. Let me remind you of the Variage incident, when the Russian captain bade the Sheik of Koweit to note the Russian colours which she flew—'the colours which,' he boasted, 'will soon rule the seas.'"

In Defence of America. By BARON VON TAUBE. (Stephen Swift and Co. 6s.)

THIS is one of the dullest books it has ever been our misfortune to read. American literature is not, as a rule, whatever may be its defects, deficient in interest; but Baron von Taube has shown that it is possible to be consistently and almost incredibly dull for close upon 300 pages. The Baron appears to think that the Americans are a much misunderstood people, and, "for the enlightenment of John Bull," he has undertaken to remove many of the prejudices which are entertained against them on this side of the Atlantic. He sets out a series of indictments which, he alleges, are brought by Englishmen against the American citizen. Many of these are mere figments of his imagination. For the remainder, he appears to us to have provided a totally inconclusive defence.

The Baron's sense of discrimination may be gauged from the fact that he lumps together Harvey, Henley, Bilroth, McKanzie, Skoda, Herba, Rokitansky, Mendlejeff, Bercholet, Bichât, Walter Scott, Dickens, Fennimore Cooper, Victor Hugo, Herbert Spencer, Huxley, Goethe, and Rousseau into one amazing category. We have preserved Baron von Taube's own order of nomenclature, as it would appear to throw some light upon his mental methods. For ourselves, we are free to confess that no rumours of the greatness of McKanzie have as yet reached us, but we gladly accept the author's assurance that Nature "employs a number of generations to accumulate the nervous power and mental predisposition within the breed" before such a portent can be produced. The book is not one that calls for any serious criticism. We could wish, however, that Baron von Taube would not refer to the expanse of water which—fortunately—divides the United Kingdom from the United States as "The Pond." It is not a pond; it is the Atlantic Ocean.

Fiction

Maids in Many Moods. By H. LOUISA BEDFORD. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

WHEN an authoress takes four beautiful girls with the set intention of marrying them, within the compass of three hundred pages or so, to four eligible men, there is a possibility that the resulting story may prove a trifle monotonous. It is so here; the repeated protestations of the various lovers, and the reiterated assurances of the beautiful—thirty years ago the authoress would certainly have written "beauteous"—damsels are cloying to a certain extent. A taste of red pepper had made this sugary banquet more appetising, although ar attempt is made to introduce variety in the shape of a New Zealand earthquake, which inflicts such damage to one hero's spine that his beautiful damsel is threatened with a rather monotonous year or two of married life to start with.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

We would that we found the world as full of innocuous people as this authoress makes it. With one exception, a cattish lady who is, unfortunately, killed off half-way through the book, everybody is positively thirsting to do everybody else a good turn—and most of the characters succeed. It is cheering fiction, but it rings hardly true enough to satisfy after a half-dozen or more instances. In places, there is not a little of bathos in the descriptions. "Isobel stood glued to the side of the boat" has about it an irresistible suggestion of cobbler's wax and a mischievous schoolboy, though the story includes neither. To sum up, we may say that the maids—all beautiful—are very much alike; the men are all good; the marriages quite conventional and proper; and there is every possibility that the various pairs are now living happy ever after.

The Signal, and Other Stories. By W. M. GARSHIN. Translated from the Russian by CAPTAIN ROWLAND SMITH. (Duckworth and Co. 6s.)

THE author of these stories, W. M. Garshin, a melancholiac born in 1855 and dying sadly in 1888, resembles Edgar Allan Poe in intense thought and brooding melancholy. The stories form the whole of his literary work and cover a wide range, from the experiences of the author as a soldier (Garshin volunteered as a private in an infantry regiment and served in the Russo-Turkish War), which are very interesting, to others dealing with various phases of Russian life, while one or two were written when he was almost over the border line of mental control.

"The Scarlet Blossom" is one of the most striking of this latter period, and is very powerful; but all are worth reading, and will give an insight into Russian ways. What strikes one about the Russian character, so well delineated in these tales, is its simplicity in many things; also the kind feelings existing between classes and the passionate attachment of the soldiers to their Czar as head of their fatherland. Doubtless with a more general education of the masses and consequently less religious superstition, less drunkenness and a purer official life might be hoped for, and Russia, with its boundless resources, mineral and otherwise, would easily take a foremost place among the nations of the world, furnishing employment for the surplus population of the countries on her borders. The country is moving in the right direction even now, and with her onward march the days of bombs and revolutionaries will easily be lost sight of, for there will be no need for meteors in the light of the sun of general progress.

The book is very ably translated by Captain Smith, translator to his Majesty's Embassy at St. Petersburg, and should have many readers.

The Fugitive Years. By KATHARINE SIMPSON. (John Long. 6s.)

RHODA LAVERICK is the principal character in the pages of this book. As a child she is a brave little soul whose great delight in life is to play with her cousin Geoff. When Geoff is old enough to be sent to Eton he wishes to abandon his little playmate, and very brutally shakes her off when she clings to him heart-broken at the thought of the parting. As the boy was, so is the man. Geoffrey Oswaldson grows up selfish and fickle, and, regardless of his cousin's feelings, seeks her out only when he is in trouble and wants her help. Rhoda never denies him all the assistance she can give until, selfish still, he offers her an unenviable position as his mistress, his wife being in an asylum. This Rhoda refuses, in spite of the fact that she professes to indulge in some crazy "free-love" notions together with her Russian friend, Anna. The end is not unexpected, and taken as a whole the story is well worked out. There is very little embellishment; the characters are clearly drawn, and Mrs. Simpson is able within a very few lines to convey to the reader's mind an apt description of events as they take place.

Her Sacrifice. By ARTHUR APPLIN. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)

THE outstanding figure in this book is that of Aaron Roberts, the mean little Jew money-lender who found his soul and changed into a man through loving a woman whom he could never hope to win, and whom he helped to marry to the hero of the story. In him, the author has accomplished a very creditable character study, and we realise the development of the man.

For the rest, it is melodrama, with the determined villain, the wronged hero, the beautiful heroine, the other woman, the murder and inquest, the detectives, the devoted brother, the faithful friend, and all the rest of our exceedingly old acquaintances making trouble in the most approved style. The groundwork of the plot is very thin material, but, if one can succeed in swallowing the first four or five chapters, the rest is exciting enough, and though we know that the virtuous damsel and the long-suffering hero will live happy ever after the concluding chapter, the plot is unfolded in an engaging style. We could wish that the author were a little more careful of his English, at times, but the swing and rush of the story, and its frankly melodramatic nature, make this fault less evident than would be the case in work of a more ambitious kind. Mr. Applin has here given us another sensational story of the thrilling order, and his large circle of readers will find is quite equal to his usual style.

Mollie the Handful. By FLORENCE WARDEN. (F. V. White and Co. 6s.)

ONCE started, one feels it almost impossible to stop reading about Mollie's adventures. The book is amusing from beginning to end. Mollie is not only pretty, but clever; she exercises to the utmost her powers of mischief and fun, in frustrating the endeavours of her elderly and most sober guardian and his younger co-guardian, a gay young man of the world, in forcing her into marrying the stupid son of the elder. A curious condition of her father's will compels the consent of both guardians to her marriage, until she reaches the age of thirty.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

All's well that ends well, and "Mollie the Handful" wins in the long run. The last chapter describes her as starting for Doncaster Races with her fiancé without a chaperon.

The Theatre

"Ben-My-Chree" at the New Prince's Theatre

A FEW years ago it was considered quite charming and fashionable to appreciate melodrama. Although that particular form of theatrical affectation is now worn out, melodrama appears more than ever sure of vast audiences. The fastidious may turn aside, but the great heart of the public remains true to its time-tried ideals. It seems rather curious after so many years of the revolutionary Ibsen—not to mention any of the successful English dramatists who, knowingly or without intention, have handed on his epoch-making methods—that the old stage tricks and artificial dialogues should remain popular. But such is the case; and we must accept the matter as it stands. If melodrama is to be produced in London, the new Prince's seems the right place for it, and Mr. Walter and Mr. Frederick Melville the best possible producers. Granted these premises, "Ben-My-Chree" is just the right sort of composition to suit the circumstances, and Mr. Hall Caine and the late Mr. Wilson Barrett the most appropriate writers. The present revival is given all possible chance of success. Everyone knows the story of "The Deemster," that rich mine of theatrical romance, passion, misunderstanding, wrong and righted wrong from which to quarry such an exciting, if obvious, play as "The Girl of My Heart," added to the approved situations and the effective, if somewhat unconvincing, speeches. On this occasion all the characters are played as though the players really believed in them. Mr. Lauderdale Maitland as the heroic hero, and Miss Jessie Winter as the most loyal of loyal heroines, are twin towers of melodramatic strength. Then there is the sincere and effective work of Mr. Austin Melford; of that admirable actor, Mr. William Lugg, of Mr. Felix Pitt, and Mr. Austen Milroy and of others nearly as excellent in their particular ways. The audience likes the spirit of the play, and the actors appear to appreciate the warm enthusiasm of the audience. The managers have provided everything necessary for the first production of this masterpiece, and thus "Ben-My-Chree" swings through to its satisfactory finish amid general contentment. But, unfortunately, there is always a cynic or so in a big house such as the Prince's Theatre, and to one such the awful sentence on the Deemster: "Alone let him live: alone let him die," would not appear so terrible if the sole alternative were to witness constantly the playing of "Ben-My-Chree."

Music

OF the new opera "Conchita" and its young composer, Signor Zandonai, we feel impelled to speak with great interest and respect. Even after one hearing of "Conchita," and that in the alien atmosphere of Covent Garden, we looked back and knew that we had been fascinated at several moments by passages, sustainedly eloquent, of real musical beauty, and also that much of the music, which had not, perhaps, moved us deeply by its general force, had interested us by its novelty of aim, and made us wish to become better acquainted with it. The intrinsic qualities of music must remain the same wherever it is performed, though "environment" has a more important influence upon our power of appreciation than we sometimes think it has. We should probably have found ourselves more in tune with "Conchita," and enjoyed it more spontaneously, had we heard it for the first time in Italy, filled, as we should then have been, with love for everything Italian, sympathetic to every symptom of advance, every ambition for development, every aspiration, in fact, discernible in the work of that wonderful country, that dearest people. We say this lest it should seem that we are too cold, too measured, in our first appreciation of music which has been hailed with enthusiasm in Italy by musicians much more competent to judge the music of an Italian of the modern school than we are.

It was evident from the first that "Conchita" is an opera more likely to take an Italian audience captive than an English one. But it does not follow that its music is not worthy of careful attention on the part of Englishmen, or that with further knowledge we may not come to delight in it whole-heartedly. There exists much British music which we think very beautiful indeed, but which makes no impression at all when performed before foreigners. We shall never forget the scathing words uttered to us by some distinguished French musicians after a concert in which some of the best specimens of Parry, Elgar, and other Englishmen had been very well given! It will be a long time, we think, before the average English opera-goer prefers "Conchita" to "Faust" or "Carmen" or "Aïda," but since "Louise," an opera with which "Conchita" may not unaptly be compared, is holding its ground in London so well, we see no reason why Signor Zandonai's fine work should not eventually gain a place in our understanding and our affections.

For ourselves, we may say that a first hearing of "Conchita" made us wish to hear it again, not only as a duty, but as a pleasure. Anyone who affects to be interested in musical movements should be ready to learn what are the aims of Signor Zandonai and to inquire how far he is able to realise them. But there are parts of his opera so genuinely attractive as music that we are sure we should enjoy hearing them again. Such are practically the whole of the second act; the intermezzo which precedes the scene at the gate, and that scene itself; the closing passages of the opera, too, gather up the best impressions of what has gone before. The first act is very spirited, and one did not find it difficult to note that here the composer was aiming at Reality rather than Realism, according to the confession of faith which he is understood to have put forward. Still we admit that this kind of musical scene, in spite of its vivacity, had no great power over us. Nor did the scene in Conchita's house rouse us to enthusiasm.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

During its progress we think we were chiefly conscious of admiration for Mme. Berat, whose versatility in playing stage-mothers, and making each one unlike the last, is truly remarkable. But we began to be stirred when the action and music of the music-hall scene revealed a composer of special gifts for musical characterisation and capable of expressing many kinds of emotion in tense passages which were as beautiful as they were dramatic. When the curtain fell, we could not perhaps have whistled any particular tune, but we were filled with a sense of melody over and above the sense that we had been aided by the music to see an actual scene of real life. Of this feeling we were conscious to the end of the opera, with but few moments of lessened interest. We knew that nothing conventional in the way of musical illustration was to be expected, that there would be no passages, such as those in the operas of Puccini and Mascagni, which could easily be detached from their context and performed on a concert platform; we had been told that Zandonai had discarded many of the modes by which effect has been sought by his brethren, and we found their absence not a little refreshing.

The quieter setting out of the orchestral scheme is in itself a welcome sign, and the composer has lost nothing by restricting himself to the less lurid colouring, for his tones show new harmonies, new textures over and over again, and one constantly knew that one had not heard this or that effect presented in the same way before. It may be that we are intended to concentrate our attention on the orchestra, that the music on the stage is designed to be only supplementary to that heard from the instruments; but, however that may be, it seemed as a general rule that the vocal work fell considerably behind the orchestral in attractiveness. This could not have been due to want of skill or earnestness on the part of the interpreters. Of Mme. Tarquini's performance of the absorbing part of Conchita we must speak in terms of the warmest praise. Both as actress and singer she came forward as an artist of quite remarkable quality. We can think of no fault to find with her at all, and we look forward to seeing her in many another part at Covent Garden. Signor Schiavazzi's singing might not charm us were we to hear him deliver a detached aria in some other opera, but as Don Matteo he was excellent, and as an actor he seconded Mme. Tarquini almost ideally. The three cigarette-makers were rather too shrill. For the stage setting we have little but praise. It is true that in the street scene we were treated to the kind of inhabitants which we see on stages, but never in Seville. But as for the Café-chantant, it was admirably like one in which we sat but the other day under the shadow of Giralda; except that when we were there the little box of a place was so densely crowded one could neither move nor breathe. Mr. Beecham's orchestra, conducted by Signor Panizzi, played beautifully, and its leader, Mr. Sammon, thrilled everybody by his solo.

The concert of her own compositions recently given at Æolian Hall by Mme. Poldowski (for that is the nom de plume of Lady Dean Paul) introduced us to a composer of songs which struck us as being of a truly delightful excellence. Her touch is of the lightest, her seizure of the spirit of her words is of the swiftest, her sense of the right union of voice and piano is unerring. One says at once that these songs might not have been composed had Debussy been born dumb, but the apparent miracle is that in Mme. Poldowski we have a composer who can use the language of another nation and adapt herself perfectly to its idiom without being, in the ordinary sense, an imitator. There is the clearest mark of her own personality on every one of the songs which we were fortunate enough to hear. We should have liked to hear everything, but wayward circumstances obliged us to be satisfied with a hearing of only twelve songs, which were sung by Miss Maggie Teyte and Mr. Gervase Elwes.

Nine of these were settings of Verlaine's words, and perhaps a foreboding listener might have been conscious of a doubt whether Mme. Poldowski would succeed as well with poetry of a different character. The vocal part of these is astonishingly pointed and suitable; so good, that every line and every word in every line are fitted to notes that give significance, and when the song has ceased, the effect is that of a long sentence perfectly declaimed, balanced with the most delicate nuance, a sentence of poetry which vanishes into air as if it had been real only for a moment. A delicious accompaniment supports and engarlands the recited poem. In every song some striking little figure has been found which insists, yet never too emphatically, in making itself heard and remembered, and colouring the whole; and this, in its turn, is twined about with the happiest arabesques. So many of the songs were encored that Mme. Poldowski had evidently hit the taste of her audience, but she would no doubt agree that to the singers was due no unimportant part of the success. We should like to know the songs more intimately before pronouncing an opinion as to whether they penetrate very deeply into the emotion of their poetry, whether their very charm of facility may not be a danger. But that they are brilliantly effective at a first hearing we have no doubt whatever. Reluctantly we must own that we should require them to be sung to us by an ordinary singer, and accompanied with less perfection than they are by their composer, before we could assign them their exact place in the list of songs which belong to the comprehensive school which includes Fauré, Hahn, Debussy, and Ravel.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

At the last concert of that singularly beautiful violinist, M. Hubermann, a player who, we trust, has now firmly established his hold upon the affections of London, we heard with great pleasure a singer who is known in Italy as Signora Talesi, though she is not, apparently, of Italian birth. While showing that her training has been rather for the operatic than the lyric style of singing, she made it clear that her gifts and her intelligence are sufficient for both of them. Her fine warm soprano, managed with beautiful finish, should bring her abundant opportunities of valuable work in English concert-rooms, should she elect to exchange an operatic career for the less exciting, but not less interesting, one of a vocalist at Symphony or Chamber Concerts, and Oratorios.

The Story of a Great Crime*

BY E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT.

IT is nearly eight months ago since the civilised world was disgusted by the summary manner in which the Italian Army in Tripoli, under General Carlo Caneva, "purged the Oasis," to use a phrase invented by the Italians themselves. In the dictionary the word purge is defined as meaning to wipe out or to cleanse, and either definition adequately describes the methods employed by the Italian Army to get rid of the Arabs whom they quite inaccurately and erroneously described as traitors. Mr. Francis McCullagh describes his book as "Italy's War for a Desert," but a far more accurate description would be "The Story of a Great Crime," because almost the entire book, with the exception of a few explanatory chapters at the beginning and end, is taken up with a detailed record of those awful events in the Oasis during the dark days from October 23 to October 28.

There are some who will doubtless say: "What is the good of recalling incidents which belong to the past, and which will never occur again?" or, "What is the use of trying to breed ill-will between a friendly nation and ourselves by recounting certain discreditable events, the like of which are found in the history of almost every nation?" I, for one, certainly disagree with this point of view. I think that Mr. McCullagh has performed a great service, not only to history, but also to humanity, by this irrefutable exposure of one of the most disgraceful chapters in all the bloody story of war and colonisation. Those of us who were there and saw with our own eyes men, women, and children shot down, bayoneted or clubbed to death, innocent and guilty alike, by gangs of raw youths from Southern Italy and Sicily, restrained by no discipline or moral feeling, cannot easily forgive or forget. We are certainly under no obligation to the Italians either to forgive or to forget. We have been held up to execration by the Italian Government and by the Italian Press, who have endeavoured by every possible means to throw dust in the eyes of Europe and to make their penetration of Tripoli appear as a godsend to a barbarous and cruel people. Nor have apologists been wanting among certain English writers themselves. Notably amongst these is Mr. Richard Bagot, who has endeavoured, quite without success, to prove that all of us special correspondents who were responsible for these exposures were either bribed by the Turks or were perverters of the truth, and, to crown all, that we were not even there when the massacres took place! Of course, it is utterly useless to confute calumnies of this sort. They are so absurd on the face of it that they only excite contempt and derision, and Mr. Bagot's letters to the Spectator, Nation, and, I believe, to the Times have done absolutely nothing to cleanse the Oasis of the foul crimes of his favourites.

Even Lord Roberts thought it necessary to intervene on behalf of General Caneva and to plead his action as justifiable on the well-known and undefinable grounds of "military exigencies." Suffice it to say that, when Lord Roberts penned his letter, he was totally ignorant of the true facts, and, had he been in possession of them he certainly would not have written what he did. In fact, all the apologists of General Caneva—with the exception of Lord Roberts—either live in Italy or inordinately love that country. They all assume one thing, and on this base their charges—namely, that every special correspondent who went to Tripoli was animated by the most bitter hatred towards the Italians from the start, and that we all sat there only awaiting an opportunity to retaliate or to have our revenge. Why we should wish to retaliate or have our revenge, they quite fail to explain. Not one of the foreigners who was at Tripoli at the time of the massacres has dared come forward to deny that they took place, or to defend the action of the Italian Army. A few have remained silent, or have pleaded the time-honoured old "military exigencies." No; the only apologists are the Italians themselves, or else certain English writers living in Italy, who have never been within one thousand miles of the front, and whose only sources of information come from what they read in the Italian Press, or what has been told to them by Italian officials. It is for the world to judge whom to believe: either the testimony of men who were on the spot, or of those who write sitting in comfortable chairs in Italy. The world has chosen to accept the evidence of those who are trained observers, who had nothing to gain and everything to lose by making these exposures, and who risked their lives in order to ascertain the truth.

The Italian Government hoped to be able to influence all the foreign correspondents at the front in various ways. The Italian Press is absolutely under the thumb of the Government, and any attempt to speak the truth would have meant instant dismissal, and even imprisonment for those responsible for any exposures. But they made a fatal error in supposing that the British Press could be muzzled in the same manner, and hence their rage and disappointment at finding that, in spite of all their carefully thought out precautions, truth emerges. The most faithful of their British allies was, and I suppose still is, Mr. Richard Bagot. He wasted an enormous amount of ink in his attacks. I used to read with infinite pleasure his letters to the Spectator, but I never thought it worth while to make any reply. Finally, Mr. McCullagh replied in a very able letter to the Nation, which showed how utterly baseless were Mr. Bagot's charges. I am glad to notice that Mr. Bagot's efforts to wipe out an indelible stain of blood with masses of ink did not in certain quarters go unappreciated or unrewarded, for the ladies of Italy banded themselves together, and presented him with an illuminated address!

* Italy's War for a Desert. Being some Experiences of a War-Correspondent with the Italians in Tripoli. By FRANCIS MCCULLAGH. Illustrated. (Herbert and Daniel. 10s. 6d. net.)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Mr. McCullagh's work is one of the most instructive and interesting I have read for many a long day. It should be studied not only by those who sympathise with the Turks, but also by the friends of Italy. It throws an immense amount of light on the Italian character and on Italian methods, and proves conclusively how unfitted the Italians are either by temperament or prowess in the field to start empire-building in the twentieth century. The campaign has been a ghastly and expensive failure. Six months ago, in summing up the military situation, I cabled, "They have bitten off more than they can chew: the war is now in a state of stalemate." The army has never advanced ten miles from the coast—in fact, it is difficult to see where it can advance, because a permanent conquest cannot be made out of sand, and the Turks and Arabs are resisting even more vigorously to-day than they were six months ago. From time to time one reads in the Press of terrible battles and the slaughter of thousands of Turks; but these wild tales are absolutely devoid of foundation, and are merely served up to keep the Jingo spirit alive in Italy and thus save the Ministry. The war is costing Turkey comparatively not a penny, and, as long as ammunition holds out, there is no reason why it should not go on for another ten years, if one only takes into consideration the military situation in Tripoli.

Every day Italy's position becomes more serious. The war, which enjoyed a temporary and quite artificial popularity, is now thoroughly unpopular, not only with the nation, but even with the Army. A short time ago there was a mutiny among the several regiments in Tripoli, because the reservists longed to return to their homes. A friend of mine told me of the departure of reinforcements from Naples to the front. The men were downhearted, dejected, and were marched to the transports like cattle to the shambles, and not a cheer greeted their departure. The Italian people are just beginning to realise how they have been deceived by their Government, and how Pyrrhic are the victories which almost every week fill a servile and censored Press. How will it end? That is a riddle which no one seems able to answer; but everyone should read Mr. McCullagh's work, as it throws real light on one of the darkest pages in the history of Italy or of any other country.

Intimate Books

THERE are some books of which a man is so fond that it hurts him to hear them criticised. There are others of which he is so fond that he dislikes to hear them praised. The first is a generous feeling, coming with early enthusiasms. We have all gone hot in our time at the shock of hearing some author of our choice spoken of lightly. But we soon grow not to expect perfection so readily, and criticism we accept in good part, or if we do not agree with it, dismiss easily enough. Praise is another matter. This dislike of praise is the lover's feeling. It does not cool, nor is it given without discrimination. We keep it only for a few books—those that we can open at random, beginning readily, if the eye so falls, in the middle of a sentence—books which we meet so frequently that we need not the usual formal greetings—livres de chevet. And we please ourselves with the fancy that ours are the only copies. That is the tacit understanding. These, the intimate books, are the books that we hate to hear praised.

Literature is not a Republic, though many consider it a fine thing to say that it is. In reality it has nothing democratic about it—no full and frank discussions, no efforts after compromise. It is a dark and secret thing—writers are solitary workers. They must do things in their own fashion, and far from being citizens of a republic, are so many tyrants, each living in his own kingdom and making his own laws. So, too, with the reader, he is secret and a tyrant; he has nothing of the democrat in him. All the literary talk that flows and eddies is shallow enough. The books that really move us we keep to ourselves; we hold them jealously out of conversation, and hug the illusion that they are our own exclusive property. These feelings are not to be defended on any ethical grounds; but they are none the less strong that we acknowledge them to be selfish, and to rest on an illusion. This much at least may be said for them, that they are the final praise. No book which has touched this spring of sentiment, even in a single mind, has failed.

These fantastic jealousies are not readily discovered, but you may suspect a man when he slips suddenly from the conversation, or gives that dull-toned assent to something you have said, which implies that here is a subject not to be discussed. Evidence is not easy to collect. Nor, if one had it, could one come to any summary or conclusion about these feelings and the sort of books that merit them. They depend too much upon individual caprice. But there are certain authors who, by the very nature of their writing, invite you to keep them to yourself. Lamb is one of these. All his writings are whispered confidences, and the pleasant privilege of having them breathed into your ear is lost if you know that others share it. The symposium upon Lamb which Mr. Lucas has in his essay the "Embarrassed Eliminators" (although you know all the characters to be himself) seems in some way wrong. Lamb is not a subject for debate, even among intimates.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

These lovers' feelings I keep for Miss Austen alone. There are some writers whom I prefer to criticise only myself, resenting any disparaging words from others as a liberty. But Miss Austen is the only one whom I would as soon hear criticised as praised. Nor is there, in reality, anything ungallant in this sentiment. I would defend her from any gross attack—if it were possible for such to be made. But the slight of supercilious criticism or mere indifference would not trouble me at all. Indeed, it would be welcome, confirming me in my jealous fancy that no one reads her as I do. I know, of course, that there are thousands of others nursing these same selfish feelings, and there are even some who write of her. I have all Mr. Austin Dobson's introductions in my copies of her books—but I have never read them. I have seen verses addressed "To Dear Jane Austen" (a horrid liberty), and I hurriedly turned the page. I should never dare to think of her in so familiar a way. For with Miss Austen one cannot be other than a ceremonious lover, and would never think to kiss more than her finger-tips. Darcy in his humbler mood—he is the example of the proper lover's spirit in the presence of such a mistress. And so I hug the illusion.

I like to think that here is a world where no other stranger has trod; that her parks and her gardens and her pleasant country lanes are my private domain; that no one else is admitted to the drawing-rooms at Hartfield and Longbourn and Mansfield Park; that I alone have adored Elizabeth Bennett and Emma Woodhouse and envied Mr. Darcy and Mr. Knightley their good fortune. I even grudge others their acquaintance with Miss Bates and Mrs. Elkins and Mr. Collins. One hesitates to see one's best friends admitted to these places on the same footing, and it is intolerably unpleasant to find that mere acquaintances or even strangers are as intimate there as one's self. Mr. Woodhouse was not more suspicious of change than are Miss Austen's lovers of one another.

Miss Austen has had many lovers; nor has any writer inspired quite the same personal emotion in her following as she, so serene, so decorous, so self-possessed. Indeed, it is a passion, and writers of a more ardent sort (thinking themselves better subjects for a hot affection) have been puzzled by it and even inclined to envy.

"Anything like warmth of enthusiasm," wrote Charlotte Brontë, "anything energetic, poignant, heartfelt, is utterly out of place in commending these works; all such demonstration the authoress would have met with a well-bred sneer, would have calmly scorned as outré and extravagant." As if there were not more depth of feeling and poignant suffering in Anne Elliot than in all the wild heroines of the Brontës! It is extravagance of words only that Miss Austen would discourage in her lovers, feeling (quite properly) that warmth of enthusiasm and hot passion are not beyond expression in a gentleman-like way. But for the most part Miss Austen's lovers keep their passion to themselves. Macaulay (the most distinguished of them all) once meditated an article on Miss Austen. "I may perhaps try my hand on Miss Austen's novels," so he wrote to Macrey Napier, "That is a subject on which I shall require no assistance from books." But the article was never written. One must suppose that when he broached the task he found his feelings of too intimate a sort to put upon paper. For these lovers' feelings towards books, with their sweet and wicked jealousy, are things not lightly to be shared.

C. V.

By-ways of Brittany*

I ENVY Mr. Davies the sensation of writing this book. It was doubtless transient in measure, but it was of nature poignant. The fresh and delicate charm of a first impression of Brittany is like the first bite of a draught of cider upon a husky throat: it cannot be reproduced. By all means, drink again and enjoy, as Théodore Botrel adjures us:—

Buvons, buvons encor,
Buvons le cidre d'or
A la santé des gâs d'Arvor!

The draught will still be pleasant and healthy. Brittany is a well that never goes dry. But the entrancing, intoxicating aroma of the first taste of its beauty and strangeness is not to be had again.

Brittany is a true bourne of discoveries for the adventurous spirit, but for him only. He who has not the right matter of adventure in him will traverse it in vain. It does not begin to be savoured by the luxurious person who spends a jolly week or so among the American millionaires at Dinard, or the tripper who rushes through the country by train or auto, whirling along railway tracks or main roads, "doing" a cathedral here and a cromlech there and picking up a pardon somewhere else. Even he, it is true, will find some element of surprise in the very existence of an esoteric backwater like Brittany in a country so joyously, so frankly mondain as France. But he can acquire only a vague impression of its individuality; he can know nothing of the soul that lies behind whitewashed wall and under thatched roof, that dwells in forests and flits over moorlands in that great province which is at once of France and not of it.

Mr. Davies and his companion did the only thing there is to do if one is to know anything of Brittany:

* Off Beaten Tracks in Brittany. By EMIL DAVIES. Illustrated. (Stephen Swift. 7s. 6d. net.)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

they walked. And they walked away from the great highways, threading a tortuous course through Finistère and the Côtes du Nord from Brest to Dinard.

As it was, they did too great a distance in too short a time to absorb much of the veritable essence. They should have left even those quiet and unfrequented roads which took them from Plougastel-Daoulas across the Montagnes d'Arrée to Loudéac and Montcontour. They should have been content with a lesser journey. They should have penetrated into the sequestered valleys by traverse and sentier, and found Yves Michel at home in his little farmhouse, and stayed there long enough to make friends with the strong, warm, deep-hearted man concealed beneath visage more sombre and dissembled by manner more aloof than those of the remotest communities of our outmost islands.

The Breton is often compared with the Welshman and the Cornishman, and not inaptly. He strongly resembles both; but he has a special affinity with the Cornishman. I have stood listening to dark-eyed, many-whiskered sailors and fishermen on the shores of the Bay of Douarnenez, and have been unable to rid myself of the impression that I was in Mevagissey or Porthleven, and that these men would presently leave off talking broken French and break into the familiar sing-song of the Cornish dialect. Again, you may lean on the gate of a farmstead in the uplands of Brittany, amid scenery of granite, gorse, and heather, and see men at work who might, for their build and their appearance, be Cornish smallholders away on the "backbone" of the Duchy, amid the Caradons or on the skirts of Bodmin moors. The scenery of Cornwall is a thought wilder, perhaps, and its hills are something higher. But the character of the two countries is the same. Even the names, how familiar they seem!—

> By Tre, Pol and Pen,
> You shall know the Cornishmen;

and by the same token you shall know the Bretons. When you are at Le Pouldhu on the Côte d'Armor, or at Lannion on the north coast, your mind inevitably flies to Mount's Bay and the hills behind it, to the Marconi station of Poldhu and to the Lanyon cromlech; and when on the road you encounter Raoul Trevithick, there is nothing but the riband hanging from his hat to distinguish him from Dick Trevithick of that ilk in our own western peninsula. How easily are Carantec and Crantock identified, or Tredrez and Tredrea! How homely does Pennenes sound! And the saints you meet are the same: your Cornish St. Breock is here St. Brieuc or St. Briac; St. Columb has taken unto himself a diphthong and become St. Coulomb.

In fact, the two people are one people, with practically the same ancient language, the same spirit, and the same outlook—the same imaginativeness, the same inquisitiveness, and the same kind-heartedness. The old Cornish language and the Breton language are one. The modification of a few consonants is the main difference: Breton is a harder-sounding and more clackety tongue than Cornish. There is in both countries the same plenitude of saints and the same devotion to religion, only the Cornishman's mysticism has run in another groove since the Reformation. The transcendentalism of the Methodist faith captured his spirit in the days when the Church was at its lowest ebb of materialism and Erastinianism; but he still is just as completely obsessed by the unseen world as the Breton.

Of course, Mr. Davies and his friend could not stop to investigate or analyse or compare. If they had been able to do so, they might have experienced a less amusing journey. They would certainly have learnt a little more about the Breton. They would have come away with a broader idea of what the Breton language stands for in the life of Armorica, a juster conception of the place of the Church in that life, and a higher appreciation of the quality of mysticism and poetry which the old Celtic province infuses into the character of France.

However, it is idle to quarrel with a book because it does not do something it was never meant to do. Mr. Davies set out with the frank intention of being amusing, and amusing he unquestionably is. He gives us the low comedy of travel. His account of his adventures has a picaresque flavour which is highly diverting. Like Gil Blas, he never came to an auberge in a lost and forgotten hamlet, or a hotel on a dusty main road, where he did not take with him the spirit of adventure and the determination to enjoy it which alone will secure adventure. A vegetarian in France is bizarre, and both Mr. Davies and his travelling companion were vegetarians. In a country where meat in various guises is the staple of life, a vegetarian is the despair of the cook and a nine days' wonder to his fellow-diners. Here was one element of farcical adventure which had surprising consequences at the tables d'hôte of all the Lions d'Or and Hôtels d'Angleterre they encountered, no less than in the kitchens of the rural inns and the shops of the pastrycooks which they raided whenever they could find them. The pedestrian knapsack, with its necessary economy of costume, was another.

But the principal tributary to the stream of harmless and boyish pleasantry which meanders through the book was the high spirits of the author, who would be jocund under all circumstances. He found laughter in the most unpromising places. Mr. Davies is a rapid observer, with a knack of visualising his impressions in a lively way. He observed with humour the paramount position of the woman in the economy of Brittany. He observed the figures and the faces of the Bretonnes with an accuracy which might reasonably have been tinctured with a little more gallantry. He observed (with some unnecessary acridity, I think) the position of the clergy. He observed the narrowness of the peasants' outlook upon the familiar phenomena of civilisation, but his glance was not intimate enough to perceive that there is another outlook of theirs over a prospect of which civilisation takes little account. He observed with sympathy and describes with infinite drollery the humours of the inn and the market-place and the street of the little town.

He enjoyed it all with such zest that his pleasure is

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

infectious. The white coif, the floating riband, the embroidered raiment of Yves and Ian and Paol (Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these), and the sabots, whose clatter in the sleepy morning he took for the marching of a regiment, all live gaily in his pages. The sabot is a perennial joy to the Englishman of the South, though I am told in the North, where they wear clogs, it is not considered to be in the least poetical. I, at any rate, never hear a blue-bloused youngster from the quays of Roscoff clacking his way through an English street with his strings of onions without thinking of the refrain:—

Toc, toc, toc, et don dondaine!
Ils étaient si blancs, si beaux,
Les petits sabots de frêne,
Les jolis petits sabots!

Some of Mr. Davies's humour is dragged in by the heels, and "Mr. Drusenheim" (who figures largely in the later chapters) has no more to do with Brittany than Julius Cæsar with the dock strike. But I forgive Mr. Davies all his discursions for the sake of one or two vivid chapters of real impressionism, such as the ineffably funny billiard match at Rostrenen. For the same reason let him be pardoned his irritating habit of using "individual" as a noun and repeating the offence four or five times on one page.

The book is adorned by some photographs taken by Mr. Davies himself. They are good enough in their way, but his selection of a street in Morlaix is rather unhappy: that marvellous old town has far finer things to show. And it was a pity to depict Brest in a rather tame view of the Rue de Siam. In the old quarter of Recouvrance, or in the neighbourhood of the Church of St. Pierre, there are many more interesting and more characteristic things. R. A. J. WALLING

At St. Stephen's Shrine

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE.

WE are watching very closely the quarrel between the Government and the Labour men. Keir Hardie almost humbly asked the Government to send money to the East End to enable the strikers' wives and children, who were starving, to get bread, but Asquith was cold and treated the Labour Party roughly, even as Joseph did his brethren when they came to Egypt for corn.

Elibank, in spite of his cherubic smile, declares he won't give way. Hanley never was a Labour seat. Although the late Liberal member, at the request of his Union, joined the Labour Party, that did not make it one, and I am bound to say from his point of view I think he has right on his side.

The egregious MacCallum Scott brought in a Bill under the ten-minute rule to give Home Rule to England, Scotland and Wales as well as Ireland. A division was forced on the first reading, and after obtaining a majority of 52 it will not be seen or heard of any more. He might just as well have added to his list the Scilly Isles. You cannot make laws at this rate. MacCallum Scott is typical of the present Radical—he is in a hurry to legislate; no matter how slipshod or inaccurate a Bill may be, make it a law so that we can place it to our credit—is their attitude.

The debate that clause 1 "stand part" of the Home Rule Bill was continued and the Unionists demanded to know what the Foreign Secretary and Winston meant, on the second reading, when they said that if Ulster really would not come in, an alternative would be found. What was it? Now was the time for its disclosure. Carson taunted the Government with the curious absence of the two Ministers, and Austen Chamberlain pressed the matter home. The Prime Minister replied with the closure, whilst the Unionists protested loudly. Ronald M'Neill, after the division, stood up and stormed against the intolerable insolence of the Prime Minister in acting as he had done. He refused to be comforted or to sit down. He was joined by Captain Craig, and both stood up in spite of the fact that the mild Mr. Whitley was also on his feet. This is a parliamentary offence of the deepest dye. Ronald M'Neill tried to move the adjournment and the row went on for quite five minutes.

Finally Bonar Law turned round and persuaded both his gigantic henchmen to resume their seats. James Craig distinctly intimated that it was only in deference to his leader he did so, and I fear that this is only the commencement of the storm. If the Radicals are going to use the gag when arguments fail, it will require all the patience and ingenuity of the Chairman of Committees to keep order.

On Thursday the Labour men gave way a bit. They still adhered to their determination to fight both seats, but there is not a word about withdrawing all their men during the contests; some may be away, of course, but that is a very different thing from their previous determination, and the general impression is that Elibank has once more triumphed.

The Chief Secretary caused a blaze of anger to spring up among the Unionists when he dared to say that "similar occurrences" to that of cutting the ears out of horses' skulls were to be found in England. He was challenged to prove his words and was glad to hide behind the Speaker's ruling that notice should be given of questions like that. Birrell is curiously contemptible at times.

In the evening we had a debate on the Army. Seely, chastened after his "victory" at the polls, had to defend his new position as Minister for War. I freely confess I do not, and I fear never shall, understand the question of the Army. When I was a small boy an old college friend of my father used to come to supper occasionally when he acted as locum tenens for our vicar. He was a most eloquent man, but in those days "Hell fire" was fashionable, and he used to terrify us and probably other members of the village congregation by describing the horrors of eternal damnation if we were wicked; and yet in the evening, to our surprise and relief, he used to eat roast goose and apple sauce with relish. How could he do it, we thought! So it seems to me with the Army. Amery, George Wyndham, "Poley-Carey" and Mark Sykes, all declared the Army was in a rotten state; that most of the money now spent on it was wasted; that there was not a branch of it fit to take the field; and that we were short of guns, horses, men, officers—everything.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

These men ought to know, if anyone does—and yet they can eat their dinners in the intervals between the debates on the Army. If what they say is true, those responsible at the Horse Guards ought to be shot—and the men who raise the question ought to raise the country against the Government—any Government—who permitted such a state of things for an instant.

Seely flatly denied it all. Everything was right: we had a perfect expeditionary force, ready to do anything and go anywhere at a moment's notice. I tried to speak and inquire whether the fact is that our Army has dwindled to an expeditionary force, but could not catch the Chairman's eye.

Seely got out of giving details by pleading that secrecy was necessary, and went back on his own views expressed some years ago in favour of compulsory military service. He was not War Minister then, and now he says it is out of the range of practical politics until after the next war—an unheard-of proposition; the next great war may be our last, say the pessimists. I really wish I knew where the truth lies; it is not a party question, and both sides cannot be right.

The Government majority went down to 49.

Balbus evidently feared it was not all O.K. with the Army.

After 11, on the adjournment, Devlin, as a counter-blast to the Hibernians' outrageous attack on school children, alleged that Mr. Clark was responsible for assaults upon Catholic workmen in his shipyard at Belfast, and quoted an interview with the Tory London Evening News in support of his statement.

On Friday T. W. Russell was under the harrow on account of the outbreak of that terrible scourge known as the foot and mouth disease. Although the outbreak had been traced to a place near Dublin, the Irish Agricultural Board knew nothing of it until their attention was called to it from England, and Willie Peel roundly charged the Vice-President with apathy and negligence. William O'Brien complained on the other hand, that the Vice-President had lost his head in bringing the whole cattle trade of the country to a standstill by stopping all exports. Russell replied vigorously. They had not had the disease in Ireland for 30 years, and, in spite of rigorous inspection, it was clear the disease had not manifested itself in the cattle until after they landed in England; he courted inquiry.

At five o'clock Charles Craig got up to give an absolute denial to Devlin's statement about Mr. Clark of Belfast, and that gentleman had to get up and admit he was wrong—he tried to ride away by saying if Mr. Clark was not responsible, the Ulster members were.

F. E. Smith wound up the incident by charging the pocket Demosthenes with deliberately making statements with no evidence to support them, and that if he had been a gentleman he would have done the right thing—apologised. Was this atmosphere, which had been created by the mere introduction of the Government's Home Rule Bill, the atmosphere to which the Government looked for the promise of that solution which was "to heal the wrongs and obliterate the injustice of centuries"? I think the Government Front Bench were glad there was no time to reply, for Big Ben boomed out the half-hour and members trooped out into the soft summer air—a relief from the highly-charged and vitiated air of the Chamber.

At question time on Monday the Premier, in answer to a series of questions, admitted that he was in favour of Lloyd George's proposed fresh attacks on land. He thought the Chancellor's statement "that the land is shackled in the chains of feudalism" was "a picturesque but not inaccurate statement of the case"; but he denied, in answer to a question from the Labour benches, that the Government was pledged to the policy of a single tax. The Labour men consider that they have won the first trick in controversy that their whips should move the writ for Hanley. It is purely a matter of etiquette and usage. The Liberals say it is a Liberal seat, but they shirked a wrangle on the subject on the floor of the House, to be followed possibly by a motion and a division, when all the Labour men would vote against the Government; so they sat silent and allowed Mr. Roberts to move the writ.

After this the second reading of the Franchise Bill came on. Harcourt, with oily smoothness and airy jests, made light of the Opposition. It was a "cooing" Opposition; even the Tories admitted that Registration wanted reforming and the Government took the opportunity to fulfil a pledge they had given for years, namely, to abolish plural voting. Pretyman replied. He had got up his case with his customary industry. He agreed that registration might be simplified, and he was in favour of simplification, but he denied that this Bill made things easier—on the contrary, it introduced fresh anomalies. It would be very costly, and it was bringing

HORLICK'S
MALTED MILK
MALTED BARLEY, WHEAT and MILK in Powder Form
NOURISHING, INVIGORATING, SUSTAINING.
MORE BENEFICIAL THAN
TEA, COFFEE, COCOA, OR CHOCOLATE.
Instantly available whenever needed by stirring briskly in hot or cold water.
NO COOKING REQUIRED.
Especially useful for Travellers by Sea or Land.
An excellent Pick-me-up in the morning.
A Refreshing Beverage at mid-day. Delicious after the Theatre.
Corrects Insomnia taken hot just before retiring.
SERVED IN HOTELS, RESTAURANTS AND CAFES, and may be obtained of all Chemists and Stores in Sterilised Glass Bottles, at 1s. 6d., 2s. 6d., and 11s.
Trial size free by post on application to—
HORLICK'S MALTED MILK CO., SLOUGH, BUCKS, ENGLAND.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

in a Reform Bill on a side wind. Redistribution was promised, but who could rely on the promise of a Government which had put a preamble to reform the House of Lords into the Parliament Bill and showed no signs of carrying it out? It was a Bill to jerrymander the electoral machine in the interests of one party. "I don't think any of God's creatures were ever more liberally endowed with the instincts of self-preservation than the present Government," said Pretyman, with bitter emphasis.

Harcourt had dealt briefly and contemptuously with the question of the women's vote, and Arthur Markham considered the Bill a further insult and humiliation to women. Stanley Wilson bluntly called the Prime Minister a coward for not tackling the women's question, and after some speeches by experts the debate was adjourned.

It is alleged—I really do not know with what truth—that it was the Little Englanders who stopped us all having a whole holiday on Tuesday to see the Fleet at Spithead. Like dogs in the manger, they did not want to see it themselves, so refused to allow the House to adjourn; 461 members, I am told, accepted the invitation, and 101 attended the House. About one-third of these were Unionists. People talk about the Irish being the champion obstructors, but give me the Tories if they are in the mood for it. They do it with an earnest skill that defies the criticism of the Chair or their opponents. The Government had produced a ponderous Bill to acquire three public sites, of which you have heard before. To-day (Tuesday) it reappeared in Committee and was debated, clause by clause, by "Peckham," Willie Peel, Alec Thynne, Bull, "Jix" (more properly known as Joynson-Hicks), Tullibardine, and half-a-dozen others, until 6 o'clock, when the Whips "came to an arrangement," which meant rising at 7.30.

This killed all sport, so I went home just as they commenced the Inebriates or the Feeble-minded Bill, I really do not know which. With great strength of mind I refrain from the obvious comment.

Notes and News

Mr. Murray is publishing immediately the work on railway nationalisation in working, by Mr. Edwin A. Pratt, entitled, "The State Railway Muddle in Australia"; also a new novel by Mr. H. de Vere Stacpoole, "The Street of the Flute Player," and Captain Amundsen's book, "The Conquest of the South Pole," which has an introduction by Dr. Nansen.

Messrs. John Long will shortly publish a new novel entitled "The Modern Market Place," by "Coronet" (the pseudonym of a well-known author). That the author is behind the scenes of modern political life is indicated by the fact that the work, although written before the present Labour unrest, foreshadows it, and suggests a scheme for curbing Trade Unionism.

In consequence of the death of Miss Rosa Morison, who had held the office of Lady Superintendent to Women Students since 1883, the University College Committee has decided to appoint a Tutor to Women Students. Miss Winifred Smith, B.Sc., formerly 1851 Scholar, and a former student of the College, has been appointed to this office, upon the duties of which she will enter as from September next.

Among the most interesting productions of the coming autumn season will be the volume of reminiscences of the late Henry Labouchere, now in course of compilation by Mr. Charles Edward Jerningham ("Marmaduke" of Truth), which is to be published by Messrs. G. Bell and Sons. Mr. Jerningham's long acquaintance with Labouchere, extending over nearly forty years, has qualified him exceptionally to write this book.

Messrs. Stanley Paul and Co. announce a volume entitled "Intimate Memoirs of Napoleon III," translated from the French of Baron d'Ambes, by A. R. Allinson. This book is the private diary of a life-long and intimate friend of Louis Napoleon, and contains much that has hitherto been unpublished in English. They also will publish shortly "Cameos of Indian Crime," by Mr. H. J. Hervey, and a new novel by Miss Everett-Green.

Maunsel and Co., Ltd., of Dublin, and Oakley House, London, will publish immediately "Aspects of the Irish Question," by Sydney Brooks, the well-known writer on Irish affairs. After dealing with the past and present problems of the country the author treats of the new elements—The Farmer and the Future—The Irish Gentry—The Church and the Religious Issue—and concludes with a critical and exhaustive consideration of the Home Rule Bill.

The Catholic Record Society held its Eighth Annual Meeting on Tuesday last, at Archbishop's House, Westminster, and the chair was taken by his Grace the Duke of Norfolk, E.M., K.G., who moved, as President of the Society, the adoption of the report—a highly interesting one, containing much information regarding the ground covered by the Society. Those present included the Very Rev. Canon Wyndham, the Very Rev. Prior Higgins, the Marquis de Ruvigny, the Hon. Alex. Wilmot, Mr. R. T. Lomax, Mr. L. Lindsay, Mr. G. Engelbach, and Miss M. M. Calthorp. The Chairman, in his speech, emphasised the useful work done by the Society.

At Colston's Girls' School, Bristol, on Saturday last, the Ryland Library was formally opened by the Countess of Suffolk in the presence of the Lord Bishop of Bristol and the Governors of the School. The Library was bequeathed to the School in 1909 by the late C. J. Ryland, Esq., and it is now fittingly housed in a fine room occupying the whole of the top floor of the new wing of the School. Mr. Ryland was a real book-lover of wide interests, who confined his reading to no one special branch of learning, and his library is therefore of exceptional value. In the course of his speech the Bishop of Bristol, after remarking on the value to the girls of this great possession, drew attention to the important place taken in modern literature by the novel, and expressed the hope that the girls of the School would, like Mr. Ryland, choose the books which were both wholesome and interesting.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Royal Horticultural Society's Summer Flower Show at Holland House, 1912

WAS it the pleasant memory of the International Horticultural Exhibition at Chelsea; was it the extreme congestion of the tents; or was it the weather which caused us to feel dissatisfaction at the Summer Flower Show at Holland House? Be the cause of our disappointment what it may, we feel constrained to raise yet one more protest against the utter folly and futility of cramming tents so full of flowers that the infinitesimal spaces left as passage ways afford none save the favoured few an opportunity of seeing and appreciating the floral beauties displayed. For our own part so wearied did we become by our repeated yet ineffectual attempts to catch a glimpse of the exhibits that at length we abandoned the quest in despair, bewailing the obsolete methods of arrangement employed, so vividly contrasted with those which rendered Chelsea such a haven of delight. After wandering for some time about the private grounds dejectedly, we found solace at last in a secluded spot of those spacious regions, where to our surprise and delight we suddenly came upon a moraine garden replete with the choicest of alpines, thoroughly at home and in thriving health.

With regard to the Show itself, the roses were exceptionally beautiful, chiefly conspicuous amongst them being the Lyon Rose, Juliet, and Rayon d'Or. The only novelty of any merit which we were able to discover was the Hybrid Tea Mrs. Charles S. Hunting; with the new Wichuriana Ethel we were little impressed. Perennials, as always at this Show, were almost overpowering in their magnificence. That queen of lady gardeners, Miss Wilmott, exhibited a superb new lily from China, named Lilium Warleyeuse. A special word of praise is due to the terrace garden of Messrs. Wallace, being, as it was, a model of careful design and execution. To every lover of alpines we commend most heartily the dainty little porcelain blue Campanula Miss Wilmott. It is of the pusilla section, quite dwarf, and flowers with almost incredible profusion.

Hokku

THE word "epigram" is no right word (and there's no right word at all) for "Hokku," the seventeen-syllable poem of Japan, just as overcoat is not the word for our haori. "That is good," I exclaimed in spite of myself, when I found this comparison to begin my article. We know that haori is more, or less, according to your attitude, than the overcoat of Western garb which rises and falls with practical service; when I say more, I mean that our Japanese haori is, unlike the Western overcoat, a piece of art, and besides, a symbol of rite, as its usefulness appears often when it means practically nothing. If I rightly understand the word "epigram," it is or at least looks to have one object, like that overcoat of practical use, to express something, a Cathay of thought or not, before itself; its beauty, if it has any, is like that of a netsuke or okimono carved in ivory or wood, decorative at the best. But what our Hokku aims at is, like the haori of silk or crêpe, a usefulness of uselessness, not what it expresses, but how it expresses itself spiritually; its real value is not in its physical directness, but in its psychological indirectness. To use a simile, it is like a dew upon lotus leaves of green or under maple leaves of red, which, although it is nothing but a trifling drop of water, shines, glitters and sparkles now pearl-white, then amethyst-blue, again ruby-red, according to the time of day and situation; better still to say, this Hokku is like a spider-thread laden with the white summer dews, swaying among the branches of a tree like an often invisible ghost in air, on the perfect balance; that sway, indeed, not the thread itself, is the beauty of our seventeen-syllable poem.

I cannot forget Mrs. N. S., who came to see me at the poppy-covered mountain-side of California one morning, now almost seventeen years ago; what I cannot forget chiefly about that morning is her story that she made a roundabout way in entering into my garden, as the little proper path had been blocked by a spider-net thick with diamonds. I exclaimed then as I do often to-day: "Such a dear sweet soul (that could not dare break that silvery thread) would be the very soul who will appreciate our Hokku poem." What do you say, if there is one, suppose, who brings down the spider-net and attempts to hang it up in another place? Is it not exactly the case with a translator of Japanese poem, Hokku or uta, whatever it be? To use another expression, what would you say if somebody ventured to imitate with someone's fountain pen the Japanese picture drawn with the bamboo brush and incensed Indian ink? Is it not again the exact case with the translator like Mr. William N. Porter, in "A Year of Japanese Epigrams"?

We confess that we have shown, to speak rather bluntly, very little satisfaction even with the translations of Professor Chamberlain and the late Mr. Aston; when I say that I was perfectly amazed at Mr. Porter's audacity in his sense of curiosity, I hope that my words will never be taken as sarcasm. With due respect, I dare say that nearly all things of that book leave something to be desired for our Japanese mind, or, to say more true, have something too much that we do not find in the original. As a result they only weaken, confuse and trouble the real atmosphere; while perhaps it means certainly that the English mind is differently rooted from the Japanese mind, even in the matter of poetry, which is said to have no East or West. When I appear to expose unkindly Mr. Porter's defects (excuse my careless use of word) to the light, that is from my anxiety to make this Japanese poetry properly understood. To take a poem or two from his book at random:—

Uzumibi ya
Kabe ni wa kyaku (not kaku) no
Kage-boshi. Basho

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Mr. Porter translates it as follows:—

Alas! my fire is out,
And there's a shadow on the wall—
A visitor, no doubt.

I should like to know who would ever think of the above as poetry, even poor poetry, in his reading of it in one breath; what does "no doubt" (which the original hasn't) mean except that it rhymes with the first line; and the rhyme cheapens the poetry—at least, to the Japanese mind—from the reason of its English conventionality? The first line of the original is not "my fire is out"; on the contrary, it means that the fire, of course the charcoal fire, is buried under the ashes. The poem is a poem of winter night which becomes late, and when a charcoal fire, already small, grows still dearer as it is more cold without, perhaps windy; now the talk of the guest or visitor (lo! his sad lone shadow on the wall) and the master poet stops, then it starts again, like a little stream hidden under the grasses; and the desolation of the advanced night intensifies the sadness of the house, doubtless Basho An, whose small body is wrapped by a few large leaves of Basho's beloved banana tree in the garden. You must know, before you attempt to understand it, a few points of the poet's characteristics—above all, the way of his living and the general aspect of his house—I mean Basho An—the poetical poverty of which will be seen from the fact that he made a big hole in the wall to place a tiny Buddha statue, as he had no place to enshrine it. Not only this Basho's Hokkus, but nearly all the seventeen-syllable poems that were produced in the early age you will find difficult to understand when separated from the circumstances and background from which they were born, to use a simile, like a dew born out of the deepest heart of dawn.

It is not my purpose here to criticise and examine Mr. Porter's translation to satisfy my fastidious heart of minuteness-loving; let it suffice to say that the Hokku is not a poetry to be rightly appreciated by people in the West who lie by the comfortable fire in winter, or under an electric fan in summer, because it was originally written beside a paper shoji door or upon the straw mats. We have a saying, "Better to leave the renge flowers in their old wild plain"; it suggests quite many things, but what it impresses on me most is that you should admire things, flowers or pictures or what not, in their own proper place. To translate Hokku or any other Japanese poem into English rarely does justice to the original; it is a thankless task at the best. I myself was a Hokku student since I was fifteen or sixteen years old; during many years of my Western life, now amid the California forest, then by the skyscrapers of New York, again in the London 'bus, I often tried to translate the Hokkus of our old masters, but I gave up my hope when I had written the following in English:—

My love's lengthened hair
Swings o'er me from Heaven's gate:
Lo, Evening's shadow!

It was in London—to say more particularly, Hyde Park—that I wrote the above Hokku in English, where I walked slowly, my mind being filled with the thought of the long hair of Rossetti's woman, as I, perhaps, had visited Tate's Gallery that afternoon; pray, believe me when I say the dusk that descended from the sky swung like that lengthened hair. I exclaimed then: "What use to try the impossibility in translation, when I have a moment to feel a Hokku feeling and write about it in English?" Although I had only a few such moments in the past, my decision not to translate Hokku into English is unchanged. Let me wait patiently for a moment to come when I become a Hokku poet in my beloved English.

YONE NOGUCHI.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

THE TRIPLE ENTENTE.

AS in the case of the Potsdam interview the recent conversations at Port Baltic give rise to a wealth of speculation. In one breath, as it were, an expectant world was informed that the speedy cessation of Turco-Italian hostilities might be looked for as the immediate result of the Imperial meeting; that an arrangement satisfactory to Germany on the question of Russian naval policy would be concluded; and, above all, that the latter Power would be torn from the embrace of France and England. A host of Machiavellian designs were attributed to Germany, while of Russia we were asked to believe something in the nature of calm and calculated perfidy as an alternative to the stupidity of the dupe.

Although to the calm reasoner no justification existed for such rash prophecy, a certain section of the German Press undoubtedly lent colour to the theory that political events of high moment might be expected to result from the meeting of the two Emperors. In strange contrast to the elation expressed in the Berlin newspapers and elsewhere it was noteworthy that the inspired organs of public opinion in Russia remained calmly indifferent, while official utterances from both countries declared in no uncertain language that the occasion was to bear no significance that would be likely to disturb the tranquillity of Europe. Now that the Standardt and the Hohenzollern have parted company we are able to review placidly the net result of the exchange of ideas which took place. And here it is of interest to recall that in spite of the pessimists, who, as on the more recent occasion, prophesied a complete diplomatic victory for Germany, one of the concrete results of the Potsdam interview was Germany's inferential recognition, for the first time, of the special position held by Great Britain in Southern Persia.

On the Baltic, history has merely repeated itself. For, once more, the German people, through their august master, have made an important concession to the political demands of the day. Nothing could have been more satisfactory to the international requirements than the clause in the official communiqué, sanctioned by both Monarchs, which stated that "there could be no question of new agreements because there was no particular occasion for them, or of producing alterations of any kind in the grouping of the European Powers, the value of which for the maintenance of equilibrium and of peace has already been proved." Thus at one stroke of the pen we find established the political sanity of Germany and the political fidelity of Russia in relation to a compact—the Triple Entente—which has long been the bugbear of England's enemies.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

It has become increasingly evident of late that a school of opinion in this country, long dormant, is again showing signs of an awakened articulation. When, in the early years of his reign, King Edward paid a series of momentous visits to the heads of certain European States, the fruit of which to-day is found in the existence of the Triple Entente, there were not wanting critics who deplored anything in the nature of close relations either with our nearest neighbour, France, or our traditional foe, Russia; but owing to the unquestionable effectiveness, as a counterpoise to the militant Triple Alliance, of the compact concluded between our erstwhile enemies and ourselves, years passed during which few dared challenge the fundamental soundness of Great Britain's foreign policy. Latterly, however, as I have implied, the old-style pessimists have once more raised their voices with the object of proving that by joining hands with France and Russia, and thereby, so they would infer, trailing the coat before Germany, we have embarked upon a suicidal course.

Doubtless such forebodings would never have been uttered had we not seen the coincident happening of the Teutonic assertion and the development of the Dreadnought era. But even allowing, on these grounds, the fullest justification for the fears expressed, we find a singular lacking in the realisation of actualities in the manner of their expression. For example, we are told that our entente with France is an altogether unholy affair by reason of the fact [sic] of her national degeneration. Whatever may be the truth in regard to other members of the Latin family, could anything be more grotesque than such an assertion applied to modern France? Apart from indications which of recent years have called forth world-wide comment, we need no stronger argument in favour of the splendid vitality which characterises the Republic than that her next-door neighbour, one of the greatest nations the world has seen, although hungering for expansion, deems it expedient to respect the amenities of frontiers.

As a matter of fact the individual and communalistic activities of France to-day strike a note in human effort to which only the more glorious pages of history can sound a reminiscent echo. Similar inaccuracy governs the contention that by cultivating friendly relations with Russia we have contracted a ruinous mesalliance, the supposition being that what we are pleased to term the corruption of a governmental bureaucracy passing through the inevitable stages of a great national transition is so deep-seated as to affect the social life of the community. Here, again, the critics betray a lamentable want of knowledge. Nowhere in this world is to be found so God-fearing, industrious, and altogether lovable a people as in Russia, and it is statesmanship of the highest order that, estimating rightly the potentialities of such a race, enters into close relations with its Government. If the critics whose prescience shows them the nightmare of Canadian absorption would but turn their attention to the process of revitalisation which is taking place among the teeming millions of Asia, they would realise that the interests of the British Empire as a whole can best be served by the observance of a continuity of the policy which found its first and most distinguished exponent in King Edward.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

BUSINESS remains dull. The investor is placing out his dividends, but the speculator declines to gamble, for he is tired; he has lost his money in oil, in tin, in Marconis. When he has recovered his financial equilibrium he will gamble again, for he cannot stop himself. Punting is a disease like drinking, and possibly subject to the same laws of ebb and flow.

Schroeders offered a very sound and cheap investment in the Valparaiso Waterboard Bonds, guaranteed by the Chilian Government. The lists closed almost as soon as they were opened.

The Orchestrelle issue of Preference shares was also a sound industrial venture. The Ceara Tramway, Light and Power Bond was not particularly cheap. It is clear that to-day the investor wants high interest on his money. Nothing goes unless it offers over 5 per cent. Most of the ventures that have been put before the public do not attract. The fashion appears to be turning towards Russia. The Sissert Company is a fair copper speculation on the same lines as Kyshtim. The Russian General Oil Corporation appears to have been formed as a relief fund for Messrs. G. M. Lianosoff et Fils of Baku. I hear that this firm managed to interest various banking groups in St. Petersburg, and they floated the Russian General with the idea of unloading their holdings.

"EVERY DROP LUBRICATES."
"Champion" Motor Oil
is the best for all types of Cars.
If not already using "Champion" send for trial tin to
S. BOWLEY & SON,
Wellington Works,
BATTERSEA, LONDON, S.W.
Established 200 years.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

I am afraid that Baku as an oilfield has seen its best days, and I strongly warn my readers against buying the shares at their present premium. Another big Russian company with a capital of 3½ millions is coming out, and will purchase the Stachyeff properties in the Ural Caspian district. This company has also been buying Ural Caspian shares on the London market.

The Canadian and General Trust is circularising with the idea of placing £200,000 of shares in the British and General Debenture Trust. They offer to purchase option certificates in this trust at 2s. 6d. each for cash. Some of the methods of these Canadian share-pushers are certainly peculiar.

I wrote a short criticism on the Shamva Mine in my new paper, The Stockbroker. It was replied to by Mr. G. R. Bonnard, of the Amalgamated Properties of Rhodesia, and the financial papers have taken the matter up. It is of great importance to those who purchased Shamvas at £3½ to £4 each, for if my criticism is correct the shares are not worth 10s. Mr. Bonnard takes the working costs at between 8s. and 9s. I am not aware that any mine works at these costs except the great Alaska properties. The Wanderer professes that it does, but as the Wanderer has reconstructed once, and has only just succeeded in paying off its debit balance, its working costs are not of great importance. Working costs, if you put large quantities of unpayable ore through the mill, can be reduced to a ridiculously low figure. The question is, can you pay dividends by reducing working costs in this way? Shamva is hardly likely to get down below 19s. or 20s., in spite of its adit levels. Penhalonga works with adit levels, and its working costs are nearly 21s. Mr. Bonnard adds £250,000 to the assumed profit per year on the ground that the trial milling result is 20 per cent. better than the assay result. This only proves how unreliable both assays and trial millings are, and in spite of Mr. Bonnard's optimism I am compelled to assume that his argument goes to prove my point, namely, that all the calculations with regard to Shamva are mere guesswork. If the assays are wrong in one way they may be wrong in another.

MONEY AND CONSOLS.—Although money is cheap and may be cheaper, Consols droop. The story goes that we shall be at war with Germany in three months; hence the slump. I need hardly contradict such a silly rumour, but it has been put about the City very industriously. I think the price of both Consols and Irish land stock much too low, and I advise wealthy people to buy and lock up.

FOREIGNERS.—China is obdurate, and the Chinaman declines to bind himself to borrow sixty millions. In the meantime he is being financed by the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank, who are getting rather sick of the process, and want the loan issued in order to replace rather unmarketable treasury bills with solid bonds. The Sino Belge, however, are quite willing to go on taking the treasury bills, and the competition between the two groups amuses John Chinaman—and benefits him. Tintos have been flat on the "bear" attack upon Copper, which appears to have been cleverly arranged and in a sense successful. We shall see, however, how far it has succeeded when the "bears" begin to buy back the stock they have sold.

HOME RAILS.—Home Rails remain dull. Why, I cannot conceive, except that it is to the interest of nobody to put them up. Those who want to buy them would like to see a fall, and those who stand in the House all day and sell Home Railways have already sold more than they possess, therefore they are not really sellers but buyers. All the leading lines give us 5 per cent. on our money, and investors should certainly purchase. They are buying gilt-edged stocks fat with dividend. What does it matter if the dividend be reduced ½ per cent.; that is neither here nor there. The price is so low that the reduction is of no moment. It only means about ¼ per cent. on the whole year.

YANKEES.—It appears that the tone in Wall Street is changing, and the bankers who last week were rather inclined to be optimistic are to-day saying that the "bulls" will have to be shaken out. Evidently they are making preparations for an autumn boom, and want to get cheap stock. The Copper people in New York laugh at the way London sells copper. The price here is much lower than in New York. This is, of course, due to the fact that we deal here in standard copper, whereas in the United States the whole market is in electrolytic, which is now quoted 17½ cents. I think that the copper position is remarkably strong. All the statistics are in favour of a big rise. I therefore expect a considerable reaction. Anaconda should certainly rise in spite of the attacks, for this mine now produces at 9½ cents a pound.

RUBBER.—The report of the great Lampard Trust is now issued, and shows that the company was quite unable to get rid of its large stock of paper. As it has various other schemes on hand, all of which will require large sums of money to be spent on them, and as it has big amounts to pay in calls on companies already floated but whose shares it had to take, it looks to me as though it would have to call up its unpaid capital. Mr. Lampard has taken on too much. The markets have been against him, and unless a boom in rubber comes along, the shareholders will find their dividends dwindle. The Bukit Rajah report is excellent, and the shares are cheap; they yield 13 per cent. Any good rubber company is worth buying into when the yield is 12 per cent. or over. What I object to is a company whose shares only yield 5 or 7½. This is not enough for a plantation, where the risk is very great. The reduction in the Linggi dividend was expected. The estate is a good one, but as the price may fall lower, it is not worth while buying to-day.

OILS.—Urals have been moved up and down in a very lively fashion. It is said that the big Russian companies formed or going to be formed have been buying. There is tremendous excitement in the Ural district, and Nobels have sent down vast quantities of machinery and pipelines, iron tanks, and all the appurtenances of an enormous oil field, so they are quite sure that the field will be a big one. The present price of oil plots on the Ural Caspian is £1,000 a plot, spot cash in Baku. But they can be bought a little cheaper in London. Tweedy has big schemes on hand for his Maikop Pipeline, and most of the oil promoters are up to their neck in Taman, which they say will be a big oilfield. If there is going to be an autumn boom in anything it will be in oil—probably Russian oil. The price is 35 copecks in Baku, but this is a fancy price, and not likely to hold.

KAFFIRS AND RHODESIANS.—The market is dead, and nothing is likely to be done until the autumn. If City Deeps fall any lower they should be bought, for the talk of faulty titles is mere nonsense. The mine is a good one, but not particularly well managed.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The Marconi meeting went off very well, but the shares did not respond. There is still a big "bull" account. It seems now quite certain that the British India issue of capital was to acquire the holdings of the late Mr. Keswick in the Indo-China. I advised a purchase of Indo-China shares some time ago; they will go to par. Waring debentures should be purchased, as the scheme now in hand will go through.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

THE SISSERT COMPANY.

THE Sissert Company has been well known in Russia for many years under the title of the Sussertski District Mining Company. It has now been purchased by an English Company, the chairman of which is Sir James Dale, the well-known ironmaster. The Sissert estates occupy an area of over 340,000 acres, and are covered with forests, from whence is obtained some of the best timber in the Urals. There are also copper, gold, and iron mines, platinum and other mineral sources. The copper mines have been worked since 1727, and from that date until 1870 produced about 28,500 tons. The new company proposes to work the old dumps and slags, and from these a very large profit is expected. The copper dumps alone appear to have £243,300 profit in sight, and the old slags are estimated to contain enough copper to give £144,000 profit. In 1906 a new copper mine was opened up, which until July, 1910, produced 2,232 tons of copper. This mine has been carefully examined on many occasions by the well-known engineer Dr. Simon, who estimates that the proved and probable ore in the mine should yield a net profit of £758,000. There are about 40 iron mines in the Sissert estate, and large iron works, which it is intended to remodel. They are expected to yield a profit of at least £15,000 for the current year. The estimated profits for 1912 should amount to £75,000, as the enterprise is now making about £6,000 a month. The company will have a total cash working capital of £215,000, and it is proposed to improve the methods of production and spend large sums upon development. By this means the profits will be increased in 1913 to £102,000, and in 1914 to £260,000. This should enable the board to pay a dividend for 1912 of at least 10 per cent., and in succeeding years largely increase the distribution. In considering the prospects of Russian copper properties it should not be forgotten that the Russian Government puts an import duty on copper of £33 per ton; therefore the present price at which the Sissert Company is selling its "best selected" copper is £98 per ton. There are large deposits of iron pyrites which are in ready demand. These deposits amount to approximately 2,000,000 tons, and will ultimately realise a profit of £650,000. Gold was discovered at Sissert in 1840, and has been worked on a royalty system by small contractors, who have already produced about 504,000 ounces. There are evidently immense possibilities in the future of this company.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

THE CITY LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.

At the Fourteenth Annual Meeting of the above Company the Chairman announced that the accumulated funds and reserves, together with the paid-up capital, amounted to £625,301 11s. 6d., as compared with £580,598 2s. at the close of 1910, an achievement, considering the labour unrest throughout the country, of which any company in similar circumstances may be justly proud. For the disturbance of the labour market not only causes people to hesitate in taking out policies, but places many already assured in such an embarrassing financial position that they are often unable to continue their policies, and are therefore induced to apply for surrender values. This notwithstanding, the new assurances during the past year exceeded in face value £1,000,000, which amount included 4,088 proposals for "Ideal" policies assuring £256,695 0s. 2d., with annual premiums thereon of £11,768 19s., as against 3,472 proposals with a premium income of £10,086 for the previous year, which tends to show that these policies continue to grow in public favour. The recently founded industrial branch, the Chairman informed the meeting, is making fair progress, and its success up to date is encouraging. As was to be expected, this department has suffered in consequence of the labour troubles more acutely than has the ordinary branch. With the view of minimising, as far as possible, the loss sustained by policy-holders, in consequence of their policies lapsing through non-payment of premiums, the directors have favourably considered every application made for reinstatement in respect of policies lapsed in consequence of strikes, lock-outs, etc., crediting the premiums paid, and granting full immediate benefit in respect of all policies that were in full benefit prior to lapsing. This concession has, no doubt, been greatly appreciated by those concerned. Some idea of the usefulness of this branch is conveyed by the number of claims, and the amount paid in respect of them during the year 1911. These claims numbered 928, representing the sum of £6,695 15s. 3d., figures which bear eloquent testimony to the assistance rendered to members in the hour of need. During the period under review 332 advances were made to members, representing the sum of £104,354, and making a grand total advanced since the formation of the company of £1,491,004. Some two years ago the directors discontinued the issue of what were known as Endowment House Purchase Certificates, which up to that time constituted the major part of the Company's business. In response to urgent requests from the staff and others, however, the directors have prepared a new prospectus, combining House Purchase with Life Assurance, embracing the best features of the discontinued certificate, but from which are eliminated those features which were thought to be objectionable. In conjunction with other industrial offices, the Company has formed the National Amalgamated Approved Society to meet the requirements of the National Insurance Act, now on the eve of coming into force. The investments of the company are yielding a rate of interest in excess of that assumed in the actuarial valuation, and a dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. upon the preferred shares for 1911 was declared at the meeting, and approved.

CORRESPONDENCE

ANGLO-GERMAN RELATIONS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—May I offer a few comments on the letters in your issue of June 29th? Mr. Immo Allen is surely quite wrong in imputing to us as a community qualities which we plainly do not possess. He says, "It is obvious that Great Britain is determined to thwart Germany's designs for expansion," and he speaks of friends on "whom we rely to help us." Now what is obvious surely is that Great Britain is not determined to do anything, and that being the case, there can be no question of reliance on friends to help us. Determination to do anything would imply willingness—nay, eagerness—to take some steps towards being able to do it. What percentage of the people of Great Britain—of our rulers in Parliament—know or care what Germany's designs are, or even grant the possibility of her having any designs? We have no designs ourselves, and we don't want to be bothered with any alarmist talk about other people's designs. It is far less trouble to assume that Germany has no designs and no national policy; that she is inhabited and governed by the same sort of people as ourselves; that she is building her fleet for fun—as a big toy to play with—a luxury, in fact. Then we can go on occupying our minds—or at any rate our tongues—with the things that really matter.

Mr. Allen asks: "Why not aid Germany in the acquisition of territory in South America?" A truly revolutionary idea. Does Mr. Allen realise what this would mean? It would mean having a foreign policy—thinking about things—forming an intelligent conception of our position in the world, and of the means of maintaining it. Anything more un-English can hardly be imagined. Besides, we should have to turn our backs on an old and trusted friend, one of the venerable catchwords which we have cherished for generations past as a substitute for a national policy. Has not one of your contemporaries lately pointed out—apparently as a reason for refusing to doubt its eternal validity—that the original impulse to the formulation of the Monroe Doctrine was given by an English statesman? And Mr. Allen suggests that now—less than one hundred years after its formation—we should already begin to inquire whether its maintenance is to our interest!

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Of the letter signed "T.McL.," one sentence is specially to be commended to those who believe that Germany's desire to strengthen her economic position is an offence against international morality. "England is the only nation standing in Germany's way." The United States should, of course, be bracketed with England in this respect. In extenuation of our attitude—if extenuation be the right word—"T. McL." should have pointed out that there are two peoples in the modern world to whom it seems quite right and proper to earmark for your own benefit whole continents of which you have no need and make no use, in the development and defence of which you make no sacrifices, and then if anybody throws doubt on your exclusive rights to feel and express righteous horror on the ground that at such and such a date you said that you would like such and such parts of the earth reserved in case it might ever suit you to make use of them. No non-Anglo-Saxon country allows to the Monroe Doctrine any value whatever except as a declaration of intention on the part of its upholders; no country outside of England has ever claimed the right which England claims to-day with regard to Holland, the right to dictate to two independent nations, neither of them touching her borders, whether they shall or shall not make such arrangements between themselves as may suit them. Lord Courtney of Penwith, in the Contemporary Review of November, 1909, assumes that it is quite an open question whether and under what conditions England would claim the right to veto a friendly arrangement by which Holland might become part of the German Empire. "Such a union . . . could not be resented by us, except through motives of jealousy. But . . . it would have to be established under conditions very different from those that now prevail. It may be dismissed as outside the sphere of practical politics"! In so far as these apparently conflicting utterances can be said to have a meaning, they express the typical attitude of the superior Englishman towards foreign nations. "Be good little boys and do as you are told; when you grow up (and reach the heights of political wisdom from which the modern English doctrinaire surveys mankind), then we will see how far you may be allowed to manage your own affairs." And Lord Courtney is a pacifist, an advocate of peace and goodfellowship among nations, and no doubt believes that utterances of this sort are likely to make foreigners feel friendly towards England.

The pacifist is of all men the least easy to understand in this matter. Men who believe that war with Germany is inevitable, or who believe that war could only be averted by concessions on our side which would be fatal to our interests, are naturally not inclined to spend their time in devising means of coming to terms with Germany. The pacifists are in quite a different position. In their ranks there are doubtless many men—members of Parliament, men to whom the country would give a hearing—who believe, as I do, that war is not inevitable, that it could be averted by concessions on our part which we could afford to make. What practical suggestion has ever been made by any of them, in or out of Parliament, towards lessening the danger of war? They have said till we are sick of hearing it that they do not want war—just as if there were anybody in the country who did; and they seem to think, curiously enough, that they have thereby discharged their whole duty. In 1876-7 their spiritual ancestors took—fortunately for the world—an entirely different view of their duty; they forced the question on the attention of the country, not in the shape of abstract platitudes with which everybody agrees, but as a concrete proposition. Is it to England's interest, is it in accordance with morality, that England should fight on this or that specific issue? And the result was that war was averted. The modern pacifist has, as far as the public can judge, never even begun to try to find out what the specific issues are which divide Germany and Great Britain; he assumes, as far as we can judge from his utterances, that the Germans are straining every nerve to make their naval power equal to ours without having in their mind any definite idea of why or with what purpose; he assumes, that is to say, that the Germans are as feckless as we are; which is certainly a mistake, and in all probability a very disastrous one.

In your editorial note to the letter of "T. McL." you say, "It is quite easy to demonstrate to Germany that she cannot possibly succeed," meaning no doubt that, if we were willing to spend the money and able to find or create the men, we could increase our naval strength to such an extent as to make competition with us impossible; my conviction, held with equal intensity, is that if we had among us a few men able and willing to mobilise public opinion we could do away with the antagonism between Germany and ourselves, and so pave the way to a lasting friendship between the two countries; just as the men of 1876, who not only did not want war, but were willing to get down into the street in order to avert it, were able to pave the way to what we all hope is a lasting friendship between Russia and ourselves.

Of the letters in your issue of July 6th it is fortunately not necessary to say much. "Wm. H.," though he happens to be on the right side, is not a very promising ally. Pharisaic references to "decaying" and "corrupt" nations are entirely out of place in a discussion of foreign policy. The delusion that friendship with one nation implies hostility to another has done quite enough harm in the past; and we are not likely to get on to the right track until we realise (1) that what really matters to us is the safeguarding of our own interests, not insistence on our real or supposed superiority to other people, and (2) that in order to avoid war it is necessary not only to get on to the right track and stick to it ourselves, but to see that other people who have it in their power to drag us into war follow our example. The letter of "R. J. Turner" contains the gist of Mr. Norman Angell's teaching in a nutshell: they both belong to the well-meaning and evil-doing group of purveyors of soothing syrup. The considerations which "R. J. Turner" adduces have not prevented war in the past, and are not likely to do so in the future; but "let us sit still and drift" is unfortunately a very popular cry. I am, sir, yours faithfully,

T. G. MARTIN.

THE GERMAN PERIL.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Mr. Turner is quick to arrive at conclusions, conclusions that not only betray ignorance of actual facts but show lack of considered judgment.

I am not aware that I stated the Hamburg-Amerika and N.D.L. Companies had any ships "laid-up," so the query of what the directors of those companies are thinking about needs no answer. The statement was: "There was always sufficient tonnage laying in the German ports to convey an army of 250,000 men," not that ships were kept laid up solely for that purpose. To prove that assertion, I recommend Mr. Turner to inquire as to the amount of first-class tonnage lying in the Rivers Elbe, Weser, and Ems. He will find that on these rivers there is at all times more than sufficient vessels capable of being put to sea in a few hours. Mr. Turner must also remember that these vessels would not require the special fittings of a troop-ship for so short a sea passage as that between our coasts and Germany. These vessels are entering and leaving port every day, engaged in the making of profits, but while in the German ports spoken of are always available for the conveyance of troops and munitions of war.

I agree that the German nation is quite aware that the pressing of the button of war may mean ruin to them if unsuccessful, but the responsible statesmen of the German Empire are much too astute to press that button until they are assured of success. Therefore, until that moment, they will be careful to conceal the sharp claw within the velvet paw, which is but a weapon to be used in order to hasten the day when they can demand concessions so great that the granting of them will be humiliating to this great Empire, and the refusing of them will mean a war, ruinous and suicidal because of our unpreparedness.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Let the responsible statesmen of both countries find "a way out," but see to it that our statesmen have behind them an efficient navy well manned—not 20,000 men short as at present—and an army that is well armed, well trained, and of number so great as to embrace every able-bodied man between the ages of 18 and 50. Then, and not till then, can we hope that our statesmen will be able to find "a way out" that will be consistent with the dignity and honour of our flag. To be deluded by the articles appearing in the Nord und Sud is what Germany wants, and is to submit to "having your leg pulled" till Germany, "the leg puller," is ready to back up her demands by the power and might to enforce them.

By all means let us extend a warm welcome to Germany's distinguished Ambassador, but let us also see to it that we are at all times prepared to maintain peace by being always "prepared to wage war successfully against the strongest nation or combination of nations." Then we will assist Germany's distinguished Ambassador in his work of maintaining peace and the greatly to be desired avoidance of any rupture between his country and ours.

In this country it has become the fashion to refuse to look and to see the danger our national existence is in. Popularity is obtained by going with the crowd, by promising everyone something for nothing, by refraining from anything so unpleasant as to remind the people that they have duties to perform as well as benefits to obtain. It has become the custom to retain popularity by saying, "All is well!" Germany counts upon this, Europe knows it; we alone are blind. I trust that Mr. Turner is among those "who see."

THOMAS MCLEOD.

BOOKS RECEIVED

MISCELLANEOUS.

Also and Perhaps. By Sir Frank Swettenham. Illustrated. (John Lane. 6s.)

The Art of Golf. By Joshua Taylor. Illustrated. (T. Werner Laurie. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Call of the Bugle. By the Rev. Walter E. Bristow, M.A. Illustrated. (The S.P.C.K. 6d.)

Merrier England: A Pageant of Progress. By Kate Murray. (Co-Partnership Publishers. 6d. net.)

Perse Playbooks: No. I—Dramatic Work by the Boys of the Perse School, Cambridge. With a Foreword by Dr. W. H. D. Rouse and an Essay on "The Teaching of Drama." (W. Heffer and Sons, Cambridge. 1s. net.)

The Ridge of the White Waters ("Witwatersrand"), or Impressions of a Visit to Johannesburg, with some notes of Durban, Delagoa Bay, and the Low Country. By William Charles Scully. Illustrated. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s. net.)

The Beyond that is Within, and Other Addresses. By Emile Boutroux, Member of the French Institute. Translated by Jonathan Nield. (Duckworth and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

The Baskish Verb: A Parsing Synopsis of the 788 Forms of the Verb in St. Luke's Gospel, from Leiçarraga's New Testament of the Year 1571. By E. S. Dodgson, M.A. (Henry Frowde. 10s. net.)

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS.

Studies in History, Economics, and Public Law:—Vol. 46, No. 4. A Hoosier Village. By N. L. Sims, Ph.D. (6s.) Vol. 47, No. 1. The Politics of Michigan, 1865-1878. By H. M. Dilla, Ph.D. (8s.) Vol. 47, No. 2. The United States Beet-Sugar Industry and the Tariff. By R. G. Blakey. (8s.) Vol. 48, No. 1. An Encyclopedist of the Dark Ages: Isidore of Seville. By Ernest Brehaut, Ph.D. (8s.) (P. S. King and Son.)

A Little Book about Lake House. Compiled by Catharine Lovibond. (Brown and Co., Salisbury. 1s.)

Ireland Under the Normans: 1169-1216. By Goddard Henry Orpen. 2 Vols., with Map. (Henry Frowde. 21s. net.)

Mary Wakefield. A Memoir by Rosa Newmarch. (Atkinson and Pollitt, Kendal. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Mystery of Francis Bacon. By William T. Smedley. Illustrated. (Robert Banks and Son. 6s. net.)

A History of the European Nations from the Earliest Records to the Beginning of the Twentieth Century. By Angelo S. Rappoport. (Greening and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

FICTION.

Grit Lawless. By F. E. Mills Young. (John Lane. 6s.)

The Waster. By Mrs. Henry Tippett. (John Long. 6s.)

The Ordeal of Silence. By a Peer. (John Long. 6s.)

Picture Tales from Welsh Hills. By Bertha Thomas. (T. Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d. net.)

Lady Dorothy's Indiscretion. By Arthur Applin. With Coloured Frontispiece. (Ward, Lock, and Co. 6s.)

The Ban. By Lester Lurgan. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

Bright Shame. By Keighley Snowden. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

Wings of Love. By C. Ranger Gull. (Greening and Co. 6s.)

Sable and Motley. By Stephen Andrew. (Greening and Co. 6s.)

VERSE.

The Odes of Horace (Books I-IV and the Saecular Hymn). Translated into English Verse by W. S. Morris, I.C.S. (Henry Frowde. 3s. 6d. net.)

Horatii Carmina. Translated into Greek Verse for the First Time by Paneymolpos. No. I. (Parnassus Press. 2s. 6d.)

Larmes et Sourires. By Sir Jean George Tollemache Sinclair. Illustrated. (Privately Printed for the Author by MM. Chaix and Co., Paris.)

Silhouettes in Song. By Philip Henry Fish. (George Routledge and Sons. 3s. net.)

The Blue Communion. By R. A. Eric Shepherd. (Kegan Paul and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

THEOLOGY.

"Personal and Parochial": Being Notes of Addresses on the Seven Deadly Sins, and Letters on Parish Work. By the late Bishop King. (The S.P.C.K. 6d.)

EDUCATIONAL.

Local Government Handbook on Education. By H. Osman Newland. (Charles Griffin and Co. 6s. net.)

PERIODICALS.

The Bibelot; The Vineyard; Cambridge University Reporter; University Correspondent; School World; Book Monthly; La Revue; Deutsche Rundschau; English Review; African Times and Orient Review; Ulula; Modern Language Teaching; Peru To-Day; Harper's Magazine; Bird Notes and News; Mercure de France; Home Counties Magazine; Land Union Journal; Empire Review; N.R.A. Journal; Matriculation Directory; Bookseller; The Author; Century Magazine; Palestine Exploration Fund Quarterly Statement; Publishers' Circular; Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly; Poetry Review; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; Revue Bleue; Scottish Historical Review; Bedrock; Garden Suburbs, Villages, and Homes; Atlantic Monthly; Literary Digest, N.Y.; Tourist Magazine, N.Y.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO . . AND THROUGH CANADA . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service via Vancouver.

For further particulars apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH AND EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

VIA the SUEZ CANAL:

Calling at GIBRALTAR, MARSEILLES and NAPLES

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE

PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

. . . Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports.

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, 102, Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours.

R.M.S.P. PLEASURE CRUISES.

To	Fare	Length of Tour	Sailing	From
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £22.	Days 23.	Every Thursday Fortnight.	London.
THE AZORES.	£17†	19.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£12.	8 upwards.	Weekly.	Southampton & Liverpool.
WEST INDIES.	From £40.	From 34.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
NORWAY.	From £1 a day	13 upwards.	June to August.	Grimsby & Leith.
BALTIC & RUSSIA.	From £1 a day.	24.	August 24.	Grimsby.
MEDITERRANEAN, HOLY LAND & EGYPT.	From £1 a day.	10.	September to November.	Southampton & Marseilles.

† Including Hotel Accommodation.

For further particulars apply:—

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY, London: 18, Moorgate St., E.C., or 32, Cockspur St., S.W.

FEARLESS CRITICISM

In support of principle
In exposure of humbug
In scorn of cant

THE COMMENTATOR

A Weekly Review of Politics, Art, Music, Literature, and the Stage.

ONE PENNY WEEKLY of all Newsagents—or sent direct from the Publishers, for 6s. per annum (post free) or 3s. for six months.

COMMENTATOR, Ltd., 31, Essex St., London

Published by the Proprietor at Cannon House, Breams Buildings, London E.C. Office for Advertisements, 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C. Printed by BONNER & Co., The Chancery Lane Press, Rolls Passage, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

CONTENTS

	PAGE
Notes of the Week	67
Change and Eternity ...	68
The Muse and the Kitchen...	68
Reviews:
Cesare Borgia	69
Catherine II in a New Light	70
Frontier Fighting ...	72
The Thirsty Gods ...	73
A Baskish Lexicological Grammar	74
Farrago and Fantasy ...	75
Music during the Victorian Era	75
Bismarckian Diplomacy ...	76
Shorter Reviews	76
Fiction	77
The Theatre:
The Irish Players ...	78
Two Plays at King's Hall	80
The Earl's Court Tourney	80
A Master of Pageantry at "Shakespeare's England"	80
Some Recent French Books	82
English Character seen through Italian Spectacles. —I.	83
The Magazines	84
The Fleet at Sea	86
At St. Stephen's Shrine ...	88
Notes and News	90
Imperial and Foreign Affairs	90
Motoring	91
In the Temple of Mammon	92
Correspondence	93
Books Received	95

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C., where all communications to the Editor should be addressed.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Notes of the Week

IT appears, as a contemporary has well phrased it, as though the chief ambition of Mr. Lloyd George is "to frame legislation that will set the whole country by the ears." Readers of THE ACADEMY may remember that we refrained from joining in the almost universal paean of praise that arose when first the Chancellor's scheme of National Insurance was published, preferring to hold an open mind on the question until more details were available. The disgracefully vague and unbusinesslike form in which the contentious Act has been cast has already led to the most unexpected results, from a threatened strike in the industrial North to a rebellion in the agricultural East, and its tangled web of clauses is the despair of those who have to administer it. Protests have come from all quarters, from employers and employed, and have ranged from serious, reasoned argument to the absurdity of burning the Act in public. Meanwhile the Chancellor poses as a benefactor to humanity rather too late in the day; he might have been, had his statesmanship and business ability matched his enthusiasm and his command of language.

It happened that one afternoon this glowing week we walked the flags of the Embankment to admire London's river, as do all good citizens when opportunity offers, and, having business Chelsea way, we made to embark on a steamer which looked cool and friendly and was temptingly labelled "Greenwich to Kew." We were briefly informed that there were no boats "up river" after four o'clock; and, there being still left three hours of hot sunshine (to say nothing of the warm twilight), we watched the fortunate voyagers start for the wild adventures of Greenwich, wondering, as we have so many times wondered, at the mysterious dispensation of those who govern London's river-traffic. Memories of the pretty little bateaux mouches of Paris, of refreshing evening trips to St. Cloud, increased our anger. Have we not also beauty-spots on our Thames within reach of a pleasant run, and would not many people on these semi-tropical evenings be glad of the chance to travel by water instead of a stuffy train? It is not the first time we have alluded in this column to the neglected possibilities of the river; we wish we could think that it would be the last.

The little paddle-steamer Comet launched a hundred years ago on the Clyde, which was the first regularly running steam-driven vessel in Europe, did not suggest to the minds of its builders the huge liners and the massive battleships of to-day; but the difference represents the quite natural and gradual progress due to constant experiment. By a similar route we have arrived at the splendidly equipped touring and racing car from the noisy, inelegant, odorous machine of a few years ago; and now that M. Bertrand de Lesseps has driven a car 300 miles, using a peculiarly constructed revolving "wing" as a propeller (thus doing away with all complicated intervening mechanism such as differential gears and clutches), there is no telling what may yet be in store. Transferring the argument to the science of flight, who knows what astounding events, what extraordinary developments of the aeroplane, may be seen during the next decade? Already we take no special notice of journeys of hundreds of miles through the air; fame is not now to be won by flying across the Channel. The recent triumph of the hydroplane marks a fresh stage, and, though the airman has yet to accomplish the feat of hovering stationary over a fixed point, he has made those who watch him feel that not many surprises can be left.

The twelfth annual gathering of the Cowper Society took place at Olney, Bedfordshire, on Thursday, July 4, and was well attended. A private meeting was held in the Cowper and Newton Museum, at which an arrangement was made that members of the Blake Society should interchange with the Cowper Society on terms of mutual advantage. After this the public meeting assembled, reinforced by the Northants Natural History Society. Lieut.-Col. Bowyer presided, and Mr. Thomas Wright and other gentlemen spoke on various matters of interest relating to the poet of Olney. It has been decided to ask the Lord Mayor of London for permission to hold the next meeting at the Mansion House. If this is arranged, Bishop Welldon has promised to address the members. The forthcoming book to be issued by the Society is entitled "Cowper and Blake," and is by Dr. Hubert Norman.

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Change and Eternity

GONE is the sheen of the stars, and the last blown gleam of the moon,
And the planets are hidden in cloud from the eyes of their sister Earth;
Only the lonely wind, singing his olden tune,
Greets with a voice as of pain the hour of a new day's birth;
For lost in the passing of days are bygone sorrow and mirth;
And the wind, blowing over the graves of men who smiled or sighed,
Wails through the lonely night for hopes that have no worth,
Having seen all things that were fair, but none that had hope to abide.

But the sun smites once and again, the mists dissolve and divide,
And the eyes of morning shine like one awakened and glad;
The wind is hushed at last, the sky shines blue and wide,
And forgotten are gloom and sighing, and all that was dim and sad.
Softly the hours pass by, silent and sunshine-clad,
Each with her word of delight, each with a flower at her breast,
Till the last of them all is gone, and the rose that sunrise had,
Glows changing and fades and darkens, afar in the unknown west.

Then with o'er-shadowing wings, and cloud for a shimmering vest,
Silver-shod, crowned with the moon, a queen in queenly array,
Night comes, and bears in her hands dreams and a gift of rest
And peace from fears that pursue, from secret hopes that delay;
But above the veil of the deep is rent and riven away,
And the house of the stars is seen, and the ways of the singing spheres
That sing in the height of heaven, in the light of eternal day,
Unchanged of rising and setting, of fretting and change of the years.

W. P. R. KERR.

The Muse and the Kitchen

IF that necessary but often irritating person, the "ordinary man," were asked to define his conception of a poet, he would probably picture for his questioner a being resembling himself in certain superficial matters, such as the possession of two eyes, a nose and mouth, arms and legs, but strangely different from himself in many other respects. Whereas he, the ordinary man, is level-headed and sober of mien (save for a period of annual intoxication known as a holiday), the poet, he imagines, is a wild-eyed, rather gaunt, and uncomfortable-looking creature, with long, unkempt hair, who talks and mutters constantly to invisible companions, who wears curious hats (or none at all), and who sits up all night breathlessly demanding inspiration for his poised pen. And in no matter would the difference be more emphatic than in that of sustenance. The poet, he thinks, lives almost entirely on air; toying absently with an occasional sandwich, dallying with cakes and coffee as a modern substitute for the obsolete ambrosia, his existence lies on a plane far above that where the art of the chef inspires his lowlier fellow-men. In fact, were the uninitiate pressed to give an absolute antithesis to poetry, he might very well say "Beefsteaks." He has never met a poet; he would rather not do so, since he feels by intuition that his sensations at such an encounter would be embarrassing, and he would not know what to talk about.

It is a pitiful thing, indeed, to shatter an illusion; but the simple, regrettable fact has to be put on record that your twentieth-century poet is an admirable trencherman. He no longer dines or sups apologetically in an attic near the stars on a slice of cold mutton, a corner of a loaf, and a glass of milk; dear, no! The circle of his melody is gently rounded with a delicate repast; the meal to him is a rite, a chord of music loud and long and splendid, harmonising perfectly, modulating, and dying away in sweet murmurs of wines and coffee and exotically tinted liqueurs. No more does he sit and scribble verses in squalid restaurants, retiring from the gaze of the public; on the contrary, he strides boldly through the flowered portals of hostels where dine the Epicureans, and, instead of a stony glare from the gigantic guardian, he receives a respectful salutation, as befits one who chooses his meats with care and knows how to use a wine-list. As to walking homeward—why walk, he asks, when there are taxi-cabs in plenty? And does his poetry suffer because he happens to be well fed? I hardly think so; for I have known several men who freely and honourably have earned the title of poet who answer this description fairly accurately.

Obviously, however, we must revise our ideas as to the unpoetic nature of things that are usually considered vulgar, such as beefsteaks. It would be comparatively easy to prove that the poetic sense depends almost entirely upon the satisfaction of the appetite. Let there be ever so fine a view to be seen, we turn from it with weary hearts if we chance to be hungry; but confront us with it after a well-served meal, and we will wax as enthusiastic as you please. So desperately a part of ourselves is this philistine, fleshly demand of the digestive apparatus that the most exquisite sight of the sun's descent, "flaming with great wings red among the vapours," moves us not a whit if 'tis dinner-time and our body-half insists upon listening for the summons of the gong. It is a dreadful thought. We, who take pride in our intellect, in our love for the beautiful, in our appreciation of the higher things—to be brought so low as this, that the glittering array of the table should thrill us with a foretaste of bliss! What is dinner that it should lure us from a moon-rise at twilight—the most glorious moon-rise of all? And what is lunch that for it we should forsake the sea, shut ourselves in a stuffy room, and glow with pleasure over the preliminary pervasive odours arising from the kitchen?

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Alas! Hard saying though it may be, we have to admit that the poet in us shakes hands with the cook; and, pursuing the theme, it is necessary to suppose that without that periodical aid from "below stairs" the poet in us would rebel and gradually pine away. What wonders have not been accomplished by good ale and honest fare in time of need—"ale, to beef what Eve was to Adam," as Meredith said. "Heroes know little what they owe to champagne," and we little know how much of the artist's visions is due to the mellow satisfaction of a leisurely dinner. Dr. Middleton, in some respects almost as notable an egoist as his prospective son-in-law, "misdoubted the future as well as the past of the man who did not, in becoming gravity, exult to dine"; and the ordinary man, given to dining with no poetic theories at the back of his head, need feel no shock of surprise at the discovery that the Muse no longer makes it a condition of service that her poet should starve. She has grown more sensible.

But one more question remains to be asked. Whence comes the prosperity of these seasoned rhymesters of to-day? Where flow the thin golden rills from which their coffers are replenished so delightfully? Ah! are there still further disclosures to be made for the wonderment of the ordinary man? Must we confess that the modern poet never attempts to live by his poems—that he is tinker, tailor, soldier, sailor, and a great many other things in order to jingle the coins in his pouch, in order, in fact, to have the time to be a poet? Times have changed since Gay made a thousand pounds by his "Poems on Several Occasions," and there are so many would-be poets now that a patron for each is out of the question. And so, however much the poet of to-day wishes to live by his poems in posterity, to live in the present (and, therefore, to write his immortal lines), he wisely determines to attempt no feats of fasting, but to call on his kindly Muse—after dinner. If she no longer responds with an "Ode to a Grecian Urn" or a "Love in the Valley," can we blame her?

WILFRID L. RANDELL.

REVIEWS

Cesare Borgia

The Life of Cesare Borgia: A History and Some Criticisms. By RAFAEL SABATINI. Illustrated. (Stanley Paul and Co. 16s. net.)

Cæsar Borgia: A Study of the Renaissance. By JOHN LESLIE GARNER. (T. Fisher Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

HERE is a book that can scarcely fail to challenge attention. By many readers it will be regarded as an ingenious piece of special pleading. A tradition has grown up about the Borgias which has taken root very firmly in the minds of most men. They were mean, selfish, cruel, arrogant, infirm of purpose, but implacable of resentment. They were poisoners on a lordly scale. They were guilty of unnamable vices. There was scarcely a crime in the Decalogue that was not laid to their charge.

Such is the popular estimate of the character of Alexander Borgia and his no less notorious son. How far is it borne out by the facts of the case? That is the question that Mr. Sabatini has set himself to answer in this volume.

It says much for Mr. Sabatini—whom we have known hitherto as a romantic novelist—that he has refused to succumb to a temptation which in his case must have proved peculiarly strong. Since it was entirely impossible for him to make Cesare Borgia the hero of the story, he might have been pardoned—as he would certainly have been applauded—if he had made him the villain. But his sole aim has been to discover the truth. He has sifted the evidence with admirable impartiality, and the conclusion he arrives at is that the Borgias, though far from being angels of light, were less black than they are painted. He found them depicted as monsters, and he leaves them as men—albeit very bad men.

We have not the space to follow Mr. Sabatini in the various ramifications of his subject. His summary of the evidence with regard to the alleged secret poison administered by Alexander VI. will leave no doubt, we venture to think, in the mind of any candid reader as to the baselessness of the rumour. It appears to have been circulated immediately after the sudden death of Prince Djim at the Castle of Capua, and it has been maintained, in the teeth of all evidence, ever since. Mr. Sabatini finds no difficulty in disposing of the poison legend, however:—

> Considering that twenty-eight days had elapsed since his parting from Alexander, it was, with the best intentions in the world, rather difficult to make that poisoning credible, until the bright notion was conceived, and made public, that the poison used was a "white powder" of unknown components, which did its work slowly, and killed the victim some time after it had been administered. Thus, by a bold and brazen invention, an impossible falsehood was made to wear a possible aspect. . . .
>
> Before proceeding to inquire further into this par> ticular case, let us here and now say that, just as to-day there is no inorganic toxin known to science that will either lie fallow for weeks in the human system, suddenly to become active and slay, or yet to kill by slow degrees, involving some weeks in the process, so none was known in the Borgian or any other era. Science, indeed, will tell you that the very notion of any such poison is flagrantly absurd, and that such a toxic action is against all the laws of nature.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

A stronger reason for refusing to credit Alexander with the death of Djim is to be found in the fact—a fact to which Mr. Sabatini does not fail to refer—that by it the Pope lost an annual levy of 40,000 ducats, in addition to his hold upon the Turks.

Whether Mr. Sabatini has not taken a too lenient view of the Borgias is a question that may well be asked. It is true that the balance of blame needed some redressing, but one finds it difficult to repress a smile when one reads of the "apostolic zeal" of Alexander VI.! Mr. Sabatini refers to the Pope's Bull granting America to Spain, and the conditions under which that tolerably easy bequest was made. And then he adds, "Thus Alexander invented the missionary."

We confess that we rubbed our eyes after reading that last sentence. Surely there was some mistake. But no. There it stands in all its naked audacity. "Alexander invented the missionary"! And this a thousand years after the labours of St. Columba, St. Patrick, and St. Augustine! Words fail us.

One particular line of apology adopted by Mr. Sabatini we do most unfeignedly deplore. We do not think that the author's partial advocacy of the character of the Borgias is enhanced in value by the frequent references to the looseness of the age. There is a modern tendency to blame epochs rather than individuals. Mr. Sabatini writes of the Cinquecento as if it were some sinister and impersonal force from the inductable clutches of which its victims were powerless to escape. But if any period of history has a more unsavoury reputation than any other—which, perhaps, upon the whole, is a somewhat doubtful proposition—it is because the men and women living in it have failed to conform to that moral standard which is independent of the mere accidents of time. It is the men who are responsible for the age, and not the age that is responsible for the men.

Mr. Sabatini's portrayal of Cesare Borgia is finely done. With all his faults, this man, who crowded so much of action into his thirty-two years of life, lives in these pages as a veritable human being, and not as a mere puppet for universal execration. The book is one that will have to be read. Mr. Sabatini throws a flood of light upon an obscure and still hotly-controverted period of European history. He also helps us to understand something of the glamour and the glory, the sin and the squalor that are summed up in the one immortal word—Rome.

We wish we could say as much of Mr. Garner's treatise, but we fear it is impossible. Mr. Garner makes a great parade of fairness, but one is not long in discovering that he approaches his subject with a pronounced anti-Borgian bias. A great deal of industry has gone to the making of this volume, but it is united to a total inability to appreciate or even understand alike the men and the times of which it treats.

Consider, for example, such a passage as the following. Our author is referring to the Italian Renaissance:—

> Man had again discovered himself; he had become conscious of his faculties; he had found that he possessed a will that could carry him on to greatness in the many fields of human activity. Hitherto superstitious, ignorant, and bigoted, he had been taught that if he had ventured to use the intellect with which he had been endowed he would be eternally damned. Life to him was merely a painful pilgrimage between two eternities, through one of which he would be doomed to hell fire if in his mundane existence he dared to find any of the joy of living.

Mr. Garner is writing of the age of Thomas Aquinas! Or yet again:—

> The gloom and superstition of mediæval Christianity oppressed men's souls, consequently the subjects selected were hideous and lugubrious in the extreme—emaciated saints, representations of the Last Judgment, human beings writhing in the torment of eternal wrath. The Almighty was not a god of pity and love, but one of vengeance.

Mr. Garner is writing of the age of Thomas à Kempis—the age, too, which produced the gentle and joyous Francis of Assisi! Comment, surely, is needless. But the gargoyles on the walls of the great Gothic cathedrals of Europe survive to-day as an eternal refutation of Mr. Garner's reckless and random theories.

It is not, perhaps, surprising that a writer who fails so signally to understand the mind of mediæval Europe should do something less than justice to the character of even a Cesare Borgia. The truth, as we all know, lies between two extremes. But we think that Mr. Sabatini has got nearer to a just and discerning estimate of one of the most baffling and complex characters in Italian history than his latest biographer. Machiavelli was no saint, but even he would hardly have yielded an unstinted meed of admiration to a human monster.

Catherine II. in a New Light

The Comedy of Catherine the Great. By FRANCIS GRIBBLE. (Eveleigh Nash. 16s.)

THE author of this most interesting work has rendered a great service to history in depicting Catherine II., the talented and beautiful Russian Empress, in an entirely new light, and one more in accordance with facts than is generally accepted. If Catherine, in her private life, left much to be desired, we must remember, as the author quaintly expresses it, that "she never had a chance," and before she was out of her teens was married to a man of low tastes and vulgar habits. She was also without any warning introduced into one of the most dissolute Courts in Europe, where morals as we know them were absent.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Married to a drunkard who kept a kennel of fox-hounds in her ante-chamber, and threatened her with imprisonment in a nunnery for life (a fate peculiarly terrible for a woman of Catherine's taste), it is not surprising that she soon found someone to rescue her from a dangerous and unenviable position. No matter how bad or how good a beautiful woman may be, she will always find someone to pity her, especially when mated to a brutal husband. Catherine, who was neither pre-eminently good nor bad, soon discovered a means of deliverance from the society of her wretched partner, who was eventually assassinated by her admirers and sympathisers in the Palace of Ropscha. She then ascended the throne, with the help of a coterie of brilliant and unscrupulous men, who committed untold crimes in her name, for which she is unfortunately too often held responsible by historians who were not acquainted with her precarious and peculiar position.

From that time she was ruled by a succession of able and unscrupulous ministers who would have soon treated the "German Usurper" as mercilessly as they did her husband had she not propitiated them with enormous largesses and carried out the policy they dictated. The so-called comedy presents the great Empress as she actually was. Henceforth she will appear in the light of modern history as "more sinned against than sinning," with all those intellectual and spirituelle qualities which, in a more healthy atmosphere, would have made her not only one of the most remarkable women of her time, but also one of the best. Her vicious environment was too strong for her, and this moral caricature of a great woman is the result. Forbidden to marry the only man whom she really loved, she endeavoured to find in the favours of a score of lovers that satisfaction which a virtuous woman should only find in one. Her life, when probed to the core, is in reality one long-drawn-out tragedy, and shows all the mischief that can ensue for misplaced affection and wasted talent. Poor Catherine was not even permitted to live respectably, and when she wished to marry Alexis Orloff, the handsome guardsman, she was informed by Panin, her Chancellor, that "Madam Orloff could never become the Empress of Russia!" One of the members of the Senate was even still more brutally outspoken, and voiced the general opinion concerning her future conduct in the following speech:—"We are delighted to see our Sovereign selecting subjects on whom to confer the favour of her affection, but we can never consent that men who are socially no more than our equals should presume to become our masters!" Catherine was not long in taking this hint, and since she was not permitted to marry either Poniatowski, the King of Poland, or Orloff, she endeavoured to drown her sorrow and regrets in the wildest dissipation, giving full play to her neurotic and passionate temperament, which, like a mighty torrent diverted from its proper channel, flowed in wasteful profusion in all directions. Potemkin who actually ruled Russia, continually discovered for the Empress fresh admirers, and was rewarded with palaces, estates, territories and millions of roubles in this questionable metier.

The Orloff brothers, who, with the aid of the guards, had secured her nomination to the throne, were rewarded for their "affection" and loyalty with seventeen millions of roubles (£3,400,000); also with estates as large as provinces and thousands of serfs. It is estimated that Catherine spent at least £80,000,000 on her various favourites, and left about thirty thousand matters of State unattended to. Notwithstanding her licentiousness, her extravagance and fickleness, there is evidence to show that she not only longed for a better life, but was to a great extent what circumstances and her peculiar temperament made her. In the plays, poems, diaries and other literary memoirs she has left, we can see the real Catherine better than in the narratives of many historians. We know from them that she was not only a great patron of the arts, but a passionate admirer of Shakespeare, and showed her appreciation of him by writing a series of plays "after the manner of William Shakespeare, without observing the customary rules of the grammar!" Catherine II., who ignored so many rules in everyday-life, could hardly expect to recognise the insignificant regulations relating to the stage. She not only aspired to be a literary woman, but cultivated the society of some of the most eminent literary men of her day, including Grimm, Diderot, Voltaire, and Rousseau. The costly manuscripts, books, cameos, statues, and valuable pictures she collected around her in the Hermitage, are evidence of her innate love for all that was beautiful and refining. With all her frailty, she was not so bad as is generally believed. To Poniatowski, whom she really loved, she wrote: "I feel the power over me of the man whom I love; may God preserve you for me, I shall be a better woman." A woman who could write thus could not be wholly bad. "Calumny," wrote the French Ambassador, "has not spared her moral character, but it must be allowed that while not entirely above reproach, she was far from the excesses of which she was accused." Concerning Gregory Orloff, the same Ambassador is far more scathing in his remarks.

In her daily life she was temperate, energetic, studious and systematic. She rose at five o'clock, lighted her own fire in order not to disturb her attendants, and showed the greatest consideration for them. No wonder there were many who loved her, in spite of her infirmities and weaknesses, and wept when she died.

This interesting volume, full of anecdote, should be read by all who care more for the facts of history than for useless fiction. One leaves the perusal of these pages with a feeling of pity that the life of this great woman should have been so wasted, and I must agree with the author that Catherine was a woman, not only of exceptional ability, but also of exceptional character. The whole of the work is written in a vein of charitable, good-natured humour and satire. Its fault is its title, which should have been the "Tragedy of Catherine the Great." This hopeless pursuit of high ideals in the midst of corrupt surroundings was no comedy, but a veritable tragedy: the tragedy of a woman naturally good and gifted, forced by her environment to lead a life totally different from the one she would have chosen had her lot been cast otherwise.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

W. BARNES STEVENI.

Frontier Fighting

Campaigns on the North-West Frontier. By CAPTAIN H. L. NEVILL, D.S.O. Foreword by FIELD-MARSHAL THE EARL ROBERTS, K.G. With Maps and Illustrations. (John Murray. 15s. net.)

WHEN Lord Dalhousie annexed the Punjab on March 29, 1849, from the Sikhs, after the second war with them, the British Government in India inherited a legacy of all the troubles which the great Mahárájá Ranjit Singh and his successors had experienced on their frontier with Afghanistan and the regions adjacent thereto. The turbulent and fanatical tribes, of whom the Afridis are the most powerful, on either side of a very unsettled and elastic frontier, acknowledged no master, and had never been properly subjugated. The first military expedition in 1849 on the Yusufzai border, was occasioned by the refusal of British villages to pay revenue, an act of contumacy in which they were aided by villagers from independent territory. Since that commencement the Government of India were engaged up to and including 1898—according to a Parliamentary Return (moved for by Mr. John Morley in that year) showing the wars and military operations on or beyond the frontiers of British India—in sixty-one expeditions, exclusive of the second Afghan war, on the North-West frontier, undertaken to resist aggression, punish attacks, raids, and robberies, repress disturbances, the commission of outrages, and religious outbreaks, exact satisfaction for murders, briefly, to maintain peace and the British prestige all along the line.

Captain Nevill's object is to make available to the military student and everyone, including political officers, interested in the subject, an historical summary of our frontier expeditions and the lessons to be learnt from them. He appends to his book a chronological table of forty-eight North-West Frontier Campaigns, with which he has dealt; he has, therefore, apparently omitted some of the less important mentioned in the official return. They have not all been of the same magnitude. Sometimes only a few hundred troops have been engaged; in Tirah in 1897 there were 43,700 troops actively employed. Captain Nevill has consulted all the best-known works and official publications, including Paget and Mason's Record, which has naturally become incomplete in the course of time; and he has incorporated various tables, such as the strengths of the Field Forces engaged on twenty-seven expeditions, the war services of British and Indian regiments on this frontier, the Civil and Military "Rulers in India" since 1767, and the brief but excellent orders issued to the Field Forces under his command by Sir Neville Chamberlain, one of the greatest military frontier officers of all time.

Captain Nevill has thus produced a book which should be carefully studied by every officer stationed on any frontier of India; as a work of reference it will be invaluable to all engaged in frontier operations hereafter. The author has properly avoided entering into the political grounds for these expeditions. Their policy is decided elsewhere, before or while such operations are undertaken, and often is not disclosed at all: as a junior military officer he could hardly be cognisant of, or become acquainted with, the politics of the frontier, except so far as they appear in the reports of the military operations, which afford ample material for his pen. His general method is to state the facts and results of the expeditions, and then to review them. His review of the first period comes down to the year 1890; the subsequent reviews are more frequent, sometimes applying to a single expedition. In these portions of the work principles are elucidated and attention is called to the varying circumstances which necessitated the application of different tactics, as required in the many operations recorded. For instance, in reviewing the Chitral campaign of 1895, he writes:—"In India the three great lessons which have been taught in the past from our constant wars in that country have been: 'Never refuse battle,' 'Never show a sign of hesitation,' and 'When you get the enemy on the run, keep him there.' All these precepts are well illustrated in the operations under consideration." These are pithy and weighty maxims, which anyone can remember. There is a most useful Chapter XXIV., which summarizes in compact form the lessons to be deduced in the shape of Precepts and Examples for Mountain Warfare. The seventeen Precepts are so brief that they could easily be committed to memory: they are referred in each case to sections of the Field Service Regulations which every officer has to study. Examples are given of successful practice of the precepts, with warnings of mishaps which may attend their non-observance.

But Captain Nevill is not content with historical accounts of past expeditions; though a junior officer himself, as he admits, he boldly faces the questions of the future. As the principles of mountain warfare have changed since 1849, so they are continually progressing. Our strategy and tactics will have to be varied to meet altered conditions, such as improvement in the armament of the enemy and increase of their knowledge of war. It is notorious that, through the neglected gun-running in the Persian Gulf for some years, a traffic in arms sprang up on the frontier, which has resulted in the tribesmen being much better equipped than ever before with arms of precision and supplies of ammunition. It is a problem for British military science to recover the superiority in these and other respects which has slipped away. Wireless telegraphy, air vessels, noiseless firearms, improved artillery, the mono-rail, are suggested as directions in which a superiority in preparation can be regained. But actual experience of frontier warfare will always be the best schoolmaster, though the fees may be heavy. There is no reason to suppose that the frontier will always remain quiet, as it happens to be for the moment. After its definition in the Durand agreement of 1893 with the Amir, the boundary of Afghanistan was brought under demarcation. and our administrative frontier was similarly verified, to limit the respective spheres of influence. The tribes living in the intermediate belt of country are in perpetual dread of being absorbed by Afghanistan or the British Government; they love their independence, they know the strength of their wild hills and secluded valleys, they furnish recruits to our Indian Army, they have access to our territory, and any good or bad reason or fancy may set the frontier ablaze any day.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

This work will show the difficulties which have been hitherto encountered in respect of the climate, the maintenance of communications, transport service, food supplies, the use of cavalry, rear-guard actions, the want of preparation, the neglect of precautions, ambuscades, night attacks, sniping, surprises. The general reader will find the number of names of tribes and places rather trying, but they are for the most part traceable on the excellent maps which Captain Nevill has provided. His glossary of Hindustani words and military terms will be greatly appreciated. His rendering of the word morale appears hardly to include the sense in which it is applied to the mental condition of a military force. There are some slight slips among the names in Appendix C. Lord Lake was not Lieutenant-General Gerard, and General Lord Hugh Gough is a misnomer; but these are small matters. Captain Nevill's book fully deserves the cordial recommendation which Lord Roberts, perhaps the greatest living authority on Indian frontier warfare, has recorded in his brief Foreword. Exception may be taken in detail by individual officers to some of Captain Nevill's accounts of particular expeditions, but no doubt can be entertained of the general value of his work.

The Thirsty Gods

Les Dieux Ont Soif. By ANATOLE FRANCE. (Calmann-Lévy, Paris. 3f. 50c.)

SOME years ago a critic spoke of Anatole France as the Erasmus of our days. Anatole France has, at any rate, this of Erasmus beyond his learning, that he surveys the world from outside, and while he wishes it well, of course, he feels no responsibility for its mistakes and crimes, he does not groan over them or complain of them or even laugh at them, he understands and recounts them simply. In this book he tells the history of the Terror, that river of blood which was the outcome of the philosophy of Rousseau acting on a nation of half-enfranchised serfs. The old-world symbolism of the title pursues us throughout the story.

Its central figure, Evariste Gamelin, has a conscience, reason, high qualities, and sentiments; but becoming a member of the revolutionary tribunal, and believing with all his soul that a new society is coming to birth, his logic, reason, and conscience do but push him to the worst excesses of sanguinary brutality. He is ready to suffer anything for the happiness of the human race, and equally so to inflict any amount of suffering on others to the same end. Two women come into his life—Elodie, who loves him for what he is, and Mme. de Rochemaure, who is interested in the personage he has become. The latter is a woman who cannot resist the temptation to mix herself up with any political intrigue, and she brings not only her own head but those of her innocent friends to the guillotine.

The best-drawn figure in the book is Elodie, daughter of the print-seller, for whom Gamelin painted and drew. She is a charming creature, her simple wiles all bent on the pursuit of love and happiness, her devotion sharpened by a touch of fear as her lover comes to her steeped in blood. We meet an old friend, too, in the person of Maurice Brotteaux, a ruined financier, a ci-devant noble reduced to making children's toys for a living, one of the race of Jérôme Coignard and M. Bergeret. Reduced to the most abject misery, he remembers that life is not altogether bad, that there is beauty, the pleasure of knowledge, the memory of his happiness in a time when the art of living was at its best. He is an Epicurean; and a worn volume of Lucretius is his constant companion. He rescues in pure goodness of soul a young woman picked off the streets, and he shares his garret, at the risk of his life, with the Père de Longuemarre, who goes triumphantly to execution with one sole grief, that his judges will persist in calling him a Capuchin, whereas he is a Barnabite. Evariste follows his victims to the guillotine in the last days of the Terror, and the book ends as it began, with the simple everyday life of Paris going on placidly, unstained by the blood that soaked the ground.

Certes, Anatole France's history of the Revolution is a very different one from that of the text-books. No passionate declamations, no epic struggles, no heaving and struggling crowds press through these pages. The Terror is there indeed; we know it because every day we learn that some acquaintance is accused, or condemned, or in exile, but the daily life goes on unshadowed. A young man is pursuing a pretty girl, caught by the glance of a curl and a bright eye under a bonnet, and is cut off from her by the passage of a guarded waggon through the street; he tries to break through the horses and the guards, and fails. But this procession is the first of the revolutionary tumbrils going from the tribunal to the guillotine. And in this way Anatole France writes history as it appears to a contemporary, stripping the most important events of the consideration which they only acquired long after they had occurred. The passage of a pretty milliner was at the moment of more importance to the youth than the first stroke of the Terror. The foundation of the terrible revolutionary tribunal brings Mme. Gamelin her daily bread.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Anatole France's books are not of a nature to encourage an undue optimism in his readers. He strips our motives one by one of all the high-sounding qualities with which we have clothed them, and brings us down to the primal motives which have influenced mankind from its birth—love and hunger. It is not flattering to our self-esteem, but, at any rate, these motives have evolved humanity from the tree-ape through the cave-man; and however we may disagree with his analysis, we must all agree that the master has lost none of his marvellous craft, and thankfully receive another masterpiece from the first and chief of the writers of to-day.

A Baskish Lexicological Grammar

The Baskish Verb: A Parsing Synopsis of the 788 Forms of the Verb in St. Luke's Gospel, from Leiçarraga's New Testament of the Year 1571. By E. S. DODGSON, M.A. (Henry Frowde. 10s. net.)

THIS volume is the latest instalment of what appears to be the life-work of its industrious author—the compilation of a Grammar of the Baskish Verb as exemplified in the "Testamentu Berria" of Leiçarraga. Its aim is wholesomely ambitious and its method pleasingly novel, and both qualities are justified by their results. Whether the Bible in any vernacular is, as a text-book, the line of least resistance to the acquisition of a language may be debatable; but a strong brief for an affirmative was drafted by Macaulay's memorable instance, and is signally endorsed by Mr. Dodgson's contributions to Heuskarian, or Baskish, scholarship. Like its predecessors, this section of the general scheme smoothes the thorny pathway to the Leiçarragan verb by helpful analyses and ample quotations from Calvin's version. One example will suffice from Luke vii, 18:—"CIETZOTEN. 2. Ind. imp. pl. 3. r. pl., r. i. s., aux act. They had them to him. ETA CONTA CIETZOTEN Ioannesi bere discipuluec gauça hauc guciac. Toutes ces choses furent annoncees à Jean par ses disciples. Καὶ ἀπήγγειλαν Ἰωάννῃ οἱ μαθηταὶ ἀυτοῦ περὶ πάντων τούτων."

Here, as in all other instances, evidence and conclusion are presented as in a nutshell. The Greek text used here and there to parallel the Baskish, and to show its superiority to Calvin's version, is that adopted by the revisers of the A.V.; the French is Calvin's from the edition of 1566, which Leiçarraga and his co-translators consulted largely in preparing the now famous Baskish version of 1571. To English and French students possessing a working acquaintance with Greek this parallelism cannot but prove of the utmost advantage in obtaining a clear and speedy grasp of the moods and tenses of the immense Heuskarian verb. The numerous textual and foot-notes are further etymologically valuable, though they are inserted in what at first sight may seem a somewhat quixotic fashion, in French and English alternately. The reason for this arrangement, however, is soon abundantly clear, as the book presupposes in its readers a knowledge of both languages. A good proportion of the etymologies propounded are distinctly independent fruits of the author's own researches.

In my judgment, therefore, the work is entirely sui generis. It is not a pendant to Van Eys's "Outlines of Basque Grammar," nor to any similar production; but is a safe and agreeable substitute—at least, in the matter of the verbs—for any one of them; a book not only for beginners, but also for the most advanced, a storehouse of invaluable reference. The author rightly calls it "A Lexicological Grammar, or a Grammatical Lexikon"; and whereas the genus grammar ordinarily repels by its complexity, this will attract by its outstanding clearness and simplicity. The service thus rendered by it to the cause of philology generally, and to the study of an ancient and curious tongue is inestimable. That mistakes should occur (such as "Show ye" for "Have ye," S.V. IETZOCVE, p. 78; "When he had to them" for "When he had them to them," S.V. CERAVZTENEAN, p. 148, etc.), and be overlooked in the proofing, in so intricate a compilation, is perhaps inevitable, and the more so because the author has had no assistance in the revision, yet is so conscientious that he has already issued a corrigenda thereof. Mr. Dodgson was the first to obtain from any University a degree as a reward for Bascological studies, and in the opinion of many is deserving of a still higher one. It is to be hoped, at least, that some British University or patron of learning will come forward to defray the publishing cost of the remainder of his synopsis before his eyesight and energy are on the wane, so that its full value may be realised, instead of being only partially so from the fragments already available. With reference to the note on p. 199, Mr. Dodgson has discovered that G. Jerment borrowed, directly or indirectly, his allusion to Leiçarraga's books from the "History of De Thou," as quoted by M. Julien Vinson on p. 29 of the "Bibliographie Basque."

Of Leiçarraga's classic itself it only remains to be noted that, with the exception of some objectionable Latinising, such as "murmuratzen," "glorificatzen," "lamentatzen," "scribuz," etc., it has, like our own A.V., long been and will remain a standard of vernacular purity of idiom and diction. England possesses four out of the twenty-seven copies extant, the finest of which lies in the John Rylands Library, Manchester. Though belonging to the first or less perfect issue or edition of 1571, the condition of its binding (embossed, gilded parchment, apparently French sixteenth century workmanship) and typography is, me teste, a joy to the book-lover, and Mr. Dodgson is to be congratulated upon having notified his discovery of it to European and American Bascophiles.

JOHN BERNARD MCGOVERN.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Farrago and Fantasy

The Four Men: A Farrago. By H. BELLOC. (Nelson and Sons. 2s. net.)
The Green Overcoat. By H. BELLOC; with Illustrations by G. K. Chesterton. (J. W. Arrowsmith, Bristol. 6s.)

FOR a considerable time the reviewers have been asking Mr. Belloc for a second "Path to Rome," and perhaps this first volume, in praise of Sussex, is a result of that constant prompting; however that may be, "The Four Men" does not ascend to the excellent heights of the former book. For one thing, the redoubtable four, who meet and tramp across the county to the border, are all and each Mr. Belloc himself; they pass by the names of "Grizzlebeard," "The Sailor," "The Poet," and "Myself," but each one speaks and phrases in precisely the same style, so that the effect becomes slightly monotonous in time. The air of jollity and satire, of wide spaces and wind and sun, which we associate with Mr. Belloc's best moods, is here in plenty; so also is the tendency to indulge in huge tankards of ale, bread and cheese, the fine healthy fare of the countryside; and the best tendency of all—the desire to discuss freely all things in heaven and earth while swinging along under the open skies. And these discussions make the book worth reading, for although the voices are pitched in the same tones, the author manages to introduce points of view that vary and admit of pleasantly diversified argument.

Thus we arrive at a knowledge of what is "The Best Thing in the World"—"a mixture," according to the Poet, "wherein should be compounded and intimately mixed great wads of unexpected money, new landscapes, and the return of old loves"; according to the Sailor, "flying at full speed from pursuit, and keeping up hammer and thud and gasp and bleeding till the knees fail and the head grows dizzy, and at last we all fall down, and that thing (whatever it is) which pursues us catches us up and eats our carcases"; according to Myself, "the digging of holes and the filling of them up again" (which leads us on to a remarkable little essay, one of the fine pages of the book); and according to Grizzlebeard, who, tired of talking, turns away to clinch the argument, the best thing in the world is "sleep." With similar acceptable diversions the reader is beguiled through three hundred very pleasant pages, and, if at intervals he is moved to resent Mr. Belloc's adulation of his favourite county (having also known and loved, it may be, Cornwall, Devon, and the West, and found that Sussex is not to be mentioned in the same breath), he must remember that Mr. Belloc is a privileged person. Exaggeration so charmingly accomplished can be very easily forgiven.

If "The Four Men" is a "farrago," "The Green Overcoat" is a fantasy. It has its funny moments, the plot being started by the abduction of an overcoat on a rainy night by a storm-bound, absent-minded professor, who is thus mistaken for somebody else, is captured, and forced to sign a cheque; but 330 pages of consequences makes rather too much of a good thing. Mr. Belloc and Mr. Chesterton have perpetrated a "lark," the only drawback being that the reader does not enjoy it as much as they apparently have done.

Music during the Victorian Era

From Mendelssohn to Wagner: Being the Memoirs of J. W. Davison. Compiled by HENRY DAVISON. Illustrated. (Wm. Reeves. 12s. 6d. net.)

THIS is a disappointing book. It adds little or nothing of importance to our stock of information concerning music and musicians during the Victorian period. Very numerous are the volumes which have thrown light upon the subject in a fitful kind of way. Some of them are not unentertaining, though most of them are garrulous and gossipy rather than critical. We cannot call to mind any work of serious historical and critical interest which covers the ground, and such a book would be welcome. We had hoped to find something of the sort in Mr. Davison's memoirs. His reputation as a critic of music used to be considerable, and he had moved intimately in the musical world of his time. But the biographical portion of the book, extending, as it does, to 350 pages, is so diffuse, so unnecessarily laden with trivial and often irrelevant matter, that we rise from its perusal with but a confused recollection of its contents. It is as if we had been looking through a vast number of the portfolios of engravings which lie outside the second-hand bookshops of London or Paris, in the hope of discovering some one or two scarce, spirited, or interesting prints.

A number of Mr. Davison's articles from the Times and other journals are given at the end of the volume. They are written with a certain rather florid effectiveness, and there is no concealment of the author's opinions or predilections. Those from the Times are much the best, both in matter and manner. Mr. Davison was, no doubt, an able journalist, as well as an educated musician; but as a critic in the higher sense he makes but little impression now. His prejudices were very strong, yet in some of his later writings there is discernable a desire to be open-minded; though as late as 1881 he could still say to a friend, "How you can regard Schumann and Mendelssohn as equals is altogether beyond my comprehension," and "The music of 'Parsifal' is simply execrable." At an earlier day he had written of Schumann that he was "a noble failure." The letters from Berlioz are, perhaps, the most interesting in the book, and here and there are scraps of information which, at any rate, can raise a smile. To us who remember Joachim in later years it is certainly curious to read of the great man playing fantasies composed by himself on "John Anderson, My Jo," and the "Blue Bells of Scotland" at a Philharmonic concert! Jullien is a figure that attracts us in these pages, and we read with sympathy of Sterndale Bennett and Macfarren. Mr. Davison himself seems to have won the friendship and affection of many distinguished persons, but we cannot say that the impression given of him in these memoirs is altogether pleasing. Had the editor practised more "tact of omission," he might have presented us with a more successful portrait of Mr. Davison, both as a man and as a musician, and, had he cut down his book to one-third of its size, he would still have included all that was worth preserving.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Bismarckian Diplomacy

Les Origines Diplomatiques de la Guerre de 1870-1871: Recueil de Documents publié par le Ministère des Affaires Etrangères, Tome V, 6 Novembre, 1864—27 Février, 1865. (Gustave Ficker, Paris.)

THE interest of the present phase of the diplomatic war between France and Prussia centres in the relations between the latter Power and Austria and in the position of the secondary and minor German States. It had become already patent to Austria that she was enacting the part of the "dindon de la farce," but she was without a leading mind, and the devotion of Francis Joseph to King William was a very doubtful asset. It is true that the leading dupe, Rechberg, had retired from the scene and been replaced by Mensdorff, and that the French diplomatists occasionally discerned in the attitude of Austria "une expectative habile," but it is impossible to read into these pages anything but her decline and impending fall.

The problem that was exercising the numerous third parties to the Danish imbroglio was to know what advantage Austria could possibly hope to get out of it. It was indeed a baffling conundrum. Bismarck, for instance, told a French representative, in a moment of confidence, that Austria could have her share in the sequestered Duchies if she liked; "mais vous connaissez la fable du Renard et de la Cigogne: notre alliée est placée bien incommodément pour jouir du repas auquel elle voudrait participer." On the subject of Venetia the German Chancellor was simply dumb. His plan was to wait to "éterniser le provisoire dans les Duchés" and elsewhere, to play, as he said himself, the successful rôle of Fabius Cunctator.

The true Austrian policy, on the other hand, was probably to bring matters to a head; energetic action could not have cost more than inertia actually did. Competent observers considered that Austria had a great chance of restoring her prestige by putting herself at the head of the secondary States, who were tired of being browbeaten by Prussia. The events leading to the evacuation of Schleswig-Holstein by the Saxon contingent are a case in point. Bismarck had told them to go, and on their refusal had threatened their country with invasion. The Diet discussed the evacuation; Austria, it seems, put Prussia in a majority on this question, to avoid one of Bismarck's "coups de tête." The Prussian Chancellor admitted afterwards that, if he had been thwarted by the Diet, "il aurait passé outre"; what is stranger still, he seems to have wished to be in a minority, in order to settle the question on his own lines.

The Cunctator policy had almost matured at the end of this period; annexation of the Duchies had become practically the only probable solution; Prussian suzerainty was almost popular in the conquered provinces, and the idea of a Prussian navy smiled on the rest of Germany. The Saxo-Bavarian attempt to form a "troisième puissance" in Germany had definitely failed. An interesting side-light is thrown on English policy; Queen Victoria seems at the outset to have exercised a decisive influence as against Palmerston in favour of Germany, and to have prevented any pro-Danish demonstration.

Shorter Reviews

The "Bookman" Keats-Shelley Memorial Souvenir. Illustrated. (Hodder and Stoughton. 1s. 6d. net.)

THERE are many much more pretentious works than this that are not half so useful or interesting. We learn that Mr. St. John Adcock has been responsible for getting it up, and we must congratulate him on the result. The photographs of the persons concerned in the late celebrations were perhaps unavoidable in such a souvenir; but they do not greatly matter. It is far more to the point that a most admirable choice displays itself in the selection of the illustrations that in some way throw light on the two personalities that have occasioned the monograph. There are few drawings or paintings, either of Keats and Shelley, or those with whom they came most intimately into contact, that are not reproduced here. In addition to this, there are also a number of special articles and poems. Some of these are reprints specially gathered together, such as sonnets by Dante Gabriel Rossetti, Browning's "Memorabilia," and reminiscences by Arthur Severn. There is, in addition to this, an article on "Shelley and Keats in the Twentieth Century," by Mr. Buxton Forman, and an article that we do not recall as having seen before, by Mr. William Watson, on "Shelley as Poet." Altogether, this is a souvenir that is not as other souvenirs are. Yet it is by no means a pharisaical, but quite a gay souvenir; and we confidently say that all those who possess it will carefully keep it against a day of need.

The Lower Depths. By MAXIM GORKY, translated by LAURENCE IRVING. (T. Fisher Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.)

IT is not a year since this play of gloom was produced at the Kingsway, but probably it is not widely remembered. In its book form, without the aid and attraction of an enthusiastic cast, "The Lower Depths" is more depressing than ever, and really M. Gorky and Mr. Irving might remember how easy it is to make us miserable, and how much more worth while it is to reform us by some kind of subtle entertainment. Such a picture of the lives and misfortunes of a group of tatterdemalions may, of course, show the highest art, but in this case the gross agony is too full for the work to be one of real distinction. There is, doubtless, a class of mind—simple and curious—that will delight in this style of drama, but to the experienced and the critical, the balanced and the knowing, "The Lower Depths" lacks the beauty which should underlie every work of art, however coarse or however refined its subject. That it is a brilliant study in its particular class is already well known. That it is a high form of art we beg to doubt. Mr. Irving's translation may be a very just and true one, but it does not always convince, and, of course, he does nothing to add beauty to the original. We are inclined to quote "Satine's" last line when we think of this example of Gorky's work: "Ah! . . . he's spoiled the song. . . ." Life is not quite such a terror as "The Lower Depths" would lead the reader to suppose.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Girls' School Year Book, 1912. (The Year Book Press. 3s. 6d. net.)

Matriculation Directory, June, 1912. (Burlington House, Cambridge. 1s. net.)

The Social Guide, 1912. Edited by MRS. HUGH ADAMS and EDITH A. BROWNE. (A. and C. Black. 2s. 6d. net.)

THE object of "The Girls' School Year Book" is "to provide a record, at once comprehensive and concise, of all matters of interest to parents, schoolmistresses and girls in connection with Secondary Education." From a cursory glance through the 640 closely printed pages of the volume it would appear that the intention of the compilers has been exceedingly well carried out. Part I deals in considerable detail with the principal schools for girls in Great Britain. The schools are arranged in alphabetical order, and a short description is given of each one. Part II is a most useful portion of the book, as it deals with the future career of girls when they leave school. We would here like to make a suggestion that some indication of the contents of this second portion should be given either in the title or sub-title of the book, as it is a most handy and complete guide to the various occupations now open to women.

The "Matriculation Directory" contains the list of examination questions set for candidates in June last, and will be of interest to intending candidates for future examinations.

"The Social Guide" contains a well-arranged calendar of all events that have taken or are likely to take place during the present year. Particulars are also given of all large associations in connection with social life, together with many pages on sport of all kinds. It should prove a most handy reference book to all visitors to London, as well as to the resident population, as it supplies information with regard to prices, requisite dress, and means of access to those functions so intimately associated with London's amusements.

Fiction

The Woman Between. By EDMUND BOSANQUET. (John Long. 6s.)

A SUGGESTION was put forward some time ago by a literary critic to the effect that Shakespeare's plays, if modernised by capable hands, would make better novels than the average output of publishing houses of to-day. The author of "The Woman Between" has stopped at eighteenth century drama instead of going as far back as Shakespeare, has brought forward the men and women of that time into the atmosphere of twentieth century life, and has produced a really creditable story by this means. The hero, Ned, although a most modern guardsman, has no place in twentieth century life really: he is the impetuous, warm-hearted Irishman of one hundred and fifty years ago. Philip, the villain, incidentally a Napoleon of finance, would figure equally well in eighteenth century dress, and the heroine is a modernised edition of the damsels who haunted Vauxhall and like places in their palmy fashionable days.

The scheme succeeds, and we are very much interested in these people and their doings. The story is told in a most engaging style, and its only weak point, as far as we can see, is the sudden conversion—albeit by rather drastic methods—of Philip to comparative morality and respectability. It seems hardly credible, bearing in view the attitude which he maintains for three-quarters of the story, that he should develop complaisance with the views of more respectable people, no matter what pressure might be brought to bear on him, but we console ourselves by reflecting that perhaps he went back to his old ways after the last chapter, in which the hero and heroine escape beyond his reach.

We credit the author with a rather fine sense of humour in some parts of this work, and with an excellent gift of characterisation throughout. Some of his minor characters—notably the squire and his wife, are admirably drawn. It is, on the whole, a very interesting story, and well told at that.

Cairn Lodge. By ANTOINE LE BOROVSKI. (Murray and Evenden. 2s. net.)

WE learn from an announcement of the publishers in The Author that the writer of this blood-curdling "shocker," which is dedicated, by the way, "To my distinguished father," is a woman. We wonder how that distinguished parent received this mark of filial regard, for we doubt if any man of sense and sensibility, let alone distinction, could welcome with joy such a production as the work before us. The wrapper bears an illustration depicting a muscular young woman in the act of gripping a prostrate old man by the throat, which may, perhaps, attract readers with morbid minds. Those, however, whose nerves are not strong will rightly regard it as a warning to avoid such an extremely unpleasant place as Cairn Lodge. It is true that nothing very gruesome occurs there during the earlier part of the narrative, but the latter half of the book positively bristles with horrors. The authoress shows some little skill in sketching sundry types of shabby, impoverished gentlefolk, but we cannot praise her delineation of her chief characters, who comprise a bibulous and degraded old satyr, the said satyr's daughter, and one of the daughter's girl-friends, whom the satyr persecutes with loathsome attentions after previously frightening his poor old wife to death. Both this hoary old scoundrel and his implacable daughter are very much overdrawn; they do not resemble human beings, and we can take no interest in them. If nightmare were a desirable thing, "Cairn Lodge" might be deserving of commendation, but as horrible visitations in one's sleep are usually unwelcome, we feel it only right to warn impressionable people against this two-shilling effusion of a distinguished female Borovskian mind.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Wings of Love. By C. RANGER GULL. (Greening and Co. 6s.)

WERE it not for the fact that an airship is introduced into the opening chapters of this book, and that an airship race forms almost the last incident of the story, it could well be imagined that the author had taken us back to fiction of the harmless novelette type. There is the young and beautiful heroine who is hidden from public gaze by two unscrupulous persons until she shall attain her majority, when she is to be handed over with her fortune to a dissolute old Greek; there is the scheming and desperate woman who loves the hero; and there is the brave and noble hero. Seeing beauty in distress (the lady has scrambled down some trelliswork from a room at the top of the house in which she was locked), the hero promptly carries off the heroine in his aeroplane, and swears that he will guard her for evermore. The fight then begins in real earnest between the wonderful hero and the unscrupulous ruffians aided by the fair lady whose overtures the hero has rejected. Adventure after adventure is gone through, but an air of unreality hangs over the whole book. It is expected that when great matters are at stake the ordinary methods of detection will be surpassed, but when we are asked to believe that a man is placed in a coffin and motored from London to Brighton, and there threatened and tortured because he will not renounce all claim to the girl he loves, we think that the author is asking too much of the reader's credulity. To those who like a touch of the improbable with their romance, the book may possibly appeal, but for a modern story the methods savour far too much of the apocryphal adventures of a Deadwood Dick, Ned Kelly, or Dick Turpin.

The Grey Terrace. By MRS. FRED REYNOLDS. (Chapman and Hall. 6s.)

ANOTHER story of Cornwall from the author of "The Horseshoe" is welcome, though the plot, in some particulars, is rather strained, and one or two of the characters are not quite natural. Keith Trent, a young doctor, strikes a man in a London slum and finds that the man has died in his fall; Keith's friend Jeanne, also a doctor, certifies that the fall was not the cause of death, but the tender-hearted Keith is oppressed terribly by his deed. And when, later, he acts as locum tenens for a friend in Cornwall, and loses his heart to a girl who has said in his hearing that she would never have anything to do with a man who had killed another, the story begins to fascinate the reader. Its faults are precisely those which we indicated in Mrs. Reynolds' previous book; among them an irritating insistence upon needless minutiæ, such as the following:—

> Miss Patty was not apparently reading her companion's expression; instead, she was busy fitting the fingers of one hand exactly to those of the other. Either Miss Patty was nervous or her hands failed to pair, for the fitting process seemed fraught with difficulty.

And a little farther on we learn that "she had given up the unequal contest with her hands, that were clearly not a pair." This sort of thing is maddening when it occurs in a really good story by an author who ought to know better. Apart from these complaints, we can recommend "The Grey Terrace"; though never exciting, it is consistently interesting.

Elsie Lindtner. By KARIN MICHAELIS. Authorised Translation by BEATRICE MARSHALL. (John Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

THE woman whose name gives the title to the present book is a very different character from the one we knew in "The Dangerous Age." The Elsie who left her husband's house in pursuit of the solitude of which she so soon tired was a person with whose selfish outlook the normal woman could have little sympathy. Elsie, as she reveals herself in the sequel to the previous book, is one for whom the reader can feel compassion, even though he may think her ideas mistaken. There is a glimpse of the true woman shining through the clouds of error, and a faint suggestion of the very human feeling of remorse for the mistakes she made when she renounced her rightful protector. A soul cannot be wholly lost which in its acute loneliness and despair looks round to see what joy it can bring into the lives of others; and in following the fortunes of her maid, and in the adoption of a small street urchin, Elsie finds consolation and a certain amount of happiness. At times the story rises to a certain lofty pinnacle, but the telling of so much of it by a series of letters is apt to detract somewhat from its force. We hope that the next book from the clever pen of Karin Michaelis will contain some laughter and fewer tears.

The Theatre

The Irish Players

WE have been very glad to notice in the Press that several writers have protested strongly against the barbarism of a number of boors who came ruthlessly tramping in across the beauty of "Riders to the Sea" at the Court Theatre. We have more than once thought that this play should not be given at the opening of a programme. Each time we have seen it, it has been largely marred in this way. But this year it was terrible. Nearly all the way through the progress of the play, people in evening dress (one acquits the pit from the discourtesy) came flocking in, whispering, and throwing down their seats with a loud clatter. The vandalism was all the worse because of the charm of the piece. We do not know a moment of such intense and harrowing beauty in the theatre as when Maurya sprinkles the holy water over her son's dead body and laments her great lament. Miss Sara Allgood's interpretation of the part is one of the very great things that the Irish Players have to give us. This year she seemed rather more to be seeking her effect; but this probably was owing to the discourtesy that we have already referred to. And when she returns to her lament at the conclusion of the play, the extra strain was noticeable. We have always considered this return to be one of the great faults of the play (the other being a feeling that the illusion of time had been strained), because it is not possible that the human mind may twice within so short a period return to so poignant a pain. And when one felt a slight strain in the acting, the effect was the more pronounced. Nevertheless, for pure beauty, such beauty as is so high that it draws the mind tense with terror of a holy kind, "Riders to the Sea" stands out as incomparably Synge's loftiest piece of work. And Miss Sara Allgood as Maurya, in a moment of quiet, strong acting, realised for one the possibilities of that beauty.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Another such moment is the interpretation by Miss Eileen O'Doherty of the mother in "Birthright." She and Mr. Sydney Morgan as Maurya and Batt Morrissey have to carry the main burden of that fine play, while Mr. O'Donovan and Mr. Kerrigan as Hugh and Shane, the central figures of the action, make as fine a combination as could be wished. Each actor seems so suited to his part that it would be difficult to conceive of any other combination. The earthy strength and brutality of Batt, bitter in the realisation of the fact that each sod of earth on his farm is heavy with his sweat; Maurya, the housewife and mother, tenderly thoughtful of all, anxious to keep peace, and always unconsciously remembering the fact that her blood is gentler than her husband's; Hugh, who is his mother's own son, a boy striking for leadership and learning, and not at all the farmer by instinct; Shane, the younger son, who is precisely what his brother is not, a source of pride to his father (whereas his brother is only a source of pride to his mother), and who feels keenly, in his strong stubborn way, that it is his brother who is his mother's favourite, not himself: that is a combination that compels our sympathy in each unit of it. We can become separately identified with each. For the father it is right that Shane should be his successor in the farm, not Hugh, who is not a farmer, and of whom he is openly contemptuous. Yet the birthright is Hugh's, and it is inconceivable to the mother that it should be otherwise. All this is quite consummately done. For a first play, Mr. Murray shows the instinct of the dramatist in very pure quality. It is only at the moment of the crisis that he makes a slight mistake—though, to be sure, it is permissible enough. For when Hugh calls out on Shane that he is a "grabber," it is exceedingly doubtful if anyone without local knowledge would realise the bitter flavour of the word. One feels that it has a strong significance that can only be called local, but not the full meaning of it. That is unavoidable, perhaps. It must compel its own way, and ring an increasing conviction with time. The conclusion is as inevitable as it is tense, however, and that is very high praise.

We have already said in these columns that "Birthright" reads as strongly as it plays. To that we hold. But in that fact there is one fault that Mr. Murray needs, it seems to us, to attend to: a fault that shows itself more fully in "Maurice Harte." For to say of "Birthright" that it reads as strongly as it plays is not a very exact way of speaking. It may mean that its strength is apparent in the words; it may also mean that the words themselves have literary strength and virtue in their choice and arrangement. It is in the first sense that the words are to be understood in this case, and in that we imply a certain criticism of Mr. Murray's plays. It is an indisputable fact that no play wins itself through to permanent attention if it have not a literary excellence apart from the acting. And it is an equally indisputable fact that all plays that do not win themselves through in this way are a form of dramatic journalism. We cannot speak more highly of Mr. Murray than to say that the author of "Birthright" clearly does not intend merely to be such a dramatic journalist. Indeed, unless we much mistake, and if it has not discarded its intention and inspiration, the Abbey Theatre does not exist for the mere purpose of dramatic journalism, though as time proceeds the pull will inevitably be in that direction. But "Birthright" does call for a beauty of phrase, of word and cadence, that shall make its separate portions as memorable as its whole. Nevertheless, it stands out with "Riders to the Sea" in the purifying and exalting quality of its last great moment.

This year, after the struggle of the brothers, the end was quite unaccountably rushed. It is, as we conceive it, a great mistake. After the entry of Shane in the last act, the pace, despite one or two retardations for the purpose of a gathered impetus, should quicken and hasten until the fierce impetuous struggle of the brothers. Then the whole rush should halt, and the play should proceed with the slow deliberation of horror to the close. It is not necessary to say why. The logic of it in the emotions is surely self-evident. Instead of which, this year, after the pause when Shane discovers the terrible thing he has unwittingly done, the fast pace of the penultimate movement is continued to the end.

We have alluded to these two plays together because they both, in their wholly different ways, fulfil the great demand of tragedy. They both purify; they both exalt. In the modern misuse of words, which is always the result of debasement, tragedy has come to be thought of as identical with calamity. Yet they are vastly different things; and many and many a play that is called a tragedy is no more than a calamity—often in more senses of the word than one. When people, therefore, say that they have no wish for tragedy, often they mean no more than that they have a healthy objection to calamity. Certainly the quiet moments of awe at the conclusions of both these plays did not arise from distaste: they arose from exaltation and the hush of the purifying mood: and to have recovered that in the theatre is a splendid achievement.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Two Plays at King's Hall

THE Theosophical Art Circle, presumably as an incentive and an encouragement to us to join the revolt against the materialism of the present age, produced two plays by Clifford Bax at the King's Hall Theatre, Covent Garden, on Saturday evening last. The first of these, "Echo and Narcissus," was described as "a mystical interpretation of the Greek fable" associated with Narcissus' realisation of his love for Echo. Unfortunately, both from theosophical and artistic standpoints, the requisite lyrical atmosphere could not be attained by a weak company upon the stage. The transference of the imagination from the echoing boards of the National Sporting Club to a wooded vale in Arcady became a question of self-deceit. With the exception of Miss Gwendolen Bishop, who said her lines with great point and feeling, the elocution was poor and the interpretation feeble.

In "The Marriage of the Soul," an Egyptian mystery play, Mr. Bax, who is the author of "The Poetasters of Ispahan," the curtain-raiser at the Criterion Theatre, realised to a much greater extent the limits of symbolic treatment upon the stage. In the first scene a young priest wishes to renounce his vows because the sunshine of love has entered his heart. But it is too late—a funeral cortège is heard approaching the sepulchre, and the youth must once again recite the litany: at its conclusion he learns that the departed was his beloved! The second scene was set in the Hall of Double Judgment, and the soul of the departed priestess is about to be weighed in the scales of eternal justice. Her soul is lighter than a feather, there is no dross; the future is now for her to choose. She does not return to earth to search for her lamenting lover, but goes to the arms of Osiris. Mr. Robert Farquharson gave an impressive rendering of the character of the young priest, and the whole production attained a far higher level than the former play. During the evening Miss Mavis Yorke and a company of child dancers delighted the audience with a series of woodland dances. Mention must be made of Miss Yorke's solo effort, "The Moth," to music by MacDowell. The plays were produced by Miss Gwendolen Bishop.

The Earl's Court Tourney

FAIR ladies and gallant knights, glowing costumes and shining armour, prancing horses and nodding plumes, lofty grey battlements and a vast arena—what more could you wish, should your mind feel inclined to wander back a few centuries along the ages? Certainly the spectacular effect of the rehearsal left nothing to be desired. Under the vigilant eye of Mr. F. R. Benson and of Lord Lonsdale—who, although in twentieth century costume, cut a very fine figure on his splendid bay horse—the procession of knights and ladies came and went; varlets hastened to and fro, and the Queen of Beauty, enthroned, was borne in on the sturdy shoulders of her henchmen. The mounted quadrille, in which so many ladies and men of note took part, was carried out practically without a hitch, producing an effect that was perfectly entrancing. Concerning the main feature of the spectacle, the tilting itself, opinions varied. There were knights who dashed with enthusiasm into the lists, and broke their spears right gallantly upon the iron breasts of their opponents. There were others who ambled into the fray surely, but very slowly, and who, indeed, seemed rather in doubt as to whether the weapon in their hand should be treated as a lance or as an agricultural implement. Perhaps this was scarcely to be wondered at, considering the temperature which must have prevailed within those mailed suits In any case, the real majesty of the entire spectacle was one to be remembered. What a pity that such picturesque folk as these cannot be let loose in the Piccadilly of to-day! We have advanced in many ways, but not in the matter of costume.

A Master of Pageantry at "Shakespeare's England."

BY HALDANE MACFALL.

THAT historical painting, which was until lately held to be of the first rank in the art of colour, has been reduced to its fit and proper rank—and that not the highest rank—is no reason why it should now be sneered away as if not in the province of art at all. If historical writing, whether in drama or other literary form, shall be, and most fitly is, an important realm of art, then of a surety it is a legitimate province of painting that history should also be legitimately reconstructed to appeal to the imagination through the sense of vision. We are much inclined to overlook this fact to-day. Such being so, let us note at the same time that mere historical accuracy of detail cannot create art; it must be so employed that the artist uses it simply as part of the battery of the craft whereby he creates emotional illusion—in other words, the reconstruction of the past must be wrought in such skilful fashion that, whilst we are never fretted by the wrongness of detail, we are made to visualise the spirit of the past as a reality, not as a museum fact. No man living is more richly gifted with this artistic skill than the veteran Royal Academician, Seymour Lucas. Yet by that strange oversight that seems to miss all significance in our native genius, his gifts are neglected and honours pass by him.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

When State pictures of Royal events and suchlike pageantry are commanded, it seems pathetic that to incompetent artists is given the pictorial record of our mighty history, when so gifted a man as Seymour Lucas is amongst us for the achievement of it. Of so imaginative a poet as Brangwyn it may be said—and with justice—that his poetic record of a great event of State would sacrifice mere detail to the great dominant spirit of the affair. It may sound quaint criticism, but it is, on the other hand, legitimate criticism. Beside Brangwyn, of course, Seymour Lucas cannot be placed, whether for power or poetic gifts. Of Seymour Lucas, however, even whilst he would record the spirit before the detail, it must be said that, at any rate, he would do so without recklessness. And surely it would make for splendour to have the spirit dominant—the higher truth of the thing—rather than the bald commonplace coloured records such as afflict the Royal collections! What this artist could have made of State pictures it is easy to realise when we survey the consummate judgment of the man in the reconstruction of "Shakespeare's England" at Earl's Court—the most successful piece of the historical pageantry of England that it has yet been our lot to look upon—to say nothing of the finely designed and well-arrayed tourney that has been the talk of London. It is a thousand pities that this reconstruction of the Tudor tourney was only permitted to the ken of so exclusive an audience as was allowed to be present—for its excellence deserved a wide public. There may have been a shrinking in the minds of the descendants of some of the great historic houses of the land lest they should have been seen at play by the populace; but so finely wrought a performance put it above all dread of assault. However that may be, its achievement places it amongst the most brilliant reconstructions of the life of the past that it would be well possible to imagine.

The tourney, to touch upon the exclusive event first, was not without its ironies, its surprises, and its mishaps. The chief defect—an innate defect—was that, being merely an artistic reconstruction, the tilting of necessity lacked the reality, the pace, and the passion even of the joust; but it is the function of art to give the impression, not the mere reality; and the impression was skilfully achieved. "The Miracle" taught us much; and that the tourney had benefited thereby was obvious to the critical. Of the ironies was the strange fact that, whilst so tried and able an actor as Mr. Benson could not deliver his words so that they could be heard by the vast audience, Mrs. George Cornwallis-West spoke her lines with such remarkable power and clarity that not a word was missed from end to end of the huge place; not an inflection of the voice but was firmly uttered. But supreme above all other achievements was the craftsmanship of the man who had designed the costumes—the bays were with Seymour Lucas.

One could not help being struck again and again throughout by the freedom from tawdry, incompetent, or weak patches. The very men-at-arms who stand before the doors of the theatre or suchlike places are convincing. The brilliant woman who initiated this tribute to England's greatest son revealed her most able capacity in selecting the ideal man to fulfil her design; and it speaks well for her insight that she drew forth the modest personality of Seymour Lucas, and revealed his remarkable gifts to a public who had probably scant idea of these gifts.

Yet, as one looks back upon his career and record, it seems extraordinary that others of lesser gifts should have been honoured by the State, and Seymour Lucas passed by. The most scholarly member of the Royal Academy in all that relates to historical research and knowledge, the supreme authority on costume now living, perhaps about as fine an authority on armour, a man whose opinion is well-nigh final upon the history of furniture, it is a fit moment to remember that Seymour Lucas came to eminence at an early age as an historical painter. His "Gordon Riots" revealed him not only a scholar, but an artist gifted with powers to utter history in terms of the senses. He seems, like many others, to have been driven to portraiture, when his mastery lay in far other fields, wherein was scant harvest or career; and his dogged pursuit and scholarly habits had almost seemed to have made for obliteration when the modern vogue for pageant brought forth to blossom again the qualities of an artist who, if the State has been justified in its tributes to other painters, should certainly have been honoured.

There will be ever-increasing desire amongst our peoples, whether home or Colonial born, or our kin across the sea in the great English-speaking Republic, to pay homage to the genius of Britain's immortal son as the day of his tercentenary approaches; but of all the pageants in his honour it will be difficult to better the historical reconstruction of "Shakespeare's England" at Earl's Court. And whilst all praise is due to the initiative of the brilliant woman who schemed out its achievement, the bays rest with her lieutenant, the man who has designed it all with rare skill—Seymour Lucas.

In any country with a Minister of Fine Arts, such a scholarly artist as this must have received honours from the State; but we seem to muddle on, and discourage even the few able Academicians, whilst the very servants of the Academy are knighted, and great gifts of modern art are refused by those officially appointed to administer the arts, in order that the French national collections may be enriched. City gentlemen whose sole claim to title is that they have benefited themselves by commerce are dubbed freely; but the men of national significance—those who have laboured to utter all that is significant in the life of the race—the artists, whether painters or writers—indeed, the poets in whatever medium—are passed by! We are a strange people, most wonderfully planned.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Some Recent French Books

EACH year, in July, the schools of France witness a touching or imposing fête, according to their importance, when the distribution of prizes takes place. In a very small school, situated in the old village of Nouvion-en-Thiérache, in the department of Aisne, the annual solemnity of prize day assumes quite a familiar and one may even say patriarchal character. For it is M. Ernest Lavisse, director of the Ecole Normale, member of the Académie, and one of the leading French professors of the University, who presides at the little intimate fête. He insists on being present each year at the distribution de prix of the quaint little school, where, long ago, he used to sit as pupil on the well-worn forms. And can any picture be more touching than that of a universally known and admired student, the first professor of France, presiding over the distribution of prizes of one of the least important schools? No doubt, when M. Lavisse finds himself in the midst of all of those little villagers, he lives over again his childhood and early youth. It is therefore hardly surprising that he should have conceived the idea, in his later life, of publishing these recollections, "Souvenirs" (Calmann-Lévy. 3fr. 50c.).

M. Lavisse sketches the fleeting impressions of his youth in the clear, concise style which has greatly contributed to his reputation as historian. It is curious to note that he probably derived his love of history from the thrilling stories his grandparents used to tell him in his childhood. For they had been eye-witnesses of Napoleon's wars. They had seen the Prussians and the Cossacks; they had lived through days of terror and anguish. And it is not presumptuous to presume that it was to their vivid descriptions of the glorious Napoleonic era M. Lavisse must surely owe that love of history he has ever since retained. Everybody who claims to be more or less of a student has read, or at least has heard, of his important historical works; his "Origines de la Monarchie Prussienne" and his "Essai sur la Jeunesse de Frédéric II." may justly claim to be modern classics. It is therefore not astonishing that, whilst applying his talent to the analysis of self and of the influences which all contributed towards forming the spirit he actually possesses, M. Lavisse should have shown the same qualities which characterise all his greater works. And surely there can be no more pleasant pastime than that of reading pages written by one who, having attained his full intellectual maturity, sketches, in the autumn of his life, with exquisite sincerity, and with evident pleasure, the recollections of his youth.

Automobilism has, in almost every country, given birth to a new literature, which at first rather puzzled and bewildered us, but with which we are at present quite familiar and which we even enjoy. This literature is not nearly as voluminous in France as it is in England; nevertheless, it has made considerable progress, thanks to Henry Kistemaeckers, Maurice Leblanc, and R. A. Schayé. This last-named author has just published a most amusing book called "A l'Etape" (Bibliothèque Omnia. 3fr. 50c.), in which, in a series of short chapters, he sketches the little comedies and tragedies apt to befall automobilists. The mishaps of the road are fully described, and one guesses that M. Schayé, besides being a brilliant barrister, is also a first-class motorist. It would be difficult to analyse this little book, replete with humour. It is sufficient to say that it reveals a very deep knowledge of the psychology of the motor, which, after woman, would appear to be the most bewildering, maddening, contradictory, yet withal fascinating entity in all creation! Among other recent works, "Au Maroc" (Bernard Grasset. 3fr. 50c.), by M. Gustave Babin, presents an undeniable interest. M. Babin knows Morocco as very few Europeans know it. He has even approached the Sultan, and he narrates several conversations he had with Mulaï-Hafid. It seems that this interesting personage possesses a far more complex psychology than is generally believed, and that he may be reserving some pleasant surprises for France. M. Gustave Babin's book will greatly help those not quite familiar with the Moroccan question to grasp it thoroughly.

The Illustration published last winter, with a number of interesting photographs, Pierre Loti's description of his pilgrimage to the ruins of Angkor. This remarkable work has just been presented in book form by Calmann-Lévy (3fr. 50c.), and has very naturally attracted the attention it deserves. It is curious to note that in "Un Pèlerin d'Angkor," as in all his other works, Loti does not so much give us a detailed description of the marvels he has had the privilege of seeing; he rather describes his "état d'esprit" at a particular moment. We must not complain, however, of this continual analysis of self, subject to the influences of different climates, art, atmosphere, or even sentiments, for it is the medium through which the inimitable writer and exquisite colourist reveals to us as no other has ever done—excepting, perhaps, Lafcadio Hearn, and even then in quite a different way—the incomparable charm and melancholy of the tropics. The dominant note in all Pierre Loti's work is a serene sadness, and this characteristic is nowhere so noticeable as in "Un Pèlerin d'Angkor." The first chapter of the book, in which he speaks of his childish dream of seeing the "evening star rise over the ruins of Angkor," contains some of the most deliciously intimate, sincere, and simple pages the great prose poet has ever written. And we follow him as he guides us up along the rivers of Siam and Cambodia, under the drooping boughs of rare trees, all alive with the chattering of marvellous birds, to the vast, terrifying, imposing ruins of Angkor—glorious remains of a glorious civilisation, which the tropical forests seem to have furtively and silently swallowed up.

We cannot help regretting that M. Loti has indulged in so many repetitions, and that he should have been so hypnotised by the bats which dwell in the sombre galleries peopled by ghastly statues of decapitated or mutilated gods. Those nocturnal haunters of the disused sanctuaries have impressed M. Loti to a rather unusual and unnecessary degree. On nearly every page the word bat occurs, accompanied by various adjectives, producing at length a really painful impression of heaviness and monotony. M. Loti should remember that couleur locale is not to be abused. In the last chapter of "Un Pèlerin d'Angkor" the author gives vent to the melancholy with which his soul is tinged, and to the intense spiritual unrest he has brought home from his innumerable voyages. He declares that the belief he has culled from the countless temples and shrines he has visited in all parts of the earth is the conviction of the sovereign existence of a God of Pity. If he had never written anything but the first and last chapters of this remarkable book, he would nevertheless have achieved immortality.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Mademoiselle Judith Cladel has drawn a curious and conscientious portrait of Mademoiselle de La Vallière in the collection of the "Femmes Illustres" (Nillson. 3fr. 50c.). She presents her heroine under a very favourable light, and expresses the utmost sympathy for the charming favorite's agitated life. And, indeed, as drawn by Mademoiselle Cladel, the personality of La Vallière is a most touching one. Her great and unfaltering love for the King has something of the sublime about it, and makes one momentarily forget her baser characteristics. But her end redeems her whole life, and the pages in which the authoress depicts La Vallière's admission into the Carmelite Convent and her humble life there until a very advanced age, are extremely interesting, on account of the details and analysis of character they contain. Mademoiselle Cladel is a conscientious, clever writer, possessing keen analytical qualities, somewhat lacking, perhaps, in fantasy and originality. Her book will nevertheless remain a precious document of the Court of Louis the Fourteenth. In the same series, "Ninon de Lenclos," an anecdotal biography of the famous courtisane by M. Emile Magne, also deserves mention. It is full of amusing details, and it will form agreeable holiday reading—but only for "grown-ups"!

There has been a rich harvest of novels lately, and "Le Ressac" (Bernard Grasset. 3fr. 50c.), by Camille Mallarmé, ranks certainly among the best. It contains some remarkable descriptions of Italy, being quite personal and showing keen observation. The psychological part of the novel is far inferior to the descriptive part. The heroine, though posing as having Anglo-Saxon tendencies, is rather incomprehensible. But as "Le Ressac" is a first book, it augurs well for the future, when Camille Mallarmé will have learnt, let us hope, to discriminate more clearly the flowers from the weeds which grow so abundantly in the garden of her imagination.

M. Georges Soulié has adapted into French an authentic Chinese novel called "Lotus d'Or" (Fasquelle. 3fr. 50c.), belonging to the seventeenth century. And he tells us in his preface that nothing has changed in Chinese social life since the time this work was written. Thus we are initiated to the intimate existence of a Chinese household, and we had better warn those persons who fear to have their moral susceptibilities ruffled or astonished that they would do better to continue to ignore the characteristics of conjugal relations in China. Lotus d'Or, the heroine, is a most alarming young person, whose chief virtue consists in not possessing any! Her husband, Simen the Glorious, is the happy owner of several such charming young spouses, and his polygamy has the deplorable result of bringing about his premature death.

It is indisputable that this book fills quite an important void in the general literature of to-day, and it is a faithful, exact painting of Chinese life, mentality, and sentimentality. It contains, moreover, some exquisite specimens of Chinese poetry, and the language and form of the whole work have a grace and colouring differing so essentially from those of our own literature that it proves irresistibly attractive. M. Georges Soulié has retained in his able translation all the charm of the Oriental phraseology and metaphors. This is, perhaps, the best praise we can bestow upon him, and let us hope he will soon initiate us to other Chinese novels, treating of "life, love, and hatred." MARC LOGE.

English Character Seen Through Italian Spectacles.—I

BY PROFESSOR HERBERT STRONG.

IF we in England have not succeeded in carrying out the injunction proclaimed by the Roman satirist to have proceeded from Heaven, "Know thyself," it is surely not from lack of instructors. From the Middle Ages down to the present day our national character has interested foreigners, who have described their impressions of us from different points of view. It cannot be said that our characters or our prospects as envisaged by the eyes of our Teutonic cousins and lately displayed to the world through German spectacles are particularly calculated to foster on our part an attitude of contented complacency. Perhaps kinsmen are more nearly aware of each other's shortcomings than complete strangers.

A study of our nation has lately been written by the Italian author, Signor Bevione,* who is well known as a diligent student of different nationalities, whose characters and institutions he is interpreting to his own countrymen. He takes, on the whole, a more favourable view of our country and ourselves than that expressed lately in the books of our Teutonic and American kinsmen. This is the more gratifying, since Mr. Bagot has recently assured us that the Italians as a nation very strongly resent what they allege to be the sentiment of the ordinary Englishman as regards Italy and the Italians, namely, an antiquarian curiosity, as distinguished from a wish to become acquainted with the aspirations of a young nation with a passion for modernity. Our author can hardly find words strong enough to express his wonderment at the energy and movement of London:—

* L'Inghilterra d'Oggi. La Civiltà Contemporanea. No. 5. (Fratelli Bocca, Turin. 5s.)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

> It is the city which more than any other in the world awakes the strongest admiration, and imparts the most lasting store of reminiscences. It has small beauty, but an expression of incalculable strength. Traffic, movement and noise: these three form the sensible expression of the great Anglo-Saxon characteristic—a passion for work. The basic virtue, the irrepressible instinct of the Englishman is to surmount all difficulties, to devote his labours unceasingly to the extraction of all that the earth has to yield, to minister thereby to his wealth and his pleasures. The flaccid laziness characteristic of the slums in Latin cities has no leisure here to mature.

It seems far from impossible that some of the measures lately taken by an ultra-philanthropic Government might accord some leisure for this characteristically Latin quality to flourish on our own soil, where, according to symptoms already manifesting themselves, a disinclination to labour may be easily fostered.

> When the Englishman of any class of society amuses himself, he never becomes excited, voluble, or nervous; he regards enjoyment as an unpleasant but healthful drug. He remains calm, cold, rigid and intent, as if he had to fulfil a duty and intended to fulfil it thoroughly and exhaustively. I have seen a young lady taking notes in a music-hall precisely as she would do at a university lecture.

The secret of this solemn performance of duty upon all occasions is that the English, more than other nations, are given to respect the promptings of conscience, though it is to be regretted that the younger generation is far more slack with regard to the obligations of duty than its predecessors.

The author describes an excursion made in a house-boat on the Norfolk Broads, which struck him as the scene of a beauty wholly unknown in Italy. "The water, on which the excursion is made, becomes, in accordance with the definition of Pascal, a road which travels. It fulfils the aspirations of Daudet to travel over the world in a home on wheels." The frank and merry way in which his fellow excursionists enjoyed themselves seems to have surprised him, as well as the freedom accorded to the girls, who, however, unlike the girls of Italy, never seem to take any work, such as sewing or embroidery, to employ them in their outings. The songs sung by the trippers were presumably negro melodies; our author describes them as destitute of pathos, melody and beauty of any description. The enormous quantity of light literature brought on the excursion by the gentlemen of the party constituted a greater mass of reading than an Italian Professor gets through in a year.

The state of London streets at night, and the miserable figures of the poor wretches reposing al fresco on the Embankment, fills him with astonishment. He thinks that the capacity of the London police, which on the Continent is rated extraordinarily high (mainly owing to the popularity of Conan Doyle's novels), is much over-rated, and he cites numerous cases of crimes whose authors remain undetected; in short, he maintains that the flair of the police of Paris is more acute than that of our force. He notes with surprise the astonishing number of houses to let in London, especially in Mayfair, which he attributes to the spirit of restlessness prevalent at the present time among the English people. Hosts and hostesses prefer to give their entertainments at the new monster hotels, which seem to him the most luxurious palaces to be found in the world. The English home is growing daily less home-like. Even the London clubs, which excited the envy of the Continental world, are feeling to their cost the attraction of the even more luxurious hotels. The abandonment or decadence of the popularity of the best clubs is, according to our author, as much to be deplored as that of our home life; for in the sober and cultured atmosphere of these time-honoured institutions men with brains can meet and discuss high questions of politics, literature and conduct; and never was serious discussion more needed than at the present day, when America and Germany are earnestly endeavouring to wrest the commercial and naval supremacy from the hands of the old country who fancied herself supreme in both.

The horrors of London stand forth in lurid light in contrast to the almost perfect comforts possible in England to the very rich. The squalid and pestilential dwellings of our slums, baby-farming, the wholesale deaths of infants owing to ignorance or neglect, the brutality of drunken husbands and drunken wives to each other and to their families, strike the foreigner as almost incredible. As a relief to this painful and squalid picture of submerged humanity is to be set the universal joy and merriment of bank holidays, when weary clerks by the thousand quit their desks for a day and flock to the seaside to bathe in that Ocean which our Italian deems to appeal sentimentally to every Englishman.

The Magazines

IN the English Review this month Mr. Henry Savage writes some wise and kindly few words on Richard Middleton. He does not attempt any kind of an estimate; and he is discreet in this. It is never kind to say of a poet that his prose is better than his verse; and we will not say this of Middleton, although it seems an obvious thing to say at the moment; but prose has a habit of staling and poetry a habit of freshening; and the most obvious things are not generally the most true. We venture to think this will prove itself to be the case with Middleton's work. As a poet his rank may not be high; for he did not make his work intensive and spiritually memorable. He won to a smaller field of song; but he was a poet. Mr. Savage's short testimony is conceived excellently, and is a timely tribute. Mr. Gerald Stanley Lee has an entertaining article in the same magazine that he entitles "This Desirable Planet to Let." It is a typical essay from the same pen that wrote, some time ago, a few worthy ideals for millionaires. The planet is, of course, the earth; and those who desire to dispose of it are its owners, Messrs. Rockefeller, Carnegie, Morgan, and Co. In the course of his article he makes some just strictures on those "few foolish old men" in Stockholm who dispense each year eight thousand pounds as "a mere colossal kindly doddering old-age pension," and who invariably pick out just those who do not want it, and whose works, contrary, of course, to the original intention of its donor, are clearly not of an idealistic nature. Mr. John Galsworthy writes a "Meditation on Finality." One of the most curious changes in recent literary history is that which has come upon the author of "Fraternity" and "Justice." He has not succeeded in writing poetry; but he has succeeded in coming over to the poets. The Finality on which he meditates is that which Literature, as distinct from Journalism, bound or unbound, always evades, giving us instead "flower of author," "sense of the spirit." Miss May Sinclair enters into a spirited "Defence of Men," protesting against Miss Cicely Hamilton's recent attack on the Male. Nothing more sane or comprehensive has been written on the subject of the mutual relations of man and woman, to our knowledge. Were we to say that she shows some understanding of the subject where Miss Hamilton showed none, the retort which the latter would at once make would be that we speak without authority, inasmuch as we speak as men. But that is an argument which cuts both ways. And it remains a fact that no knowledge is born apart from sympathy. Miss Sinclair writes with sympathy; and what she says should make both sexes realise themselves better.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

In the Fortnightly Lord Rosebery writes about "The Coming of Bonaparte." The article is, in fact, the introduction that he wrote to the cheap edition of M. Vandal's "L'Avènement de Bonaparte." One would have thought that a Napoleonic student like Lord Rosebery would not have been content to give us what, after all, is merely a précis of M. Vandal's book. Justly one might have claimed, if not an independent contribution, at least an independent point of view. Mr. Gosse prints, in English, the address he delivered, in French, before the Société Jean-Jacques Rousseau at Geneva on "Rousseau in England in the Nineteenth Century." He passes in review the influence, one way or another, that Rousseau has had in English Literature—from the anger of Burke to the wise monograph of Morley. Among other literary articles there is one by Mr. G. H. Powell on "Romance versus Reality," which we should no doubt agree with heartily if we could only understand it. Romance and Reality are, of course, only interchangeable terms. They envisage no antithesis. The wise man takes no sides, but just gets on with his work. Nevertheless, it is interesting to learn that "in the obscurantist intellectual jungle of anti-romanticism strange flights of gaudy-coloured, loudly screaming parrots, strange chatterations of simian contortionists ensconced up more or less inaccessible trees, are noticeable enough." In "The Great Republic of China" Mr. Robert Machray writes an informative article. Mr. Arthur Baumann has an essay on "Lord Hugh Cecil on Conservatism." It is exceedingly interesting to see him refuse with some emphasis Lord Hugh's dictum that the basis of Conservatism is "Christian Morals as revealed in the New Testament."

In the Nineteenth Century Mr. Wilfrid Ward makes a spirited reply to the recent attack by the Edinburgh Review on Cardinal Newman in a review of his father's recent biography. Mr. E. S. Bates contributes an exceedingly interesting article on "Some Foreigners in Shakespeare's England"; though why he should particularly say Shakespeare's England we cannot tell. Mr. Robert Fowler, in view of the recent display of the pictures of new and up-to-date schools of painting, asks "Is Art a Failure?" It is not difficult to see what his reply to that question is. But we venture to say that a more considerable service would be done to Art and to clear thinking if such writers, instead of telling us to go back to Rembrandt and such masters, were to set themselves to answer some of the questions that modern movements in Art have raised. For ourselves, we agree largely with the injunction to regard more attentively the works of the old masters: but it is impossible to forget that it is just that stiff-necked conservatism that has driven us inevitably on to a good deal that we might have escaped. Miss Edith Sellars writes on "Where Women Sit in Parliament." It is partly an examination of the political conditions of Finland, and largely an "argumentum ad verecundiam"—a fact that somewhat mars its value.

In the Oxford and Cambridge Review Mr. F. E. Smith continues his article on "Industrial Unrest" that aroused so much interest in its first instalment. Mr. P. P. Howe writes well upon "The Playboy in the Theatre." Mr. W. L. George deals with "Tartarin: the French Comic Giant." His knowledge of French and French literature stands him in good stead, but he would, we think, have been better advised had he made his article more one of critical interest than purely an account of the doings of the great Tartarin. It is not always that we are able to find ourselves in agreement with Mr. Lodovici; but in "The Italian Futurists and their Traditionalism" we are heartily at one with him, both in the negative and the positive aspects of what he has to say. It very largely answers our demand when speaking of Mr. Robert Fowler's article, and should abundantly repay thought. The Oxford and Cambridge Review is wise in laying this additional emphasis on literary and artistic contributions; it is in such that interest will chiefly centre, and not in the political matter. Another essay by Mr. Leonard Magnus on "Russian Lyrical Poetry" makes interesting reading.

In the Cornhill Mr. Joseph C. Bridge writes upon

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

"Mr. Pepys and his Office Boys," in a paper of human interest. An article that strikes us as somewhat strange is by Mr. Whetham on "Electricity—Positive and Negative." Not for some time have we seen a scientific matter treated in this excellent magazine. It is full in its treatment, and provides admirable reading. The matter of the scaffold used by Napoleon at the Battle of Waterloo, raised in the Cornhill last month, seems to be settled by a number of correspondents. It appears to have been a wooden scaffold raised for the purpose of a trigonometrical survey that had been made some weeks before by the King of the Netherlands. In Blackwood's this month there is a good short story by Mr. Jeffrey E. Jeffrey, entitled "Snatty." Mr. Robert Hannay writes upon "A Complete Elizabethan Gentleman"; and one would scarcely have thought that Robert Dudley, the Duke of Northumberland, was altogether worth treating so solemnly and at such length at this time of day.

The Moslem World for July maintains its high standard as an intellectual and well-informed exponent of Islam. Its tendency is perhaps too learned for the ordinary reader. For instance, the account of "the way" of a Mohammedan mystic, a Sufi, is difficult to follow. The editor's view towards Islam is to approach it with humility, docility, and love, but not to compromise at any price. Another writer dwells on the points of contact between Islam and Christianity, and argues that points of contact are often points of opposition and may serve as a hindrance to Christianity. The Moslem believes in Monotheism, and this belief "makes the Christian doctrine of the Trinity an abomination to him—a form of the Polytheism on which Islam has waged relentless war." Again, the Moslem honours Jesus, but denies His divinity and His superiority to Mohammed. The conclusion is that, though Islam is a higher stage of civilisation than barbarism, its ethics raise a barrier which barbarism does not raise against the acceptance of Christianity. The cult of Bahaism in Persia has been constantly explained, as the bibliography shows, and requires no further description. Missions in Morocco were unfavourably treated by the country's rulers until 1894. Since then a change has appeared, and substantial progress is being achieved by dispensary preaching, distribution of the Scriptures, and education.

Baghdad, the centre of the Khalifate for 500 years, now an emporium of trade and associated with the future railway from Asia Minor, conquered by Turkey in 1638, is now frequented by both Sunnis and Shiahs, while Jews form a quarter of the population. The writer recognises its importance as a Moslem centre, to which the many neighbouring shrines of Moslem saints attract innumerable pilgrims. Some "unfounded Moslem claims" are subjected to searching investigation, which is constantly necessary, as the claims are never abandoned. The notes on current topics bring together many interesting references to movements and affairs in Mohammedan countries which would otherwise escape notice.

The Fleet at Sea

BY E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT.

FOR the first time in my life I have had the experience of cruising for three days on a great battleship in the company of nineteen other great battleships of various ages, designs, and armament. I went on board the King Edward VII., the flagship of Rear-Admiral Burney, at Portsmouth, watched the review of the fleet by legislators—I wish the said legislators could have heard some of the remarks of the crew on them and their methods, for they were not altogether complimentary—and sailed in the evening with the fleet for the West Coast of Scotland. Two things struck me at once about this great fleet under the supreme command of Prince Louis of Battenberg: (1) How heterogeneous modern fleets are as they gradually pass through the period of transition which will in time give us and other nations homogeneous squadrons of all big-gun ships. For instance, under Prince Louis's command were old battleships built ten years ago, as well as the King Edward VII. class, with their four 12-inch guns and their supplementary armament of four 9.2 and 6 inch; then we had two, the Lord Nelson and the Agamemnon, of a slightly later date than the King Edward VII., mounting, in addition to their 12-inch, four 9.2 on either broadside; after these two pre-Dreadnoughts come the mighty Dreadnoughts themselves, and there are hardly two of them alike. They do not look the same, and possess very different armaments arranged in a very different manner. For example, the old original Dreadnought, built only four years ago, is already obsolete. She could not stand up for half an hour against her younger sisters, like the Orion and the Thunderer, which carry ten mighty 13-inch guns, the most powerful afloat to-day. Some of the Dreadnoughts can only fire eight of their 12-inch guns on either broadside, but the Orion and the Thunderer and similar vessels can fire all ten 13-inch guns on either broadside, which is, of course, an enormous advantage in action. But this great variety in designs, arms, and armaments, although it makes a fleet more picturesque and interesting as a study to the amateur, does not make for efficiency, either in peace or in action.

The ships have different speeds, and therefore, when at sea, the most efficient and economical average must be found, so that all may keep together, manœuvre easily, and not lose their places in the formation. This takes time, and is one of the chief objects of manœuvres. It is not nearly so easy to control the fire of the guns of a battleship if there are many different calibres on board, and the ammunition supply presents much more serious problems. In all big-gun ships the gun's crew can be moved from one big gun to another without inconvenience, because all are handled on a common basis and the ranges are the same for all. But if you took a gun's crew from a 6-inch or 9.2 gun, and sent them to work a 12-inch or 13-inch, their efforts would be very poor until they became accustomed to the new weapon. Then the position of the admiral-in-chief is rendered immeasurably more difficult if he has a great variety of vessels under his command. In a naval war he must always try to match a particular item of his fleet with an item of equal or inferior strength in the fleet of his enemy. For instance, it would not do to launch a squadron of pre-Dreadnoughts against an opponent's squadron of Dreadnoughts. The action could only terminate in one way, if naval theorists are to be believed at all. It would not even do to send the old Dreadnought and her class against the super-Dreadnoughts of an enemy, with a more powerful armament, capable of firing a larger number of guns on a broadside. These are just a few of the problems for which the naval constructor of the future will have to find a solution before our fleets can reach anything like a maximum of strength and efficiency. The main problem at present is this: To discover the most perfect type of all big-gun ships, and to build a mighty squadron with all ships exactly alike. This will free the mind of the commander-in-chief from a great load of additional responsibility; it will enable the crew of a damaged battleship to be transferred to another, and to find themselves perfectly at home on board, and such a squadron will be infinitely more easy to navigate at sea. A heterogeneous collection of samples must be standardised in the course of the next few years, and the British taxpayer must be prepared to foot the bill, or else allow this country to retire from the struggle for naval supremacy.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The second point which struck me about this great fleet at sea was the facility with which it manœuvred, although brought together for the first time and composed of vessels of so many different designs. To outward observation it seems far more simple to handle a fleet than to train a company of raw recruits to drill. The fleet manœuvred like a company of guardsmen at the Trooping of the Colours, changing from divisions to line ahead, or from line ahead to line abreast, or sweeping in graceful curves from starboard to port, or from port to starboard, in a manner that was fascinating to watch. Yet I was told by the navigating officers that they were far from content with these performances, which seemed perfect to the untrained eye of the amateur, and that after a few days a vast improvement would become manifest.

The life on board a modern battleship has been told and retold so often, and in so many different ways, that he would be a bold writer who would attempt to say anything new on the subject. But until you have stayed on board for a few days you can have no real comprehension of the amount of work that is gone through, and of the strenuous and exacting nature of the life. At first all appears chaos and confusion amidst endless engines, revolving wheels, and intricate machinery. It seems like a beehive in which the bees have no idea where to go or what to do. But after a day or two this impression wears off, and you discover that each individual rushing around at the double, amidst the blowing of whistles and the totally incomprehensible words of command, has his allotted place, and is a human cog in this vast revolving wheel. The sailor's life when at sea is very different from his comrade's in the army or on shore. On shore, whether in civilian or military life, work begins and comes to an end at certain well-known and specified hours, except on rare occasions. But at sea there is really no beginning and no ending to the day's toil. Darkness and light to the sailor are both alike. The day and the night run into one another without the change being noticed. There is always the same hustle and blowing of whistles and the constant patter of bare feet on the decks. There are always men lying perdu in all attitudes asleep and others full of life jumping over their prostrate bodies. Only one half of the ship's company is ever found asleep at one and the same time, the other half is always on duty ready for any emergency which may arise. In this age of luxury and comfort, where the standard of living both for the soldier and civilian has risen so immeasurably during the past few years, the discomfort of the sailor's life has received but scant amelioration. His food is better, but his accommodation is just as bad, or even worse, than it was on Nelson's fleet, and his pay remains practically the same.

The question of accommodation is almost incapable of solution, because ships can only be built up to a certain size and vast numbers of men are required to handle the guns and machinery. The life must be patiently borne. But the problem of an increase of pay can, and should be, considered, if we are to maintain the same standard of recruiting for the Navy, and if we are going to obtain a sufficiency of men to meet the rapid expansion of our fleet, necessary in order to maintain the two-Power standard, without resource to conscription, which at present seems inevitable. Our legislators did not hesitate to vote themselves a small solatium of £400 a year apiece, but they will not face the difficulty of finding the necessary money to attract a good class of man into the Navy. It is the grandest service in the world, and the men who protect our shores surely deserve something better than a mere pittance. It is all very well for the optimistic to say, "Patriotism will carry us through; you will always find sufficient officers and men to wear the King's uniform under the existing conditions." But this is far from the truth. The men and officers of the Navy to-day are just as good as any who have served their country at any other time; but they are becoming increasingly difficult to find, especially the rank and file. The British Empire, with its vast field for enterprise and colonisation, is every year attracting a larger and larger number of our best and bravest from these crowded shores. Canada, South Africa and Australia offer advantages to the young and able which service in the fleet can never offer. Many who would formerly have enlisted in the army or navy now drift to the colonies, where fortunes can be made or lost, and made again within a very few years. But the officer or bluejacket who serves the King knows well the extent of his remuneration from the beginning to the end of his career. There is for him no hope of making a fortune. He must live in discomfort all his days; he must lead a hard, exacting and dangerous life, and then at the end of his term of service be content to retire on a small pension. Therefore only one solution remains. If we are to man our fleets in the future without resort to conscription, we must make the service more attractive to both officers and seamen.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

At St. Stephen's Shrine

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE.

A GOVERNMENT is like an ice pudding: directly it appears, it begins to melt, and nothing stops it. The process may be quick or slow, but it is inevitable. By-elections cut wedges out of it, and other causes make it wobble. This is what is happening to the Coalition Cake. I do not know whether it is because of an exceptionally busy season, or on account of slackness or downright weariness, or a spirit of revolt and a disgust at some of the actions of the leaders (it is probably all of these things), but it is clear that the Master of Elibank is finding it more and more difficult to keep his men together. The huge majority has sunk on occasion to 22 and 46, and very rarely touches three figures, in spite of the most urgent whips.

It is now announced that the House will rise on Friday, the 2nd, or Saturday, the 3rd, August, instead of Saturday, the 10th, as originally arranged.

Home Rule, Welsh Disestablishment, and the Franchise Bill, after this week, are all to be hung up until the autumn, and nothing but Supply and the Budget will be taken before the recess. It is exactly like a pugilist who, to mark time, lies down and waits until the timekeeper has nearly counted ten, with the intention of wasting the round until "time" is called.

On Wednesday night the Foreign Office vote was taken. Everybody who ever had anything to do with diplomacy, and a great many who had not, had a cut in. The Persian railway came in for the usual amount of criticism; people still think it will make the way easier for invading troops to approach India, but Sir Edward Grey was reassuring—care was being taken to secure British representation in its control and as to the decision about the width of the gauge.

As to the fleet in the Mediterranean, he thought a one-Power standard enough. We really could not afford to keep a fleet there sufficient to take on all the fleets out there at one and the same time; we must take some risks, and were on excellent terms with France and Russia, and he was satisfied with our progress towards a complete understanding with Germany. Bonar Law said, cost what it might, we must have a naval force which would be able to beat any possible combination that could be brought against us. He denied that we had any quarrel with Germany, but we could not shut our eyes to her action, and begged that Winston would at no distant date give us a statement as to our position as a naval Power. A dull evening, but very useful.

On Thursday the House prepared itself for another dull evening, for the debate on the jerrymandering of the franchise was resumed. There was a scanty attendance. By dint of many questions and some supplementals it was discovered that not only had the Government not been able to come to terms with the doctors, either by threats or cajolery, on the Insurance Bill, but other parts of the scheme were in an equally backward state. Lloyd George had promised the working man that, if he had consumption, he could at once go into a sanatorium and be properly nursed. It now appears that there has been no time to lay a brick of any one of them, and that the workman has no "right" to go there as a matter of course—it must be subject to the decision of some committee.

Gussie Grant surprised the Government by jumping up and asking leave to move the adjournment of the House on a matter of "definite urgent public importance"—viz., that the Act was to come into force on Monday next, and the Government, after forcing the public to pay their coppers, were obviously, from the answers received, not in a position to fulfil their part of the contract. The whole Opposition, including Bonar Law, stood up in a solid phalanx when the Speaker asked whether the hon. member had the leave of the House. "Cannot I claim a division?" squeaked MacCallum Scott desperately. "No," said the Speaker. "Over forty members have stood up." So at eight a discussion on the Insurance Bill was suddenly pitchforked into a dry debate on the technical difficulties of the Franchise Bill. The Master of Elibank was at his wits' end. Was it another carefully planned "snap"? It certainly looked like it. Asquith had cynically said that the division on the second reading should not take place until Friday at five p.m. The Ulster men had raged at his fixing it for their great festival on the 12th. He had deliberately adjourned the division on the first reading of the Welsh Disestablishment Bill to enable the Nationalists to get back from their convention in Dublin, but he showed no such consideration for the Ulster men in Belfast, and now it looked as if he might be "hoist with his own petard."

The Liberals were taking their ease, secure in the thought that no division was possible that night. Luckily for them, Mr. Asquith was giving a large garden party to the faithful in the cramped little backyard behind Downing Street, so a message was sent there post-haste, and telegrams were sent off by shoals—long and expensive telegrams, like the pale-faced Babu "head of the district" sent in Rudyard Kipling's story, couched in terms "that the sack of Delhi would hardly have justified."

In the meantime John Burns made a turgid speech on the Franchise Bill, and lectured the House, which it always resents. At eight the engagement began. Waldorf Astor seconded Grant in a thoughtful speech. He knows a good deal about sanatoria and consumption, and the House listened with interest. Masterman was very indignant, and accused Grant of trying to score a party advantage at the expense of the poor consumptives. The division took place in a crowded House at eleven, and by dint of the most desperate exertions the Radical Whip had succeeded in getting his flock together. When the numbers went up, and it was seen that the Government had a majority of 111, the Radicals cheered as if they had won a notable victory. As a matter of fact, the Unionists had not troubled to recall a single man, and no attempt at a snap had been thought of; but it is useful to keep the Government on the run occasionally with these little alarums and excursions.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

On Friday we once more resigned ourselves to the Franchise Bill. It really is a very unfair measure. It is hybrid in form, and deals piece-meal with two very different but important questions—viz., registration and the franchise. To take up either at this end of a crowded session is an outrage, but to take up both—well, some feel "there ain't no words," as the coster said when he turned round and saw his apples rolling down the whole length of Piccadilly. Balfour and Asquith both spoke, but it was as if they were discussing an abstract problem in a debating society. Asquith has made the women very angry by saying that it would be "a national disaster" to admit 10,000,000 women to the franchise. Yet, as Mr. Balfour pointed out, if the amendment is carried, Mr. Asquith is pledged to carry a Bill in which there is a provision which he believes will be national disaster.

Bonar Law wound up for us in a practical speech showing the immense expense that would be put on the rates, which would subtract somewhat from the new taxation promised by the "new leaders" of the Radical Party—Wedgwood and Hemmerde. That is one drawback of belonging to the Radical or Socialist Parties—there is always someone who can outbid you—Burns and Grayson, Asquith and Keir Hardie, Lloyd George and Lansbury, and other great democratic statesmen all discover the sad truth in due course.

The Little Englanders have got Mr. W. H. Massingham to write an article in the Nation which has fluttered the dovecots at St. Stephen's. It is a severe warning to the Cabinet: they must either refrain from spending more money on the Navy and Army, or they will lose what the curate called their ee-wee lamb—Lloyd George. The funny part of it is that it is by no means certain that Lloyd George is a Little Englander now, or that he is in sympathy with the peace-at-any-price party. During the last year or two he has spoken very plainly to the German Empire, and his recent contribution of a million to the Navy Vote out of his surplus does not support the Massingham view. Indeed, some people in the Lobby think the warning is issued against Lloyd George as much as anyone else. The Tory talk that there is a split in the Cabinet is rubbish; they may have differences inside, but they are much too shrewd to allow them to appear outside the front door of No. 10, Downing Street. I do not pay them the compliment of having so much principle. The present Government will never dissolve owing to internal differences.

Monday was very hot, and everybody was very languid. Austen Chamberlain attacked Lloyd George for holding up the surplus instead of letting it go automatically towards paying off the National Debt. What a row the Radicals would have made if Balfour had done it when he was in power! That rollicking banker's son—I mean banker's rollicking son—Charlie Mills, chimed in with: "He spends it how and when he likes," and likened the little Welshman to the Stuart kings who got into trouble for trying to do this very thing.

Lansbury, both before and after the debate, tried to show that the police had behaved brutally in Hyde Park, but McKenna was able to show that the boot was on the other leg. However, he promised further enquiry into the matter.

Tuesday was hot and stifling. Mr. Harold Baker, the new Financial Secretary to the War Office, went in to bat first. He was not very much at ease, and, to show how much he was, he made one or two feeble attempts at humour. This is not considered good form in a new Minister, any more than it is in a new member. All that a Territorial Force required, he said, was peace! (Ironical cheers from the Opposition.) Peace, he hurriedly went on to explain, not from an invader, but from hostile critics. This is all nonsense. The Navy and Army want all the honest criticism they can get from all parties. What we are suffering under, said Arthur Lee, is a guilty silence at the War Office, and acidly added that we did not want comic opera retorts. The country had a right to know how we stood. But it was no good. All through the long, sleepy afternoon, Seely and his friends looked at everything through roseate spectacles, while the Opposition appeared to be using smoked glasses. I could not help thinking, as I looked up at the ceiling, that the position was not unlike the patent ventilation of the House, which has cost thousands and thousands of pounds, and yet on a hot day like this we cannot open the windows because it would interfere with the artificial draught. The attitude of the Government was that no healthy and natural criticism was permissible or desirable. Air drawn through cottonwool and red tape was far preferable to natural ozone.

Seely said a good word for the National Reserve, but showed an official dread that they might injure the Territorials.

The strike still continues. Lord Devonport is being abused up hill and down dale, and there have been midnight meetings, but the Government seems powerless.

Down below, on the Terrace, one hears the loud laugh of Mr. Outhwaite, the new member for Hanley. He is in excellent spirits, for, in spite of being a carpet-bagger, he has brought the Labour Party to their bearings. No wonder Elibank rubs his hands. He has not only dished the Tories, but humbled their quondam allies, who were getting just a little swollen-headed.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Notes and News

A catalogue of the works on Peace and International Law in the Nobel Institute of Christiania is in active preparation, and Volume I., containing the peace literature, will be issued by Messrs. Williams and Norgate in the autumn. It will form a large octavo volume, printed on one side of the paper only. The collection of peace literature at the Nobel Institute is probably the largest in the world, and this catalogue will therefore be a valuable bibliography of the subject.

Mr. Henry Frowde is publishing the novels of Sir Walter Scott, twenty-four volumes, in three editions. A list of the chief characters and a newly prepared glossary is given in each book, and there are more than 900 illustrations all told. Prices range from a very low figure, and the best edition is printed on Oxford India paper, so that the twenty-four books occupy only ten inches of shelf space. The Oxford Scott, which is uniform with the copyright Oxford Thackeray and Oxford Dickens, will be ready this month.

Messrs. John Long are now issuing the second part of the Royal Opera Souvenir for 1912, which is specially concerned with the "Saison Russe." Like its predecessor, the new part is a beautiful specimen of artistic design and typography, and contains finely reproduced photographs of the principal dancers and of scenes from the ballets, while the letterpress, which is by Mr. Leonard Rees, gives the story of the Russian ballet from its institution in the nineteenth century, personalia of the leading members of the company, and the plots of all the ballets in the repertory.

The July issue of the Edinburgh Review is the first to appear under the editorship of Mr. Harold Cox, who will contribute an article on Contemporary Politics. For the first time in the history of the Review the writers' names will be appended to certain articles. Among them will be "The Hôtel de Rambouillet," by Edmund Gosse, C.B.; "Fox," by Horace Bleackley; "The Rousseau Bicentenary," by Francis Gribble; "Causes of Chinese Unrest," by J. O. P. Bland; "Zoology in the Time of Shakespeare," by Dr. Shipley, Master of Christ's College, Cambridge; and "Chauvinism in Music," by Mrs. Rosa Newmarch. There are also important unsigned articles on "India and her Sovereign" and "Safety of Life at Sea."

Many aspects of bird protection are dealt with in the summer number of Bird Notes and News (23, Queen Anne's Gate, S.W.; 3d.). The relation of birds to man's work and welfare is considered in regard to the economic position of gulls, "The Friends of Trees," and the methods of so-called sparrow clubs, as well as in reference to the protection of crops in field and garden. Comments on the plume trade (with a further appeal to ladies by Sir Herbert Maxwell), the caging of birds, bird protection orders, and the use of traps, together with specimen convictions in the police-courts, refer to the practical work of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds. Notes on such matters as the scarcity of swallows and the neglected study of bird notes indicate occupation for the field ornithologist; while letters from Switzerland and Holland show what is being done for the preservation of birds in those countries.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

THE OPEN DOOR IN AMERICA.

THERE would seem to be at the present moment no conclusive reason for supposing that the discriminating clauses contained in the Panama Canal Bill will ever be carried into operation. Aimed primarily by their authors at what constitute purely domestic interests, these clauses betray no arrière pensée of spread-eagle Americanism, and therefore should not offer insuperable difficulties in the way of diplomatic solution. At the same time the discussion that has centred round the Bill in political circles, as related by the correspondents of the London Press, reveals not only a wealth of Chauvinistic bombast, but also a nice disregard for treaty obligations, worthy in every respect of the most mature diplomacy of Europe. Fortunately for the British Empire, whose trade would suffer materially by any preferential treatment accorded to American shipping, this latter-day cynicism is not shared by a large section of the statesmen, the people, and the Press of the United States. The Washington Administration of to-day has inherited the mantle of Mr. John Hay, the founder of the Open Door policy in China; and it would indeed be ironical if America, who but a few years ago protested so loudly and so bitterly at the preferential treatment accorded by Japan to her own nationals in respect of goods carried over the South Manchuria Railway, were herself to adopt discriminating measures in regard to the Isthmian waterway.

Should the worst come to the worst, and the Panama Canal Bill as it now stands become law, we can still submit our case to The Hague. In the event of this contingency arising we can only hope that America will show more respect for the decision of that tribunal, supposing the decision to go in our favour, than has been the case with Japan over the question of perpetual leases held by foreigners resident in the country. A recent Reuter states that:

> Despite the Hague Arbitration award on the question of perpetual leases, and the fact that negotiations are proceeding between France, Germany, Great Britain, and Japan, with a view to the settlement of this complicated and long-standing matter, the municipal authorities yesterday distrained for taxes on the Central Hotel here (Tokyo), which is held by an Englishman on a perpetual lease.

It may be of interest to recall that shortly after the abolition of extra-territorial jurisdiction in Japan the Government sought to levy a house-tax in connection with buildings erected on land held under perpetual lease, but the foreign residents strenuously resisted the suggested impost, declaring that it was contrary to treaty provisions. In 1902 Japan consented to submit the whole question to arbitration; but the decision of the Hague Tribunal, given in 1905, went against her. "The provisions of treaties and other engagements mentioned in the arbitral protocol (declared the text) do not merely exempt land held in virtue of perpetual leases granted by the Japanese Government or in its name; they exempt lands and buildings of whatever description constructed on such lands from all imposts, taxes, charges, contributions or conditions whatsoever other than those expressly stipulated in the leases in question."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

With this decision the matter was allowed to rest for some three years, when, probably owing to the low state of the Treasury, the Government again raised the issue in an acute form, and, on the ground that the Hague award precluded only the levying of land and house taxes, imposed income and business taxes in relation to the leased properties. Acting on the advice of the diplomatic representatives, to say nothing of the threat of distraint, these charges were paid under protest. The foreign residents contended that the ground rents paid by them comprised not only rent to the Government for the use of the ground, but also all taxation; that the business and income taxes were tantamount to a tax on the property itself; and that such taxes tended to depreciate the value of perpetual leases. In plain language, they claimed that they were called upon to pay twice over. And so the matter stands to-day. Eminent lawyers have declared that this dexterous evasion is illegal, and, as we have seen, the question is still one of negotiation between the Japanese Government and the various Powers concerned.

In the matter of rights enjoyed by foreigners, one reservation, long a source of irritation, was withdrawn last year. Foreigners are no longer precluded from owning land in the country. In the early part of 1910, during the twenty-sixth session of the Diet, the Government introduced a Bill for the enactment of a law granting to foreigners the ownership of land in fee simple. A note annexed to the Bill stated that:

> According to the law in force foreigners are not allowed to possess the right of property in land (in Japan). With the career of the nation in the ascendant, the people have gradually grown in their real ability and confidence in themselves, so that there no longer exists any objection to granting to foreigners the right of possessing land. Not only that, but it has become necessary at this juncture to grant to foreigners the said right in consonance with the usage commonly obtaining in different countries of the world.

Japan has received nothing but commendation for this enlightened legislation. But her friendly critics would seem to have disregarded one or two essential circumstances that contributed in no small measure to her change of policy. Her statesmen fully realised that in 1911 the Treaties with foreign countries would expire; and, rather than have the thorny question of landownership settled by the binding terms of international treaty, they wisely decided to anticipate all diplomatic negotiation by themselves adopting suitable legislation. At the same time they reasoned astutely that advanced concessions would smooth the way for the revision of the treaties, and would give them some tangible justification for framing their demands to the advantage of the nation. Above all—for it must not be forgotten that the British are predominant among the international communities in Japan—the Government were keenly desirous of retaining the close friendship of England—ally and banker.

The mission of Prince Katsura is now well on the way to St. Petersburg, where, subject, of course, to formal ratification in London, the fate of the Manchurian provinces will be sealed. A great deal of speculation is rife as to whether Japan and Russia are on the eve of concluding an alliance, the effect of which will be to render the Anglo-Japanese compact a worthless document. Such a consummation is, however, highly improbable. It is much more likely that Great Britain will give her sanction to what must constitute one of the most appalling acts of international vandalism of modern times. The only redeeming feature—and one for which no party to the transaction can claim credit—is, perhaps, the observance of a decent period of mourning for the fallen dynasty before taking possession of the ancestral home of the Manchu race. Warranted alone by an inordinate ambition for Imperial expansion, the coming annexation of the three Eastern Provinces will establish a period of false security, to be followed sooner or later by an upheaval, to find a parallel to which we shall have to look back to the holocaust of 1904-5.

MOTORING

WITHIN the next few days will begin a tyre trial which should possess exceptional interest for all motorists. It is to consist of a test to destruction of four tyres of different makes, three of them—the Continental, Dunlop, and Michelin—enjoying world-wide reputations, and the other—the Victor—having its reputation still to make, but claiming to be the best of them all. That the last-mentioned is a first-class tyre is already known to many users, including the present writer, but whether the confident assertion of the makers that it is the best pneumatic tyre in the market is justified or not can only be determined by an impartial and exhaustive test, such as the one it is intended to hold.

"EVERY DROP LUBRICATES."
"Champion" Motor Oil
is the best for all types of Cars.
If not already using "Champion" send for trial tin to
S. BOWLEY & SON,
Wellington Works,
BATTERSEA, LONDON, S.W.
Established 200 years.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The main conditions under which the competition will be held are as follows:—An independent committee, consisting of representatives of the Press and well-known private motorists, will select from stock tyres of the four makes indicated, have them fitted to a 40 h.p. Fiat, and run them to destruction on the road, under ordinary running conditions. Every 250 miles the position of the tyres will be changed, those on the front wheels being transferred to the back, and vice versa, thus ensuring equal treatment for all. During the whole period, which is expected to occupy about ten weeks, the car will contain two independent observers, one elected by the Press and the other by the private committee, and at the conclusion of each day's run the car will be "sealed" by the observers to prevent tampering and ensure the fairness of the contest.

In addition to the observers appointed by the committee, the test will be supervised by the late manager of the technical department of the R.A.C., whose report of the behaviour of the various tyres under similar conditions should provide valuable data for the motorist. The promoters of the trial are the makers of the Victor tyre, who have for some time been issuing challenges to the other makers to participate in a durability test. It was originally intended that it should take place under the official supervision of the R.A.C.; but, for some reason or other which has not yet transpired, the club committee suddenly decided to retract its acceptance, thus leaving the challengers no option but to organise an independent test. The conditions, however, will be essentially the same as those laid down by the club, except that the trial will take place upon the road instead of the racing track, an alteration which will enhance its practical value.

Another feat, the special interest of which is for the constantly increasing number of Colonial motorists, is that of a 15 h.p. Colonial Napier, which is arranged to be held under R.A.C. supervision this week. As is generally known, Mr. S. F. Edge recently made a prolonged visit to South Africa for the express purpose of investigating the conditions of motoring in the Colonies, and, no doubt, he brought back with him a good deal of useful information which has been embodied in the latest Colonial Napier. The course chosen for the test is the roughest and hilliest tract of country to be found on the South Downs, a considerable portion of which consists of mere tracts unused by ordinary traffic, the idea being to test the car under conditions which correspond with those to be found in undeveloped over-sea countries. Judging from the contour map before us, which shows a continuous succession of climbs and descents ranging from 200 to 800 feet above sea-level, we should imagine that it would be difficult to find a more formidable and exacting course in the whole of Great Britain.

From the secretary of the Automobile Association and Motor Union comes a specimen copy of the Foreign Handbook the committee have prepared for the benefit of the numerous members who contemplate touring abroad with their cars. Although containing over 500 pages, it is small and compact enough for the ordinary coat pocket, and it is almost superfluous to state that the task of providing a really useful vade mecum for the Continental touring motorist has been carried out with thoroughness and ability. In appearance and general arrangement the Foreign Handbook resembles the ordinary A.A. and M.U. Handbook, issued annually to all its members. Following an article of general information on touring abroad come details of the regulations and motor-touring conditions applying to each of the Continental countries, with lists of the hotels, garages, and A.A. agents in the principal towns, and particulars of their accommodation and facilities for motorists. The second portion of the book consists mainly of details of selected routes from one centre to another all over the Continent, with elaborate but very lucid information as to distances and driving directions. It is hardly too much to say that the little work, which will be presented free to every member of the A.A. and M.U. who chooses to apply for it, is practically indispensable to the motorist who tours abroad.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

UNDOUBTEDLY the event of the week has been the remarkable slump in Consols following upon Lloyd George's visit to the City. Everybody is selling and there is no market, neither will the jobbers put Consols on their books to any great extent. We must not think that Great Britain is in any worse financial plight than Germany. That is not the case. German Threes carried over at 79, and they are quoted 78-79. This is lower than the 3 per cent. stocks of the London County Council, which stand at 82¼, or the Water Board stock, which is quoted at 81. The mania for stocks bearing a high rate of interest extends all over the world. The fact is we are all too extravagant. We are living up to our incomes; a good many people are living beyond them, and, in order to make both ends meet, some gamble and the more careful search for high-interest bearing bonds. The enormous developments in Canada and South America, where land is being opened up with great rapidity, call for cash, and the pioneers are willing to pay high prices for loans because the margin of profit is great. There is no doubt that both in Canada and in the Argentine a man may invest his money with considerable safety, and yet obtain from 7 to 9 per cent. interest. The finance houses have, therefore, no longer any use for Consols. Even insurance companies are going abroad for their investments. Another point that is important to mention is the question of income tax. Here the heavy tax forces people to put their money into Bonds, the coupons on which are collected by foreign banks and the money re-invested abroad. In this way many rich people save large sums in income tax.

The new issues are not going well. The Newfoundland offer met with cold treatment, but the City of Nicolaieff Bonds were well subscribed, and it is said that the Queensland issue was treated better than that of Newfoundland. The terms were certainly superior. The British North Borneo debentures do not appear particularly cheap, but the General Electric Company 6 per cent. preference were a reasonable security. Mr. J. C. A. Henderson has been trying to unload his properties through the British and French Trust. The company is not one I can recommend. The British and General Debenture is another relief company, and the securities are some of them given in this week's Stockbroker. They hardly inspire me with a desire to apply for shares. Calgary is borrowing more money, but the offer, although better than that made by her last February, is still not good enough. The British Maritime Trust 5 per cent. convertible debenture is a reasonable bond at a reasonable price.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

MONEY is momentarily tight, but I think that as the summer progresses we may see rates reduced. There is no trouble ahead, and although the crops in Canada and the United States will require financing, that money will not be needed until the autumn. However, all chance of a reduction in the Bank Rate seems to have vanished.

FORBIGNERS.—The haggling over the Chinese Loan still continues, and the Powers would appear anxious to meet China in every way. They must meet her. France remains obdurate on the question of control, but really no other country cares very much, although they pretend that they do. I am glad to see that some members of Parliament are taking up the Chinese question, and pointing out very properly that Great Britain, who does half the trade, is only to have one sixth of the finance. This is a most unfair division, and Sir Edward Grey has been badly served in China, otherwise he would not have alllowed the control to slip from his hands.

HOME RAILS.—Most of the stocks in which there has been any speculative account are weak. The banks do not wish to lend on stale accounts, and the bulls are being shaken out. But the Heavy lines appear good to buy. Great Westerns are certainly cheap, and London and North Western and North Eastern are much undervalued. I advise my readers to put their money into these stocks. If they buy to-day they buy a dividend, and they are getting 5 per cent. interest on a gilt-edged security. They need not be afraid of the railway nationalisation scheme that Mr. Lloyd George has in hand. It cannot hurt them, and it may end in giving them a very handsome premium on their capital invested. This is presuming that the scheme is seriously meant, and can be carried out. I believe that Mr. Lloyd George means business, and he hopes that through this scheme he will be able to placate the Labour Party. The leaders of this party, would, of course, get fat jobs.

YANKEES.—It is not much use discussing the American market, for nothing will be done here until the fall. The copper position has been attacked, but I must confess that I see little chance of a victory for the bears. They will have to buy back, and as the bulls have enough money to hang on to their copper with, it seems to me that the position is stronger to-day than ever.

RUBBER.—The rubber market remains dull; not even Mr. Lampard's optimism has been able to revive it. The Eastern International report is not good, and the Bukit Mertajam report is equally disappointing. These shares are over valued.

OIL.—The big 3½ millions pounds Oil Company that is to purchase the Stachyeff Properties hangs fire. There is no doubt that Urals have been marked up to enable this company to make a successful issue. They should relapse. It is certainly not the time to buy oil shares, although I confidently anticipate an oil boom in the autumn. Tweedy has many plans on hand, and all the other promoters are equally busy. Spies is, however, the best purchase of the lot.

KAFFIRS AND RHODESIANS.—It is said that Sir Abe Bailey has lent the Amalgamated Properties of Rhodesia £200,000, and that he and Latilla and Bonnard will start business again. The Wanderer report is bad; the shares should be sold. The Antelope report shows that the reef is narrowing at depth. It was wide at the surface, and the shoot grows narrower every hundred feet it goes down. These shares also should be sold.

TIN.—The Tin market looks like reviving. All the mines now have plenty of water, and if they can only get sufficient labour the returns from Nigeria will jump up rapidly. The dealers are short of shares, and if the promoters will only exercise a little self-restraint we might see a good rise. Edmund Davis, Bastard, Wethered, and the rest have enormous blocks they wish to sell, but they know that the public only buys on a rising market.

MARCONI.—The market in the Marconi issues has been quite lively during the past few days. This is easily accounted for. Most of the weak bulls have been driven out, and there is a bear account. Also the Marconi Company is getting short of money, and desires to make a new issue of shares. This it cannot do on a flat market, therefore the rise may continue until the directors are ready with their issue.

MISCELLANEOUS.—Hudson Bays are now quoted at 13⅜ ex dividend, and I expect that a great many people who could not afford the old share will buy a few of the split shares. A rise here, therefore, seems probable. The new issue of prefs. is quoted ⅜ premium. Agricultural Banks should be bought, as they are much too low. Lord Kitchener will do nothing to injure this Government institution, and I consider that Agriculturals at 5¾ are one of the soundest investments on the London Stock Exchange.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

A POLITICAL QUERY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I think your Parliamentary Correspondent is in error (in company with many others) in saying that Gladstone nominated Lord Rosebery as his political heir.

Lord Morley, in his "Life of Gladstone," reports a conversation with him just before his interview with the Queen at the time of his resignation.

He told Lord Morley that, if asked, he should advise the Queen to send for Lord Spencer.

Lord Morley states, "As it happened, his advice was not asked."

Yours truly,

THOMAS JONES.

LEIGH HUNT'S HOUSE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In a recent issue of a contemporary it was remarked that "it is curious that not even Mr. Algernon Ashton is to the front with a suggestion for the usual plaque for Leigh Hunt's house in Edwardes Square, Kensington," where the famous writer lived for several years, and wrote the criticisms in "Imagination and Fancy," "Wit and Humour," the "Jar of Honey," a portion of "The Town," and the greater part of his biography. I do hope that this timely paragraph of your contemporary has since come under the notice of the London County Council, and that it will not be long before a memorial tablet is erected on this interesting dwelling-place of Leigh Hunt. His handsome tomb in Kensal Green Cemetery is, I am happy to say, in perfect order. Your very obediently,

ALGERNON ASHTON.

CHILDREN'S HOLIDAYS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—At this period of the year large numbers of the children of London's well-to-do citizens are looking forward eagerly to their usual summer holidays in the country or by the sea. But more than half of the children of the poorer citizens of London have never known the delight of spending even a night in quiet country surroundings. Many of these live so far from the parks and open spaces that their only playground in holiday time must inevitably be the dingy street or crowded court in which they live.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Children's Country Holidays Fund is endeavouring to send away at least 45,000 of these small Londoners for a fortnight's holiday in the homes of country cottagers.

Never has the holiday been more needed. One effect of the unhappy labour troubles of the past twelve months has been that many of the children have been underfed and badly clad, and in consequence have suffered greatly in health. A fortnight's change of air and scene, with good country food, would do wonders in setting them up again and giving them the strength to withstand the trials of the coming winter.

I venture to appeal, therefore, most earnestly to your readers for financial help to prevent bitter disappointment to large numbers of children whom it will be impossible to send away unless further donations are forthcoming.

Every pound sent to the Hon. Treasurer, the Earl of Arran, 18, Buckingham Street, Strand, W.C., ensures for two poor children a fortnight in a cottage with kind country hosts.

Those who are hoping to take their own children away, and all who realise the recuperative and invigorating effect of the joy that such a holiday brings with it, will, I am confident, respond generously to this appeal. Yours faithfully, (Signed) THOS. BOOR CROSBY,
Lord Mayor.

July 12, 1912.

OUR RELATIONS WITH GERMANY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In reply to Mr. T. G. Martin, I fancy that the ordinary Englishman has an implicit confidence in the British Navy as being well able to scare away intruders while he indulges in the pleasant pastime of football watching. If he is a little more than ordinary, he looks also to the United States as an additional bulwark, and talks with becoming reverence of the Monroe Doctrine and the unthinkableness of war between the two branches of the Anglo-Saxon race. Now all this is, in my view, a state of false security. Our imperial interests and those of the United States are very far from being identical or mutually compatible. What of that Great Dream by which I suppose all citizens of the Republic are swayed, either consciously or unconsciously — the dream of a United North America dominant over two oceans and regulating the policy of the world? How does this dream assort with the continued existence of Canada as an integral part of the British Empire? And what but some such dream could induce a nation of strong commercial instincts to invest in a vast undertaking of such doubtful profit as the Panama Canal? I venture to think, sir, that the Panama Canal is the first step towards the realisation of that Great Dream to which I have referred as the impelling force in the United States National policy. That we should take steps to counteract the enhanced power of the Republic in the New World does not seem to occur either to our statesmen or to the directors of the Popular Press. Trust America, she will always stand by us and will never suffer us to be driven to the wall by ambitious and energetic rivals. There may be a little friction over Canal dues, it is true; but that will be easily composed by arbitration, just as the Maine boundary difficulty was composed, very much to the satisfaction of at any rate one of the parties.

I will conclude by stating what appears to me to be the position of Canada with regard to the Panama Canal as things now stand: Canada as a portion of the British Empire will have to pay Canal dues; as a portion of the United States of North America she would have free use of the waterway, and be a sharer in the realisation of the Great Dream. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
IMMO S. ALLEN.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—While I am grieved to think that the humble expression of my views in regard to the above places me, according to Mr. T. G. Martin, in the category of "the well-meaning and evil-doing group of purveyors of soothing syrup," I feel obliged to say that I prefer to remain in that class than in that of the fire-eating alarmist who sees an invasion of England in every move of Germany, and who imagines that yearly increase of armaments on sea and land are the only cure for the present tension. But I do object to be associated with the popular cry of "let us sit still and drift."

On the contrary, I submit that the apprehension on both sides must be removed, and that quickly, and in venturing to suggest that the statesmen of both countries will find a way out I assert with every confidence that at the present stage is the proper course to pursue. But I go further and, if it is found that the "powers that be," either through incompetence or excessive amour propre, stand in the way of a friendly settlement, then I am with Mr. Martin in appealing to the "man in the street" of both nations to ensure a settlement by the force of public opinion.

This country is no longer the sole guardian of the peace of Europe, and it would be worse than folly to attempt to assume that position. Any settlement with Germany will necessarily involve a policy of give-and-take, and we ought to be able to adopt such an attitude without loss of dignity or prestige.

I am sorry if I misunderstood Mr. Thomas McLeod in regard to his tonnage for the 250,000 Germans, but Mr. McLeod ought to know enough about shipping to realise that 50 large steamers (allowing 5,000 men per boat) cannot be diverted from their regular employment and filled up with soldiers, guns and stores without someone on this side knowing something about it, in which case, of course, the British fleet would be waiting for them at the mouths of the Elbe and Weser. I am afraid I must still hold to the opinion that, apart altogether from economic reasons, Germany will never be mad enough to face the terrible odds against her in such an adventure; nor do I believe, with all due respect to Mr. McLeod's Hamburg friend, that such a desire exists to any appreciable extent in the German Empire.—Yours, etc.,

July 12, 1912. R. J. TURNER.

THE PASSING OF A GREAT MASTER.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Our art critics have been so long at feud with the Royal Academy that everything and everybody connected with it is belittled by them, and the Press, art criticism, and the critics themselves are belittled at the same time; as we saw by the unworthy treatment a great American artist, Edwin Austin Abbey, received from a section of our Press on his passing to where critics cease from troubling and the logrollers are at rest. This scandal seems likely to be repeated in the case of a greater and far more original artist, Sir Lawrence Alma-Tadema, O.M., whom the nation honoured by burying him in our Pantheon, St. Paul's. Many of our great weekly papers made no mention of his death, and those which did so show no glimmering of insight into the nature and significance of his achievements. Putting aside personal preference, and resting on incontestable facts, we may safely affirm that Alma-Tadema was one of the most original and, in some respects, one of the most consummate painters of all time; and he made greater departures from orthodox or "academic" art than any one of his contemporaries. He opened up a new class of subjects, and made Greece and Rome live again in a way to colour all our thoughts of those epoch-making times. He gave us a new type of beauty, and in composition he gave us the quaint and unexpected with refreshing originality. Earth's records stored by cosmic chemistry in the variegated marbles he turned into precious stones by his wondrous artistry. With deepening insight he revealed a host of new beauties never before seen in art, and he perfected a new technique to realise them. In dealing with the master problem for the painter, light, he, with his command of the reflected lights, made pigment glow as it had never glowed before except in the hands of our own great light-bringer, Turner. Colour he sublimed into its higher refinements. Eschewing the crude primaries he gave those odd, unexpected, tender, æsthetic tones only discerned by the higher colour vision. All these new departures, these new phases of perfection, achieved by one man, constitute a record seldom equalled in the history of Art.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

We may like or dislike such art, we may deplore what we think this or that deficiency; but the extent of his actual attainments, the extent of his originality are beyond question; their real worth must be appraised by a saner generation, after the wave of Anarchism which has inverted all criteria has spent its force. Meanwhile we should call on our Press to rise to its responsibilities as the mouthpiece of the public, and not allow us to be degraded by the petty sectarianisms into which so many of our critics have fallen. Yours, etc.,

E. WAKE COOK.

20, Fairlawn Park,
Chiswick, W.

POETRY AND THE PUBLIC.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Your interesting and stimulating article in THE ACADEMY of July 6 prompts me, not "as a leading light of the intellectual world," but as a "mere ordinary man" with a love of poetry in its widest sense to suggest that Mr. Wilfrid Thorley has himself answered the two questions he commences his article with:—

No. 1: "Because we are in an age when the fine arts have become actively divorced from life."

No. 2: "Poetry, to win respect from the ordinary man, must be by way of an affirmation. Rightly or wrongly, to the normal English mind poetry stands or falls by its effect as a help towards or a hindrance to living."

May I add the opinion that an age must not be judged, from a poetical point of view, entirely by the merit or quantity of its verses; and however we may deplore "that present-day poetry generally speaks with a voice of protest, dismay, or despair," there are still singers and, moreover, workers who see and work poetically towards "the hills ahead," and echo bravely Campbell's (the Canadian) words:—

"Doubt but the battle smoke,
Dusk but the morning's cloak,
Care and despairing but dreams of the night,
Roll the grey mists up,
Drain deep the dawn cup—
Ride we—Ride we into His light."

The spirit of the age is surely full of hope, and, rightly or wrongly, is strenuously aiming and striving for another "New Birth":—

"God is in Heaven. All's right with the world."

Do not let us aim too much at writing good poetry, but let us inculcate by every means in our power the spirit of poetry into the rising generation. Yours faithfully,

C. OSCAR GRIDLEY.
Treasurer of the Poetry Society.

104, Elm Park Gardens,
South Kensington.

BOOKS RECEIVED

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS.

Aspects of the Irish Question. By Sydney Brooks. (Maunsel and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

Les Sculpteurs Français du XIIIe Siècle ("Les Maîtres de l'Art" Series.) By Mlle. Louise Pillion. Illustrated. (Plon-Nourrit and Co., Paris. 3f. 50c.)

Histoire du Peuple Anglais au XIXe Siècle: I. L'Angleterre en 1815. By Elie Halévy. (Hachette and Co. 15f.)

All Manner of Folk: Interpretations and Studies. By Holbrook Jackson. (Grant Richards, Ltd. 3s. 6d. net.)

English Lyrical Poetry from its Origins to the Present Time. By Edward Bliss Reed, Ph.D. (Henry Frowde. 8s. 6d. net.)

Princess Ælfrida's Charity. Part III. By Henry Lansdell, D.D. (Burnside, Blackheath. 7d., post free.)

The Love of Nature Among the Romans During the Later Decades of the Republic and the First Century of the Empire. By Sir Archibald Geikie, K.C.B. (John Murray. 9s. net.)

English Literature, 1880-1905. By J. M. Kennedy. (Stephen Swift and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

A Short History of the Worshipful Company of Horners. By H. G. Rosedale, D.D. (Blades, East and Blades. 5s. net.)

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Cornish Coast and Moors. By A. G. Folliott-Stokes. Illustrated. (Greening and Co. 12s. 6d. net.)

An Introduction to Psychology. By Wilhelm Wundt. Translated from the Second German Edition by Rudolf Pintner, M.A. (George Allen and Co. 3s. 6d.)

Histrionics in the Dramas of Franz Grillparzer. By Elizabeth Adelaide Herrmann. (University of California Press, Berkeley, Cal., U.S.A. 75 cents.)

Spenser, the School of the Fletchers, and Milton. By Herbert E. Cory. (University of California Press, Berkeley, Cal., U.S.A. 75 cents.)

The British Museum Reading Room: A Handbook for Students. By R. A. Peddie. (Grafton and Co. 1s. net.)

On the Truth of Decorative Art: A Dialogue Between an Oriental and an Occidental. By Lionel de Fonseka. (Greening and Co., 2s. 6d. net.)

FICTION.

The Triuneverse: A Scientific Romance. By the Author of "Space and Spirit." (Charles Knight and Co. 5s. net.)

Galbraith of Wynyates. By E. Everett-Green. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

The New Humpty-Dumpty. By Daniel Chaucer. (John Lane. 6s.)

The Things that Women Do. By Florence Warden. (F. V. White and Co. 6s.)

Into Thy Hands. By Arthur Applin. (F. V. White and Co. 6s.)

The Hidden Fear. By James Blyth. (F. V. White and Co. 6s.)

PERIODICALS.

St. George's Magazine; The International, N.Y.; United Empire; Men's League for Women's Suffrage; The Women's Industrial News; The Bodleian; Palestine Exploration Fund Annual, 1911; Bookseller; The Conservator, Philadelphia; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; La Revue; The Eugenics Review; The Dublin Review; Publishers' Circular; Peru To-Day; University Correspondent; Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly; The Bookfellow, Sydney; Revue Bleue.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Twelve years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC
OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO . . AND THROUGH CANADA . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service via Vancouver.

For further particulars apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE
TO
SOUTH AND EAST AFRICA.
WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.
Vià the SUEZ CANAL.
Calling at GIBRALTAR, MARSEILLES and NAPLES

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.
(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—
DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.
Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE
PLEASURE CRUISES
LIVERPOOL
to the
MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC
by the
"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"
. . . Ports of Call . . .
CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—
THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

P & O Passenger Services.
EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports.
(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)
Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises
Throughout the Year, according to Season.
AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.
Programme on Application.
For Passage, Freight and all information apply—
PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,
102, Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours.

R.M.S.P. PLEASURE CRUISES.

To	Fare	Length of Tour	Sailing	From
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £22.	Days 23.	Every Thursday Fortnight.	London.
THE AZORES.	£17†	19.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£12.	8 upwards.	Weekly.	Southampton & Liverpool.
WEST INDIES.	From £40.	From 34.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
NORWAY.	From £1 a day	13 upwards.	June to August.	Grimsby & Leith.
BALTIC & RUSSIA.	From £1 a day.	24.	August 24.	Grimsby.
MEDITERRANEAN, HOLY LAND & EGYPT.	From £1 a day.	10.	September to November.	Southampton & Marseilles.

† Including Hotel Accommodation.

For further particulars apply:—
THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY,
London: 18, Moorgate St., E.C., or 32, Cockspur St., S.W.

FEARLESS CRITICISM

In support of principle
In exposure of humbug
In scorn of cant

THE COMMENTATOR

A Weekly Review of Politics, Art, Music, Literature, and the Stage.

ONE PENNY WEEKLY of all Newsagents—or sent direct from the Publishers, for 6s. per annum (post free) or 3s. for six months.

COMMENTATOR, Ltd., 31, Essex St., London

Published by the Proprietor at Cannon House, Breams Buildings, London E.C. Office for Advertisements, 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C. Printed by BONNER & Co., The Chancery Lane Press, Rolls Passage, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

CONTENTS

	PAGE
Notes of the Week	99
Canoeing	100
On Contradicting	100
Is Jesus an Historical Personage?	101
Three Pairs of Spectacles	102
The Spell of the Duchess Anne	103
Reviews:
The Competition Festival Movement	105
The Poet Sub Judice ...	106
Religion and Life ...	107
Light on Agadir	108
Shorter Reviews	108
Fiction:
A Future for India ...	109
A Life on the Ocean Wave	110
The Theatre:
"The Ideal Wife" at Vaudeville Theatre ...	112
The National Reserve ...	112
English Character Seen Through Italian Spectacles—II	113
The Keeper of the Gate ...	114
Playing with Fire	115
Andrew Lang and His Work	117
At St. Stephen's Shrine ...	118
Art:
Some Exhibitions ...	121
The London Salon, 1912	121
Notes and News	122
Imperial and Foreign Affairs	122
Motoring	123
In the Temple of Mammon	124
Correspondence	125
Books Received	127

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C., where all communications to the Editor should be addressed.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Notes of the Week

ADDRESSING a gathering of the Midlothian Boy Scouts last week, Lord Rosebery said: "If I was to form the highest ideal for my country, it would be this—that it should be a nation the manhood of which was exclusively composed of men who had been Boy Scouts, and who were trained in the Boy Scout theories. Such a nation would be the honour of mankind; it would be the greatest moral force that the world had ever known." This is high praise, but we do not think it is too high for a movement which is setting before its members the finest ideals, and encouraging qualities of perseverance, endurance, and strict truthfulness, which too often deteriorate when boys are left to their own devices. Of late years the Boy Scout seems to be always on the spot in an emergency; if there is an accident, he knows what to do; he is getting to understand everything, from an aeroplane to a submarine. And his knowledge and general willingness, if we mistake not, are tending to make of him a fine specimen of English manhood and a good all-round citizen.

Too much fuss has perhaps been made over the fact that the English competitors did not win a first position in the sports contests at Stockholm. Although we may be a "nation of sportsmen," it need not follow that we are on the down grade simply because our representatives do not uniformly win the highest laurels in an international gathering. Our men do not devote their lives to rigid training for supremacy, as is the case, we are given to understand, with the Americans; trophies secured under such conditions signify individual excellence, doubtless, but convey no meaning when a national standard of achievement is sought. Meanwhile Private Fulton has won the King's Prize at Bisley, without any blare of trumpets, and our national recreations, undertaken for the simple enjoyment of the thing—cricket, boating, and the unostentatious athletics of summer days—tend to keep us fit guardians of the nation's honour and welfare.

During the last six or seven years a curious and very complete change has taken place in the noise of London's streets. Listening at an open space, such as Hyde Park Corner, a few years ago the prevailing sound was as that of heavy rain falling on a leafy garden; it was caused by hundreds of horse's hoofs, and it blended into a dreamy roar. Now it is a thunderous reverberation; the ground trembles, and at intervals there are blasts of rough music, stentorian organ-notes from obstructed traffic. Against this hooting, which in some cases is merely a habit on the part of drivers, and in many instances is entirely unnecessary, Mr. George Moore is protesting in the public Press. What seems to us equally reprehensible is the quality of the noise which some of these hooters emit. Is it needful to carry an instrument that bellows like a bull, or gives a violent, excruciating yell when a button is pressed, or whoops like the siren of a battleship? The central ways of London are fast becoming intolerable to people with ordinary nerves and ordinary ears. Later on, of course, we may develop nerves of steel and ears insensitive to music; then, perhaps, we shall enjoy the sudden, shuddering blast of the horn whose greatest triumph is that it indicates a wild animal in extreme agony.

The common house-fly is receiving an amount of attention lately entirely out of proportion to its size. Most of the daily papers, morning and evening, have had long articles on his unpleasant way of earning a living, and several magazines, notably Bedrock, have discussed him at a length which would flatter him, could he see and understand. He has been fed on specially prepared syrups, kept in durance vile until the number of bacilli on his feet and legs has been enumerated and tabulated, and the general result is to prove that on the whole Musca domestica is one of the most desperate villains in the insect world, to be, so to speak, shot on sight by all who have the health of the community at heart. We seem to remember campaigns similar to this in previous years; and still the familiar buzz awakes us in the early hours, still the brief word of execration escapes us at odd moments when his attentions become too pressing. One effect of this recrudescence of public interest is undeniable: it has become a boon to the effervescent journalist.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Canoeing

(Beaugency-sur-Loire.)

A STRONG stroke, and the boat leaps, and the heart grows merry!
But I think of a little farm slid by, and a dark girl at the ferry.
The sun dies, and a bird cries, and a bright star's gleaming:
And I alone in my small boat, with all the night for dreaming. . . .

A strong stroke, and the boat leaps, and the stream swirls under;
And here am I by the small white town, in a sad, hush'd wonder.
Lovers sigh and the leaves sigh—and bright eyes peeping:
A boy laughs and a girl laughs . . . and ah! who's weeping?

DOUGLAS GOLDRING.

On Contradicting

WHEN we were small and unimportant, yet not too small or too insignificant to hold some very decided opinions of our own, one of the first lessons we had to learn was the heinousness of the sin of contradicting. "Don't contradict!" we were constantly told; and if we ventured, under stress of firm convictions, upon the abrupt "'Tis" or "'Tisn't," reprisals too painful to be recalled with equanimity were sure to follow, the hollow pretence being that it was necessary for us to learn "good manners." Where, we doubtless felt inclined to demand, was the good manners in the process of slapping and other undignified maltreatment as reward for simple statements of truth?

As we grew older in the ways of the world, and possibly a little wiser, it was borne in upon us that contradiction was a thing most needful, and that often the sin lay rather in keeping silence than in speaking plainly our dissension from conclusions under consideration which seemed to us wrong. We began to realise that a great part of the life and vivacity of the world lies in the fact that most truths, like a coin, possess a head and a tail, a positive and a negative aspect; that one man lives to disprove precisely what another man spends his years in proving; that half the books that appear are written to pull to pieces the theories put forward in the other half; that one destroys, while another builds. And in time we regarded the sin of contradiction in a new light—regarded it, in short, as an art of indubitable value in the progress of the human race.

The man who never contradicts is a poor invertebrate fellow at the best. To endeavour to be "all things to all men" is too often to succeed in being nothing to any man. He may have opinions, but he rubs his hands pleasantly and adopts yours, rather than appear ungracious or disagreeable; his mind resembles a jelly that refuses to "set," perpetually ready to take the shape of any mould that may be handy. Not for him is the keen conflict of wit, the hammer-and-tongs argument that leaves its participants glowing, unconvinced, pugnacious still, but happy. Strong men regard him with a kindly contempt if they do not pass him by as a cipher, and if he gets on in the world it is because his temperament suits him peculiarly for the position of sycophant—there are always people who are willing to pay for a consistent and complimentary human echo. He is a Liberal—while he is reading the Liberal paper; he is a Conservative directly he turns to the Tory reasonings; he never knows which way to vote, and frequently doesn't vote at all. If he writes, he is principally employed in dressing up what other people have written.

For such men there is little use. The hard work of the world has been done and will be done by men who are not afraid to contradict, and there is more need for them than ever at the present time. To take only one example: because Ibsen was an acute psychologist, and saw in advance of his period the strain that was coming into social and family life, given certain conditions of unstable equilibrium, dozens of other less gifted writers jumped to the conclusion that such sorrowful conditions were the normal, and based upon those erroneous conclusions plays that have become the vogue—plays in which the principal attraction is a nauseating situation (known euphemistically as "daring") treated in a way that would have made Ibsen sad indeed. Where is the man, sure of his public audience, who will stand up and say that we want to get back to the clean, delightful plays of real wit and real humour so rarely seen, and still more rarely written nowadays; that it is not necessary to stage adultery; that the spectacle of one man making love to another man's wife is neither pretty nor funny; and that there are a thousand aspects of life which may be portrayed with profit without exaggerated pictures of perverted morals and desire masquerading as love? This is a contradiction that is badly wanted to-day.

There are many others; but there are not many men, apparently, who see the need of utterance. Outspoken contradiction may be "bad form" at times; but it holds tremendous possibilities for good when undertaken by a wise and fearless soul full of conviction. The cry of "good manners" may be exalted unduly until it becomes as the beautiful ignis fatuus that rises from stagnant waters and unwholesome places; give it its true worth as a guide to social pleasantness and agreeable intercourse; but let us not be afraid, when self-respect incites, to contradict, and to do it emphatically.

WILFRID L. RANDELL.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Is Jesus an Historical Personage?*

By FRANK HARRIS.

THE critical and sceptical spirit of our time inspired by the scientific method has at length ventured what may be called, after Dante, the supreme denial. Was there such a person as Jesus? it asks, with a would-be impartial manner. Is there any proof, any evidence even that such a man ever existed? Naturally, the author of the question is a German, the well-known Dr. Drews; his book, "Die Christusmythe," or "Christ Myth," set Germany thinking a couple of years ago. An English translation was published by Mr. Fisher Unwin in 1911, and now there appears "an abbreviated and amended version of the second part" of the book under the title, "The Witnesses to the Historicity of Jesus." There is nothing to be said against Dr. Drews' manner: he is not reverential, it is true: but, then, his avowed intention almost excludes reverence. He says in his introduction:—

> The chief aim of the work is to collect, examine, and refute the arguments which are advanced on the theological side for the historicity of Jesus. In spite of their arrogant behaviour, the German theologians have not been able to produce one single decisive reason for the historicity of Jesus. It remains to be seen whether the English authorities can adduce better proof of the validity of the Christian belief than their German colleagues have done.

And the spirit in which he undertakes his work is no less definite and definitely stated:—

> What a situation it is when the deepest thoughts of the modern mind must be measured by the teaching of Jesus, and referred to a world of ideas that has nothing to recommend it but the antiquity of its traditions and the artificially engendered appreciation of everything connected with it!

With this object, then, in view, and inspired by this contemptuous prejudice, Dr. Drews passes in review all the witnesses to the existence of Jesus. His learning seems sufficient, though his impartiality is to seek. First of all, he deals with "the Jewish witnesses," dwelling on the silence of Philo and Justus, and finally deciding that the famous passage in Josephus is the work of a Christian interpolater. Dr. Drews then handles "the Roman witnesses," and finds reason to reject all of them, even Tacitus, because, forsooth, the style of Tacitus is so peculiar that it is extremely easy to imitate. Dr. Drews forgets that the peculiar spirit of Tacitus is just as clearly to be seen in the well-known passage, and he furnishes no reason why anyone should imitate the views of Tacitus as well as his style. He sums up: "There is no such thing as a really convincing witness in profane literature." It is true that he is able to console himself for this. "What," he asks, "could Josephus or Tacitus do for us? They could at the most merely show that at the end of the first century, not only the Christians, but their tradition and Christ-mythos, were known at Rome. When it originated, however, and how far it was based on truth could not be discovered from Tacitus or Josephus."

At length Dr. Drews comes to Paul: after all, Paul is not a hundred years later than Jesus, but almost a contemporary, writing his epistles perhaps twenty years after the Crucifixion, and Paul again and again bears witness to Jesus in express terms. He tells at length of the Last Supper: he says he went to Jerusalem, and saw Peter and James, "the brother of the Lord": Paul is a witness whose truthfulness cannot be impugned, and whose capacity is as manifest as his trustworthiness. But after spending scores of pages in proving the obvious fact that Paul's Christianity is not in every respect the Christianity preached in the Gospels, Dr. Drews finally decides that Paul himself was probably a myth. His words are:—

> It is equally possible that the name of Paul is only a general title for a number of letter-writers who invented the character in order to give an air of authority to a religious system that went beyond the original Christianity. It would not be possible to ascribe so peculiar and novel a system as Paulinism to an immediate disciple of "the Lord," to whose supposed historical personality the other followers of the new religion appealed.

After all this, Dr. Drews finds no difficulty in disposing of the Gospels and their evidence, and here, as in his estimate of Paul and his witness, we are in direct opposition to him. He says:—

> The attempt to prove the historicity of Jesus is hopeless if there are no other historical sources for it than the gospels. . . . However much the figure of Jesus as it is set forth in the acts and words of the gospel narrative may move and enchain the sentiments of the reader, it cannot be deduced from these sentiments that an historical personality was the model of the character. Otherwise we should have to describe Homer's heroes, Shakespeare's Hamlet, and Goethe's Faust as historical personalities because they are so vividly portrayed and make such a "strong impression" on sensitive souls.

I am at issue with Dr. Drews from the beginning of his argument to the end. I believe, for reasons which I cannot give here, that the passage in Josephus mentioning Jesus and his crucifixion is authentic, though it has probably been amended or worsened by some overzealous Christian. I am persuaded that the account of Tacitus is absolutely trustworthy: its contemptuous anti-Christian bias removes any suspicion of invention. But without such confirmation the Gospel story itself would be as convincing to me as are the Epistles of St. Paul. Dr. Drews tells us that we have no reason to believe that there is a historic character named Paul, because, forsooth, we might as well believe in the historic reality

* Die Christusmythe. By ARTHUR DREWS. (Jena.)
The Witnesses to the Historicity of Jesus. By ARTHUR DREWS. (Watts and Co. 5s. net.)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

of Hamlet or Faust as in the historic reality of Paul. But Paul is a thousand times more vivid, I will not say than the shadowy Faust or the interesting Hamlet: he is more vividly realised in one epistle than Dr. Johnson in five hundred pages of admirable pen-photographs. We know Paul as we know no other character in all history; and if we do not believe that Paul has described himself to the finger-tips in these wonderful epistles, then we are compelled to believe that there existed in that first century an artist capable of creating him—an artist, that is, infinitely more gifted than Shakespeare or Goethe. As a historic personage St. Paul is astonishing enough; as an imaginary character he would be the wonder of the world's art.

And this argument, founded on the extraordinary vividness and peculiarity of the character of Paul, is enormously strengthened when we come to consider Jesus himself. Dr. Drews does not see that in denying the historical Jesus he is only increasing the difficulty. If we do not believe that Jesus was an historical personage, who created him? Who at that time and in that place was capable of imagining a man of such wisdom and such sweetness that he dwarfs even Buddha and Socrates? And who was it invented the magical story every incident of which has become a symbol in the mind of man? Does Dr. Drews seriously ask us to believe that three or four Galilean fishermen were capable of such a feat? Or does he imagine that an astral-myth can clothe itself not only with divine poetry, but with a passion of humility and self-sacrifice?

Dr. Drews asserts that many of the sayings of Jesus are to be found in the Hebrew prophets and earlier Jewish writings. But this proves nothing. The best words of Jesus are distinctively his own. There are sayings of his the like of which are not to be found in any other writing—sayings which carry with them not only an eternal appeal, but which in themselves are a convincing transcript of life. He spoke from the soul to the soul as no one ever spoke before or since, and it is a thousand times easier to believe in him than in his creation by inferior creatures who could not even understand him.

Three Pairs of Spectacles*

MULTIPLE personality is always interesting, and in authorship the interest is free from the sombreness that attaches to it in other connections. Mr. Sydney Brooks, writing on "Aspects of the Irish Question," exhibits three personalities. In descending order we find Mr. Brooks the able observer and critic, Mr. Brooks the Liberal without blinkers, and Mr. Brooks the Liberal with blinkers. Mr. Brooks 1, to borrow the style of identification employed by the late Mr. Myers and his fellow-workers in corresponding cases, has an ardent sympathy with the Celtic Irish, but he is fully alive to the shortcomings which racial character and their history have imposed on them.

"For bodies to pass resolutions," he says, "to which all present are secretly opposed; for Irish politicians to deride in conversation and in private letters pretty nearly everything they are engaged in upholding in Parliament and on the platform—these are the everyday phenomena of Irish affairs. Make-believe, dissimulation, a conscious insincerity, and the miasma of moral cowardice permeate nearly the whole country, and one is almost tempted at times to declare that if half-a-dozen leading Nationalist M.P.'s were to say on a public platform one-half the things they mutter in private about the devitalising tyranny of the Church over the social life and mental development of the people, it would do more for the essentials of Irish welfare than the most perfect of Home Rule Bills. Over far too large a portion of Ireland terrorism is the rule of life, opinion is no more than the bellowing of the loudest claque, civic spirit is represented by the wranglings and intrigues of factions, performance fails to follow promise, patriotism finds its only expression in a litter of histrionic resolutions, the very conception of industrial discipline seems to have perished, witnesses perjure themselves with an Asiatic liberality, juries return verdicts that every man in the twelve knows to be against the evidence, the individual cowers before the priest, and the whole conduct of life is scaled down to a turbulent level of greed, languor, intimidation, inefficiency, falsity, and superstition." Thus Mr. Brooks 1 on page 236 of the joint personalities' book: yet on page 237 Mr. Brooks 3 is able to remark, "The foolish taunt that the Irish are unfit for self-government is no longer heard. The fear of Home Rule producing or giving free rein to a régime of religious intolerance has been dispelled by the repeated demonstrations that in Ireland bigotry and the persecuting spirit are a Protestant monopoly."

On page 39 Mr. Brooks 1 deals with certain indisputable facts. "There are thirty-three County Councils in Ireland. In fourteen of them the Unionists have not a single representative; in eight they have only one apiece; in twenty-seven, out of a total of 780 Councillors, the Unionists are no more than 23; and in the whole thirty-three they are outnumbered by more than six to one. In the towns and cities it is just the same. The whole machinery of local administration, in fact, outside Ulster is in the hands of men whose chief claim to election is that they are Nationalists in sentiment, and who represent neither the wealth nor the experience nor the best brains and capacity of the country." Then Mr. Brooks 3 intervenes as a commentator. "The Unionists complain bitterly of their exclusion, but I cannot see what other fate they could possibly have expected. A majority long harassed and thwarted, often persecuted, always looked down upon, finds itself in sudden possession of political power. What can be more inevitable than that they should use that power against those who have oppressed them in the past, and who still retain most of the characteristics of an alien and dominant caste? An impartial student of Irish history can only, I think, marvel that the retribution should be so slight." In this matter, as Mr. Brooks 2 no doubt recognises, "performance has failed to follow promise," and Irish Unionists are not altogether wanting in sense of augury.

* Aspects of the Irish Question. By SYDNEY BROOKS. (Maunsel and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Mr. Brooks 2 contemplates with disfavour the Home Rule Bill now before Parliament. He passes judgment upon it almost in the tone of "Cato the Severe." "Compared with the comprehensive scheme of Home Rule worked out by Mr. Erskine Childers with such a wealth of understanding and so broad and sure a grip of the psychology, as well as the material problems and needs of the Irish people and of Irish government, the Bill brought forward by the Liberal Ministry is not statesmanship, but gerrymandering politics; and I gravely fear that it will not only deflect upon England a gathering tumult of Irish animosity and resentment, but will have to be proved unworkable in practice before the field is cleared for a more harmonious and lasting solution." But though Mr. Brooks 2 is wholly unable to commend the Home Rule Bill to intelligent electors it need hardly be said that for the Ulster Unionists who are uncompromisingly opposing it Mr. Brooks 3 has no sympathy—he has scarcely tolerance. "Ulster not only has its eyes on the counting-house," says the least perspicacious Mr. Brooks, "but Popery on the brain." Ulster seems to have seen, like Mr. Brooks 1, "the individual cowering before the priest." Nevertheless, Mr. Brooks 3 is convinced that "the obscurantism of Ulster is more than 'religious.' It is a wild nightmare of hallucinations in which Protestantism, landlordism, Unionism, and loyalty have come to be regarded as synonymous terms"; and the Ulsterman of the North-east "moves in a world of hysterical unrealities."

"Aspects of the Irish Problem" is a book that all students of the Home Rule problem will find it worth while to read; the facts in it stand out all the more clearly because the various Mr. Brooks destroy their respective theories about them.

The Spell of the Duchess Anne

EVERYWHERE in Brittany you are walking in the footsteps of a fifteenth-century feminist. Everywhere you are haunted by the spirit and the legends of the Duchess Anne; and nowhere more than in the green valley of St. Jean-du-Doigt. As the road winds seawards down the steep hill some twenty kilomètres from Morlaix, you get now a momentary peep between the trees at the blue of the Channel, now a glancing vision of a slender spire and a white-walled villa gleaming among the green. Then you lose them all in the prevailing verdure till you reach the bottom of the hill. A turn to the right—St. Jean!

You have heard that St. Jean is a resort of artists. Now you realise what that means: you run the risk of upsetting an easel at every dozen steps. Before every easel a painter, and on every canvas a church and a fountain, the church containing the sacred finger of St. Jean, and the fountain of the Duchess Anne—the most be-painted and be-photographed church and fountain in all Brittany. Very properly so, for both are beautiful in themselves and lovely in their setting.

The church and the fountain, and the old mortuary chapel, with its decaying roof of gloriously carved wood—these are the cause of the easels, and of the hotel and of the villas and the pensions that make up St. Jean. But the root cause of St. Jean-du-Doigt, of course, is le doigt de St. Jean. The little relic, enclosed in its little silver casket, with a little glass window for you to look through (which the Curé will presently show you with great reverence), the veritable finger of St. John, is responsible for them all—even for the bathing machines on the pebbly beach half a mile away. If mine host at the hotel with the Gothic doorways and arches and tortuous stone passages, formerly appertaining to a religious house, finds trade booming; if Madame Le Houérou at Les Lauriers, and Madame Scouarnec at Ker-jean, and Madame Maréchal at Bella Vista are making their frugal fortunes—let them attribute it all to the finger of St. John. Such is the puissance of a morsel of bone!

But no, not all. The Duchess Anne must have her tribute too, for if that strong-minded female had not determined some four hundred years ago to have her eyes cured by the miraculous water of St. Jean, and if she had not presented the village with its lovely fountain of stone with the leaden figures, now moss-grown and weather-worn, St. Jean-du-Doigt would be lacking half its æsthetic charm, and therefore half its patrons.

How she dominates Brittany still! As surely as though she had never married either Charles VIII. or Louis XII.—as though she had never taken the step which joined the acres of the duchy to those of the kingdom—as surely as if her own ambitions had been realised and Brittany had retained its independence, as surely as if the great Revolution had not centralised Regionalism out of existence and smashed her realm into a dozen French departments—the Duchess Anne still reigns. Even as the western peninsula of England looks back with shining eyes to the age of Elizabeth, when its peculiar heroes made its fame resound in the world, so the western peninsula of France looks back to the age of the Duchess Anne.

Frenchmen say that, in spite of her great talents, her cultivated tastes, she was a bad queen. "Ni comme femme, ni comme reine, cette excellente Bretonne et mauvaise Française ne mérite les éloges qu'on a répétés sur son compte." But in Brittany her eulogies are still sung. Only a little while ago she had an affaire all to herself, when Jean Boucher, the famous Breton sculptor, in a group of statuary placed on the front of the Town Hall at Rennes, depicting the union of France and Brittany, represented La Bretagne in an attitude of humility before La France.

"La Bretagne agenouillée!" cried the Regionalists, the Druids, and the local Press. Was ever such an outrage? The idea that the Duchess Anne could ever have been brought to kneel to the power of France! In other days an insult like this would have been wiped out with seas of blood. Now, as the Journal de Rennes remarked with delicious humour, it was avenged with "des flots d'encre!" "A genoux!" cried another journal in the course of sixteen patriotic stanzas:—

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

> Toi, Bretagne, à genoux en signe de servage,
> A genoux, implorant la pitié du vainqueur. . .
> Tu ne recevras pas cette blessure au cœur,
> Tu ne mérites pas, ô mère, cet outrage!

It was in vain that the genial Jean Boucher asseverated that his intentions were quite honourable, and that La Bretagne was not meant to be depicted kneeling. The uproar continued till the day when the work was "inaugurated" (by M. Chaumet, of the Posts and Telegraphs). The Druids refused to attend the ceremony, and there was almost a duel between a Republican deputy and a local journalist about it.

Here in St. Jean-du-Doigt we are far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife of Rennes. But the Duchess is still with us. We are indeed carried back into the very atmosphere of her own age. Here she came to worship the Relic, to bathe her eyes in the miraculous water that flows from the well into the church, to be cured of whatever trouble afflicted her, and to order the building of the lovely fountain—to which at this moment come white-capped Bretonnes with their pitchers, dressed in the very costumes in which she saw their ancestors curtsey as she passed into the church. But for the white villas (which are hidden among the trees) and the easels and the paint, the village of St. Jean has altered very little in four hundred years.

There was one person who had not come under the spell of the Duchess Anne, who disregarded the church, and was contemptuous of the fountain. He had turned his back upon them, and upon the long line of artists conjuring the spire and the leaden figures off palettes on to canvas in all the genres. He was facing the ripe yellow wall of the hotel, across which an old vine clambered. Stretched on a lounging chair against the wall was a pretty woman feigning to sleep, with her arms behind her head. Her simulacrum mingled with the outline of the vine in vague greens and misty blues upon his canvas.

It was while I consulted Hebe in the hotel as to the composition of a drink attuned to the temperature of the day that he came in. Hebe turned to him.

"Do you not recommend, monsieur, a little cassis for such weather?"

"Well, ya—as," said he, "or you might do better with vin blanc-citron—mix a little white wine, lemon, and soda."

It was while Hebe composed the mixture that we became acquainted. I remarked upon the fact that he was not doing his duty as a good American: he was not painting the church and the fountain of the Duchess Anne.

"No—o," said he, with a drawl. "Fact is, I'm paintin' the Duchess Anne herself. I'll introduce you. If you want to see the relics and the church, it's about time she made her daily pilgrimage, and we can go along together."

The Lady of the Vine smiled when her whimsical companion presented her to me as the Duchess Anne. "Delicate flattery," she called it, as anybody who had seen a portrait of the Duchess Anne would at once perceive. The nickname was a confidential joke between them, and so remained for an hour.

We had pulled at the Curé's door bell, walked through his long, weed-grown garden, waited a moment in the bare passage with the dark crucifix upon the whitewashed wall; we had followed him and his jangling keys, as his soutane whirled up the dust along the sun-baked road; we had been permitted to inspect the jewels, the finger of St. John, and the wondrous chalice given to the church by the Duchess Anne, and we had made our contribution to the funds of the parish. So far no explanation. Then, the Curé said,

"Madame's eyes are better?"

"Yes, monsieur," replied the Lady of the Vine; "they improve daily."

We all strolled down the church together, and in the North Wall came to a little zinc tank, with tiny taps that supplied it with water. Madame stopped and dipped her hand in the tank, and made the sign of the Cross with the water upon her forehead. Then she bathed her eyes, the Curé looking gravely on.

"My husband laughs at this, you know, monsieur," said she, smiling at the Curé.

"Oh, monsieur pretends to laugh, because he will not be thought superstitious," was the reply. "But he is diligent to bring you here every day—and has he not given you the sobriquet of 'the Duchess Anne'? I am certain that monsieur will never let you leave St. Jean, and never give up the daily visit to the sacred spring, until the miracle is achieved."

The artist had strolled away to the porch on the other side of the church through which the ardent sunlight was streaming.

"My eyes were very bad when I came here three weeks ago," said the Lady of the Vine, by way of explanation. "We were at Morlaix, and I happened to take up a foolish little guide-book and read a silly little tale about the miracle which the well of St. Jean had wrought upon the Duchess Anne four hundred years ago. And somehow or other it got on my nerves—you know the way things will when people are ill. Horace laughed me to scorn—and insisted on bringing me down to show what folly it was. And here we've been. And really, I'm much better."

"Dieu merci!" said the Curé.

"I think it's a radio-active spring, isn't it?" said the artist, who had come up behind.

"Perhaps, monsieur," said the Curé. "But it is as God made it. And as for madame, it goes well with her, eh? Bon jour, madame, messieurs." And we stepped out into the sunshine, where the drops of water falling from the moss-grown fountain glistened like showers of diamonds.

R. A. J. WALLING.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

REVIEWS

The Competition Festival Movement

Mary Wakefield: A Memoir. By ROSA NEWMARCH. (Atkinson and Pollitt, Kendal. 2s. 6d. net.)

THE name of Mrs. Newmarch on the title-page of this brief memoir assures us that the story of Mary Wakefield, what she was and what she did, will be told with perfect tact, knowledge, and discernment. Except for one verbal delinquency—she writes "cultured" when she means "cultivated"—we cannot find a fault. It would have been so natural if a friend of Miss Wakefield had sometimes allowed enthusiasm to master judgment; so natural for a musician to hold language of too glowing praise about the success of that Competition Festival Movement which must surely remain for Mary Wakefield a monument more durable than brass. But Mrs. Newmarch, whether as friend or musician, always remembers to write with measure, at the same time allowing the reader to see how unreservedly her affection and sympathy and admiration had gone out to the bright, brilliant woman who is the heroine of her pages. It would have been easy, also, to have expanded this memoir into a volume of the ordinary type by the inclusion of letters which would undoubtedly have been interesting, and a host of details which, for the general reader, would have been entirely unnecessary. Mrs. Newmarch sets a good example to the compilers of memoirs when she confines her account of the life and labours of Mary Wakefield to a thin volume of 125 pages. She tells the public all they need to know, but not more, about a life which was so full, and labours which were so extended and so useful that a less gifted biographer could hardly have described them in so short a space.

It is when we look back to the state of music, amateur and professional, town and country, in the England of the "seventies," and compare it with its state to-day, that we most clearly realise the value of such a life, such a work as Mary Wakefield's. She was never, perhaps, more than the most gifted amateur of her time, but in such a sphere as was open to her she accomplished as much for music as did any professional in larger fields. Had her circumstances obliged her to earn her living, to "go through the mill," and apply herself to one task with the concentrated purpose of an apostle, "This one thing I do," she had gifts, energy, enthusiasm which would quite certainly have enabled her to take ultimate rank among the great women of the Victorian epoch. Had she been born forty years later, in the more liberal conditions of the present time, it would have been recognised from the first that she was one of those whose destiny was to be in the forefront of the world's workers, and she would have been trained accordingly. But though her exceptional talents were perhaps restricted to work in a more confined sphere than that of which they were worthy, let no one despise that work. She began by influencing the taste of musical amateurs. The cultivation of the amateur is a very different thing now from what it was in the "seventies," although at that time there were several amateur singers much finer than any we know of now. Mme. Conneau, Lady Folkestone, Lady Downe, Lady Agneta Montagu were among them. But these ladies sang such songs as their everyday hearers liked. It was Mary Wakefield who seasoned her programmes with Schubert and Schumann and the old Italians, and caught eagerly at the work of the coming composers. So indefatigably did she travel about England with her fine repertoire—she kept "popular" songs for the inevitable encores—that she succeeded in making a very definite and permanent impression upon the musical taste of those days. She was an amateur Camilla Lardi, if anyone who never heard her wishes to know what she was like as a singer; though Mrs. Newmarch perhaps goes too far when she says that, had Miss Wakefield become a professional singer, she would have been one of the greatest. The training had not been sufficiently severe, and the natural gifts were not perfectly under control.

We remember hearing Mme. Ristori speak a little gravely of a certain incompleteness of equipment when all social Rome was talking about Mary Wakefield as if she were Malibran rediviva. It is possible that there never was another woman in the world so good-hearted and unselfish as Mary Wakefield, and she gave too unstintingly of her best in those years when Music's tide was coming up with a rush and everybody wanted her to sing for them. Prodigal as she was of her talents, her singing would probably have been finer had she been less generous, and given more time to the discipline of study. When a certain reaction came after the busy years of social success and untiring platform work, Miss Wakefield's energy found a new channel, and she did as much good by the lectures, which she illustrated herself, as she had formerly done by her singing. She reached a wider class, and taught it that music has charms which are not confined to the momentary pleasure of hearing a song or two at a concert. But the great moment had not yet arrived, though all the experience gained as singer and lecturer was to bear abundant fruit.

The present writer was tolerably familiar with the conditions of music in Westmoreland and Cumberland at the time when Miss Wakefield began the labours that were to result in the wide-spread Competition Festival Movement, which, issuing from the ancient mountain town of Kendal, has changed the character of music in countrysides throughout England by inspiring new ideals. Mrs. Newmarch tells the story of this work briefly enough. This is a part of her book which we would willingly have found more copious. But still, without omitting essentials, she states, with conspicuous fairness, the collateral influences which aided the successful development of the Westmoreland scheme, and does not permit the legend to spread that the Competition Festival emanated, Minerva-like, from Miss Wakefield's brain. But she brings out, what is most important, that the statesmanship which was responsible for the guiding of the infant movement was hers. With a head at the helm less wise than Mary Wakefield's—we may add, also, with a leader less completely endowed with the special genius of a general—the movement would never have been guided to the ultimate, surely-founded success that it was. There had been competitions, there had been local festivals before Kendal, but the finger which touched and gave them life and the power to grow was Miss Wakefield's. In the "Risorgimento" of England's music her name holds a place unique indeed. On her banner were inscribed the words of Ruskin: "Music fulfils its most attractive and beneficent mission when the masses of the people enjoy it as a solace and a recreation."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Like some musical Joan of Arc, Miss Wakefield set out to free her country from ignorance, lethargy, acquiescence in the lower forms of musical enjoyment, to raise the standard of taste, to show how possible it is for the dwellers in the remotest villages to join with their brethren in a concord of sweet sounds. We do not know to what extent the individual members of the choirs and orchestras who reap the advantages of the movement which she sowed recognise their debt to Miss Wakefield. Many of them, perhaps, take it for granted that their Festivals exist, and they need not trouble to inquire how they came into being. But we trust that the leaders of every body which takes a part in the Competition Festivals will see to it that Mrs. Newmarch's memoir of their founder circulates generously among the singers and the players. Lectures, the material drawn from its pages, might well be given at the commencement of the winter rehearsals. Gratitude is not such an extinct emotion among us as some pretend, and we cannot but believe that a very little pains need be taken to kindle a real sense of gratitude and devotion to the memory of Mary Wakefield among the humbler musical folk whose cheering activities she may be said to have called into existence.

The Poet Sub Judice

New Essays, Literary and Philosophical. By JAMES LINDSAY, D.D. (Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 6s. net.)
The Future of Poetry. By F. P. B. OSMASTON. (Elkin Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Poet and the Poetic Principle. By L. CONRAD HARTLEY. (J. E. Cornish, Manchester. 2s. net.)

THE poet keeps us pretty busy nowadays. In the intervals of charming our ears as a singer he occupies our critical faculties as a phenomenon. Here are three more books, all more or less concerned with him in the latter sense. Dr. Lindsay's excellent essays deal almost exclusively with poetical subjects. There is a very comprehensive sketch of the Romantic Movement, a brief survey of contemporary Italian poetry, an essay on the poetry of Petrarch, and one on the genius of Browning. Two of the papers, however, are of a more general character. One of these discusses with good effect the distinctive features of epic and lyric poetry. A brief extract or two will serve to show Dr. Lindsay's characteristic standpoint:

> The lyric poet, remaining ever himself, freely abandons himself to his own vivid impressions, but the epic poet may not wrap himself up in personal interest in this fashion, but must have his readers ever before him. In the primacy of the song spirit, the lyric differs from the epic, whose motive and inspiration are primitively ethical.
>
> The true epic demands at least religious imagination, for, in its desire to explain its great humanitarian fact or event by heavenlier agency or power, it shows itself to be, of all poetic styles, the most essentially religious.

Hence he ranks Dante above Milton because "Dante's cosmical epic is more shot through with Christian idea." In a further essay treating of the relation between poetry and philosophy Dr. Lindsay takes a fairly "safe" line. He is not prepared to uphold Matthew Arnold's prophecy that poetry will in the end dethrone philosophy. The two are permanently co-existent, though in a sense inter-related. "The poet is philosopher by inspiration and instinct, not through ratiocinative process; the philosopher is poet by insight and vital thinking." For the most part Dr. Lindsay does not break any very fresh critical ground, and his literary judgments are inclined to a rather pronounced flavour of the D.D., but the essays are well written, and will be found very pleasant reading.

Curiously enough, Mr. Osmaston, in his stimulating little essay, discusses the same dictum of Arnold, but in a more suggestive way. He accuses Arnold of totally ignoring the idea of philosophy of art, since he regarded art simply as superlative expression. In this sense Mr. Osmaston repudiates the contention also; Art and Philosophy are distinct both in their content and in their problems. But his own conception of the art of poetry is wider and more profound. It comprehends a lifting of the particular into the universal; and he ventures to hope that, the "Universal in Philosophy" having "vanished," poetry will replace the sister Muse in this respect. "The supreme value," he says, of an intensely personal poem, such as Tennyson's "In Memoriam" or Meredith's "A Faith on Trial," > does not consist in the nearness of an approach to scientific truth at all . . . .; it consists in this: that it is the expression of a faith that can only be expressed in the full strength of its appeal through the medium of an imaginative art vitalised by a spirit which is not entirely intellectual at all, or an appeal direct to the intelligence, but is essentially mystical or symbolic, and as such is an appeal to man's entire nature.

Viewed in this light, poetry is a criticism of life from a unique and inspiring standpoint, and its contribution is of the sort we can perhaps least afford to dispense with. With regard to the specific question of the future of poetry, Mr. Osmaston is very guardedly optimistic.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

He only faintly trusts the larger hope of Emerson that presently "we shall know how to take up all this industry and empire with thought as easily as when the arts were few"—is a little afraid that this modern life of ours is a lymphatic affair beside the life Shakespeare knew; but he seeks comfort in the principle of Browning that poetry, while critical, is reconstructive, and takes the past as well as the present into its scope. But the modern tendency is to lose the architectonic in the passion for complexity, to make consummate craftsmanship hide poverty of spiritual vision. If poetry is to fulfil her future, those who would serve her must do so with the high seriousness of a prophetic and priestly office. Which brings Mr. Osmaston to the conclusion of his interesting argument with Hugo's oracular words: "La poésie contient la philosophie comme l'âme contient la raison."

Mr. Hartley's contribution to the subject is an agreeable discourse enough, of a not too technical character. His style is rhetorical and declamatory. In fact, we can best place it as a lecture delivered at "a meeting of the Hatherlow Literary Club." It will serve to occupy a pleasant hour by and by at the fireside.

Religion and Life

Aus Wissenschaft und Leben. By ADOLF HARNACK. 2 Vols. (Alfred Töpelmann, Giessen. 10 Marks.)

PROFESSOR ADOLF HARNACK is one of the outstanding figures of modern Europe. It is not entirely because of his supreme position in relation to an increasingly popular body of science, nor is it wholly on account of his opinions and conclusions. These latter, indeed, are often highly provocative, in spite of the moderation with which they are expressed, and in spite of their promulgator's aspirations after an eventual harmony of the universal human spirit. The paradox is, however, at best superficial; all harmony comes out of conflict, and the Founder of Peace on Earth has said, "I came not to bring peace, but a sword." Nevertheless, we cannot help dwelling for a moment on the apparent incompatibility of aims with methods in connection with Professor Harnack's remarks on Catholicism. Nothing is more certain than the great theologian's goodwill towards the Roman Church and his desire to do it justice; but we will venture to say that no part of his writings is more open to controversy, from one side or the other.

The great quality of Professor Harnack is his universality; he is not simply a theologian or a religious historian; he is in the very highest sense a man—one to whom no human transaction, past, present, or to come, is without interest. We have only to glance at the headings of his speeches and writings. Questions of pure theology are found side by side with proposals for a modus vivendi between Catholics and Protestants in Germany, or between Englishmen and Germans in the world, with domestic matters, such as the regulation of German education and the constitution of the "Evangelical" National Church, with maxims on the use and abuse of footnotes in books, with remarks on the Royal Library at Berlin, and with a host of heterogeneous subjects. Readers of the "Reden und Aufsätze," of the same author, reviewed in THE ACADEMY some nine years ago, will know what they are to expect to find in the present volumes.

We were surprised a short while ago to find the judgment expressed by a French critic that Professor Harnack's discussion of modern problems was trivial, "simpliste," or some such adjective. We can only suppose that the critic of books was judging the critic of life from the point of view of the austere specialist. For our part, we hold that the historical spirit is an admirable qualification for a view of life. Professor Harnack is not one of Carlyle's "Prussian Dryasdusts." He has the only true open mind—that is to say, he has strong opinions, amounting sometimes to prejudices, and he can examine a question without any prejudice at all. His own conclusion of the matter will save many words: "Das Wissen allein reicht zur Wissenschaft nicht aus, es will getan sein." He is a great practical optimist, not disdaining any part of his heritage, but looking forward to a better future. Among other things, he is a patriot and an ardent loyalist; no formula will move the world that has not patriotism for one of its terms; but some of the eulogy on Bismarck is difficult to reconcile with certain other ideals of the author. He is on safer ground when he salutes the Iron Chancellor somewhat vaguely as a "Dichter." The Reformation means much to a German Protestant, but Professor Harnack is willing to share it with the Roman Catholics: "Wenn man die Reformation schmäht, so schmäht man den Mutterschoss, aus welchem im sechzehnten Jahrhundert neben der Reformation auch all das Gute hervorgegangen ist, was eine Erneuerung der Katholischen Kirche bewirkt hat."

It is natural that the religious sections of this book should be the most interesting. Professor Harnack pleads for the essential unity of religion and history, and insists on the identification of the former with life in the highest sense, but practically religion tends to be a subject apart. Controversialists are presented with one golden maxim for their guidance: "Die falsche Kampfesweise besteht darin, die gute Theorie der eigenen Kirche mit der schlechten Praxis der anderen zu vergleichen; man vergleiche vielmehr Theorie mit Theorie und Praxis mit Praxis." It is in the spirit of this great principle that certain aspects of the Mass are held up for the approval of Protestants, while the Papal Encyclical of 1907 is praised because, in defiance of political prudence, it "nach langer, langer Zeit von höchster Katholischer Stelle die Glaubens—und Weltanschauungsfrage, nicht aber die Frage des Papstums, in den Mittelpunkt stellt." We have quoted enough of Professor Harnack's words to show what sort of a spirit can be brought into great controversies by a great protagonist; for the application of this spirit we can only refer the reader to the two volumes we have been discussing.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Light on Agadir

Morocco in Diplomacy. By E. D. MOREL. (Smith, Elder and Co. 6s. net.)

THIS book appears none too soon, for the twentieth century has a way of forgetting history, as it makes it, in a hurry. The author has aimed at a clear presentation of the events preceding and leading up to the Algeciras Convention, and subsequently, with a view to furthering the understanding between England and Germany, of the practical violation of the terms of that historic agreement by at least two of its signatories, which led to the dispatch of the Panther to Agadir.

It is a twisted, tortuous story which Mr. Morel has to tell, too long to be outlined within the limits of a review. The book itself is a marvel of compression, and, whatever one may think of the conclusions, a number of the premisses are unassailable. As the German Chancellor stated in a fairly well-remembered speech, the Algeciras Act was "intended to maintain the independence of Morocco with a view to the economic development of the country for the benefit of the trade of all the Powers parties to it"—a characteristically German sentence, by the way. The occupation of Fez by French troops, publicly approved by Sir Edward Grey, and followed by the dispatch of a strong Spanish force to occupy Larash and El-Kasr, in the North Atlantic section of Morocco, may have been innocent enough, but on these actions, principally, Mr. Morel bases his contention that these two Powers violated the Act—in effect—and that the dispatch of the Panther was no piece of international piracy, but a reasonable expression of a reasonable desire that Germany should not lag behind in the land-grabbing operations about to commence.

In this, as in all that preceded and followed the crisis of last autumn, the author presents his facts in such a way as to make out a remarkably strong case for Germany. It is shown that the very acts which so nearly led to the breaking of the peace of Europe were due to a desire to maintain peace, and stress is borne upon the point that the presence of the Panther at Agadir was never an "occupation" of that port. Had Germany wanted war she could easily have provoked it by the reasonable demand that French and Spanish troops should be withdrawn from Morocco, in order to preserve the status quo—Moroccan independence.

Thus reasons Mr. Morel, and those who are acquainted with his works on West African and Congo problems will realise that this is not a book to be neglected. The Franco-German Convention of last November makes waste-paper of the Algeciras Act; the independence of Morocco disappears in a French protectorate, while Germany gets certain advantages, and British commercial interests benefit materially by the new position. Events are piling up in a way which makes for forgetfulness of these things, save in the case of those immediately concerned, but the probability of greater friendliness between Britain and Germany in the near future makes it desirable that this book should be well and widely read. We may not agree with all its author's conclusions, but the mass of facts which he presents clearly and concisely will assist in forming the opinion that, after all, the Moroccan crisis was not all Germany's fault.

Shorter Reviews

Anglais et Français du XVIIe Siècle. By CHARLES BASTIDE. (Félix Alcan, Paris. 4 fr.)

"DE tout temps l'Anglais a été partagé entre le désir de nous admirer et celui de nous haïr," says M. Bastide in the book before us; curiously enough, just before reading this pronouncement, we happened on its almost exact pendant in an article by M. Jean Finot, who speaks of the English as "un grand peuple, noble et libéral, dont on médisait et médit souvent, mais qu'au fond on admire toujours." The two nations indicated have long resembled two children newly brought together by the informal introductions of childhood; suspicion, curiosity, and instinctive sociability season their relations. M. Bastide is anxious to throw light on the origins of our international relations. The seventeenth century is, for many reasons, an excellent starting point, but chiefly because it was then that politics in the modern sense were invented. This is very important for Anglo-French relations, in view of the generally accepted judgment that "jusqu'à la mort de Louis XIV., la France donna à sa voisine plus qu'elle n'en reçut, mais au XVIIIe. siècle, l'Angleterre nous dédommagea largement de notre apport." M. Bastide considers that the French refugees exercised so decisive an influence on English thought that the view cited above requires modification. It is in the coffee-houses, especially at the "Rainbow," that "pendant la période qui s'étend de la Révocation à la mort de Guillaume III., toute l'œuvre du XVIIIe. siècle s'accomplit d'avance." Huguenots started our newspaper system, Huguenots were the leaders in many of our most famous controversies, and we find it estimated that, a little before the middle of the eighteenth century, one-fifth of our commerce was in the hands of persons of Huguenot origin.

There are many interesting features in this book. There is, for instance, an account of an average journey from Paris to London. Then there are chapters on the respective linguistic attainments of the two nations. We read with astonishment of a French Ambassador who is baffled by the expression, "Very wel." We find the two most ancient English Universities masquerading as "Cambruche" and "Auxonne." As to the Ambassadors, M. Bastide thinks that a little elementary knowledge on their part of the English people and language might have averted the Revolution of 1688. Finally, we will mention a little chapter on Shakespeare and his Huguenot acquaintances.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Fauna of British India, including Ceylon and Burma: Coleoptera. By W. W. FOWLER, M.A., D.Sc. (Taylor and Francis. £1.)

THE subject of beetles appears to be practically inexhaustible. This is another volume in the great series in the course of publication under the authority of the Secretary of State for India, edited by Dr. Shipley, F.R.S. This particular volume is by Canon Fowler, formerly President of the Entomological Society of London, and author of the "Coleoptera of the British Isles." Its scientific value may therefore be regarded as guaranteed. Anyone taking it up can see at a glance the fascination the whole subject is capable of affording, though by ordinary persons beetles are commonly disliked as horrid vermin. The scientific language is to others as repellent as the creatures themselves. Yet many sentences are clear enough:—

> A beetle may be compared to an aeroplane, being considerably heavier than air, with the elytra and wings constituting the balancing-frame, the body representing the passengers and material, and the wing-muscles representing the motor. In order to counteract the comparatively great weight of the body the wings must present a correspondingly large area, and must, therefore, when expanded, be much larger than the elytra. As it is, however, of the greatest importance to the insect that the delicate wings should be protected by the elytra, there must necessarily be a mechanism for folding them, and this we find to be the case not only in the Coleoptera, but in all orders that have the outer wings corneous (horny) or coriaceous (leathery).

The introduction deals fully with the creature in general, including its external and internal structure, up to its classification. The main portion of the work would be unintelligible but for the copious glossary of technical terms; and some explanation of the numerous names mentioned in the classification would be an improvement. The extent of the subject is enormous; there are 1,500 species of the Cicindelidæ, often called Tiger-beetles from the ferocity of their nature, as well, perhaps, as from their colouring: the Carabidæ family contains some 13,000 to 14,000 species: and so on. The information thus collected represents the achievements of many collaborators in India, Burma, Ceylon, and other countries. The illustrations, nearly in all cases original, are numerous and excellent: they add to the completeness of a work which is a distinct contribution to scientific knowledge.

Guilelmus Neubrigensis ein Pragmatischer Geschichtsschreiber des Zwölften Jahrhunderts. By DR. RUDOLF JAHNCKE. (A. Marcus and E. Weber, Bonn. 4 Marks.)

WILLIAM OF NEWBURGH is perhaps little known among our earlier historians and chroniclers, but as the man to whom Freeman gave the title of "Father of historical criticism," he is worthy of all honour. Dr. Jahncke's dissertation examines his credentials, and abundantly establishes that he was a sincere and single-minded historian, endowed with a fruitful curiosity, an almost precocious understanding of the laws of historical evidence, and an unprecedented impartiality. The grave retailers of legends, such as Geoffrey of Monmouth, the amateurs of the marvellous, the Chauvinists, and the furious partisans are all treated by the Yorkshire monk with a most judicious severity. He can lay aside clerical prejudice to judge the faults of Thomas à Becket, when the Canterbury tragedy is still a living memory, and when "nicht nur England, sondern die gesamte Christenheit schaute in blinder Bewunderung zu ihm als zu ihrem Märtyrer und Heiligen auf." Foreigners are spoken of with discrimination and appreciation, and even the Saracens are allowed their good qualities; the persecutors of the Jews may be the instruments of Heaven, but that plea will not serve to avert punishment here and hereafter for their crimes of violence. A well-accredited poisoning story is dismissed for lack of evidence, and two alternative accounts are given of the death of Barbarossa. William of Newburgh attaches great importance to the testimony of eye-witnesses, which, as an almost contemporary writer, he was often able to command. He reminds us, in that respect, of Voltaire—another of the "fathers of history"—and, indeed, there are other points of resemblance. For the rest, his work does not add much to the materials for the study of the period; its value lies in the method rather than in the substance. Dr. Jahncke's volume forms a good introduction to what should be an excellent historical series.

Fiction

A Future for India

A Derelict Empire. By MARK TIME. (William Blackwood and Sons. 6s.)

THE tricks constantly, and specially of late years, played in India with the Government of the country have set many people thinking on the further developments possible and the results which may ensue. This skit, which the author calls a fantasy, supposes that, under a Socialist and Syndicalist majority in the House of Commons, the Home Government had decreed the final withdrawal of England from India, and that it actually took place on the day appointed, the country being left, on the departure of the Viceroy and the English troops and officials, to the Indian Army, with a National Assembly, composed of Indian representatives, installed at Allahabad. But one far-seeing officer, a smart captain of native cavalry, the hero of the book, utilised the interval between the announcement and execution of the withdrawal to some purpose. Retiring from the Government service, he, with the help of native officers devotedly attached to his commanding personality, organises a coup d'état which comes off to perfection.

The Native Army, under his leadership as Captain-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

General, becomes the real power in India; the National Assembly is relegated to subordinate functions, and an attempt of the Marathas to assert themselves is cleverly suppressed. The hero's task of governing India, however, has only then begun. The independent Nepalese, unprovoked, make a raid on Kumaon, but their capital is seized by the hero's dashing enterprise. The Afghans invade India in force, but meet with signal defeat near Peshawar. The hero's plans never fail; his good fortune never deserts him. When ominous rumours of a combined attack on India by Russia and Japan assume grave proportions, and India, having no navy, is destined to become a victim, a deus ex machinâ appears in the form of an emissary from the Kaiser, who offers, with reference to the above rumours, to take India under German protection on two conditions, the acknowledgment of German suzerainty and a preferential tariff for German goods. The hero resolutely declines to forego his allegiance to King George, and prepares to leave India; a telegram from the Kaiser, waiving the question of suzerainty for the present, and praying the hero to stay in India, ends the book.

This jeu d'esprit is full of life and incident. It shows much geographical and military knowledge, besides keen observation of current politics, and it displays real acquaintance with India. The various Indian characters are well depicted—the intriguing Maratha, the loquacious representative, the neurotic student, the faithful and brave Indian soldier. The authorities are mercilessly exposed. The hero stands somewhat on a pedestal, and is perhaps too universally successful. It is noticeable that there is no heroine or love-story, no mention of a woman's name. A breezy, bright little book—"A Derelict Empire" may be read with profit and instruction by the British elector, to whom it is inscribed.

A Life on the Ocean Wave.

John Graham, Sub-Lieutenant, R.N.: A Tale of the Atlantic Fleet. By FLEET-SURGEON T. T. JEANS, R.N. With Frontispiece. (Blackie and Son.)

SURGEON JEANS long since made himself popular as a purveyor of sea-stories dealing with life on a modern battleship as seen from the inside. For most British youngsters, at one period or another of their adolescence, will, as sure at fate, long for

> A life on the ocean wave!
> A home on the rolling deep;

and books that tell of

> The sea! the sea! the open sea!
> The blue, the fresh, the ever free, and the brave doings thereon, seldom fail to appeal to them.

Our earlier sea-yarns dealt with those wooden walls of Old England which have now become obsolete—leaving behind them many a glorious memory—to be replaced by the torpedo-boat, the destroyer, the submarine, the fleet armoured cruiser, and the mighty super-Dreadnought, with its 13-inch guns, either of which modern craft would more than astonish a jolly Jack Tar of Nelson's day, were he to come back among us; for in this age of steam and electricity the seafaring man gives little thought to

> A wet sheet and a flowing sea,
> A wind that follows fast,
> And fills the white and rustling sail,
> And bends the gallant mast.

This present "Tale of the Atlantic Fleet" comes very apropos at a time when our Navy is passing through such a momentous crisis. It is written in Surgeon Jeans' usual light vein, full of humour, and, indeed, rollicking fun, but also with a serious side which gives the reader many an instructive side-light on life at a naval college and on board a modern warship. As the incidents recorded are founded on actual facts, the book may be taken as typical of the early careers of young British naval officers, and in that respect alone it is well worthy the perusal of those who take an interest—as all should—in our first line of defence. But the story is most entertaining reading also. The characters, every one of them, are all very much alive-o; their nicknames and their merry doings, the Model's practical jokes especially, are enough to make the proverbial Cheshire cat laugh; and one of the youngsters actually has that feline pseudonym bestowed upon him by his shipmates.

As we have before said, however, there is a serious side to the yarn as well, which shows how more than high spirits is expected of the young British sailor. A good instance of this is told in the chapter, "The Blusher Turns," when the Cheshire Cat, commanding a steam-pinnace, succeeds in dodging the battleship's searchlights by an ingenious device of his own, and might easily have torpedoed her, much to his commanding officer's astonishment and admiration. "'It's not every jam-guzzling snotty who'd trouble to use his brains at all,' he said, and was quite pleased with the Cheshire Cat." Fleet-Surgeon Jeans spins a good yarn always, and a thoroughly British one to boot, and these sea-stories of his, showing the bitters and the sweets of life aboard a modern man-of-war, should do much to keep alive the sea-dog spirit that animated our naval heroes of the past, whose motto was: "Britain's best bulwarks are her wooden walls." And though "the old order changeth, yielding place to new"—and it is doing so now more rapidly than ever before, yet, come what may, Campbell's words hold as true to-day as when he penned them:

> Britannia needs no bulwark,
> No towers along the steep,
> Her march is o'er the mountain waves,
> Her home is on the deep.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

A Romance of the Impossible. By PAUL BOOKHAM. (Cottrell Horser, Oxford. 2s. 6d. net.)

MOST of us know Théophile Gautier's "Mademoiselle de Maupin"; Mr. Bookham remarks in an analytical introduction, which is not the least valuable portion of this book, that a fair presentation of its merits requires considerable skill—and proceeds to exhibit that skill. He has not merely translated Gautier, but has done as Fitzgerald did with Omar, almost; he has Anglicised Gautier, and given us not only a translation, but a work which possesses none of the awkwardness and disjointed phrasing that would characterise an English version of a French masterpiece. It is as if Gautier had thought in English as though it were his natural vehicle of expression. English literature has no parallel to Gautier, a fact which renders this work all the more worthy of consideration.

Keats, perhaps, approached nearer than any other to a parallel line of thought, and again we may find a likeness in Swinburne; but in neither of these can we trace the absolute, sensuous hedonism which made up Gautier's philosophy. Nietzsche, and the numerous exponents of his cult, repressed a modern development of the thought which Gautier expressed—yet they have added an ideal higher than that which formed the Frenchman's summit, for in sense he began and ended. For Christianity he had no use; its "languor and dreaminess" had no place in his philosophy, which, admitting only the stark, sharply defined virtues and vices of the gods of old, pictured human nature as a thing almost unaffected by intellectual progress, and almost entirely dependent on the promptings of sense.

Such was Gautier, and here Mr. Bookham has given us the best of his work in a manner that is beyond praise. The book must be read for understanding of the wonderful imagery, the sensuous wealth of thought, descriptive power, and intellectual depth which "Mademoiselle de Maupin" displays.

The Woman Wonderful. By WILFRED HEMERY. (Sidgwick and Jackson. 6s.)

THE "woman wonderful" is South Africa, where the scenes of the story are laid. The story itself is that of one Brown who went out into the Cape Civil Service and stood in a fair way of becoming a resident magistrate, when he discovered, in an old dead-beat implicated in the murder of a little native boy, his own father, and in that little native boy his half-brother. The woman of the story is Maisie van der Merwe, with whom Brown falls in love, only finding out the strength of his passion when, by reason of racial and intellectual disparities, he has let her go to marry another man.

That is the story, a skeleton on which its author has built up a convincing picture of South Africa. Conradiesdorp is any veldt dorp, Maisie and her sisters, and the people of the town are the people whom anyone who knows the country has met and lived with. The town and people are real and visible before us as we read, for Mr. Hemery, writing in a plain, matter-of-fact way, conveys the atmosphere of the veldt as has not been done, perhaps, since Olive Schreiner gave us another aspect of the "woman wonderful."

From the bare outline given above, the book may seem melodramatic, but there is not a suspicion of melodrama throughout. It is fine, powerful work, intense in its realism, yet full of delicate implications. The author suggests, rather than describes, the haunting charm attendant on this land of broken promises, buried reputations, and compelling fascination. In Mr. Hemery we are faced with an author of no small power, and this, evidently his first book, ought to win him a large and appreciative public.

The Guide Book and the Star. By RUTH LINDSAY (Evelyn Benmar and Co. 4s. net.)

THE presentment of a story in the form of a series of letters needs to be very cleverly done if the narrative is to prove attractive; in Miss Lindsay we recognise a clever writer, for the letters given here form an exceedingly attractive story. It is not, however, a book to be read running; the work which it contains is too delicate for that. The writer of the letters is a certain widowed Lady Jean Upton; the addressee is one "Martin," whose replies to Jean's letters are not given, but of whom we gather some dim understanding as the story proceeds. Lady Jean herself, her little boy Teddy, and Father Campion, a Catholic priest, are the clear-cut figures of the story, which is not concerned with the usual problems that novelists delight in, but is sufficiently new in plot to merit the attention of all thinking people, and the hearty dislike of those whose views are inclined toward extreme Anglicanism. To say more than this would give away the plot to an extent which would hardly be fair to the author.

It may be said, however, that in the study of Lady Jean we are given a very fine, delicately etched picture—she is the central figure of the book, almost the only figure, and an admirable one at that. We may not agree with her final decision, after reading of the circumstances which led to its making, but we are forced to sympathy with and at least some regret for her. We feel that these are real letters, written by a real and exceptional woman; the story which they make is one of delicate allusions, of fine work which demands and amply repays careful reading. As a final word, the format is quite in keeping with the contents of the book, and that, in these days of hurried productions, is a point worth mentioning.

Diana Weston. By RALPH DEXTER. (Murray and Evenden. 1s. net.)

"DIANA WESTON" is a story woven round Monmouth's rebellion, a somewhat hackneyed subject, for several novels have been based upon it during recent years. The author writes in an attractive way, but some of his "situations" are quite conventional. Not so his ending, for he scorns the idea of poetic justice, and ruthlessly kills his heroine and both her lovers, after she has vainly surrendered herself to the pleasure of the notorious Colonel Kirke, in the hope of thereby saving one of them. The story might well have concluded with this triple tragedy, but conscious, no doubt, of the extreme brevity of his work, the author has added an account of Monmouth's execution, which comes like an anti-climax. On the whole, it is not pleasant reading, but as the ordeal can be gone through in about half an hour, perhaps the aforesaid brevity may be the story's chief recommendation. At any rate, considering everything, the booklet is distinctly dear at the price of a shilling, when so many capital novels are obtainable nowadays for half that amount.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Theatre

"The Ideal Wife" at the Vaudeville Theatre

DURING the last few years the stage has had its share of cynical plays, but for subtle bitterness "La Moglie Ideale" of Signor Barco Praga is easily first. We hardly suppose that it will be the more appreciated on this account. The story of a thoroughly unfaithful wife who is perfectly delightful to her husband, of a lover who is tired of the affair, of a friend who uses a deadly style of wit, and others who evidently amuse the author's ironic fancy, it is one more likely to interest the critical than entertain the general public. Mrs. Crawford's translation, "The Ideal Wife," requires admirable acting to carry it to a successful issue, but such is not always forthcoming. Mr. Leslie Faber and Mr. Ballard are, however, convincing, but Miss Ada Potter as the curious heroine lacks the adroitness which her difficult part requires. Thus the brilliant and biting study appears incomplete, and there is more regret than delight in the result. We should be grateful, however, for even this rather half-hearted presentation of a play at once typical of our period and boldly candid. No doubt the unusual quality of the work will attach many, and we can only regret that, as a whole, this comedy of bad manners is not made more sure and convincing.

The National Reserve

BY R. J. TURNER.

TRULY the ways of the War Office are past finding out. To-day we have in the National Reserve a body of something like 120,000 men, daily increasing. Those who were privileged to view the King's inspection of the London Division in Hyde Park last month must have realised the sturdy material of which it is composed. Sixty per cent. of the men are under forty years of age, a large proportion of them have seen active service and display one or more war medals; all of them are eager to show their willingness to assist the nation in time of need, and with that aim have registered their names all over the country. What has the War Office done, and what does it intend to do, with this important voluntary gift of service? Will it be credited that so far the War Office has not contributed a penny towards the movement, and, if we are to believe the departmental heads, has not the slightest intention of doing so? The very badges presented to the men have been the gift of patriotic gentlemen, and the cost of the various parades on a large scale—notably, those at the Horse Guards, at Guildford, and at Hyde Park—was defrayed by private munificence. Though repeatedly pressed to do so, neither uniforms, arms, nor equipment have been provided nor any allowances made to the officers or men taking part in the various parades. On the other hand, the War Office has not been slow to take command, to appoint brigade commanders, and to refuse to grant commissions to officers who have not already served in the Regular Army or Territorials. It is a magnificent example of trying to get something for nothing, which sometimes answers up to a point, but which generally recoils upon itself in the end.

The War Office declines to recognise this excellent body as a third line of defence, in which they may be right, but prefers to use it to stiffen the Territorial ranks on mobilisation. That is to say, should such order ever come, arms, equipment, and uniforms will have to be found at a moment's notice for a force which in a year or two's time may number a quarter of a million of men. Past experience shows that such requirements do not exist and will not be forthcoming at the critical moment. All this splendid material will be compelled upon a sudden emergency to inaction when their presence as old soldiers is most required. Again, is it not asking too much of the man who has not been in the ranks for ten or fifteen years to fall into line when words of command, formations, and even the service rifle may have all changed. Does the War Office do anything to keep the old soldier in touch with modern requirements? With the exception of occasional musters of isolated companies by keen commanding officers the men have no opportunity of becoming efficient in the drill of to-day, while their only access to shooting is at the miniature range of some friendly civilian rifle club, where they must pay for their ammunition.

Now, how are we to account for this exhibition of parsimony and neglect? In these days when in spite of the recent access of recruits the Territorials are still short of establishment, and more particularly deficient in officers, why is it that some encouragement is not given to this valuable nucleus of reservists? Can it be because the Territorial Reserve, which has never taken on, and under present conditions is not likely to be a success, is a War Office offspring and must be preserved, while the National Reserve is mainly the outcome of civilian energy and must be snubbed accordingly? The official explanation given the other day in the House was to the effect that as the members of the National Reserve had undertaken nothing in the way of service, but simply registered their names, they could not be treated seriously. Let them come forward with a guarantee of service and things would be put upon a different footing.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

It was promptly pointed out by a member that many men had already engaged to serve, but had met with no greater encouragement. But if this is the real difficulty, then by all means let us have a hard and fast obligation to serve in the event of war. To my mind it is only a question of formula. By registering their names the great mass of the National Reservists have tacitly expressed their intention of supporting their country in arms in time of trouble. If the War Office in its wisdom thinks it necessary to cross the "t's" and dot the "i's" of such a contract, by all means let it do so, when I shall be surprised if the response is less enthusiastic. My only fear will be that, acting on the something for nothing principle, the conditions will be made so stringent as to cool the ardour of willing men. We have enough experience of the fighting spirit of this country to know that when the need arises the difficulty will not be the lack of men, but the paucity of trained men ready. I cannot but think, therefore, that, given the opportunity to train, we shall find plenty of men available, and that at the present stage it would pay the War Office to accept the will for the deed. A comparatively small sum would equip existing members, a few drills and a little musketry practice in the course of the year would bring them up to date, while the privilege of attending camp on the same terms as the Territorials would complete their military education and be of inestimable benefit to the younger men doing their four years' training.

Is it too much to expect, therefore, that the successor to Lord Haldane will lose no time in putting matters upon a more satisfactory footing? Colonel Seely is a great believer in voluntary service. In the National Reserve he has a splendid opportunity to strengthen enormously the value of the Territorial Force. There are thousands of retired officers only too willing to give their services to its proper organisation. Many have already done so, but it cannot be left to them and to generous patriots in the counties to keep the movement alive. Continued neglect can only end in inanition. A suitable grant would not be grudged by the Commons, and even the Treasury might be induced to recommend the loosening of the purse strings if it can be shown that by financially encouraging the National Reserves it helps to lay the costly spectre of compulsory service.

English Character Seen Through Italian Spectacles.—II

BY PROFESSOR HERBERT STRONG.

THE system pursued in English law courts strikes our author as unfavourable to the promotion of rhetoric, but as distinctly interesting to our countrymen, who are nothing if not sportsmen, and who therefore insist on having full reports of the contest of wit between the counsel who examine and cross-examine respectively made in the daily papers. The part played by our barristers in court proceedings seems very much more important that that played by Continental advocates, and the ability displayed by practised cross-examiners like Sir Edward Carson seems to our foreign critic quite astonishing.

The large stores of London, where every imaginable article can be bought under one vast roof, seem to our author the products of some magical genius, the ne plus ultra of luxury. He can hardly bring himself to believe that no less than four thousand employés should be in the service of one single firm. He does not dwell upon the conception which has presented itself to some of our thinkers, that the institution of these huge establishments may have a tendency to destroy the feeling of independence and pride in his craft which the small shopkeeper or artificer enjoyed when trading on his own account, and that they may deaden the sense of responsibility on the part of their numerous employés with regard to their public duties.

Signor Bevione does not think highly of our national taste in music; he regards us as singularly deficient in great composers and great singers, and he sets this down to an ineradicable vice of our race, forgetful of the fact that in Elizabethan times we were at once the musicians and the singers of the world. But he notices with approval our attempts at founding an English opera.

He thinks the majority of the dramas presented in our theatres destitute of ideas and sterilised by the resolution of the British nation to accept no play which fails to have a happy ending; but he thinks very highly of Galsworthy's "Strife." He admits that the short and unconnected sketches given in our music-halls can have no particularly elevating effect upon the intellects of our citizens, but he dwells with admiration on their harmless nature, and on the willingness of our people to accept any kind of harmless amusement, even grateful to the benefactor who has raised in them a good laugh to crown the labours of the day.

In the life of our Universities he is struck by the inordinate amount of time and attention paid to sport of every kind, and by the scanty regard paid to learning and its professors. The cost of university life appears to him enormous, but he admits that these old seminaries of learning succeed at least in turning out healthy and sensible youths able to fight their battles in the world.

But his reflections upon the character and the future of our nation are probably the most interesting portion of the work. He deems that a great transformation has accomplished itself in the psychology and in the life of the British race, which transformation augurs badly for our future; that we have borrowed many characteristics from the Continent, and that we should have been a stronger nation without them. One of these is Socialism and the habit of coquetting therewith. Another is the passion for amusement of every kind, which is sapping the moral fibre of an austere people who once found its pleasure in the pure cult of sport alone. The music-halls are crammed, and many of the amusements provided for the public taste are made up of risky and indecent incidents and dialogue. The national "flegme" which was by all nations regarded as the unique possession of John Bull has given way to a nervous and spasmodic restlessness and apprehension. Unreasoning panics and a confidence as ill-founded succeed each other turn by turn. And he regards the future outlook as ominous. The Boer War showed Continental nations our military weakness. The defeat of Russia by Japan raised Germany to the incontestable hegemony of Europe. The rise in prices and the discontent prevalent among our working-classes have weakened our resources. Our independence, our liberty is at stake. Germany is without any possible doubt preparing to attack us the very moment that a favourable moment presents itself. Such is the deliberate opinion of the Italian critic, and he proceeds to add that he fears that the issue of the struggle will not be in favour of the nation which relies on an army described by Lord Roberts as a sham, and which by its deficiency in this respect renders itself incapable of obtaining or retaining firm alliances with other more patriotic nations. Let us hope that our most recent critic is mistaken; but let us not forget that to be rich and to be weak is not a situation likely to endure.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Keeper of the Gate

FOR every manuscript which is published there are scores which return unfailingly from every publisher's office and are finally locked away, soiled, thumb-marked, torn, and stained with tears—actual or spiritual. A mass meeting of the Great Unpublished would afford an appalling demonstration, both in numbers and in mournfulness. Therefore, it is inevitable that the publisher's reader, who stands between these unhappy souls and their one desire, should be regarded as a monster, with an atrophied brain and perverted instincts. Perhaps the most charitable picture which the unsuccessful author could suggest would be a purblind gorilla, condemned eternally to test nuts for his species, and so weary of the business that he takes a spiteful pleasure in throwing the soundest kernels away and selecting the mouldiest specimens for public consumption. Alternatively, he is mentally so degraded that he does not know the kernel from the husk.

On the other hand, every author considers that he himself is quite competent to act as a publisher's reader; and most authors—especially unsuccessful authors—are more than willing to play the part of the book-tasting gorilla. Consequently the author ought to be the first to admit that the publisher's reader may conceivably be a man of nearly average intelligence. This possibility will become a probability if he studies a few examples in the flesh. But the publisher's reader is an obscure and elusive creature; he does his work in secret and anonymously, with the result that he is, both in person and in character, an unknown quantity.

The most striking fact about the publisher's reader is that he has only one ambition—the discovery of genius. This is a hard saying for the innumerable geniuses whom he has failed to discover; but everyone will admit that publishers are continuously bent on "discoveries," and it is only through the reader that these discoveries are made. What is not so easily admitted is the assertion that the reader is, in consequence of his ambition, a confirmed optimist. We are apt to imagine that because he passes his time in reading trash, he therefore goes upon the assumption that every book submitted to him is an insult to literature. As a matter of plain fact, the attitude of a reader on opening a manuscript is always one of hope. Here, he says, may lie a book of the season, or of the generation, or of all time. Anything is possible within a brown-paper bundle tied with pink ribbon. So he opens it and tastes, and tastes again, until his judgment confirms his reluctant fear that this is another of the productions which represent wasted time, wasted energy, and futile vanity.

So it is with sorrow, and not with savage glee, that a reader commits himself to an unfavourable report. And if he is mistaken, if he has really failed to perceive the divine gleam on the typewritten sheets, he is no worse than the critics and the public have often proved themselves to be. Some people have attempted to define genius, but no one has ever produced a touchstone by which its presence may be discovered. Talent itself is not too readily detected, because one man's talent is another man's imbecility. Even on the lower level of attempting to select "what the public wants," there are extraordinary difficulties. Everybody connected with books—publisher, reader, librarian, bookseller, and author as well—works more or less in the dark. The true light comes only with the verdict of posterity, when author and publisher and copyright have all expired.

It is the reader's problem, therefore, to find a "system" to guide his stakes in this gamble. Failing that almost impossible feat, he has to fall back upon a trained faculty of judgment. He has to apply certain standards to the qualities of construction, style, character-drawing, intrinsic interest of subject, mode of treatment, and so on; and his reports are mainly a statement of how far the book on trial approaches or falls short of the standards. Beyond that he is obliged—and this is a point which the disgusted author seldom considers—to estimate the commercial chances of the book, both in general and in relation to the particular types of book with which his firm is associated. Therefore the publisher's formal refusal may conceal a high opinion of the book as a work of art, just as it may conceal the reader's conviction that successful work will be done by the author when he has shed a few faults and gained the experience which writing will alone bring. And here one may put in a plea for an occasional human variation upon the "Returned with thanks" formula. In its bald negation it conveys only despair to the young author who happens to be modest about his powers. When a book bears on it the marks of promise, although it may not be acceptable for many secondary reasons, the publisher will be doing a service to literature if he qualifies his refusal with a word of appreciation. How many are there among the published who do not owe the birth of artistic courage to a discerning word well spoken?

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

There is only one serious objection to this philanthropic plan. All authors are not modest; and a single hint that a publisher does not consider their work quite contemptible is enough to lead to a correspondence in which the publisher will be overwhelmed with appeals, threats, advice, objurgations, and the bitterest sarcasm. The "Returned with thanks" formula probably represents the publisher's sage defence against such persecution; it is equivalent to the Editor's refusal to enter into correspondence about rejected contributions. Nevertheless, the disease of author's vanity is virulent only among adult writers. Adolescent talent has an engaging diffidence which ought to appeal to the critic who is able to see the strength of manhood in the awkwardness of the hobbledehoy.

If, on the other hand, the author hopes to be treated with consideration by the reader, he should give a little thought to the natural feelings of the reader. It is extraordinary that authors, with all their power of constructive imagination, never seem to picture a book-worn human being opening their manuscripts and reading them. Some of these manuscripts are as unwelcome to the sight as a visitor who has forgotten to shave, or cut his finger-nails, or wipe his boots. The invention of typewriting has mitigated one of the worst of the daily sorrows of the reader, but it has introduced some curses of its own. The fatal ease with which typewriting can be learned (in a fashion) has induced many authors to type their own manuscripts, with the result that the reader has to endure bad alignment, irregularity of impression, senseless misprints, and the breaking of words at the wrong letter. Irritation lurks in every line of this incompetent work. The appearance of every page is an offence. And even when the author has the good sense to get his work done by a competent typist (failing his own competence), he often forgets to bind the sheets together, or, if he remembers, he does it in such a way that only a prestidigitateur or professional weight-lifter could handle them with comfort. Such matters as these, of course, ought to be beneath the attention of a publisher's reader, who sits on Olympian heights; but how often must even that Olympian individual marvel that an author who has paid five pounds sterling to have his manuscript typed, neglects to pay five shillings more to have it bound in convenient sections! After a few visits to publishers' offices the unbound typescript acquires the melancholy appearance of a hopeless out-of-work; it becomes dirty, battered, degraded, patently demoralised. A fresh supply of pink ribbon is not enough to cover that disheartening shabbiness. Yet the authors who think it enough are those who at a later date quarrel violently with a publisher over the tint of a binding. It is only the reader's infinite capacity for suffering which gives them the opportunity.

If we penetrate the obscurity which surrounds the profession of reader, we shall probably discover that the tasters of books have served their apprenticeship as producers. This element of the situation lays them open to the sneer that, like critics, literary agents, and the authors of books on How to Succeed in Authorship, they have become parasites because they failed to nourish themselves and their wives and families in the normal way. The only way to deal with this amorphous form of contempt is to invite authors themselves to become readers, if only for the briefest period. It ought to be regarded as an essential part of the process of initiation into the mysteries of the literary life for an author to sit awhile as a keeper of the gate. The experience will have its phases of humiliation, but it will give him some invaluable information about how the gate is to be stormed (or perhaps crept through), and it will also enrich his stock of humour and of the pity and understanding which go with it. It will enable him to look at his craft not with the myopic vision of unrequited genius, but with the matter-of-fact eye of one who is compounded of critic, publisher, librarian, bookseller, and casual buyer. It will put his feet upon the hard earth. Those who are devising schools for authors must not omit this most essential part of the great curriculum.

A. G. W.

Playing with Fire

BY E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT.

MR. CHURCHILL'S statement in the House of Commons will be received with profound disappointment and dissatisfaction throughout the country. It is quite evident, in spite of previous prophecies to the contrary, that the Little Navy section of the Cabinet, headed by Mr. Lloyd George, has again triumphed, and that the future security of the Empire has again been cast into the melting pot of party politics. In his recent speech Mr. Churchill has contradicted or repudiated almost every principle he laid down in his previous speeches as to what margin of strength is necessary for the safety of these shores and for safeguarding the great trade routes of our Empire. What has become of the two keels for one standard of which we have heard so much? What has become of the sixty per cent. margin?—a phrase which Mr. Churchill invented himself. Apparently they are dead letters to-day, and in future it will be unsafe to place any reliance on what is said by any member of the present administration.

Mr. Churchill first dealt with the German Naval Programme. He gave an able and concise summary of what the New Law provides for in the future, and a mere cursory examination of the German Programme will show how insecure our present position is, and how still more precarious it will become in the immediate future. To sum up, the position is this: Germany in 1914 will have twenty-five battleships on a war footing in the North Sea, within a day's easy steam of our shores, and four in reserve—a total of twenty-nine in all, besides the necessary complement of fast armoured cruisers, torpedo-boat flotillas, and submarines. In the same year, 1914, we shall have twenty-five battleships in the North Sea, and eight more based on Gibraltar, which, when they are united—and Mr. Churchill admits they will take four and a half days to unite—will give us thirty-three battleships against Germany's twenty-nine. In addition, we shall have in reserve a force of sixteen obsolete battleships in home waters, manned by nucleus crews, which, according to Mr. Churchill's calculation, can be mobilised at once, as the remainder of the crews of these vessels are not to be drawn from the reserve, but from men who are engaged in passing through various courses on shore. The position in 1914 will be far from satisfactory because a simple examination of these figures shows clearly that we are maintaining nothing like Mr. Churchill's reiterated margin of sixty per cent. In fact, placing aside the second line of sixteen already obsolete battleships and the eight of the first line which are based on Gibraltar and which cannot reach the North Sea Fleet under four and a half days, allowing twenty-four hours for coaling, we shall have only twenty-five battleships against Germany's twenty-five immediately available for active service in 1914.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

But if the position in 1914 is bad, the situation in 1920, when the existing German programme has been carried into full effect, will be infinitely worse. By that year Germany will have a fleet of forty-one modern Dreadnoughts, twenty Dreadnought cruisers, and forty small cruisers concentrated in the North Sea, and at the present moment it is quite impossible to say what force we shall have available to meet this tremendous armada, because as yet we have no programme formulated on which any accurate calculation can be formed. By 1920 the personnel of the German Navy will amount to no less than 101,500 officers and men. This is one of the most serious aspects of the whole naval situation. Germany has it in her power to obtain as many seamen as she requires by simply diverting a portion of the conscription from the army to the navy. But we are placed in a very different situation. We can only obtain recruits for the Navy by voluntary enlistment, and year by year, as we pointed out last week, seamen are becoming more and more difficult to obtain. How are we going to obtain the men to man the huge fleet which we must create, unless we intend to resign the command of the sea to Germany in 1920? Mr. Churchill says not a word on this all-important problem, which, until it is settled, renders our shipbuilding programme almost abortive.

Mr. Churchill has done one good service to the country by laying frankly before it the full extent of German naval ambitions and the step which she is taking to carry them into practical effect. The country may, but probably will not, be aroused by his statement that in future four-fifths of all available units of the German Navy are to be kept ready in times of profound peace for instant active service. As he points out, in the whole history of the world no Power has ever kept such a proportion of ships fully manned on the active list.

In the face of all these facts what steps do the Government propose to take to meet the expanding German programme, which is, and can only be, intended to strike a deadly and final blow at our Empire? A small supplementary vote is brought forward to provide an increase of fifteen hundred seamen, to accelerate the construction of six small cruisers, and also to provide an increased aerial service for the Navy. As a set-off to this increase, four of our finest and fastest armoured cruisers are to be taken from the North Sea and despatched to Malta. Was there ever a more absurd and contradictory programme devised by human ingenuity? For the rest, Mr. Churchill gives us nothing but vague promises. Four additional Dreadnoughts are to be constructed in the course of the next four years, but this is no addition to the programme, as they are merely those vessels which Mr. Churchill promised in his statement last March, when he laid it down that we would build 4, 3, 3, 3 capital ships in the course of the next four years if Germany did not add to the number prescribed by her then existing Naval Law, and 5, 4, 4, 4 if she did. Among other vague promises which may or may not materialise, but of which we are to hear nothing until the Autumn Session, is an increase of pay to stokers and seamen. He also was careful to state that we should have to add largely to our personnel. We are quite sure he is perfectly sincere in his desire to do so, but how is he going to obtain the necessary men without resort to some form of conscription?

The remainder of Mr. Churchill's speech was devoted to the question of the Mediterranean. The discussions which have taken place of late in the Press on the abandonment of the Mediterranean seem to have been somewhat premature, and to our mind very overstrained. Experts talk as if, once the Mediterranean is left, some hostile Power will place a boom across the mouth and prevent us from ever returning there again. We are glad to see that both Malta and Gibraltar are to be maintained as important naval centres, but we have never been among those who considered that the maintenance of a huge fleet equal to, or stronger than, the combined fleets of Italy and Austria was essential to our welfare. The programme of the Admiralty is to remove the slow, obsolete battleships from Malta and to replace them with four powerful armoured cruisers. At the same time a squadron of eight second-class battleships is to be based on Malta. As long as we can count upon the French as our allies, this arrangement seems to be thoroughly satisfactory, and, if we are going to base our calculations on the armed alliance of Austria and Italy against ourselves, it is only just to bring the French Fleet into line as an ally of our own.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

This, in brief, is the naval position of England and Germany, and, whether looked at from the standpoint of 1912, 1914, or 1920, it is profoundly disquieting. We still have a small margin of power, but it is more a paper margin than an actual one, when we consider how divided are the duties and spheres of action of our fleets and how Germany is able to concentrate the whole of her forces to achieve one definite aim.

There are only two ways of facing the situation. Either we can make it perfectly clear to Germany that the limit of our patience and of our resources has been reached, and that we would just as soon fight the matter out at once as to allow the old game of ever-increasing expenditure to continue indefinitely; or we must have resort to a Naval Loan so as to place our Fleet on such a basis that Germany will give up the race for supremacy in sheer despair. But a large expansion of the Fleet is of no value unless we can obtain the men to man the ships, and, if we read the signs of the times correctly, they can only be obtained by resort to conscription.

Andrew Lang and His Work*

THE death of Andrew Lang takes from us one of the most notable of the young men of the 'sixties, the generation which welcomed or abused Swinburne and Morris, Meredith or Anthony Trollope, or George Eliot, Huxley, or Herbert Spencer. Ever since the early 'seventies he has been among the most prolific of our authors, and the most influential of our journalistic literary critics, and withal one of the most popular, not only with the general public, but even with those whom he criticised. He was, as befitted his time and race, a romantic, and it is this which gives unity to the enormous volume of his work, disparate as it may seem on first view—

> ". . . The epic and the teacup Muse,
> Bookbindings, Aborigines,
> Ballades that banish all the Blues,
> Young married life among Yahoos,
> An Iliad, an Orang-outang, > Triolets, Totems, and Taboos. . ."

not to speak of the Jacobites, the Young Pretender, Mary Queen of Scots, Jeanne d'Arc, and Helen of Troy. Classic, in the sense of the word used to oppose the Romantic spirit of wonder, he never was; his Homer and Theocritus are as romantic as his Aucassin and Nicolette, and his studies in folk-lore and primitive custom were inspired directly by his hatred of the attitude which saw in early religions a disease of language. It would be unfair to deny him scholarship, though it was wide, not deep, but his distinguishing characteristic was an insatiable curiosity, a passion for getting an explanation of seeming mysteries. He solved many of them; some, like the casket letters of Mary of Scotland, remain intractable. It is as a critic that his fellow-writers like him best—as a critic of someone else, be it understood. He was in many respects akin to the best French school of critics; his light touch, his quaint humour, his little asides and sudden surprises of expression, kept alive the attention and forced one to read to the end, however one disagreed with him. His canon of criticism of any serious work, that one should be able to correct an author where he is wrong, and add something, if only a little, to his information, is, of course, the true one, but what if the poor critic is faced, as the present writer was, with a book like Rashdall's Universities, or one of Mr. Round's? Mr. Lang's least successful essay in criticism was his attack on Anatole France's "Jeanne d'Arc." With all his sympathies for the French mind, he does not seem to have realised the point of view from which it was written, or the philosophy it involved, and he was certainly ill-advised in following up his criticism by venturing on authorship in French to emphasise the corrections of detail he undoubtedly made. But taken as a whole, his critical work is surprisingly well done, and he always managed to put something fresh and personal into the expression even of a familiar thought.

Every one of us will have his favourite book in the collection of his works. For a time Aucassin and Nicolette held the field with the present writer till it was dethroned by Mr. Bourdillon's accurate and beautiful rendering, but in later years I have turned most often to "Old Friends," and "Letters to Dead Authors," prime favourites since the days when they first appeared in the St. James's Gazette, under Greenwood. Beneath their humour and their knowledge of life there lay such a deep and just appreciation of the literary merits of their authors that one always longed for a more formal judgment on them and others; in short, a History of English Literature by Andrew Lang. At last we have it, and its author is taken from among us without any opportunity being afforded him of seeing its reception by his fellows. Yet, if he had known, he might well have taken his leave of us with it. Vale et plaudite. None of his books is more personal than this; he had read all the interesting books in English, and most of the dull ones—some of them, it must be confessed, for the purpose of writing this book. A friend tells us he was "horribly bored" by the study of the minor dramatists of the seventeenth century, and we can imagine that he liked the early Tudor dramatists still less, though he conscientiously describes them, since he tells us that "the rise of the drama, under Elizabeth, is a kind of miracle, like the sculpture of Phidias appearing after the rude art" of the pre-Marathon artists.

It would be folly to present one's first impressions of a book of some 650 pages as a considered judgment,

* History of English Literature from "Beowulf" to Swinburne. By ANDREW LANG. (Longmans, Green and Co. 6s.)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

but I am seriously of the opinion that it is a work of the first importance. It gives a clear and considered view of the whole field of our literature, with a personal note on every writer of any importance and a hint as to his best work, while the dullest parts are enlivened by little personal "asides" which send the reader on his way contented. It is manifestly written for people who have read a good deal: there is an air of mutual confidence in his dicta, a sort of "Don't you remember?" which flatters one's taste as one goes on. The best way to read the book is to turn up, as the present writer did, a few of the main points in English criticism, and afterwards to see what he has to say about the men of his own time.

The book opens with a first-rate account of our Anglo-Saxon and Early English literature, in which he puts quite shortly much that will be novel to the reader of the ordinary text-books—e.g., his summary of "Layamon's Bust." Or take later his summary of the "Testament of Cresseyde," closing thus: "In the poem of this adventure there are but 616 lines; and it contains the poignant essence of romance; all passion and pity." Or his excursus on the origin of ballads, full of sound sense and knowledge about an obscure and difficult subject; or his account of the Utopia with a six hours' day and universal military training; or Ascham's "unholy knowledge of all the tricks on the dice-board"; or the handsome and wicked Master of Gray's love of Sidney. Spenser is a test case for English critics; Mr. Lang sums up: "The spoils of all old poetry are mingled with his own . . . his successors have taken from him his very tones; English poetry fell with the neglect of Spenser, and came fully to her own again when the magic book of Spenser was opened by Keats."

It would be pleasant to quote at length his appreciation of Shakespeare, but space forbids. Readers of THE ACADEMY will be interested in his last lines on the sonnets: they are "never to be dimmed by mists of conjecture, or nonsense about Shakespeare as a sensual sycophantic snob, mad with jealousy and foiled desire." Turning to his contemporaries, we feel that his notes on American poets will not be welcomed with enthusiasm, even though he has compared Longfellow with Theocritus. He estimates Tennyson very highly, Poe not so much, though stress is laid on his "originality of tone and touch." He is unkind to Emerson and Lowell, and tells a good anecdote of Matthew Arnold and the Income Tax Commissioners, who wanted him to pay a tax commensurate with his fame. Morris and Swinburne are, naturally, spoken of at length, and his account of Meredith and his competitors for popular favour could have been written by no one else. The whole two hundred pages which deal with the nineteenth century are written with especial care; there is not an uninteresting line in them, not a sentence which is not stamped with Lang's individuality, hardly a phrase which would not bear quoting. There has been in our time no compendium of criticism with anything like its originality or its power of provoking thought. It is a work of permanent value—one which every lover of our literature, every teacher, and every student must read and put on his shelves—a summing up of the life's reading and thought of a cultivated, brilliant master of criticism.

ROBERT STEELE.

At St. Stephen's Shrine

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE.

ON Wednesday, 17th inst, Mr. T. W. Russell, in answer to an obvious "bonnet" question from a Nationalist, was able to assure the House that it was not accurate to describe the disturbance at Kilrea as an attack on women and children, but, when cross-examined by Mr. Moore, he was unable to explain why the police had not sent a full report. "It would not suit the Government to do so," commented Mr. Moore scornfully. At eleven, on the adjournment, he accused the Irish Department of attempting to make light of this attack by the Hibernians on defenceless women and children at a Sunday-school treat, and you may be sure we have not heard the last of this. The Ulstermen will not allow the matter to rest, and will demand an inquiry into the whole matter.

All the afternoon we discussed the Home Office Vote, and a motion to reduce McKenna's salary by the substantial sum of £500 was kindly moved by Cripps to give McKenna an opportunity of explaining what he conceived to be his duty in regard to protecting free labour during strikes and as to the freedom with which he remitted sentences. McKenna put the responsibility on the magistrates—any man had a right to apply to a magistrate if he had been molested, and if the magistrate did not punish he could be dealt with. This is the old plea that people must be injured before they can get protection, and even then it is only a question of punishing the wrongdoer, not protecting the innocent from damage. The Home Secretary saved his salary all right, but the Government majority was down again to 52.

When Birrell was at the Board of Education, Tommy Lough was his under-secretary, and John Burns had Hudson Kearley as his lieutenant at the Local Government Board. It is alleged that Birrell on the Bench once confided to Burns that he preferred Burns's butterman to his own tea-dealer—both gentlemen having made comfortable fortunes in those useful commodities before they went in for high politics. Hudson Kearley, the erstwhile butterman, is now Lord Devonport, hon. chairman of the Port of London, and is showing that he is a strong man. His friends call it dignified firmness, whilst his enemies below the gangway call it infernal obstinacy.

Some London M.P.'s to-night determined to "have a go" at settling the dock strike off-hand. People said it was no business of theirs, and they had no right to interfere, but they stoutly replied: "It is our business; the trade of London is being ruined; innocent women and helpless children are being starved; and, as we represent London, we are entitled to say what we think." There was no party in it, or rather both parties were equally in it—eleven Unionists and twelve Radicals signing the heads of an agreement which was drawn up. It recognised that the masters had won, but it asked that the men's grievances should be considered at once if put forward by the unions and not by the National Transport Workers' Union. It suggested that all men, including the lightermen, should go back to work at once, and thought that the Port Authority should let bygones be bygones, and take back the men as and when vacancies occurred. Briefly, it recognised the unions, but repudiated the huge paper federation which had done all the mischief. It recognised that the men had some grievances which ought to be attended to at once; on the other hand, it advised that the men ought to go back forthwith. Without going into details, it saved the men's faces as much as possible, and probably represented what any special jury would have awarded if the case had been put before them. Other London members would have signed it, but they could not be found at so short a notice, whilst it was felt it ought to be published that night.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

It was freely whispered about the Lobby on Thursday that Elibank could not guarantee a majority during the time the King was giving his garden-party at Windsor. Radicals are so loyal. . Perhaps he remembered that his party had seized the opportunity to defeat the late Government on the occasion of a similar garden-party some years ago. Be that as it may, the Whips decided to take no risks, so the House did not meet until seven p.m., and then half the members turned up in light waistcoats and white spats.

The Finance Bill came on for second reading; Lloyd George was as airy and inaccurate as usual. For instance, he had the audacity to quote the Birkbeck as a case of unbusiness-like finance, and rashly gave figures which were promptly contradicted in detail by the Receiver next day. Bonar Law made one of his deadly quotations. Lloyd George had said:—

> Who is it that is responsible for the scheme of things whereby one man is engaged through life in grinding labour to win a bare and precarious subsistence for himself, and another man who does not toil receives every hour of the day and every hour of the night while he slumbers more than the poor man receives in the whole year?

This was Snowden's principle of taking from the rich and giving to the poor. Everyone wanted to see a fairer distribution; but was that the way to do it? Had not such sentiments frightened capital out of the country until securities had fallen in a way they had not fallen in any other country? At half-past twelve the House divided, and the Government majority went down to 48. This constant dropping is as bad as Consols. Elibank was glad that he did not give us a half-holiday.

On Friday the London members who had signed the document discovered that they were suffering under what has been cynically called the "curse of the peace-makers." They had offended both sides and pleased no one. The strikers were the first to rush in and repudiate the advice in language more forcible than polite, whilst Lord Devonport did not seem particularly pleased. Both parties to the dispute plainly said: "It is no business of yours; don't you interfere." But the London members still say: "It is our business, and we mean to interfere," and at the time of writing I hear that they are going to meet again on Monday to consider the position.

A thin House discussed the long and carefully prepared Mental Deficiency Bill of sixty-eight clauses. It is the work of the philosophical, philanthropical Radical Party led by Dickinson. The opponents thought the legislation grandmotherly. If Charles Reade had been alive, he would certainly have written several of his trenchant letters to the Times, and pointed to his novel, "Hard Cash," which deals with sane people being locked up. Wedgwood, indeed, thought it set up an inquisition more dangerous than the Holy Inquisition. Banbury said he was accustomed to shocks, but he had never—no, never—in a long political career spent in blocking egregious private Bills come across such a rotten one as this was. It gave power to the Home Secretary (of all people) to lock up anybody he liked!

Nobody said it during the time I was in the House, but many felt that prevention was better than cure, and that, if a Bill had been brought in with drastic powers to stop the procreation of feeble-minded children, it would be better for the Empire. We were behind the Spartans, or even the Zulus, in some matters.

However, only nineteen men had the courage of their opinions, and a Bill which once more gives almost unlimited power to the bureaucracy was blessed by a House ruled by a party which professes to believe in government of the people by the people for the people, but really submits to Government by an ever-growing army of officials ruled by a demagogue who dictates to a submissive Prime Minister and an obedient Cabinet.

On Monday, O'Grady essayed to emulate "friend Lansbury's" exhibition. He wanted to discuss the dock strike instead of the Navy Estimates, and when his petition was refused he shouted out that it was "a damned scandal," threw his papers on the floor, and would have slammed the doors (if they had not been swing ones) as he marched melodramatically out of the House.

The Labour men sit on the two lowest benches below the gangway, and opposite to them sit a number of the noble lords and some of the younger and more go-ahead members of the Tory Party. They are constantly "chipping" each other in the course of the debates, in a way the older members do not think desirable or dignified. Crooks, who is often frankly referred to as "Consul" by his friends opposite (owing to a fancied resemblance in figure to that talented baboon), in the midst of the war of words called out, "Starving people, not overfed lords!" This was a ludicrous misdescription, because, curiously enough, the thinnest people in the House are

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Winterton, Hugh Cecil (who might be called Lanky instead of Linky by his friends), and Castlereagh, while Bob Cecil and Charlie Helmsley cannot honestly be called "overfed."

Winston was then allowed to proceed with his statement on the condition of the Navy. It was no mere explanation as to how he intended to spend the £900,000, but a careful and weighty survey of the whole struggle for naval supremacy between ourselves and Germany. He admitted our position was none too satisfactory, and warned the House and the country that we must be prepared for further sacrifices in the coming years.

In the gallery sat Mr. Borden, who must have been gratified at the reception Canadian support received. As Austen Chamberlain said later on at the United Club dinner, "The one bright feature of the situation was the growing willingness of our great Dominions over the seas, not to acknowledge, but to claim their share of the responsibility for the defence of the Empire of which they formed a part." Looking back on the First Lord's speech, it contains a great many promises, but not much action. Everything was in the future.

In the lobbies and the smoking-rooms the most pacific members admitted that the situation was very grave, whilst some openly said, "Peace at this price was almost as expensive as war." At the present moment we were in a position to dictate terms, whilst later on we might not be able to do so. The British are very patient, but some men openly say it would be wiser to repeat "the guilt and folly of the Crimean War" rather than allow Germany to get the upper hand.

There was very little party spirit in the debate, and, except for the Labour men and a few peace-at-any-price people, the whole House, regardless of party, voted with the Government—the Unionists not because they were satisfied with what was being done, but to show that they supported the Admiralty in their efforts to make up the leeway. There was no talk of "nightmare scares" now.

To go to smaller matters (for, although they are very important, they seem small after the question of the existence of the Empire), the London members met upstairs in the afternoon to discuss the dock strike. They did not take very seriously the ungracious reception their overtures had received from both parties. They reiterated that it was their business, as the representatives of London, to interfere, and appointed a small committee of eight, taken equally from both sides, to see the employers and the leaders of the men. The position seems to be as follows: After breaking their agreements in the most light-hearted manner, the men thought, when the strike was over, even if they lost, that they could go back to the status quo ante, but the masters say: "No. We have discovered that certain concessions made by us in the late agreements have been unfairly used. For instance, engagements outside the dock gates, instead of inside, are used to coerce the men into joining the Transport Union. If you had no ticket, you had not much chance of getting a job, so the matter is complicated by other things besides the present position." The men are fighting for the old position. The masters say: "No. The men must be engaged inside the gates." And so the deadlock continues.

The Insurance Act appears to be working very badly. Hundreds of people have been turned off and fresh arrangements made to avoid the payment of the tribute, to the detriment of the worker. Hundreds of thousands of employers and employed openly boast that they have taken no notice of the Act at all—that, like the Shops Bill, it is a dead letter—whilst there is a sinister rumour going the rounds to the effect that the only way the Government can retrieve the position is to put on another 2d. and add death benefits. This would anger the insurance companies, but please the great orders, as the same agent collects the Government insurance coppers and the life insurance at the same time, and it appears to many that the Act stops short just when it is most needed.

And so the Radical proposals grow. I feel very melancholy about the whole outlook—the Navy, the strike, and the Insurance Act—and when I took up Gibbon to read as I went to bed it did not improve my spirits.

How true it is that sometimes when we get our own way we are not satisfied! O'Grady clamoured for an adjournment on Monday, and was refused—to his obvious annoyance; on Tuesday he got it, and still he is not happy. There was nothing on except Scotch Estimates, and no one can call them exciting; so O'Grady obtained his adjournment at 8.15. He and Lansbury and MacDonald begged for Government interference—and succeeded! Lloyd George, in quite a casual off-hand manner, said that the Government would interfere—that, conciliation having failed, compulsion would have to take its place. Monetary guarantees would have to be put up on both sides. Early legislation would be introduced, and the whole thing put on a new basis. The Irish looked frightfully sick—indeed, they held an emergency meeting during the evening to discuss the matter, for it affects them very vitally. "Early legislation" means interference with the passage of the Home Rule Bill. The Labour men, also, were not altogether pleased. It is clear that the trade unions must once more be brought within the pale of the law. The Trades Disputes Bill will be torn up, and other unpleasant things take place.

Norman Craig made an excellent speech on behalf of the masters, and Bill Crooks suggested that the Prime Minister and Bonar Law might form themselves into a Committee of Arbitration. The House reluctantly divided, but there were many abstentions; some people cannot see how you can make a man work if he won't. Our little Welsh showman has given the "pannerrammer another twist" with a vengeance; and it was done in such an off-hand manner, too. The people who came to the peep-show saw far more than they had expected.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Art

Some Exhibitions

THERE is now open at the Dowdeswell Galleries, in New Bond Street, an exhibition of modern etchings which includes a good deal of the work of Mr. Ernest Lumsden. There is a singular beauty in practically everything that Mr. Lumsden does, an exquisiteness of feeling and touch which belongs to each one of these etchings. Among them are a number of Chinese subjects: "The Great Wall," "Chinamen from Without," and others, as light and delicate as the work of Le Gros, and, although not resembling it, the pictures have that same wonderful appearance of having hardly been touched by hands. It is not possible to speak of each one, of "The Dean Bridge, Edinburgh," "The Figure Eight," with the stretches of sand, "R.M.S. Dairen," with its curving railway lines, or of "St. Sulpice" or "Loch Shieldaig"; but "The Pier," which has been exhibited before in this gallery, still remains for us one of the most beautiful of modern etchings. Beside such work as this, other things are apt to seem heavy or laboured or hard; but in the corridor of the gallery are a few lovely impressions by Mr. T. Murray Smith—"Waterloo Bridge," "Mortlake," and some others, and Mr. Hamilton Mackenzie's "Fenwick Church" and "Market Cross, Crail." In the main gallery also, amid much interesting work, there are "The Harbour Light" and "The Morning Market" by Mr. Frank Mason, "A Summer Gale" and "Summer Afternoon" by the Hon. Walter J. James, and several things by Mr. Albany E. Howarth—best of all, perhaps, his "Strand-on-the-Green."

Messrs. Dowdeswell are still showing in their first gallery a collection of black and white Beardsley-like drawings by Mr. Kay Nielsen. They are wonderfully interesting and singular, full of a curious Oriental mysticism and yet modern in spirit. They are worked out with a great deal of detail, in beautiful lines, with a sort of restrained luxuriance. One is called "Metaphysics," yet it merely represents a pierrot in an armchair full of cushions, and the printed name was not necessary. But the most interesting drawings in the exhibition are the ten illustrations to "The Book of Death," in the fifth of which, called "The Chasm," there is a strange haunting beauty, which, indeed, one feels in all of these.

At the Chenil Gallery, in Chelsea, there is a collection of some fifteen paintings by Mrs. Mabel Nicholson. Most of them are portraits of children—children whose plain faces and straight hair and simple dresses have a beauty and individuality of their own, though none is quite equal to "Nancy in Tartan Frock," which was exhibited some time back, but is among those now to be seen at Chelsea.

The London Salon, 1912

THE motto of this year's Salon is Alfred Stevens' saying, "To compare is to know." Its truth can be realised more fully after a couple of hours spent in the Albert Hall. After gazing horror-stricken at divers lurid freaks of diseased imaginations, vainly seeking draughtsmanship and colour, we left, praying more fervently than ever that the vagaries of l'art nouveau may be no more than a temporary smear upon the glass of art. As for certain of the paintings and drawings—alas! many of them—we can only describe them as the crystallisation of the obscene. In Mr. Epstein's unfinished "Maternity" we were unable to find any of the primitive strength of Rodin: the treatment is coarse without being rugged, and contains no vestige of tenderness. Mr. Mervyn Lawrence's large figure, entitled "The Argument," is a fine study of muscle, and nothing more. Of the smaller statuettes in the arena we were chiefly attracted by the dainty charm and delicate modelling of Miss Gwendolen Williams' "Sappho." The miniatures were almost uniformly poor.

As to the larger paintings exhibited upon the walls of the arena, the most notable was Vereker M. Hamilton's "Vitality," a knight upon a spirited steed carrying off a nude female: the whole composition is full of the quality which is its title. The portrait of Miss Eileen O'Malley by Kirkby Wynne suffers mainly from the too studied arrangement of detail. A. de Bries' "The Scout" errs slightly in the opposite direction. Robert Walters' "A Summer's Day on the Wye," has caught just that peculiar atmosphere and tone which characterise the scenery which it depicts. With the above exceptions, we saw nothing which rose to the level at which criticism is provoked.

If such be our judgment of the major exhibits, what shall be said of the minor atrocities awaiting an unwary visitor to the gallery? It is not even paint which here is flung at us. One or two works, it is true, contain something of the beautiful, something of the true, such as Mary McCrossan's "Nocturne," W. E. Gladstone Solomon's "War," Constance Law-Adam's "Dordrecht," and the late Mrs. Thomas' Swiss studies. But with very few exceptions the exhibits were glaring examples of all that is tending to make Art a by-word amongst us—lack of line and form and finish, crudeness of colour, commonplaceness—nay, vulgarity of subject-matter. Lest we might at length come to believe that the art of painting has really fallen to the depths suggested by this parade of imbecility, we hurriedly persuaded ourselves that we were suffering from a species of visual nightmare, due, perhaps, to an incautious lunch, and fled.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Notes and News

Messrs. John Long publishes this week a new novel from the pen of Lilian Arnold, editor of the Ladies' Field, and author of that popular novel, "Also Joan." Mrs. Arnold's new book, entitled "The Storm Dog," is a romance of Western Cornwall.

Although much has been written about the Durbar, and a novel has been announced, dealing with the historic event, it has been left to the well-known lady journalist, Mrs. Charlotte Cameron, to write a romance with the many brilliant ceremonies and festivities for a background. She has entitled her story "A Durbar Bride," and her official position at Delhi afforded her unique opportunities for witnessing the many incidents revealed in the story, which appear for the first time in print. Messrs. Stanley Paul and Co. are the publishers, and they also announce that "The First Signs of Insanity," by Dr. Bernard Hollander, will be published on the 23rd instant.

Mr. Paul Neuman, in his new novel, "Simon Brandin," to be published by Mr. Murray during the next few weeks, breaks new ground. His hero is a Jew whose family has suffered from the Pogrom in Russia. He sets his whole heart and fortune to revenge the losses he has suffered. The working out of the story gives full scope for Mr. Neuman's powers. Mr. Murray also hopes to publish, early in the autumn, the fourth volume of Professor Gomperz's authoritative history of ancient philosophy, entitled "Greek Thinkers," which has been in preparation for a considerable number of years. The work is now practically complete. It treats more especially of Aristotle, and has been translated by Mr. G. G. Berry, of Balliol College, Oxford.

The proprietors of the Bioscope, the trade journal of the cinematograph industry, were requested by members of the London County Council to arrange a demonstration of the possibilities of the cinematograph in education, at the County Hall, Spring Gardens, S.W., on Thursday last, at 5 p.m. The films shown were selected with a view to illustrating the range of subjects which could be educationally utilised by means of the cinematograph. The branches of learning thus visually demonstrated include geography, history, zoology, botany, marine biology, embryology, and ornithology; films dealing with the details of various industries and with the subject of physical culture were shown. An attempt will be made to prove that the cinematograph would be an invaluable adjunct to almost every kind of teaching, from elementary to the most advanced. A preliminary address was given by Mr. C. H. Heydemann, Ph.D., who was the lecturer at the medical and educational demonstrations recently organised by the Bioscope. The display at Spring Gardens is unique in the history of cinematography, and it is the first time that living pictures have ever been shown in a council chamber before an official audience.

The Marquis of Crewe, who is President of the Summer School of Town Planning which is to be held at Hampstead Garden Suburb, is announced to give the inaugural address in the Institute Hall on Saturday, August 3. The Summer School is being held under the auspices of the London University Extension Board, and covers a fortnight—from the 3rd to the 17th of August. The lectures and demonstrations are intended to be of special value to municipal engineers, architects, and surveyors, but most of them will be of interest to others who are concerned with town planning from the more general aspect of civic and economic progress. There will be a series of lectures on the legal aspect of the subject by Mr. E. R. Abbott, Clerk to the Ruislip-Northwood Council, who has just successfully piloted the first town planning scheme from a local authority to be accepted by the Local Government Board. Professor Adshead, who occupies the first chair of town planning established in an English University, will give a series of lectures on "Town Planning in Foreign Countries and Past Times." Mr. Raymond Unwin, F.R.I.B.A., who is responsible for the planning of the Hampstead Garden Suburb, will lecture and demonstrate on "Town Planning in Practice." Among other lecturers are Mr. Henry Vivian, J.P., who speaks on the financial aspects of the subject, and Mrs. S. A. Barnett, to whose genius and energy, as founder and honorary manager, the initiation and success of the Hampstead Garden Suburb are largely due. Applications to attend the course, or single lectures or excursions, should be addressed to the Hon. Secretary, Summer School of Town Planning, Hampstead Garden Suburb, N.W.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

BY LANCELOT LAWTON.

THE MIKADO.

IN his old-world palace in Tokyo the Emperor of Japan, at the time of writing, lies perilously near the brink of death. We are told that throughout the crisis, which has so suddenly been announced to the unsuspecting millions of the Island Empire, a deep hush has settled upon the life of the nation. The history of Japan can show no parallel to the circumstances which surround the Imperial affliction to-day, for never before have the masses been admitted to such a degree of intimacy in relation to the sacred personality of a Mikado. It is not the intimacy between monarch and subject as we know it in the West—the doctrine of divinity does not make for human fellowship—and yet it marks a wonderful advance upon conditions that have existed within living memory. Indeed, it is safe to assume that the graphic and detailed bulletins that have been issued during the past few days for the information of an almost dumbfounded proletariat were not worded without a great deal of opposition and heart-burning on the part of highly-placed personages of the old school. For in Japan there are two generations of Monarchists, the first holding jealously to the belief that the doctrine of divinity should be expounded as a spiritual essential, the second advocating its retention on grounds of purely political expediency. The influence of the old Conservatives can be seen behind the suggestion, a suggestion which was vetoed by the Court Chamberlain, that all business should cease during the critical period of His Majesty's illness. In common with the people of Japan, we can only register a fervent hope that their monarch may yet be spared long to watch over the destinies of the Island Empire.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

NAVAL STRENGTH.

The decision of the Government to increase our naval strength in the Mediterranean comes as a welcome corollary to the note of vigour that has recently marked British policy in its relation to the European situation.

It is no exaggeration to say that up to the present Great Britain has led the world in the development of naval science. The Dreadnought type was not, as is popularly supposed, the direct result of the lessons learned from Tsushima; nor were the Japanese responsible for its creation. It was for British architects to discover the secret of the single calibre in big-gun fire, and much of the delay which characterised the construction of the Satsuma was due to the fact that the experts of Japan, watching closely the experiment being carried out in this country, endeavoured to apply the principle as nearly as possible to their own ship. From the moment that we begin to multiply types unnecessarily we shall be sacrificing the originality of our constructors, and placing rival Powers in the self-same position of advantage which we have hitherto enjoyed.

In one sense we cannot help sympathising with the cry of the extremists, though from a different motive, and in a spirit of philosophic resignation to the inevitable. We regret the impossibility of an expansion which would have provided a sufficient display of sea-strength in the Pacific, and particularly in the waters of what is comprehended in the term, the Far East. Over the Mediterranean question Sir Edward Grey has rightly recognised that diplomacy, unsupported by military force, can have no influence in the councils of nations. This truth applies the world over, but nowhere, as far as we are concerned, has it more regrettable significance than in China to-day. Forced by a combination of political and economic circumstances to concentrate our sea-strength in home waters, we have been obliged in recent years virtually to abandon the leading position we once held in the Far East; and although in the fulness of time it is more than probable that, with the growth of Canada and Australasia to nationhood within the Empire, we shall regain that position, the interim is likely to be fraught with danger to the peace of the world. Already it is suggested from inspired quarters in St. Petersburg that the settlement of what is euphemistically called the Far Eastern Question should be left solely in the hands of Russia and Japan. Actually, the purport of such a proposal can mean nothing less than the gradual disintegration of China, a country that, for the sake of future peace, apart altogether from its just claim to universal sympathy, should at the present moment be helped and not hindered in its efforts to bring about national cohesion and stability. Anticipating the opening of the Panama Canal, Russia and Japan are on the eve of concluding an understanding—not an alliance—in respect of the final disposition of Manchuria and Mongolia. It is inconceivable that territorial aggression of such a magnitude could have taken place had Great Britain been free to follow her traditional policy in China, a policy which had in its keeping the integrity of that great country. But, for the time being, Great Britain is not in a position to bear the burden of other and weaker nations. We must face this fact unless we wish to delude ourselves. There is, however, as I have said, some hope in the future.

For the first time in the history of the country circumstances have favoured the drawing together of the members of the Imperial family. This statement may be challenged, but it is the truth. Hitherto the Canadian Government has, under Sir Wilfrid Laurier, cherished ideals, which, however much we may admire them in a spirit of detachment have been subversive of all practical schemes for Imperial unity. Remembering that Canada is far and away the most progressive among the British Dominions, we cannot be surprised that her lukewarm advances in the past met with no more enthusiasm than they deserved by a Government that would have sacrificed its self-respect, and the respect of the nation, had it pandered to the wishes of the yellow press and adopted an attitude of sycophantic invitation. Now the old order has changed, and Mr. Borden has behind him a large majority of Canadians, loyal to the Crown and to the Empire. The unswerving fidelity of New Zealand has never been in question, while the cut-the-painter party in Australia is automatically going to the wall. The concrete result of the Imperial unity which is slowly but surely coming about will be the restoration of British prestige in the four corners of the earth by means of an Imperial navy, whose mission shall be that of protection and peace, and whose power shall remain unchallengeable.

MOTORING

FOR the Goodwood Races—July 30 to August 2 inclusive—the Automobile Association and Motor Union has made arrangements for a special car enclosure for its members. The enclosure is conveniently situated almost opposite the entrances to the grand stand, and patrols will be on duty to direct members and render

"EVERY DROP LUBRICATES."
"Champion" Motor Oil
is the best for all types of Cars.
If not already using "Champion" send for trial tin to
S. BOWLEY & SON,
DISTILLERS OF BOWLEY'S MOTOR SPIRIT,
"Express" and "Bomo" Brands.
Wellington Works,
BATTERSEA, LONDON, S.W.
Established 1744.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

any assistance that may be required. The charge for admission will be one guinea for the four days, or six shillings per day. Petrol, tyres, and other requisites will be obtainable in the enclosure, and a competent staff of mechanics will be in attendance.

The committee who have consented to supervise the forthcoming tyre trial, which is to start on Monday next, includes Earl Norbury, Earl de la Warr, Lord Kingsale, Lord Clifford, Sir Thomas Lipton, Admiral Sir John Hopkins, and Admiral Sir George Neville. Two members of the Technical Committee of the R.A.C. have also been invited to act on the committee, and the Michelin, Dunlop, and Continental Companies have been asked to send a representative to accompany the test throughout. Whatever the result of the trial may be, therefore, it can hardly be contended by the losers that its bonâ-fides is open to criticism.

For some years past it has been assumed that the motor-car as now constructed represents finality in general design, and that there has been nothing to look forward to beyond detail improvements. News, however, is to hand from Paris that a "winged motor-car," differing radically from the standard type, has actually accomplished a run from Paris to Lyons—320 miles—at an average speed (running time) of 28 miles an hour. This revolutionary car, says the Paris correspondent of the Daily Mail, is propelled by means of a two-bladed wing-propeller, constructed on the principle of the action of a bird's wing and attached to a shaft at the rear of the car. The propeller, which is 45 inches in diameter, is protected by a cage, and has a maximum number of 2,200 revolutions per minute. The chassis is that of an ordinary car, with the motor and radiator in front. The motor, a 40 h.p. Labor, controls a shaft running the whole length of the body, with a chain transmission rotating the wing-propeller at the rear. All the wheels of the car run free. A single lever beside the driver controls at the same time the clutch and the forward and reverse movements of the wing. In combination with the reverse action of the propeller there is a foot brake to stop the car. Speed changes are simply regulated by the acceleration or diminution of engine speed. It is stated that at various stages of the run from Paris to Lyons a speed of 60 miles an hour was obtained. In appearance the winged car is somewhat startling, but so were the early attempts at ordinary motor-car construction, and it would not on that account be safe to ridicule its future possibilities.

Except for the existing grievance over the price of petrol—a grievance which is entirely attributable to commercial operations, and which, it is to be hoped, will not assume a permanent character—the motorist's only real trouble in the matter of upkeep is that associated with tyres. It is beyond doubt, however, that much of this is due to his own carelessness. Leaving out of consideration for the moment the disastrous results of bad driving—excessive speed round corners, violent starting, and unnecessary use of the brakes—it is certain that many motorists regularly drive with their tyres much under-inflated. They do this in spite of the repeated warnings of the tyre manufacturers, all of whom issue instructions as to proper pressure, and emphasise the damage necessarily done if these pressures be not maintained. As an instance of thoughtlessness in this respect, the writer may mention that, the other day, in the course of a discussion on the subject with a motoring friend, he tested the back tyres of the latter's car—a heavy Mercedes—with a Schrader gauge, and found the pressure to be 45 lbs., which is just about half what it ought to have been. And it was with his tyres half-inflated in this way that he had just completed a run of 120 miles. It is little wonder that he finds his tyre bill excessively heavy, and probably most other motorists do so for a similar reason. The fact is that it is impossible for the most experienced motorist to judge from mere observation whether his tyres are adequately inflated or not, and every car owner should carry with him one of these little pressure gauges for periodically testing his tyres. They occupy no more room in the pocket than a penknife, cost only a few shillings, and are simplicity itself in use.

We are requested by Messrs. S. Bowley and Son, of Battersea, the manufacturers of "Champion" motor lubricants and distillers of Bowley's motor spirits, to state that there is no foundation for the reports that have been circulated in certain quarters to the effect that they have withdrawn from, or compromised in any way, the action now pending between one of their late travellers and themselves.

Mr. McCurd, of McCurds, Ltd., Store Street, Tottenham Court Road, W., informs us that he has at present a 25 h.p. 1912 Clement-Talbot, absolutely unused, with handsome five-seater touring body, for sale at a bargain price. It may be mentioned that the list price of the chassis of this model is £515.

At the meeting of directors of Rolls-Royce, Ltd., held on Friday, the 12th inst., it was decided to pay an interim dividend on the whole of the company's shares for the half-year ended April 30 last at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum (1s. per share), less income tax, payable July 31.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

NOTHING is talked about except the price of Consols. Every kind of remedy is suggested, although naturally none of them has the smallest chance of success. The idea of passing an Act of Parliament redeeming Consols at par within a certain date would mean taxing the nation to a prodigious extent. From a business point of view it would be much cheaper to go to war with Germany next week. We might win, in which case we should get a big indemnity, and even if we lost I doubt whether a losing fight would not cost the country less than a sinking fund for the redemption at par of a stock now standing under 74.

The idea of consolidating the whole of the debts of the

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Colonies, India, and Great Britain would cost less and have an infinitely greater effect upon the credit of the Empire. We all realise that we should never allow any of our Colonies to default. We insist upon these Colonies stating when they issue a loan that the Colony is alone responsible. Nevertheless, this is only a fiction. If Great Britain is not to be responsible for her Colonies she might as well give them up. We must consolidate our defence, our credit, and our finances. Admittedly the scheme is vast; but so is our Empire. We should have to raise the rate of interest on the National Debt, but we could reduce the rate of interest on our Indian and Colonial debts. I hope some great statistician like the Editor of the Statist will work out the figures. The trouble is that we have no really patriotic and hard-working statesmen who will devote their lives to such a scheme. The Colonies would gladly agree and India would save money.

The new issues still fail to please the public. The Chilian Northern Railway debentures have the guarantee of the Chilian Government, the soundest of all the South American Governments, and the issue was attractive. The Brazil Railway 5 per cent. debentures at 98 are convertible into common stock at 150. This does not appear a very valuable option, but the house of Speyer Brothers is not in the habit of making many mistakes. The Anglo-Brazilian Meat issue does not please me. The Cuban Central Railway's offer of 5 per cent debentures at par is hardly as good as that of the Chilian Northern at 96. The Tin Trust asked the public for £50,000, but it did not state definitely what properties it intended to buy.

MONEY.—The Money market is still in an uninteresting condition. The Americans appear to be borrowing in London, but there is very little demand outside Wall Street, and this demand is more or less due to the crop, which it is said will be very good. There is no chance of the rate being reduced.

FOREIGNERS.—Very little business has been done in the Foreign market; there was some attempt to sell Japanese, but it came to nothing. Even if the Emperor died this would not affect securities. Tintos are now being bought, for the copper scare is dying down.

HOME RAILS.—The Great Eastern report was very bad indeed, and the Board appears to have lost its head over the coal strike, for the figures show over £20,000 increase in the coal bill and a great increase in other expenses. The traffics were quite good, but it is clear that most of the companies make the bulk of their profit carrying coal, and that when this falls off the takings have to bear the cost of carrying passengers and goods. The profit on these is small. The Lancashire and Yorkshire report is also disappointing. The dividend has dropped 1 per cent. and £25,600 is carried forward and £20,000 placed to reserve. Apparently the decrease in earnings was all net loss, but we must wait until the figures are issued before we can speak with confidence. The "bears" have been buying back Metropolitans, but the railway market on the whole is flat. I am still of opinion that Home Rails should be purchased on any reaction. The quotations will recover and a good profit should be made by those who buy now.

YANKEES.—The American market looks like going better. The crop reports are excellent, and this is really all that the nation asks for. There is some talk of an agreement being entered into between Eries and Baltimore and Ohio. As a result, Eries have been bought and they look like higher prices. The copper position in the United States is as strong as ever. The big selling agencies who work for the Amalgamated and Guggenheims did not reduce their price for electrolytic copper below 17¾ cents. This in spite of the fact that some of the small people sold little lots under 17. They soon got tired of doing this, however, and the Continental "bears" also bolted when they found that they were up against a very strong "bull" clique. I think that all copper shares will rise.

RUBBER.—The Vallambrosa report showed a profit of £67,917, and the dividend is reduced to 130 per cent. This Company, however, will be tapping some of its new trees, and if the shares fall to 20s. they should be purchased. The trouble with Vallambrosa was that the estate was too closely planted. Now the trees have been cut out the yield from those left will increase. The Rubana report was good, and those who hold the shares have a splendid investment. Sumatra Consolidated paid a dividend apparently with the idea of refunding the guarantors a portion of the money they had put up for dividend purposes. It is not a satisfactory company.

OIL.—The Emba Caspian Oil Company still hangs fire, and it is now said that the prospectus will not be issued until the law suit has been settled. The ground is good, but I think the company over-capitalised. All oil shares are very dull. The Spies have offered their shareholders the new shares at 22s., and those who hold Spies shares should certainly take up their quota.

KAFFIRS AND RHODESIANS.—It is said that Barnatos intend to move the Kaffir market, and we may expect a revival here before the end of the year. In my opinion the best purchase is City Deep, but Knights are very cheap. No doubt the first shares to feel the revival will be the Far Eastern propositions, but some of these are, in my opinion, dangerous, and if a rise comes should be sold. The Latilla group intend to have a dash at Rhodesians, and as Amalgamated Properties now have funds in hand we may see an attempt made to revive the Rhodesian market, as the dealers are short.

TIN.—Apparently the public decline to come into tin, and the little spurt in Nigerians died down. However, as the companies are now making better returns and as most of them have very rich ground, I think that in the end we shall get increased values. Nigerian Tin is, of course, a gamble. So many people bought the shares that I hope an effort will be made to get them out. Pahangs are being talked about. It is said that the Company has struck some rich tin ground and that its rubber is looking extremely well. The market is not a good one, but I should not be surprised to see a still further advance in quotations.

MISCELLANEOUS.—Marconis improved, as I suggested they would. They will probably be supported until the new issue is made. I do not advise anyone to buy the shares, as I think they are much over-valued. Those who hold them should get out whenever the market moves up. The general market in Miscellaneous shares is very dull, but there is some talk of the Helsby people putting up Automatic Telephones. This company runs a most ingenious automatic telephone which is now being tried by the Post Office. If it is adopted the shares, which are guaranteed by the Helsby Company, should have a still further rise. They are not a speculation, and cannot be carried over. Agricultural Banks and other Egyptian shares are in an uninteresting condition. The crop will be good and the shares should be bought.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

GERMANY AND GREAT BRITAIN.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I agree with Mr. Turner as to the desirability of removing the apprehensions on both sides; if there are apprehensions on both sides. But I do not agree with those who would leave it to "the man in the street" to ensure a settlement by the force of public opinion of both nations. "The man in the street" is but the blind populace, who too often have forced their rulers into declaring, against their better judgment, war which has ended with disaster. History shows us many cases where the populace have, by their cries, precipitated war, with all its hideous consequences.

With regard to "removing the apprehensions on both sides." If there were apprehensions on both sides, it would be a very laudable desire; but there are apprehensions on one side only, and that not the German side. The German side is "Imperative Need" and resentment at England because England (for her own protection) stands in the way of the satisfying of their "Imperative Need."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

In Europe, Germany is a Power that no other European nation can ignore, because Germany has the finest army; but in the world, outside of Europe, Germany does not count, because Germany, until recently, had no great navy. She has power to negotiate and secure what she wants in Europe, but she has no power to back up her negotiations outside of Europe, until her fleet is equal to, or greater than, that of the country with whom she wishes to negotiate, or the country that stands in her way. Germany is therefore building her great fleet in order to be able to satisfy her "Imperative Need."

Her "Imperative Need" can only be satisfied at the cost of other nations, among whom England is not the least. Hence the cause for apprehension is only, and can only be, on the English side.

But what is Germany's great need? Germany's great need is "land." Land suitable for colonisation, so that her sons and daughters can continue under the protection of their flag and retain their German nationality. Her population is increasing by about 900,000 annually. She is fast becoming an industrial nation, and she wants markets wherein to sell her manufactures in order to be able to maintain her people; markets which do not depend upon the goodwill of any other nation for right of entry; markets which are absolutely under their own control, to be closed against foreign competition when it is to the interest of Germany's industrial population.

If Germany is to continue as "a great self-supporting European nation" she must become a "World Power." Without adequate colonies and markets of her own, she must soon exhaust her resources, and fall into decay.

Every German knows this, and every German is preparing for the struggle which will decide the future history of their land and the destiny of two nations.

Whether the struggle will be of "war" or of "negotiations" depends entirely upon England's preparedness to face the struggle.

England's preparedness depends upon the honesty of her statesmen.

There are only two ways to remove the apprehension of England: first, by conceding to Germany what Germany wants and assisting her to become a great world empire; second, by being so strong as to make it impossible for Germany to attempt to coerce any concession. Which method does Mr. Turner approve of? He cannot approve of the first, because to do so would be to approve of the betrayal of England. To refuse to adopt the second method is to "sit still and drift."

With regard to it not being possible to take 50 steamers and utilise them as transports for the conveyance of troops and munitions of war without some news leaking out to the intended enemy, surely Mr. Turner knows that adequate means would be taken beforehand to prevent information of the operations being given. It is generally recognised that "no declaration of war" would be given, and that a favourable moment would be chosen most suitable for the success of the undertaking. Even in these days of wireless telegraphy it is not impossible to elude the British fleet which might be waiting for them.

Yours truly, THOS. MCLEOD.

West Hartlepool, July 22, 1912.

OUR RELATIONS WITH GERMANY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I am authorised by Lord Courtney to say—and I have great pleasure in saying—that the interpretation which, in my former letter, I applied to the remarks quoted by me from his article in the Contemporary Review was a mistaken one. The quotation was: "Such a union" (i.e., a friendly union between Holland and the German Empire) "could not be resented by us except through motives of jealousy. But . . . it would have to be established under conditions very different from those that now prevail." I took this latter sentence to mean "we should not consent to such union unless it were established," etc. Lord Courtney has been good enough to inform me that this sentence was intended, not to qualify the first, but to convey his opinion that such a union "could not come within the range of practical politics until after a complete change in the circumstances and principles of policy now dominant in the two countries." You will, I hope, Sir, allow me publicly to express my sincere regret at having misinterpreted Lord Courtney's views: and also the great pleasure with which I find that in Lord Courtney's opinion "we should have no right of interference in the case of a voluntary union between Holland and Germany."

Mr. Turner's remarks, in your issue of the 20th, on the necessity of arriving at a friendly settlement with Germany are admirable in the abstract, but they throw no light on how the thing can be done. Mr. Turner and I might appeal to the man-in-the-street, from now till Doomsday, without making any impression on him. What is needed is some action in, and if necessary outside of, Parliament on the part of somebody whom Parliament and the man-in-the-street are likely to listen to. If neither the Peace Society nor the Labour Party will provide us with a leader, where are we to look for one?—

I am, Sir, yours, etc., T. G. MARTIN.

2, Anderson Street, Chelsea, July 20, 1912.

A MYSTERY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

DEAR SIR,—In your issue of the 13th there is a note which begins: "America having standardised steel, lobsters, pork . . . . is now rather worried as to why somebody does not standardise the English language." The whole paragraph is vague and involved. It reminds me of a group of candles that the summer heat has melted into a mass of shapeless wax. In fact, it cannot be "standardised."

There is the gleam of a hatchet buried among the molten wax: "We are antagonistic to the 'nu speling,' it is true . . . ."; whence a passage to the "American Language." I know you do not wish to open the sluicegates to further correspondence on the question of rational spelling. You have treated us most fairly. But from this hotch-potch of a paragraph I am afraid the reader may carry away a dim idea that the "Nyu Spelling" and the "American language" are one and the same. I want to assure him that the headquarters of the Simplified Speling Sosiety are in London, not in New York. An ocean lies between, and the "nyu speling" was born on this side. We are not enemies who go about in the fields of the English language to sow tares among the wheat. "Nyu Speling" stands for purity of speech.

There are dark mysteries in the Note. But (1) Is "standardising" identical with the making of "the perfectly inflexible word, the irrefragably rigid rule"? And whatever is meant by this oracular talk about "the perfectly inflexible word"? You can't hold a word in fetters. (2) Is "slang" . . . . "the manufacture of the word for the occasion"? Technical terms cannot, I think, be set down as slang?

I assume, however, that THE ACADEMY pleads for liberty in spelling. It would write "standardize" and "standardise," "plow" and "plough," "delight" and "delite." This is a great step forward, and I rejoice. Yours faithfully, SYDNEY WALTON.

Simplified Speling Sosiety,
44, Great Russell Street, London, W.C.

July 16, 1912.

[Mr. Walton takes a steam-hammer to kill a butterfly—and even then misses the butterfly. Our harmless

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

little paragraph needs no explanation or defence, being perfectly clear to anyone of ordinary mental equipment; but we quite see why Mr. Walton is incensed. We spelt "Nyu" without the "y." Gently, but firmly, we must decline to apologise. Meanwhile, bearing in mind the stress of our recent "Spelling" correspondence, we cannot re-open the subject just yet.—THE WRITER OF THE NOTE.]

THE NECESSITOUS LADIES' HOLIDAY FUND.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—You have been good enough to allow me to appeal in your columns now for several years past for funds to provide holidays for necessitous ladies by the sea and countryside, and through your kindness and that of your readers I have been enabled to bring rest to many to whom it meant a boon untold.

May I be allowed to appeal again for help to send away governesses, typewriters, hospital nurses, secretaries, musicians, actresses, and ladies of gentle birth engaged in other professions, unable to provide holidays for themselves, who, without the possibility of earning money in the summer months, are left behind in London, exposed to the sufferings attendant on poverty?

I plead, then, for those too proud to plead for themselves, for the sick, and more especially those broken down in health from overwork.

All contributions sent to this address will be gratefully acknowledged and distributed.—Your obedient servant,

CONSTANCE BEERBOHM.

48, Upper Berkeley Street, W.

BOOKS RECEIVED

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS.

Cameos of Indian Crime. By H. Hervey. Illustrated. (Stanley Paul and Co., 12s. 6d. net.)

The Mundas and Their Country. By Sarat Chandra Roy, M.A., B.L. With an Introduction by E. A. Gait, I.C.S. Illustrated. (The City Book Society, Calcutta. 9s. 6d.)

Intimate Memoirs of Napoleon III: Personal reminiscences of the Man and the Emperor. By the late Baron d'Ambès. Edited and Translated by A. R. Allinson, M.A. With Illustrations from the Collection of A. M. Broadley. 2 Vols. (Stanley Paul and Co., 24s. net.)

Three Lectures on St. Theresa. By the Rev. James M. Wilson, D.D. (The S.P.C.K. 6d.)

Knickerbocker Days. By Harris Tweed. (John Ouseley. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Fourth Generation. Reminiscences by Janet Ross. Illustrated. (Constable and Co. 12s. 6d. net.)

MISCELLANEOUS.

Syndicalism and the General Strike: An Explanation. By Arthur D. Lewis. (T. Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)

Martin Marprelate and Shakespeare's Fluellen: A New Theory of the Authorship of the Marprelate Tracts. By J. Dover Wilson. (Alexander Moring. 5s. net.)

A Zola Dictionary: The Characters of the Rougon-Macquart Novels of Emile Zola. With a Biographical and Critical Introduction, Synopses of the Plots, Bibliographical Note, Map, Genealogy, etc. By J. G. Patterson. (George Routledge and Sons. 8s. 6d. net.)

Bacon is NOT Shakespeare! A Reply to Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bt. By Ralph Winnington Leftwich. (Simpkin, Marshall and Co. 6d.)

FICTION.

Affairs of Men. By D. C. F. Harding. (John Long. 6s.)

The Modern Market Place. By "Coronet." (John Long. 6s.)

The Race of Circumstance. By H. R. Campbell. (Stephen Swift and Co. 6s.)

An American Girl at the Durbar. By Shelland Bradley. (John Lane. 6s.)

Selmin of Selmingfold. By Bertram Mitford. Illustrated. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)

Love's Cross Road. By L. T. Meade. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

The Big Fish. By H. B. Marriott Watson. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

VERSE.

Studies and Portraits. By E. Herrick. (H. R. Allenson. 1s. 6d.)

King Henry III; or, The Rise and Fall of Simon de Montford. By Bernard Wyman. (W. Heffer and Sons, Cambridge. 2s.)

Pavements and Pastures: A Book of Songs. By Thomas Burke. (The Author, 12, Craigton Road, Eltham, Kent. 1s. net.)

EDUCATIONAL.

A School Atlas of Ancient History. (W. and A. K. Johnston. 2s. net.)

A Junior Geography of Scotland, Regional and Practical. By David Frew, B.A. (Blackie and Son. 1s.)

La Révolution Française. By F. A. M. Mignet. Selections edited by Taylor Dyson, M.A., with Notes, Retranslation Passages, etc. (Blackie and Son. 4d.)

JUVENILE.

Granny's Wonderful Chair. From the Story by Francis Browne. Illustrated in Colour. (Blackie and Son. 9d.)

Alice's Adventures in Wonderland. By Lewis Carroll. Illustrated in Colour. (Blackie and Son. 9d.)

PERIODICALS.

Quarterly Review; Book-Prices Current; Constitution Papers; Mercure de France; Atlantic Monthly; The Rajput Herald; Bookseller; L'Action Nationale; Mind; Publishers' Circular; Literary Digest, N.Y.; Manchester Quarterly; The Collegian, Calcutta; Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly; Journal of the Anthropological Society, Bombay; Revue Bleue; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; Report for the Year 1911 on the Victoria and Albert Museum and the Bethnal Green Museum; Friendly Greetings; Boy's Own Paper; Girl's Own Paper and Woman's Magazine; Sunday At Home; International Journal of Ethics; The Periodical; Journal of the Gypsy Lore Society.

HORLICK'S MALTED MILK

MALTED BARLEY, WHEAT AND MILK, IN POWDER FORM.

THE COOLING SUMMER DRINK

MADE IN A MOMENT BY STIRRING BRISKLY IN COLD WATER.

Its cooling and thirst-quenching qualities, as well as its nourishing value, commend it to Athletes, Sportsmen, Golfers, Tennis Players, Cricketers, etc.

VERY REFRESHING WITH A DASH OF SODA.

SERVED IN REFRESHMENT ROOMS AND BARS, AT MANY SPORTS GROUNDS, AND IN RESTAURANTS AND CAFÉS.

Of all Chemists and Stores in Sterilised Glass Bottles, at 1s. 6d., 2s. 6d., and 11s.

Trial size free by post on application.

HORLICK'S MALTED MILK CO., SLOUGH, BUCKS., ENGLAND.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Twelve years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC
OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO . . AND THROUGH CANADA . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service via Vancouver.

For further particulars apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE
TO
SOUTH AND EAST AFRICA.
WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.
Vià the SUEZ CANAL:
Calling at GIBRALTAR, MARSEILLES and NAPLES

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.
(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—
DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.
Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE
PLEASURE CRUISES
LIVERPOOL
to the
MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC
by the
"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"
. . . Ports of Call . . .
CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—
THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

P & O Passenger Services.
EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports.
(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)
Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises
Throughout the Year, according to Season.
AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.
Programme on Application.
For Passage, Freight and all information apply—
PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,
102, Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours.

R.M.S.P. PLEASURE CRUISES.

To	Fare	Length of Tour	Sailing	From
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £22.	Days 23.	Every Thursday Fortnight.	London.
THE AZORES.	£17†	19.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£12.	8 upwards.	Weekly.	Southampton & Liverpool.
WEST INDIES.	From £40.	From 34.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
NORWAY.	From £1 a day	13 upwards.	June to August.	Grimsby & Leith.
BALTIC & RUSSIA.	From £1 a day.	24.	August 24.	Grimsby.
MEDITERRANEAN, HOLY LAND & EGYPT.	From £1 a day.	10.	September to November.	Southampton & Marseilles.

† Including Hotel Accommodation.

For further particulars apply:—
THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY,
London: 18, Moorgate St., E.C., or 32, Cockspur St., S.W.

FEARLESS CRITICISM

In support of principle
In exposure of humbug
In scorn of cant

THE COMMENTATOR

A Weekly Review of Politics, Art, Music, Literature, and the Stage.

ONE PENNY WEEKLY of all Newsagents—or sent direct from the Publishers, for 6s. per annum (post free) or 3s. for six months.

COMMENTATOR, Ltd., 31, Essex St., London

Published by the Proprietor at Cannon House, Breams Buildings, London E.C. Office for Advertisements, 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C. Printed by BONNER & Co., The Chancery Lane Press, Rolls Passage, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

TO

THE ACADEMY

CONSISTING OF

NOTABLE ARTICLES, REVIEWS, Etc.,

WHICH HAVE APPEARED FROM TIME TO TIME IN "THE ACADEMY" AND "LITERATURE" SINCE ITS INCEPTION.

Perishable Books: By Leslie Stephen

(LITERATURE, November 27, 1897.)

A SPEAKER at the recent conference of librarians complained that most modern books were doomed to speedy destruction, not in the spiritual but in the material sense. The paper on which they are printed will rapidly become mere pulp or impalpable powder. One might have supposed that such a result would be gratifying, especially to librarians. Considering what a vast proportion of printed matter not only is, but is intended to be, purely ephemeral, there could, at first sight, be no reason for desiring its preservation. The regret, perhaps, is an instance of a tendency noted by all psychologists. A pursuit becomes delightful for its own sake, even when its ostensible end ceases to be valuable. A zealous librarian takes such a pleasure in preserving literature that he forgets to consider whether the stores accumulated can be of any use, and then to ask whether useless stores are not positively pernicious.

Persons who are not subject to that illusion may take a different view. Why should not all books be made of perishable materials? Hawthorne somewhere argues that when we have become civilised we shall again give up houses for tents. Why encumber ourselves with huge masses of bricks and mortar which, if they suit the convenience of one generation, are all the more likely to be ill-suited to its successors? Why on the same principle should we try to carry with us vast accumulations of printed matter which have served their only possible purpose? Would it not be a good thing if a law were made that no paper should be used which was not warranted to vanish (say) in a century? Domestic life now involves a continuous struggle against the masses of waste paper, circulars, and advertisements which pour in by every post; and but for a systematic destruction would cause a household to be snowed up as under a paper avalanche. The race at large is suffering in the same way; and some mode of self-defence is becoming absolutely necessary. The legislation we have suggested would provide an automatic machinery which would become operative at the end of the twentieth century. From that time forth no book would be in existence which would have been printed more than a hundred years, and room would be constantly made for a new influx by the spontaneous vanishing of rubbish.

It would not follow that all literature above a century old should perish. It would simply be that books not reprinted for a century would vanish. All the great books, the models and masterpieces of literature, would be preserved; and there would, we may suppose, be a constant watchfulness over books which were approaching the fatal term. The effect would be like that of cremation. We should destroy what is really dead instead of preserving mere mummies. The literature actually preserved would be mainly such as had some prima facie claim to the title of classical. We are often exhorted to limit our reading to really good books. That is obviously impossible, if we are to know anything of our contemporaries; but it seems to be a sound rule for the study of older literature. Shakespeare is worth reading; but the only real use of plunging into the enormous rubbish heaps of the small Elizabethan literature is to glorify the Dry-as-dusts who won't recognise the inevitable law of death. The advantages are obvious in the case of history. A book which shall be a great work of art as well as an accurate record is now scarcely possible. The improvement of modern history is a familiar topic, and in certain respects is undeniable. But it is permissible to doubt whether modern historians would not be better if great masses of records had been summarily destroyed. The examination of all manner of archives and State paper offices has, it is true, enabled recent inquirers to give elaborate accounts of the various purposes and impressions of statesmen from day to day. If history is understood as implying an exact knowledge of Queen Elizabeth's intentions as to Mary Queen of Scots at any given date, the records have been invaluable. But even in the hands of a great literary artist like Froude, history written on this scheme often becomes wearisome because we feel that the minute personal questions are both insoluble and irrelevant. The broad and really important facts are obscured by the supposed necessity of going into minute biography. Imagine a history of the present day written on the scale adopted for periods when documents were comparatively rare and the unfortunate historian bound to be familiar with all the views of Mr. Gladstone and Lord Salisbury and all their subordinates, to read all the private letters, and all the despatches, and all the Blue-books, and all the statistical tables to make up his mind about all the ins and outs of the labour question, and the education question, and the rights of our policy in Egypt and India—any one of which is enough to occupy the whole time of a contemporary. If it takes Mr. Gardiner a year to write the history of a year at Cromwell's time, it will hereafter take a lifetime to write of a year under Queen Victoria. History on such a scale is plainly impossible; and it is every day becoming more essential to tabulate, classify, prepare indexes, and in one way or other to organise the vast masses of information which are accumulating more and more rapidly. The unhappy historian in the future will be physically unable to go into a hundredth part of the available sources of information. He must constantly be content with summaries without trying to go behind them; and it is desirable that the burthen should be lightened by destroying what is plainly useless. We seem to be making such a mistake as a collector of a museum of natural history, who should not be content with getting examples of every species, but should try to keep every example he could of each species. The historian is constantly tempted to waste time by ascertaining facts, not because everybody supposes that they can throw any more light upon any serious question, but simply because they are ascertainable. He can only refuse on peril of being denounced as superficial by somebody who spends his whole energy upon the minute details which are really without any significance. The historian will clearly have to abandon the pretence of omniscience; but he should be freed from the temptation of pretending to it by destroying the worthless records, which, so long as they exist, make constant calls upon his attention. After all, a vast mass of knowledge is valueless; it could be destroyed without really altering our judgment of any important point, and if we here and there destroyed something which might be of some use, we should get a greater advantage by making the waste of time upon such investigations once for all impossible.

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The argument applies even more clearly to pure literature. How much of all the writing intended for ephemeral amusement is really worth the space it occupies on the shelves of the British Museum? Look at any collection of British poets. Say honestly what proportion of it does any good to any human being. The old rule as to mediocrity in poetry gives the principle. A tenth-rate historian may add something to our knowledge of fact; but a tenth-rate poet does nothing whatever. He is simply an inferior echo of something better, and the original is enough for all our purposes. Would anybody suffer if Blackmore's "Creation" or Boyse's "Deity" had calmly and quietly vanished away? Will our grandchildren have any cause for sorrow if ninety-nine hundredths of all the publications of to-day should disappear like a bad dream? To keep such things, it may be said, is a harmless superstition. They may be stowed away in boxes and do no injury to any one. There is, however, some harm to libraries, as every one knows who has anything to do with the accumulating matters which are always overpowering the energies of their guardians. But the bare existence of such repositories discourages and overwhelms conscientious readers. They are haunted by the vague impression that they ought to read everything, and forget that the more rubbish they study the less energy they have for what is good. And surely the honest writer of such stuff may feel the same. He writes an article to amuse his neighbours for a few minutes. He has nothing whatever to say to posterity. When he writes a letter to a friend he means it for the waste-paper basket. When he addresses the public, he means the public of his own period, and should feel it to be an impertinence if he is forced to present himself to the future race without any intention of his own. We are, as has sometimes been remarked, ephemeral beings, and ought to behave as such. Why should we be forced to be immortal? We should be content, and even eager, to pass into oblivion as soon as the temporary purpose of amusing an idle hour has been fulfilled. A writer who feels that strongly—of course, we do not speak to the Heaven-born genius—should insist, if he could, upon having his work printed upon perishable materials. Immortality in print is not only a superfluity; the bare suggestion of its possibility is a positive injury to one's feelings.

Review: Hawthorne.
By Professor Saintsbury

(January 17, 1880.)

Hawthorne. By HENRY JAMES, JUN. (Macmillan.)

A CAVILLER might ask, on beholding the title of this book, what business Hawthorne has in this particular galley. It certainly would seem that the lamented author of "Mdlle. D'Arvers" might as justly figure in a collection of French authors as Hawthorne, an American citizen born thirty years after the Declaration of Independence, among English men of letters. This, however, is rather an objection for Americans to make than Englishmen. It may be somewhat cruel of Mr. Morley to take their ewe lambs and range them with his stately flock. But no Englishman will be sorry to have a convenient life and criticism of Hawthorne, and certainly no one will be sorry to have it from the hand of Mr. Henry James. Mr. James's already published criticisms and analyses of French novels and novelists contain some very admirable work of the kind here required; and the fact sometimes noticeable in those criticisms, that he busies himself more with the life and character than the literary achievements of his subjects, is hardly against him. Something of the last-named peculiarity may indeed be noticed as recurring here. We should have liked a somewhat clearer and more definite attempt to sum up the characteristics of Hawthorne's novels than that which Mr. James has given us. Such attempts no doubt often lead those who make them into the fault of exaggerating special features in order to make the picture definite and distinct. But if literary criticism is worth anything at all, it ought not to decline an attempt simply because the attempt is often made badly. Such handbooks as these are, we suppose, intended either as a substitute or as a preparation for the study of the original. As a substitute—which very likely Mr. James would say he had no thought of attempting—this book seems to us inadequate. A person unacquainted with the writings of the author of "The Scarlet Letter" would, we think, lay it down without any clear notion of the sum and nature of the work which he actually accomplished. Nor would a person who, having studied it, proceeded to attack the texts find himself provided with any clear notion of where to lay his critical hold. Interspersed in Mr. James's pages are many scattered remarks about Hawthorne's different works which are excellent as criticism; but whether they are sufficient, in the words of the prospectus to the series, "to satisfy intelligent curiosity as to the performances" of the man of letters they deal with is a question which we feel inclined to answer in the negative. Moreover, to get over what we have to say that is unfavourable at once, we do not always like Mr. James's style. Such a sentence as "out of the soil of New England he sprang—in a crevice of that immitigable granite he sprouted and bloomed," appears to us, we must confess, to be a mixture of the inappropriately sublime and the indisputably ludicrous.

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

These shortcomings, however, though they can hardly be passed over by a critic who has to give an account of a book professing to do certain things, and, as it seems to him, failing to do them, do not prevent this book of Mr. James from being an exceedingly interesting one. As a critical biography of an artist by one of the same craft it has unusual excellence. Mr. James's account of Hawthorne's novels may seem to us to lack fullness and precision; his account of Hawthorne himself, as a man and a novelist, is quite proof against any such criticism. He has treated his subject as carefully and as lovingly as if he were the hero of one of his own stories. Hawthorne's idiosyncrasy has, it is well known, been very variously judged. There are readers whose judgment is not contemptible, and who regard him as simply a morbid horror-monger possessed of some literary skill. There are others—of whom, by the way, Mr. James quotes M. Emile Montégut as the most prominent instance—who look upon him as the type of the Puritan novelist ever harassed and goaded by a consciousness and conviction of sin. Edgar Poe looked on him as the great representative of quiet or repose in literature—but this was, it is true, when his work was but half accomplished. In short, quot homines tot sententiae is truer of Hawthorne than, perhaps, of any other novelist. Mr. James has picked his way among these perplexed paths with great skill, or rather, to speak more truly and to do him more justice, he has disregarded them all, and has been his own road-maker. Without going into the extravagances of the Taine school, it is, of course, clear that, speaking roughly, the idiosyncrasy of any man or writer is determined by his temperament plus his circumstances. Mr. James has endeavoured to indicate Hawthorne's temperament with great analytical skill, and has illustrated his circumstances with full knowledge. The earlier portion of the book is hardly more a biography of Hawthorne than it is a picture of New England society from sixty to forty years ago. The theoretical equality, combined with a very decided pride in race and pedigree; the shy, unsocial ways; the universal diffusion of elementary education and decent affluence without any great scholarship or luxury; the eager aspiration after higher culture, with very few opportunities for its attainment; and, above all, the traditional religionism with its gloomy teachings and constant incentives to introspection and soul dissection, are admirably indicated without being at all "charged." Many of the incidents of Hawthorne's life of "cool solitude" become highly dramatic and pictorial in Mr. James's hands, particularly his short sojourn at Bowdoin College, with its curious result in the half-lost romance of "Fanshawe" and the later episode of his residence at Brook Farm. Mr. James's treatment of this latter quaint establishment and of Margaret Fuller is delightful, but there are things in it which make one reflect, copybook fashion, on the mutability of things. "There flourished at this time," says Mr. James, "in Boston a very remarkable and interesting woman, Miss Margaret Fuller by name." Evidently Mr. James thinks that the poor marchioness's name will be new to most of his readers. If this be so—and he is probably a better judge of the fact than we are—how quickly are the mighty fallen! Only five-and-thirty years ago, to anybody in England who took the slightest interest in matters literary or in matters American, Margaret Fuller's name was familiar enough, and familiarity with it has been handed down to at least some persons who at that period had not the advantage or disadvantage of existing. But now it seems Margaret Fuller, Marchesa d'Ossoli, contributor to the "Dial," transcendentalist and all the rest of it, has to be reintroduced to most readers as "a very remarkable and interesting woman, Miss Margaret Fuller by name." We have not recently come across a more striking example of sic transit.

"Margaret" has led us, as indeed she has led Mr. James, a little out of the way. To return, we may say that in all Hawthorne's modest vicissitudes, his temporary and not specially congenial official employments at Salem, his happy marriage, his Liverpool consulship, and his subsequent wanderings, Mr. James follows him with the same intelligent touch, showing how each situation affected him and was represented in his work. In the rather thorny matter of "Our Old Home" the biographer has conducted himself with very considerable tact. He makes the best case he can for his hero, and he does not make any concessions to

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

English feeling which a good American ought not to make; but he admits freely that Hawthorne had "a constant suspicion and mistrust of the society that surrounded him," and that "his national consciousness was exaggerated, painful, and morbid." This is all that any Englishman can reasonably claim, though putting "Our Old Home" quite aside, and, looking at Hawthorne in his American rather than in his English relations, we think that we should give a more unfavourable account of him than Mr. James has done. He seems to us to have had a distinct vein of "ill-conditionedness" in him which may or may not be worth noticing in connection with his purely literary work, but which certainly shows itself in his relations with the actual world. It is at least significant that Brook Farm complained of "The Blithedale Romance" quite as much as did English society of "Our Old Home."

Mr. James, as we have said, does not give us much "lead" to a discussion of Hawthorne's literary characteristics, and such a discussion would therefore be out of place here. His inclination to defend his author from the charge of special gloom leads him to argue that the selection of such subjects as that of "The Scarlet Letter" was rather due to the paucity of really striking subjects open to an American novelist of his day than to any natural predilection. The gloomier side of Puritan faith and practice offered from a purely artistic point of view a good subject, and Hawthorne as an artist jumped at it. This, at least, is Mr. James's argument as we understand it. It might be interesting to inquire whether the choice of the subjects of "Transformation" and "Septimus Felton," where no such excuse can be offered, does not militate strongly against this hypothesis; and, indeed, Mr. James in some places of his book seems himself to hold opinions rather inconsistent with that which, as against M. Montégut, he champions. But, as we have said, he has not summed up or arranged his literary judgments of Hawthorne with sufficient definiteness to allow them to be in their turn seriously criticised. We think that this is a pity, but for what he has given us we return him very hearty thanks. Much of his information and many of his points of view are from the nature of the case inaccessible to an unassisted Englishman, and for the supply of them, as well as for the way in which they are given, he deserves our best gratitude.

The "Inhumanity" of Art

(LITERATURE, June 4, 1898.)

THE lecture with which that sternest of the old school of critics, M. Ferdinand Brunetière, recently disconcerted an audience convened by the Paris Société des Conférences, has since been republished by him as a pamphlet under the title of "L'Art et La Morale." His views will, no doubt, be received by his readers with more composure than they were by his hearers, whose artless surprise at the lecturer's denunciation of what may be called the Antinomian philosophy of Art was quite refreshing in its way. It is so long since these sensations have lost their original stimulus for ourselves. They have, indeed, been so thoroughly blunted by the psychologists of the daily Press that a discourse on "the relations of art to morality" is one of the last things by which we in England should expect to be startled, and one of the first by which we should apprehend being bored. To M. Brunetière's hearers, his assertion of the supremacy of morals and his unsparing rebuke of those who maintain that art is its own ethical law-giver, apparently combined the attraction of novelty with the charm of paradox. His contention that "in all forms of art there is a latent germ of immorality which is ever striving to develop" (and which, as we gather, it is the duty of the artist, as a good citizen, to sterilise) appears to be as new to Frenchmen as the first of his three supporting arguments is familiar to ourselves. For, as to M. Brunetière's "firstly"—that the end of art being the pleasure of the senses, it is necessarily directed to what either is, or is continually tending to become, an immoral purpose—was not this thesis expounded years ago with fascinating perversity by the late Mr. Stevenson? And did he not succeed in demonstrating to his own perfect satisfaction that there was no essential difference either in spirit or vocation between the novelist and the fille de joie?

These heart-searchings of the philosopher and the philosophising artist are far too familiar to have any freshness of interest at this time of day for Englishmen; so that neither M. Brunetière's "firstly" nor his "secondly" (which is like unto it) need detain us longer. But his "thirdly" is in a different case. His "thirdly" is an argument not nearly so often adduced in this country to prove the essential immorality of art; being, indeed, put forward much more frequently to demonstrate its preciousness as a possession of mankind. The French critic's third reason for pronouncing art immoral is founded on its "isolating" tendency. In proportion to the refinement of his æsthetic sense the artist necessarily becomes segregated from the rest of mankind. Their inability to share his subtle sensations, to comprehend his complex emotions, to discern those elements of beauty in the world of thought and things to which his own perceptions are so keenly alive, produces a constantly increasing effect of estrangement and alienation. In the end the breach between the artist and his fellowmen becomes complete; he gets into the habit of speaking of them as "the crowd," "the herd," and declares, as Flaubert does in his correspondence with George Sand, that they will "always be hateful." And a gift, an occupation, even an instinct which can induce a comparatively small class of men to speak in so unbrotherly a way of a large body of citizens who are many of them excellent husbands and fathers, pious and benevolent, upright and conscientious, respectable and respected in every relation of life, is on the face of it a thing to be reprobated and reprehended by civilised humanity. It is anti-social, inhuman—in a word, immoral.

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

These, no doubt, are seriously disquieting thoughts. The democrat in all countries feels the burden of them; but among us at any rate, and we presume in the other English-speaking democracies, they do not beget quite so despairing a conclusion as that to which they seem to have led M. Brunetière. Our own democrats, for instance, decline to accept his minor premiss. While admitting that all things which have an anti-social tendency are immoral, they deny that art is to be included under that category. The artist, they contend, is only temporarily estranged from his fellow-men. In the course of time the advance of "culture" will heal the breach; and the "herd" will cease to be "hateful" to him by becoming a community of art lovers like himself. The expectation may be illusory—in our opinion it is wholly so—but at any rate it saves the logical situation. The democrat of artistic tastes who entertains it is no longer tied down to the conclusion that those tastes have in themselves an anti-social, and therefore immoral, tendency, and thus he escapes the extremely awkward practical consequences which follow from that conclusion, and with which the French critic does not appear to have grappled. For M. Brunetière will find his "thirdly" a desperately disagreeable argument to live with. With his "firstly" and "secondly" it is otherwise. Effect might be given to them without positively fatal results to art. The immoral tendency which is inherent in it, either as ministering to sensuous pleasure or as imitating a Nature which is itself too frequently immoral, is to a great extent an affair of "subject," and may be corrected by a judicious choice of material. But the deeper, the more vital immorality of spirit—the immorality which belongs to art as art, and which inhumanly estranges the artist from the mass of mankind—is a much more difficult matter to deal with. One does not readily see how art is to be freed from this more essential taint. What would M. Brunetière himself advise "in the premisses"? That the artist should, out of sheer "enthusiasm of humanity," follow the example of the American humorist of whom it was recorded that out of regard for his fellow-creatures, "now he never writes, As funny as he can?" Should the artist, in other words, make it his endeavour not to work "as artistic as he can," and so get nearer to the common heart of humanity, after the manner of the famous Parliamentary advocate who used to drink a pot of porter at lunch in order to "bring his intelligence down to the level of the Committee's"? No doubt it is possible for the literary artist to avoid this painful rupture with the rest of his species, and to write in such a way as to win the sympathy of hundreds of thousands of readers, and to insure the periodical sale of many scores of editions. But it is to be observed that in these cases there is no conscious or deliberate debasement of artistic standards. The "art" which these artists offer to their public is simply the best art they know, or, at any rate, can command.

It would appear, therefore, that if the possession of an artistic gift has the "anti-social" effect attributed to it—if art has this essentially "inhuman" tendency—there is nothing for it but submission. Still, it seems necessary to remind M. Brunetière that the possession of any gift in which the majority of mankind do not participate tends to the same result. We fancy we have heard of the vanity of personal appearance and physical strength, the arrogance of learning, the pride of science, the mock-humility of self-righteousness, the conceit of connoisseurship in a host of matters which are not even distantly connected with art. The man with a fine discrimination in wine is not unconscious of his superiority. We may be pretty certain that Juvenal's epicure, who could distinguish primo morsu between Lucrine and Rutupine oysters, was in the same case. It is possible that the general body of worthy London citizens figure as the "crowd" or the "herd," and as such appear contemptible, if not "hateful," to an accomplished tea-taster in Mincing Lane. The attitude of all these people is more or less anti-social, but we do not on that account exclaim against the essentially inhuman character of the gift or the acquirement which fills its possessor with this sense of superiority to his fellows. The fact is, of course, that the feeling which it is apt to excite is inherent in human nature, and instead of protesting against its particular excitant for the time being—whether art or anything else—it would be much more reasonable, though perhaps not much more profitable, to lament the existence of original sin.

The whole discussion curiously illustrates the prevalence of that malady of self-analysis which is so specially characteristic of the age. It is a malady which, as is the case with maladies of the physical order, is aggravated by dwelling upon it. The artist who, instead of simply following his artistic bent, sits down to consider solemnly whether it is not inhumanly alienating him from his fellow-men is, in reality, ministering subtly to that egotism which he professes to dread. He is going the way to make himself not less, but more, conscious of his superiority to the rest of the world. If he is really haunted by apprehensions of the danger of which he discourses, there are at least two topics of reassurance which he might with advantage accustom himself to consider. In the first place, he might reflect that, if the consciousness of artistic endowment has an anti-social influence, the practice of art, at least in many of its literary forms, has, or should have, a broadening effect on the sympathies; at any rate, the creator of Falstaff and Shylock, of Hamlet and Juliet's nurse, does not seem conspicuously out of sympathetic contact with his fellow-humans. In the next place, we would remind him that it takes two to make an estrangement, that "the crowd," "the herd," whom he hates, are much too well satisfied with themselves to reciprocate that feeling, and that, so far from smarting under a sense of their own inferiority to the artist, they are, many of them—in fact, every "practical" man among them—complacently convinced that the inferiority is all on the other side. They themselves feel immensely superior to men who, like some, though assuredly not all, artists, are wanting in "business instinct"; but even here the feeling towards the inferior is not that of inhuman hate, but rather that of good-natured tolerance. If the artist, haunted by a sense of his "isolation," and brooding generally, as M. Brunetière seems to think he should, over his parlous state, has not sufficient sense of humour to feel himself reconciled to the crowd by the very fact that he and they are mutually looking down upon each other—if, after all, he still remains oppressed with the burden of his superiority, we are left without any counsel, save such as may sound a little frivolous, to offer him. We can only advise him to act in the spirit of the injunction laid upon the youthful daughters of the house of Kenwigs, who were instructed to tell their schoolfellows that, though they enjoyed certain domestic educational advantages over other children, they were "not proud, because Ma says it's sinful."

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Sonnet: Love's Pilgrims

(November 23, 1889.)

I SAW them pass, their high clear faces pale
With deathless longing, their dark eyes upturned
To where the dying flame of sunset burned,
While deep in shadow lay the enflowered vale;
Above, one cloud, a snow-white hurrying sail,
Sped o'er the darkening sky, as tho' it spurned
The azure depths; while passionate planets yearned
Toward the hidden god love only might unveil.

I saw them go, press up the desolate hill,
And stand clear-cut against the sunset's fire,
Yet dared not follow; like a broken lyre
That sings not, smitten, so my tortured will,
Pale as the ghost of some unslaked desire,
Held me in bondage, anguished—frozen—still.

EVELYN PYNE.

Sonnet

(January 20, 1883.)

ΑΙΑΣ.

(In St. Andrew's Hall, Cambridge, December 1, 1882.)

CLEFT is each dark and thickly peopled age
'Twixt our low time and Man's supremest height,
And through the varied vista comes to-night
A moment's vision of the Attic stage;
Athene visits us with counsel sage,
A hero tells the secret of his might,
The book of life is opened in our sight,
With here its fair and there its blotted page.

O people wise and human, strong and free!
O well-filled life, in all thy fulness calm!
O Greece! teach us to walk where thy sons trod,
To live as men, nor more desire to be,
To know that path beyond which is but harm,
To understand the irony of God.

HENRY NORMAN.

Thoughts on Style

By J. P. MAHAFFY.

(LITERATURE, November 13, 1897.)

LITERARY men of old were supposed, I believe, to wander at will among their books and cull from their shelves what took their fancy. If such was indeed the case, they enjoyed a leisure very different from that of our generation. The man of books no longer brings out of his treasure-house things new and old, like the householder in the Gospel, but these things are borne in upon him by circumstances, and his mind is determined by what he has to read. Who can avoid, at this moment, reading critic after critic upon the "Life of Tennyson," a book which has hit the fortunate moment "when nothing else was going on," and so has got an ample hearing. A college Don in Dublin is led by his examinations at this same moment to re-read the great classics which have long been part of his mental furniture, and so I chance to have before me again Virgil, the literary artist whom common consent has declared to be the most Tennysonian of the ancients. Not that our poet's direct obligations to Virgil are so marked as those to Theocritus, with whom he seems to have been saturated, but the general resemblance is surely the most remarkable. Virgil is far the greatest of the Roman poets, not by reason of his great ideas—in that Lucretius is his rival—but by reason of the combined purity and dignity of his style, which bears the evidence of being deliberately and consciously polished to the utmost degree of propriety and refinement. Illustrations abound on every page of his work. Take but one, not above the average, in his brief lines on the palace of Circe, which Æneas passes at the opening of the seventh book of the epic, from which I select but two:

> Hinc exaudiri gemitus, iræque leonum
> Vincla recusantum et serâ sub nocte rudentum.

You feel that Virgil must have heard the strange grating and metallic sound of a lion's roar at some Roman amphitheatre. And so he uses the word rudentum. This is the kind of perfection to be found all through Tennyson, and when one of our weekly oracles of wisdom, in its recent comparison of Shakespeare with him, said many true things, it seems to me to have missed an important contrast in this respect. To talk of the style of Shakespeare seems to me odd and irrelevant. The style of Tennyson is of the essence of his greatness.

This reminds me of an interesting remark in Gustave Flaubert's correspondence. "What distinguishes great genius is generalisation and creation; it resumes scattered personalities in a type, and brings new characters to the consciousness of humanity. Shakespeare is something tremendous in this respect; he was not a man, but a continent; there are crowds and countries in him. Such men have no need of attending to style. They are strong in spite of all their faults, and even because of them; but we, the little ones, are worth nothing except by finish of execution. V. Hugo, in this century, will eat up everybody, although he is full of faults. I venture on this proposition—that great men often write very badly, and so much the better for them. It is not to them that we must go for the art of the form, but to men like Horace and La Bruyère." I should leave out V. Hugo, who certainly aimed at a splendid style, and should put in Walter Scott, who now offends the young Scotland of Stevensonians by the negligences of his diction. But he, too, was far too great for style; he was unfolding such a wealth of human nature, galleries of great portraits, of nationalities, volumes of history and of legend that he had neither time nor care for the graces of a polished style. Look how his people live, just like the people of Shakespeare, in the hearts of all English-speaking people, nay, even in the hearts of foreigners, for Scott, owing to his want of style, is capable of translation! On the other hand, there is something so personal in an elaborated style that the characters are thrown into the shade by the personality of the poet, and so Tennyson has not left us a single character whose name is a household word, such as Scott and even far lesser men have created. His imagination has not furnished us with a great hero. The portrait of Arthur Hallam is drawn from real life with loving care, but fades out in the great "In Memoriam" before the great world-problems which fill the poet's mind, and so that exquisite monument of personal grief is like the Attic tomb reliefs, in which we wonder at the poetical pictures of human sorrow without knowing or caring what individual bereavement they were designed to commemorate.

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

But here I am, discoursing of style, concerning which my fastidious academic friends tell me I know nothing. Nevertheless, every man who writes must have some notions about good and bad writing, though they may be faulty. In a paper just published I had reason to compare two authors whom I called Miss Austen and Marie Corelli. An excellent academic Mentor said that was wrong; I should have said for conformity's sake, "Jane Austen." But, if I could only clear myself of the grave charge of having courted alliteration, I should defend my phrase by the fact that when I was young I always heard from my prim and staid relations of Miss Austen, a lady of whom they spoke with respectful but distant admiration. They would have thought Jane rather forward. And this marks the contrast to which I was pointing between certain older and newer novelists.

I have just said that thoughts on style may be expected from any literary source, and, by way of curious confirmation, where do I find the latest essay on this subject? Actually in the Hellenic Journal, where there is a paper not only very instructive but very interesting on the well-known tract "On the Sublime," which dates from the purist Renaissance in the days of Augustus. The author, who is apparently a literary amateur, tells us his ideas concerning fine style, as opposed to poverty and vulgarity on the one side, artificiality and bombast on the other. Mr. Rhys Roberts has given an excellent analysis of this very sensible and "modern" piece of criticism, and only shows in one spot that he has not taken the lessons of Longinus adequately to heart. I do not think the off-hand judgment disparaging Bacchylides in comparison with Pindar will be justified by what I have read of the new papyrus. There seems to be, with great simplicity of structure and of metre, a rich vocabulary and a great deal of fine and moving pathos in these odes. But it is hard to judge æsthetically when impeded by the trouble of deciphering even an easy hand. There is no need, however, to anticipate the verdict of scholars which will be let loose upon the world almost immediately. But I return to the interesting passage thus translated in the Hellenic Journal:—"The legislator of the Jews, no ordinary man, having formed and expressed a worthy conception of the might of the Godhead, writes at the very beginning of his Book of Laws:—'And God said'—what? Let light be, and it was; let earth be, and it was." What a strange bathos in expression! And has Mr. Roberts never appreciated our Authorised Version? Longinus is quoting loosely from some version (not the LXX.) read out to him by some Jewish friend. But surely the A. V. is just as accurate—"Let there be light, and there was light. Let the dry land appear, and it was so." At all events, this was English.

I suppose it is only in so very simple an instance that we can reproduce sublimity in a translation. And how many of us can really understand the beauties of any language but our own? When I see criticisms on French and German masterpieces written by men who are unable either to speak or write these languages, it reminds me of the foreign criticisms on Burns by people who can read English, but who only know the dialect of Burns, as I do, through a glossary. And what knowledge of a dialect can we gain through a glossary, or even through a dictionary? How can we learn the clusters of associations, the delicate shades of feeling which cling about words familiar to the poet from childhood and which determine both the beauty and propriety of their use? So then, to the great body of English-speaking people, Burns, as a great poet, is inaccessible. How much more to foreigners? And for the same reason Goethe's "Faust," or the lyrics of V. Hugo, are by us only very imperfectly understood. Of course, the same may be said of our appreciation of Sophocles and Virgil, who would laugh their sides sore at our Babu verses in their language. But then in dead languages no better knowledge is now to be had. In the living we should perhaps be content with native judgments. I have even heard it said by a great linguist that no man really knows more than one language—and most men not even that. But what a blow to all our critical literature and our fancied appreciation of the great masterpieces of many languages! These considerations are so humiliating that I feel disposed to apologise for bringing them forward.

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

"The Mikado"

(March 28, 1885.)

"THE MIKADO," at the Savoy Theatre, is, let us say to begin with, a frank success. Among the works of Gilbert and Sullivan it will rank next after "Patience," and "Patience" is already classed among nearly immortal things. Indeed, almost the only objection we can make to the "Mikado" is, that it is not absolutely fresh, though it is absolutely tuneful and merry. Somehow the music reminds us pretty often of "Patience," while the sentiment of the libretto reminds us—well, not so much of "Patience" as of Mr. Gilbert. The personages of the drama, of course, are Japanese, and their action is thus happily freed from the fetters which restrain us in our western civilisation—from the "custom which binds us all." A Japanese damsel may, with utmost merriment, receive affectionate attention from a gentleman who is doomed to be beheaded in a month, but whose philosophy, meanwhile, is of the Epicurean order, while a second gentleman looks on furnished with the pleasing knowledge that the lady is destined for him when the first gentleman's month is over. Thus it is that they settle matters quite amicably in the Japan of Mr. Gilbert. And in the Japan of Mr. Gilbert—as in Mr. Gilbert's England for the matter of that—a spirit of mockery is abroad. The love that those feel who are no longer beautiful and young is a subject of ridicule. The promptings of integrity are an ingenious pretence—everybody has his price—but it is natural that a Lord Chancellor's price should be a more substantial one than that of a police-court solicitor.

The most important person, however, in Mr. Gilbert's Japanese realm, is the Lord High Executioner, who objects to the suicide of the miserable only as an undue interference with his vested interests—an undue curtailment of his prerogatives. This important State functionary is played by Mr. George Grossmith in his driest fashion, and he sings a song indicating how many are the leaders of politics and society who, if capital punishment befell them, "never would be missed." He capers here and there on the stage, full of that cheerful assurance, and practically he amends the famous saying that il n'y a pas d'homme nécessaire by holding that there is but one homme nécessaire—the public executioner. Entertaining as Mr. Grossmith is, however, in the utterance of his naïve brutalities, he is, in the present piece, less absolutely àpropos—less certainly Japanese—than Mr. Rutland Barrington, who has been either to Yokohama or to Knightsbridge to excellent purpose. His eyebrows are painted in so completely at the proper angle that they deserve the traditional "sonnet"—if eyebrows in Japan ever win a sonnet. His highly intelligent and—dare we say it?—wicked little eyes are very telling, and so is his smooth face and his placidity of demeanour. And he pads about the stage with the half-feminine courtesy and softness which belong to the cultivated male in the Land of the Rising Sun. So Mr. Barrington acts his part well, and he sings charmingly. His part, we should say, is that of every public functionary except the Lord High Executioner; and as Secretary of State he advises that which as Chancellor of the Exchequer he could not even listen to, and as Paymaster-General he cooks the accounts in a manner which as Archbishop of Titipu it becomes his duty to denounce. Mr. Durward Lely plays Nanki-poo, the son of the Mikado. He sings tastefully enough the first part of his long first song—the sentimental portion—but has not volume or energy enough for the change into the patriotic.

The ladies are four in number, over and above the most quaintly attired chorus now in London. These are, first, Yum-yum, who is to marry Mr. Lely first and afterwards Mr. Grossmith; then her two friends, "two little maids, in attendance come"; and, lastly, Katisha, an elderly lady in love with Nanki-poo—a lady whose features are not exquisite, but who has a left shoulder-blade that is a miracle of loveliness. "People come miles to see it. My right elbow has a fascination which few can resist. It is on view Tuesdays and Fridays, on presentation of visiting card." Of these four characters, the two that are the most important are Katisha and Yum-yum. Miss Rosina Brandram plays the elderly Katisha, and in her serious passages—for much is serious in Katisha—uses a fine voice sympathetically. Miss Leonora Braham is Yum-yum. She and the other "little maids" besides are admirably vivacious. They are more Japanese than the Japanese. Their sudden, angular picturesqueness outvies that of the screen, and their ready cheerfulness that of the tea-house. Yes, as we said to begin with, "The Mikado" is a frank success. It is great nonsense, no doubt; but then it is the very funniest fooling to be seen. And so pretty, too!

(July 29, 1899.)

THE vigilance of our readers is unfailing. Last week we quoted the following announcement of a country clergyman in his parish magazine: "The ancient oak chest belonging to the parish has been restored and placed in the schoolroom. It is over two hundred years old. If any parishioners have books or articles of public interest which they would like to give to the parish, and hand down to posterity, they will be welcomed by the rector and churchwardens, and deposited in the chest." And now comes a card from a novelist, asking pertinently, we must admit, "What have the parishioners done to be deposited in a chest two hundred years old?"

Published by the Proprietor at Cannon House, Breams Buildings, London, E.C. Office for Advertisements, 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C. Printed by BONNER & Co., The Chancery Lane Press, Rolls Passage, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

CONTENTS

	PAGE
Notes of the Week... ...	131
St. Gabriel	132
The Lost Sir Massingham	132
The Thrill of a Tarpon ...	133
Reviews:
Churton Collins	134
An Alien Muse	136
Among the Rougon-Macquarts	137
William Sharp Himself	138
A Magnificent Ruin ...	139
Shorter Reviews	139
Fiction	141
The Theatre:
"Autumn Manœuvres" at the Adelphi Theatre	142
The Day of Short Plays	142
Some Irish Types	143
The Psychology of Error...	144
University Extension ...	145
Foreign Reviews	146
The Celluloid Danger ...	148
At St. Stephen's Shrine	149
Indian Reviews	151
Grammar for Futurists ...	152
Art: Whistler and Legros at the Tate Gallery	152
Notes and News	153
Imperial and Foreign Affairs	154
Motoring	155
In the Temple of Mammon	156
Correspondence	157
Books Received	159

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C., where all communications to the Editor should be addressed.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Notes of the Week

THE judgment of the Wreck Commission, presided over by Lord Mersey, which has been inquiring into the loss of the Titanic on April 15 last, confirms the opinion which many people will already have formed. The principal finding of the court was that the craze for speed is at the root of the mischief. The blame, as we understand it, does not rest wholly on the company, but to a considerable extent upon the travelling public—especially the American portion of it—who demand speed at all costs. Had the Titanic slackened down or altered her course, having been advised of the ice ahead, the disaster would not have happened. If one steamship company would refuse to guarantee that its boats shall keep time like an express train, and would reserve discretion to alter routes when deemed advisable, others would soon follow, and people would travel by the line which promised safety rather than speed. Upon the other findings of the inquiry we need not comment; the above is the most important, and we trust that the lesson to be drawn from it will not be lost.

"We told you so" is not the most admired method of converse. We have taken occasion, however, both in articles in this journal and on the platform, to warn the dupes of the agitators that the strike—after the fiasco in the coal trade—was an obsolete weapon, so far as any advantage for themselves could be derived therefrom. The end of the dock strike is a ludicrous confirmation of the opinion we expressed. "We have been sold!" exclaim the men, who are ordered back to their work without any advantage gained, after weeks of strife and often destitution. They will always be sold, until they cease to listen to self-interested demagogues, whether in the Cabinet, in Parliament, or on Tower Hill. It is almost a truism, but it seems that it must be frequently repeated, that these people are playing entirely for their own hands, and merely use what they believe is the ignorance and credulity of the masses to gain their own ends. Labour disputes must be dealt with on other and scientific lines, which will ensure general advantage and needs being carefully sifted, and right will then be done according to the actual position and prospects of trades and industries, which alike need the capitalist and provide sustenance for the employed.

According to news received to-day, rioting at the docks has resulted in the death of one man and injury of serious description to many others. Between forty and fifty revolver shots are said to have been fired. In the old days of Panama, before the United States established law and order, these pastimes were habitually indulged in, but now they are unknown. There is not, so far as we know, any South American Republic which would welcome Mr. McKenna as a Minister. In May last we wrote, "Why not shoot?" The question was not intended to be a direction to the ruffians who are Mr. Tillett's intimates, but to soldiers whose duty it is to shoot such scum. We applaud the action of free labourers in defending themselves in every manner which is open to them, since they live in a country without a Government. It is true, of course, that in loyal Ulster the Government are employing troops to quell disorder, but it is apparently hopeless to expect them to take similar measures against the revolutionary blackguards who meet on Tower Hill and at the docks.

It has been said that the seasons are gradually changing, and perhaps the silly season is changing in sympathy. Before July was ended, somebody saw one of the sea-serpents that are such familiar objects on the English coast towards the middle of August, and already someone else has written to the Press rebuking the scoffers—"only frivolous people," says this correspondent, "make fun of the sea-serpent theory." And then he spoils his own admirable solemnity by suggesting that this particular ophidian might have been "a harmless submarine scouting on the surface before diving for its prey!" We await now the story of the gooseberry twelve inches in circumference, the correspondence on "Are Good Manners Vanishing," and the other well-known signs that the London Season is over. Without these annual commentators what would the papers do?

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

St. Gabriel

YET once again the messenger of morning
  Wakes the imprisoned wonders of the clay,
And the cold Earth, Spring's altar-shrine adorning,
  Lifts up her lilies to the day.

And if no more among their stars descending
  The Angel of the Strength of God is seen,
Perchance his feet in darkness touched them, lending
  Light to their living green.

Before the swirl of unborn suns was limnéd
  First on the sunless purple of the sky,
The promise by angelic throngs was hymnéd
  Of Gabriel's embassy.

Though now his song of hope cleaves not asunder
  The aimless tumult surging everywhere,
The lilies of the garden hear, and wonder,
  And lift their hands in prayer.

DOROTHY MARGARET STUART.

The Lost Sir Massingham

MR. MASSINGHAM is the Garvin of the Radical Rump. Without him, Progressive Radicalism, which may be interpreted to mean larceny, would be in a parlous extremity. As Mr. Garvin is the self-appointed guardian of the Empire—and on many occasions an extremely able and eminently sane guardian—so Mr. Massingham is the mentor—and very often the very foolish mentor—of the Radical group, who strut about leaving cards on which is the National Liberal Club as the address of their choice. This unconsciously comic person has lately written:—

> Yet there comes a time when, if statesmen are to be saved from themselves, the critic must speak.

No doubt, when a crisis such as this is reached, an uncomfortable time has arrived for those who must perforce listen or read. An irate critic is apt to miss the essentials of criticism. Such a critic not infrequently strays from his appointed path, and, losing his way, is swallowed up in

> A gulf profound as that Serbonian bog
> Betwixt Damiata and Mount Cassius old,
> Where armies whole have sunk.

He emerges no longer a critic, but an oracle. So Mr. Massingham. Like other oracles, however, he speaks with more than one voice.

On July 15 Mr. Massingham's momentous message in connection with the modest naval proposals of the Government was:—

> Sooner or later he [the Prime Minister] will lose his Chancellor; and nine-tenths of the thinkers and fighters of Liberalism will follow the banner of the only executive statesman in Europe to whom the mass of the people look up as their champion and friend.

The picture is an awful one, but, having regard to recent bye-elections, we think the "thinkers and fighters" will manage to survive with tolerable serenity.

On July 29 the oracle had a further message, which suggests a suspicion that it has been discovered that Mr. Lloyd George is not the little-Navy man Mr. Massingham believes him to be. Mr. Lloyd George is therefore dethroned by the literary King-Maker, and—solventur risu tabulae—Mr. Ponsonby reigns in his stead.

Now Mr. Ponsonby is quite an interesting man. He is a descendant of Earl Grey, the Prime Minister; he was educated at Eton and Balliol; he has been in the diplomatic service; and he was responsible as private secretary for some of the late Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's performances as Prime Minister; he is a member of the National Liberal Club, and, so far as we can gather from "Who's Who," of no other club as a set-off; lastly, we suspect he is honoured with the friendship and certainly the confidence of Mr. Massingham.

No man who can lay claim to or who has achieved thus much can be expected to set bounds to his ambition.

Perhaps it is unjust to suggest that Mr. Ponsonby is ambitious as Cæsar was. As the author of the "Camel and the Needle's Eye," he may conceive that the greatness which his friend would thrust upon him is a little difficult of realisation. What exactly is the ambition of Mr. Massingham for the man of his choice?—

> Let him raise the banner of revolt. Thousands will gather round it. And, above all, let this party vote against the estimates.

Well, thousands will gather round any banner, whether it be the symbol of revolution, criminality, or mere foolishness. Therefore we do not deny that, if Mr. Massingham takes Mr. Ponsonby on his knee, the wire-pulled automaton will be sure of an audience. The show is to represent "an independent Radical party." In itself a monstrous parturition, owing its being, we think—in our charity—to "much muddled thinking and talking in our present-day politics and journalism." Mr. Massingham will approve the passage, because it is culled from his own literary gems, amongst which may also be noted the pretty simile anent statesmen who are like horses, and are therefore liable to madness at times.

It is a little disquieting to have the editor of the Nation's admission that he has been honoured with the acquaintance of some of these Ministers of unstable mind, because in a work just published, entitled "The First Signs of Insanity," there is a passage . . . but we do not pursue the line of argument.

Suffice it to say that Mr. Ponsonby's trifling task is to keep Ministers "well bitted and firmly driven along the path in which they ought to go."

Au revoir! Mr. Massingham. We hope to enjoy very much more of your delightful tiltings at the party which you honour with your patronage, and deluge with your advice.

CECIL COWPER

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Thrill of a Tarpon

By F. G. AFLALO.

THE low and steaming shores of the Gulf of Mexico on a perfect morning "im wunderschönen Monat Mai," with the sun beating down out of the brazen heavens on the dancing blue waters of the Pass. Out at sea a thunderstorm is circling, an inky blot in an otherwise cloudless sky. Inland, the fish-houses shimmer in the haze like museum models of Swiss lake-dwellings of the Stone Age. Heavy pelicans and vulturine turkey buzzards strut uncouthly over the shell-strewn beaches of the keys in search of such food as may please their easy palates. Quantity, not quality, is the delight of these scavenging fowl, and the turkey buzzards in particular will gobble anything that once had life, no matter how long it has been dead. The line of the long, low beach is broken only by a little white lighthouse that marks the narrow inlet from the Gulf, and the lonely lighthouse-keeper suddenly appears on the look-out platform. He sweeps the Pass with his glasses, and this is what he sees.

Midway between the low shores, eight fragile skiffs are moving slowly against and across the tide. Each little craft has two occupants—one at the oars, the other holding a short fishing-rod at an angle of sixty degrees over the stern. They are fishing for tarpon, one of the most coveted prizes of those who, in the past few years, have carried the precepts of Izaak Walton from drowsy backwaters of the Lea to the threshold of every ocean.

Of a sudden one of the fishermen throws himself backwards, almost into the arms of his guide; there is a commotion a hundred yards from his boat, and a curved something, gleaming molten silver in the sunshine, flings itself in the air, throwing off the coruscations of spray and falling back on the surface of the sea with a booming splash that distinctly reaches the keeper of the light. Forthwith the skiff detaches itself from the rest of the flotilla, amid shouts from the others, and heads slowly for the beach. The man at the oars is not, however, to have matters all his own way. Again and yet again that shining bar of silver shoots up in the air, and now the skiff is being towed back towards the fleet. Now it turns completely round, the result of the oarsman's efforts to keep the angler face to face with his redoubtable foe; and, with a fresh somersault every whit as high as those that have gone before, the great herring heads inexorably for the open Gulf. Then follows some manœuvring which for the moment puzzles the solitary watcher overhead. The boat is a mile away from him by now, and, unable to follow the struggle to his own satisfaction, he goes inside. The men in the skiff, however, have just seen the sinister black fins of a great shark gliding tandem over the oily surface in the wake of the plunging tarpon. The first impulse of a fisherman unaccustomed to the conditions of the three-cornered duel thus inaugurated would be to reel in with might and main, so as, if possible, to haul the precious tarpon out of his enemy's reach. By so doing, he would court defeat of his dearest object, since he would fail to make due allowance for an instinct of opposition common to tarpon and those who fish for them. In short, the tarpon, feeling the coercion in front, would forget all about the danger behind, and, resisting the fisherman, would fall straightway into the jaws of the shark.

Fortunately, on this occasion, the man behind the rod is no stranger to such complications. Instead, therefore, of further handicapping the tarpon by dividing its attention, he actually pulls line slowly off the reel, relying on the hook having taken firm hold in that adamantine mouth, so that the fish, its movements unhampered by the rod, may give all its speed and strategy to evading the terrible apparition looming in its track. These tactics answer admirably, and the tarpon, forgetting for the moment that it is still anchored to the boat, actually swims towards it. Instead of the fisherman reeling in line, as he would do under happier circumstances, the guide, who knows every move in the game, pulls slowly and unobtrusively for the beach, and to such good purpose that in a few minutes the skiff, tarpon, and shark are all in shallow water. Suddenly realising the fact, the shark, an arrant coward like all its tribe, half relinquishes the pursuit, and contents itself with cruising threateningly to and fro, its sinuous movements betrayed by the tell-tale triangular fins that cut the water. A quarter of an hour's twisting and turning to avoid the sudden rushes of its natural enemy has not, however, been without effect on the tarpon's strength, and even as the guide jumps, gaff in hand, out of the skiff and pulls it up the gently sloping beach, the fish allows the angler to reel it to within twenty feet of him and rolls wearily on its side. Yet the fight, which has already lasted over half an hour, is not quite won and lost, for the sight of the white sand, which spells defeat, makes the tarpon forget that other peril lying out in the deeper water. It makes a gallant rally, and even throws itself once more clear of the water, shaking its blood-red gills in a last desperate effort to rid itself of the hook. Then the end comes. Quickly it is reeled back to the shallows, and, after two or three failures to gaff its slippery body, the guide hauls it ashore, six feet and some inches of burnished, quivering silver, and the great tail beats a despairing tattoo on the hard sand.

It is not without a dash of sadness in his cup of joy that the fisherman, gladly laying down his rod and relaxing his tired muscles, looks down on the fallen foe, beautiful in the iridescence of death, and realises, like Wellington at Waterloo, that there is bitterness in victory as well as in defeat. He could wish that the gallant fish, which taxed his skill and strength in a way to win any sportsman's heart, might have been spared to live and fight another day, and he hopes that more merciful counsels may yet prevail, so that every tarpon,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

so beautiful in life, so useless after death, may be released after owning honourable defeat. On such an understanding, the cruel gaff might be dispensed with and each fish reeled close to the boat. Were it played absolutely to a finish (as all fish must need be if the angler has neither gaff nor net), it should even be possible to appraise its weight with sufficient accuracy to check the angling imagination, since it has been found that the length in feet cubed and divided by two gives the weight in pounds. Not every fish in the ocean could be treated by so simple a formula for evolving weights from measures, but the tarpon in normal condition is so symmetrical that the result is correct to a pound or two, a sufficient approximation in the case of individuals that may exceed a hundredweight.

All this the lighthouse-keeper might have seen had he waited for the end, but the spectacle, of daily recurrence throughout May, was too familiar to keep him standing in the sun. What he could not have seen was the wondrous thrill of a first tarpon, the exhilaration, momentarily numbing like a galvanic shock, that goes tingling up the right arm and puts the man on his mettle against the fiercest fish he ever fought with rod and line. After a few tarpon have been landed, familiarity breeds, if not perhaps contempt, at any rate a calmer bearing and more confident response; but the rush of the first tarpon is an unforgettable sensation. It seems incredible that the faint nibble, no more than that of a pond roach mouthing a morsel of paste, should be followed by such tremendous work on the reel, such frenzied vaulting in the air, such lightning speed through the water. The newcomer is all unprepared, whatever he may have read on the subject, for a fish that one moment goes careering away through the underworld like a torpedo, and the next behaves like a rocket. He has to concentrate all his mind and body on fighting the giant, and, as he is so engrossed, an enormous whipray, tormented by sucking-fish, may hurl itself into the air close to his boat, falling back on the water with thunderous crash, or a loggerhead turtle may suddenly thrust its snakelike head above the surface. The Pass is full of such surprises.

Taken all round, tarpon fishing is the most perplexing, challenging, inspiring business in all the angler's experience of river, lake, or sea. A trout on gossamer gut may tax his finesse. A salmon on a Castleconnel rod may outmanœuvre him in heavy water. Here, however, is a fish that makes less of tackle that should hold a runaway horse than trout or salmon of the gear we catch them on. The effect is nothing short of staggering. Here is sport for men indeed—no kid-glove dallying with feeble creatures to excite the pity of gentle hearts, but a fight with a very worthy foe, the better, it may be, of the man by both pounds and inches. The one blemish on the sport is the killing of a creature that does no harm and that cannot be eaten. "The slothful man roasteth not that which he took in hunting." No one would wish his bitterest enemy to eat a tarpon. But the argument in favour of sparing the tarpon's life is simply unanswerable.

REVIEWS

Churton Collins

The Posthumous Essays of John Churton Collins. Edited by L. C. COLLINS. (J. M. Dent and Sons. 6s. net.)

THOSE who have any knowledge of the mass of material that Churton Collins left behind him will not need to be told that some such book as this was necessary. Primarily he was, of course, a lecturer; and the printed word can no more carry the spoken than the spoken can carry the balanced deliberation of the written. It is true that these lectures were not given from notes, extempore, but were written down in their completion; to a man accustomed to the demands of lecturing, however, that is a side issue. He devises his form of sentences for delivery; and consequently their construction is looser and their matter more tentative. That this is so no one who has done any lecturing will need to be told; but on reading through these various "essays" it is surprising to see how the fact is exemplified in them. They are not essays; they are lectures. They are a rearrangement of those lectures that Churton Collins delivered on his famous University Extension courses, and that were not re-cast by him during his lifetime for literary form.

This does not diminish their value: it only has reference to the form in which they appear. Their value is a matter of very much deeper concern. The literary remains of a man who read so widely and who enjoyed such a vogue in his day, in themselves command attention; and it is not merely a filial duty that Mr. L. C. Collins has served in seeking to find a more final form for some of the heavy mass of matter that his father left in exercise-book on exercise-book. Yet in the choice of his material Mr. Collins has not been as wise as he might have been. In the first place, it would have been common wisdom to have recognised Churton Collins' natural limitations; and to have avoided those lectures in which these limitations made themselves most pronounced. To that we shall return. At the moment we have more in mind those lectures that are manifestly out of date—if ever they were in date. The worst of these is the very one that Mr. Collins has selected to open this book. Many wrong things have been said from time to time, and many very wrong attitudes taken, with regard to the "Shakespearean Theatres"; but in the present essay nearly all the faults and all the errors seem to have combined together to make a picture that is not only erroneous, but even ridiculously erroneous. Some of the pages contain more mistakes than we could have thought conveniently packed together in the space. For example, it is true that at one time it was held that the balcony in the Elizabethan manner of playhouse contained all inset scenes, such as the play within a play in "Hamlet"; but this idea has long since been discountenanced. The whole conception of the inner stage, which may be taken as the pivot on which Elizabethan stagecraft was swung, is entirely neglected.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

This is perhaps only a question of the post-dating of old ideas, although a careful examination of the sources, such as Churton Collins was well fitted to give, would have revealed the true position of affairs; but when he goes on positively to state that "it was for the audiences of the private theatres of the Black Friars that Shakespeare wrote," one can but wonder what he had in mind. We know that in the closing years of Shakespeare's life there was a revival of Shakespeare's plays at the Blackfriars, but that they were written for the Globe, and first acted at the Globe, is not only a simple historical fact, but is even obvious by some of the implications in the text. Such things may be forgiven, however (although their revival in book form at this time of day is not to be so easily forgiven); but when we are taken in a fanciful trip to the Globe, and the scene during one of the plays is described to us, one is inclined to be a little indignant. It is not a question of scholarship; it is a simple matter of common sense: is it conceivable that the terrific sequence of Shakespeare's tragedies could have been written for, or appreciated by, an audience such as Churton Collins describes? It is pure burlesque. One has only to hear the giggling, trivial audience that nowadays attends drama that intends nobly, to appreciate the true stature of an Elizabethan audience, to realise how far from the truth Churton Collins was in his essay.

It is an indication of the special quality of Churton Collins' mind when one realises that the best essays in this book are on such men as Dr. Johnson and Edmund Burke. His was the scholar's outlook, with more than a little of the pedantry and blindness to live issues that one has hitherto come to associate with that type of thinker. He often wrote, as it is the function of the literary critic to write, on poetry; but it is very doubtful if he knew what poetry was. It was part of the province of literature, and that province was his field of work: that was all. There are many indications of this strewn throughout the book. In his essay on Matthew Arnold, for example, it is almost comical to read of the "essay on Shelley, in which surely justice is not done in very important respects to Shelley's genius and work." When one realises that in that particular essay on Shelley, Matthew Arnold revealed an attitude of his mind that has done more than anything else to shatter his reputation as a critic of poetry, one sees how almost humorous that sentence is. Indeed, he has done more than that. He has shown us that criticism, as such, is an impertinence in poetry. If a poet be appreciated, criticism is superfluous: and if he be not appreciated, it is even more completely superfluous. Churton Collins rightly gauged the possibilities of Matthew Arnold in saying: "Virgil he can measure and understand, but not Pindar; Sophocles, but not Æschylus; Cowper, but not Milton"; though he might have gone on to add Gray, but not Wordsworth; Byron, but certainly not Shelley. Yet in that very criticism he not inaccurately measured the quality and faculty of his own mind. In neither one nor the other critic is there anything of the "tendentemque manus rapae ulterioris amore" that is the especial quality of the truest poetry, or appreciator of poetry. Indeed, while Arnold was conscious of it, and distrustful and cynical towards it, Churton Collins, in his careful, scholarly, matter-of-fact way, was blissfully unconscious of it.

This naturally mars his work in many ways. It is rather in the subsidiary patient work that one realises Churton Collins' true strength. For instance, it is possible for one to say that Wordsworth's vision cannot be seen otherwise than in Wordsworth's own poetry; that the poet sang it so because it could not otherwise be told. And it is certainly desirable that it should be recognised that no possible kind of writing on a poet can convey what he has seen, or what is to be discovered in his work. Yet if it is necessary that such writing should be done, then the essay, "Wordsworth as a Teacher," is as careful and comprehensive a piece of work as can be desired. There is more of the true Wordsworth to be discovered in it than may be found in, for example, Matthew Arnold or Walter Pater. It takes more account (or one might even say it takes account) of the mystical prophet and seer in Wordsworth, who saw the Earth flaming with being. As is the scholar's way, Churton Collins is too apt to date back the live tendencies of Wordsworth's mind to sundry Greek philosophies that probably bothered him little. This is a thing that one gets accustomed to in English thinking and writing, and makes allowance for. Men of moment may possibly be inspired by others' thinking, but they do not derive from it. Yet if one reads for "Stoicism" a certain upright integrity of mind and high heroic resolve, it is possible to think a good deal more clearly of Wordsworth as a result of the essay.

As we have said, however, the best pieces of work in the book deal with the men of lesser inspiration. The essay on "Samuel Johnson" is a very interesting and entertaining piece of work, while that on Edmund Burke is one of the best short essays on the subject we have seen. It hits off very effectively a picture of the man and the age he moved in. And if in "Emerson" the lecturer frankly professes himself puzzled in the attempt to convey an orderly account of his philosophy it will be admitted that in that he is not the only one of Emerson's readers who has faced the difficulty. "Browning and Butler" is another of those unfortunate essays that the present editor would have been better advised had he omitted. To quote from Browning and Butler in a series of parallel passages seems to us one of the most hopeless of possible proceedings. A parallel like that means nothing, of course. In fact, in none of the three essays on Browning does Churton Collins appear to advantage. Such a book as this was almost necessary; but we think Mr. Collins has been not altogether happy in his editing. Some of the essays, too, seem to have been re-cast and altered from their original form as lectures.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

An Alien Muse

Défense de la Poésie Française à l'Usage des Lecteurs Anglais. By EMILE LEGOUIS. (Constable and Co. 5s. net.)
Du Rythme en Français. By ROBERT DE SOUZA. (H. Welter, Paris. 3 fr. 50.)
Omar Kheyyám, traduit en Vers Français d'après la Célèbre Version Anglais de Fitzgerald. By J. H. HALLARD, M.A. (Rivingtons. 2s. 6d. net.)

"JE sais (trop bien, hélas!) que tout étranger, qui se mêle d'écrire des vers français, court bien des risques." So writes Mr. Hallard at the beginning of his heroic attempt. In a different spirit Landor, in one of his "Imaginary Conversations," quoted by M. Legouis, proclaims, "I would not creep into the secrets of your versification." French verse is undoubtedly a difficult subject, especially for foreigners, though we have abundant evidence, in the brochure of M. de Souza, for instance, that it does not lack its thorns and controversies for the native investigator.

M. Legouis' apology for French poetry is a most delightful piece of pleading. It presents an extraordinary combination of ability and modesty. Having disarmed criticism by the frankness and courtesy of his admissions, and by his preparedness for all the usual and many unusual objections, the author assumes the offensive with the well-tempered weapons of humour, analogy, and learning, and forces us to confess that if we still cherish a feeling that the appeal of French poetry is not as universal as that of some nations, we should at least revise the grounds on which we base that opinion. We have ourselves, not without a certain pride of authorship, ventured on the pronouncement, "We go to France for prose, to Germany for poetry"; it is with a pang of disillusionment, therefore, that we find it roasting, textually, along with other similar "chestnuts," before the fire of M. Legouis' wit.

The eminent professor of English at the Sorbonne has established a great many things. He has reminded us that English poetry owes an enormous debt to France; that "l'accident Shakespeare" and a "règlement de police" were the deciding causes in the bifurcation of the two schools in the sixteenth century; that, at the very least, "there is a great deal to be said" for the French conception of tragedy in the seventeenth century; and that France has or has had during the present generation poets who can be read by men of any speech, poets such as Auguste Angellier, who is practically the only modern witness called, and by his amazing versatility and power gives the strongest support to his cause. M. Legouis is further concerned to prove that French poetry has been in England the victim of a conspiracy which, initiated by Dryden, has found in later times such spokesmen as Coleridge, de Quincey, Landor, and Matthew Arnold. With the last-named, as the representative of a scholarly, courteous, insidious, and, at times doubtless, perfidious, line of criticism, the debate becomes serious. The half-truth contained in the line,

> France, famed in all great arts, in none supreme, is most satisfactorily refuted by a reference to French architecture; the general proposition breaking down, the particular one, concerning French verse, is obviously in jeopardy. On another point the credit of this important witness is even more seriously shaken. Arnold, dealing with the thorny subject of comparative rhythm, has placed side by side the Shakespearean gem,

> Take, oh! take those lips away
> That so sweetly were foresworn, and some little-known alexandrines from a source unknown to M. Legouis. The latter uses his advantage to the full, and in a page or two of humorous criticism completely turns the tables.

If at times M. Legouis smells—pleasantly, it may be admitted—of the Salle des Pas Perdus—as, for instance, when he draws inferences from the respective predominance of the vowel and the consonant in such words as "oiseau" and "bird," "force" and "strength," or when he illustrates the advantages of a thrifty vocabulary, or when he turns Pope's metaphorical comparison of the snake and the alexandrine against the heroic verse itself—he has succeeded on the whole in giving us a view of the matter that is remarkable for its breadth and sanity. Some of his pronouncements deserve to be printed in gold: for example, "En réalité il n'y a pas de jugement porté du dehors sur la valeur esthétique d'une langue qui ait grande autorité." And he imagines the best kind of international criticism as a kind of dialogue on the model of part of the "Shepherd's Calendar," where Willye and Perigot shall chant alternately the praises of their respective mother-tongues, and the umpire shall have nothing to do but to divide the prize.

M. Legouis, we have said, skilfully demonstrates a great deal. We are not sure if he can ever persuade us that the full enjoyment of French verse will ever be an easy acquisition for the English reader, that it can be attained without much prayer and fasting. That is, we think, the whole point. We may feel that the dicta of Dryden and Arnold were unjust or impertinent, but we cannot but repeat with the latter:—

> What rendered vain their deep desire?
> A God, a god their sev'rance ruled!
> And bade between their shores to be
> The unplumbed, salt, estranging sea.

M. Legouis gives two principal reasons for the difficulty, apart from "l'accident Shakespeare"—the first is the classical tragedy, the second is the alexandrine verse. This latter, or rather the entire question of French versification, with the problem of the accent, is enough to account for the whole misunderstanding. In this connection we will abstain from any comment on Mr. Hallard's feat of arms, except to say that his translation of Fitzgerald's Omar is extraordinarily faithful, and should provide rusty Omarites with an agreeable method or excuse for "reviving old desires" and thrills.

M. de Souza is to some extent a revolutionary. He believes in a chastened "vers libre," as distinct from an "artificielle liberté," as the "pensée libre" of M. Paul Flat claims to be from "la libre pensée." But the freedom of M. de Souza is not to be won with a caress; it is to be attained only with tears and mortification.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Its champion seems at times almost a sinister personage; his clarion-call, "Be free," and his word of warning, "Be worthy of your freedom," strike such diverse notes, that we feel before him as before La Fontaine's hero, who Souffle le chaud et le froid.

We may console ourselves by remembering that M. de Souza is not only a critic, but also a poet of acknowledged merit, and that his severities are due less to a desire to make a technique seem difficult than to a deep sense of the loftiness of his divinity. He believes that the revolution he advocates will before long win a glorious victory. The scene that greeted the first performance of "Hernani" is to be repeated, when the enlightened lips of some great actor will tell the truth about rhythm to the enlightened ears of a converted audience. Meantime the proselytes are to be strengthened in their faith by the evidence of comparative phonetics. The system and apparatus of the Abbé Rousselot, it would seem, contain the answer to the whole metrical question. Every sound and every nuance is capable of the most complete analysis. The results may not always be the same—M. Landry, for instance, in his recent work on French rhythm, reached very different conclusions—but to men of goodwill the path is one and plain. Poetry is to eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, and to know her own good and evil.

Briefly, the postulates of M. de Souza are these:—There is a real accent in French poetry—not quite like the Anglo-German accent, which, according to M. Legouis, is a "tatonage," painful to acquire, and impossible to get rid of—but still an accent. It is composed of length and intensity, which have been inseparable in French since the days of Cæsar's soldiers: there is a metrical, as opposed to a grammatical, word, in prose as well as in poetry: in poetry, words and syllables have no existence—nothing exists but the line, the verse: in the verse the vowels alone count: and, finally, there is only one judge to whom appeal can be made—the ear.

Life is short; Art is immeasurably long, but every excursion in her domain is profitable. In the realms of Art no region bears more unmistakably the impress of her gracious sovereignty than that of French poetry; and of those who are privileged to wander therein.

Heureux qui, comme Ulysse, a fait un beau voyage.

Among the Rougon-Macquarts

A Zola Dictionary: The Characters of the Rougon-Macquart Novels of Emile Zola. With a Biographical and Critical Introduction, etc. By J. G. PATTERSON. (G. Routledge and Sons. 8s. 6d. net.)

ON Michaelmas Day ten years will have elapsed since the death of Emile Zola, and it is incontestable that the sale of his works has declined during the period in question. No better proof of this could be found than in the figures which Mr. Patterson gives in his note on the editions of the Rougon-Macquart series. By comparing these figures with those which appeared in Vizetelly's life of Zola issued in 1904, it will be seen that the number of copies of these books sold during the interval has been far from large. It may be pointed out, however, that a similar fate overtook the writings of Balzac during the twenty years which followed his death in 1850. Later there came a Balzac revival, and it is, of course, possible that there may also be a Zola revival.

Meantime, Zola's writings are at least of interest to the student of literature, as, for good or ill, their influence on fiction-writing has undoubtedly been far-reaching. It follows that Mr. Patterson's compilation may have its utility, though we could certainly have wished for a work of greater scope, that is one embracing all Zola's novels, whereas Mr. Patterson's volume is strictly limited to the well-known Rougon-Macquart series. In 1901, a year before Zola died, M. F. C. Ramond produced a compilation entitled "Les Personnages des Rougon-Macquart," which is familiar to all Zolaists, and which covers precisely the same ground as that which Mr. Patterson has been exploring. True, one work is in French and the other in English; but to what real student of literature can the latter appeal when the former is at his service? A knowledge of the French language is becoming widespread in this country, and every publishing house is aware that only a very small market is now left for English translations of French authors

Mr. Patterson certainly supplies a biographical introduction, together with synopses of the plots of the Rougon-Macquart novels—features which are not included in M. Ramond's work—but in other respects his volume is the inferior one. Once or twice we have found him giving a brief entry which is not in M. Ramond's book, but again and again the entries in the latter are far more informing and complete. Mr. Patterson must assuredly be acquainted with his forerunner's work, for although he does not mention it with others in his prefatory note, we have more than once found him using virtually the same language respecting some particular character. Let us take an instance at random. This is what Mr. Patterson says of Worms, who figures in "La Curée":—

> A famous costumier, before whom the ladies of the second Empire bowed the knee. Renée Saccard was one of his customers, and when she died owed him an account of two hundred and fifty-seven thousand francs (£10,280 stg.).

Here, on the other hand, is what we find in M. Ramond's book:—

> Worms.—Illustre tailleur, devant qui les reines du second Empire se mettent à genoux. Il les habille avec l'inspiration et le recueillement d'un artiste génial. Renée Saccard est une de ses clientes, et laisse chez lui, en mourant, une dette de deux cent cinquante sept mille francs.

Thus Mr. Patterson's two sentences are virtually iden-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

tical with M. Ramond's first and third; and M. Ramond's account of the personage is the more informative, as his second sentence, omitted by Mr. Patterson, tersely describes Worms's gifts and disposition.

'We have not space for further comparisons, but the attention of those who may use Mr. Patterson's book must be directed to one very extraordinary instance of mistranslation. He says of La Mère Louis, a character in "L'Assommoir," that she was famous for her "hen feet." The statement greatly puzzled us, but on referring to Ramond we found that this woman was famous for her "pieds à la poulette"; and on opening "L'Assommoir" at page 336 we learnt that Coupeau proposed to take Bec Salé to Mother Louis to partake of some sheeps' trotters, for that is the meaning of "pieds à la poulette"—"poulette" sauce being compounded of butter and yolk of eggs, with pepper, salt, and a dash of vinegar. But, according to Mr. Patterson, Mother Louis had "hen feet"! Perhaps, when he perpetrated that remarkable blunder he was thinking, not of Zola, but of Anatole France and "La Reine Pédauque," otherwise Queen Goosefoot. In conclusion, we must say that while Messrs. Routledge may well be commended for their enterprise in issuing a series of dictionaries to famous authors, this particular volume is by no means so impeccable as those previously allotted to Dickens, Thackeray, Scott, and others.

William Sharp Himself

Poems by William Sharp.
Studies and Appreciations by William Sharp. Selected and Arranged by Mrs. WILLIAM SHARP. (Wm. Heinemann. 5s. net each.)

MESSRS. HEINEMANN are rounding off their handsome collected edition of the works of "Fiona Macleod" with the works of William Sharp. That the latter should be issued as supplementary to the former is in itself significant. Few to-day will judge otherwise than that Sharp won for himself an honourable niche in the literary Pantheon; that niche may prove to be a little obscure, set in a somewhat select corner where only the chosen worshippers may foregather, but he is likely to hold it secure from usurpation. Most will be agreed, however, that the face in the niche will be the face of "Fiona Macleod." This, indeed, would appear to have been William Sharp's own judgment, at least thus far, that he recognised his "Fiona" work as the expression of his most secret self and the fruit of his choicest moods. It was for this function that he, so to speak, donned his priestly robes and with confidence invoked the divinus afflatus.

There are some good poems in this new volume. Take, for instance, the one entitled "Motherhood," or that very successful ballad, "The Weird of Michael Scott." The "Sospiri di Roma" struck a new note, and some of the numbers in this sequence have a wonderfully elusive atmospheric quality. But for the most part the muse of William Sharpe is pedestrian, where the muse of "Fiona Macleod" winged the strange ether. This may help to explain why the best things in this book are the sonnets, a form in which polish and careful craftsmanship count for quite as much as lyric spontaneity. But by far the greater portion is descriptive verse, turned with all that artistry of delicate colour and sweet sound which is distinctive of William Sharp in any rôle, but lacking the more characteristic Celtic glamour and bated mystery of the "Fiona" poems.

> Great moths came out, with myriad sharded wings
> Huge beetles droned, and other twilight things
> Hummed their dim lives away, and through the air
> The flittermice wheeled whistling: while the glare
> Of summer lightnings flashing furtively
> Blazed for a moment o'er the sleeping sea.

There are many pages similar to this, but nothing in the whole volume like "Fiona's" "The Secret Gate," or "Dreams Within Dreams," or "Dim Face of Beauty," or the eerie little poem:—

> I hear the little children of the wind
> Crying solitary in lonely places:
> I have not seen their faces,
> But I have seen the leaves eddying behind,
> The little tremulous leaves of the wind.

Not that we would imply a too fantastic idea of psychic difference, as it were. Now that we know the jealous secret of "Fiona," it seems easy to compare, discern similarities, and pick out parallels. Little personal idiosyncrasies may frequently be discovered in both volumes by the curious—as a fondness for the words "flittermice," "spire," "banneret," and the use of the phrase "the Hollow Land" for the spirit-world. It is noteworthy that the later "William Sharp" poems betray most affinity with those of "Fiona Macleod."

The new prose volume is by the nature of its contents removed from the delicate imaginative prose of "Fiona." At the same time it is a collection of considerable worth and interest. It includes, in addition to the valuable treatise on the Sonnet—for which many of us have treasured the little "Canterbury" sonnet-anthology—his critical preface to "The Songs and Sonnets of Shakespeare," and the paper introductory to the "English Odes," both issued in the same series. There are also essays on "Modern Italian Poets," "Sainte-Beuve," "Some Dramas of D'Annunzio," and other papers collected from the reviews. Mrs. Sharp tells us that her husband himself intended issuing these essays in volume form, and we are left somewhat sadly to imagine the introductory essay he had planned on "The Sevenfold Need in Literature," from the following suggestive outline, which is all that remains to us:—

I. Idea.
II. Technique.
III. Spontaneity of Impression,
Fidelity of Observation,
Sincerity in Expression.
IV. Judgment.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

V. Emotional Power :
(i.) Rhythm,
(ii.) Emotion.
VI. Invention. (i.) As Formative Energy ; (ii.) as Synthetic Vision.
VII. The Achievement in Beauty.

It is a vain thing out of our plenty to mourn the books that have never been written, but we would give a good deal to have seen this fragment complete.

A Magnificent Ruin

The Fall of the Mogul Empire. By SIDNEY J. OWEN, M.A. (John Murray. 7s. 6d. net.)

INDIAN history may be written in several ways: by a complete statement of the facts, by analysing the causes in operation, or by some mixture of the two methods in varying proportions. Mr. Owen does not aim at what he calls regular history. His object is to bring out the salient features of the story of a limited period by indicating the causes which effected the dissolution of the Mogul Empire. As an expert in his subject, as a Professor in India, and Reader for an unusually long time at Oxford, he may be trusted for the accuracy of his narrative, which is derived almost entirely from contemporary and recognised authorities. The lectures which he has thus summarised covered rather more than a hundred years from the illness of the Emperor Shah Jehan in 1657 and his deposition, to the fatal battle of Panipat in 1761, when the Afghans broke the Mahratta power. The common view of historians is that the Emperor Aurangzib's (1658-1707) bigoted and anti-Hindu policy originated the decadence of the Mogul Empire, and that his degenerate successors contributed to its downfall. Mr. Owen's theory is that Aurangzib dealt it a mortal blow from which it could not recover, and that the Mahrattas under Sivaji and his followers completed its ruin. He shows so clearly the errors committed by Aurangzib and the development of the Mahrattas that it would be difficult to avoid concurrence with his views. Aurangzib's successors really never had a chance of retrieving their position. The Empire was too unwieldy in size, the central government was too weak, there were too many racial and religious elements of cleavage, and, apart from the Mahrattas, the foreign invasions of Nadir Shah the Persian, and Ahmad Shah Abdali the Afghan, further impaired the waning resources of the Empire.

The merit of Mr. Owen's book is that it is eminently readable, his extracts from native and other sources are to the point, and he avoids as far as possible the kaleidoscopic mixture of innumerable names which is fatal to all pleasure in the study of history, especially Indian. It would be easy to take exception to his transliteration of certain well-known Indian words which shows his want of acquaintance with their originals, and the eye is struck by the same word being spelt differently in different places. It is strange that he should end his work with the battle of Panipat, which brought to grief the Mahrattas who had contributed to the ruin of the Mogul Empire, though their discomfiture did not resuscitate the Empire, and that he should make so little allusion to the English who had asserted themselves in India long before 1761, working their way inland from the sea coast, by contact with the Native Powers. But he has said enough to support his main theory, and to present the history of an important century in a form which the general reader cannot only tolerate but will find attractive. His chronological table of chief events helps to prove Mr. Owen's mastery of his subject.

Shorter Reviews

Big Game Hunting in Central Africa. By J. DUNBAR-BRUNTON. Illustrated. (Andrew Melrose. 10s. 6d. net.)

EVEN the man with some years of experience of South Central Africa will find this a useful book, and probably, after studying its recommendations on the subject of health preservation, will be amazed at his own lack of elementary medical knowledge. The author is, first of all, a sportsman; he is incidentally a medical man as well. He has given here an immense amount of information regarding the habits of nearly every species of African big game, and from that point of view his work will prove a help to the intending hunter —and to the comparatively old hand as well, since additional knowledge is always useful. For the stay-at-homes, who get their big-game thrills from books rather than from actual experience, here is enough of exciting incident to satisfy the most exacting, and all bearing the stamp of reality—we feel that these things happened, for the author frankly relates stories against himself as well as those illustrative of his successes.

His familiarity with native dialects has enabled him to include a few legends and folk-lore stories told by his carriers round their camp-fires. The rabbit is the central figure in each story, save in that one in which the cat, seeking for the strongest of all protectors, comes at last to sit by the woman's fire. We should have liked to see more of these folk-tales, but, then, it is a hunter's book.

We cannot congratulate Captain Dunbar-Brunton on his choice of photographs, which, with two or three exceptions, do not adequately represent the text. Apart from this, and one or two other trifles, the book is a simple, straightforward record of experiences in the life of a good sportsman, who knows how to make his stories interesting.

The Oxford Country: Its Attractions and Associations Described by Several Authors. Collected and Arranged by R. T. GÜNTHER, Fellow of Magdalen College. Illustrated. (John Murray. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE character of this work is described by the above head-note. Several of the essays appeared so long ago as the middle of the last century, but in a work

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

dealing with the surroundings of a city where the lapse of centuries produces little change in men or manners that fact in no way diminishes their interest. The one-time alumnus of the Alma Mater will peruse with interest these descriptions of familiar haunts and jaunts, and by so doing will demonstrate once again that even the commonplace may become of importance if a sufficient number of people emphasise it sufficiently. It is curious and instructive to notice upon the very first page one of those charming old-world split infinitives —"to adequately record"—which are so seldom met with in the present-day world. The "humour" to be found in these pages is of the type illustrated upon page 313, where we find a pterosaur described as "an early Oxford flying machine," and upon the next page, where the reader is shocked to behold in graphic form the fate of the sacred Bagley Wood, whence the public has been rigorously excluded so long that "the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." Bagley Wood let in building plots! Ye fauns and dryads, what a fate! The book is plentifully illustrated with photos and plates.

Caught in the Chinese Revolution. A Record of Risks and Rescue. By ERNEST F. BORST-SMITH. Illustrated. (Fisher Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.)

IF the reader will forgive the author for a rather catch-penny title, and the publisher for a very crude cover, he will find much to entertain him in this profusely illustrated little volume. Mr. Borst-Smith writes in his preface: "I am deeply conscious of the many imperfections of this work, but find comfort in the fact that the interest of these pages lies in its story rather than its style; in the tale itself rather than in the telling." We think that the author, who is at all times most modest, has, on this occasion, done himself an injustice, for the subject of this book, which cannot fail to awaken considerable interest, has been treated most excellently. Our only adverse comment is that some of the photographs, especially those of babies, should have been relegated to the family album.

Mr. Borst-Smith gives a vivid account of the revolution in the province of Shensi. Though he admits that "the Manchu rule of the past three centuries has been little else than a story of oppression," he points out that this fact cannot possibly serve as an excuse for the fearful atrocities perpetrated by the revolutionary party, and more particularly by the "Elder Brother Society," for Mr. Borst-Smith is at some pains to discriminate between the two movements. The revolutionaries proper had every intention of protecting the foreigner, but their good intentions were too often overruled by irresponsible rioters. The aim of "Young China" was to wipe out the Manchus. The object of the rioters was personal gain, and no means were too foul to attain that end. Even those who have no particular interest in missionary enterprise cannot do otherwise than admire those men and women who figure in this volume, for their loyalty and heroism add a glory to human character that is happily quite distinct from creed and dogma. China's missionary work has been adversely criticised of late. We have heard of arduous and expensive labour giving a return so small that it can hardly be called a harvest. Whether this is so or not is quite apart from the purpose of this book. The thrilling story of the Shensi Relief Expedition, the story of those men who risked their lives to rescue the Shensi missionaries, reveals, without a doubt, fine, stirring, fellows—heroes all. It is to these men Mr. Borst-Smith has very appropriately dedicated this book that describes on the one hand the terrors of a mad, voracious mob, the slaughter of helpless women and children, and on the other hand the splendid strength of men who are prepared to lay down their lives for others.

Letters to Myself. By A WOMAN OF FORTY. (T. Werner Laurie. 5s. net.)

WHEN it is stated on the title-page of these epistles that they are dedicated to Miss Winifred James, the reader has a good idea of what may be expected from a perusal of the pages following. There is very little in any of the letters that one can either praise or blame. They are very sentimental and occasionally morbid. Like many of the recent outpourings of the female mind, they are very selfish and self-centred. The dread of grey hairs, fading charms, and a large number of dots help to fill the book. We suppose there always will be a certain number of people who will read their own feelings into and appreciate a book of this kind, just as there are people who imagine that they possess all the symptoms which are suggested in each line of a patent medicine advertisement. As long as there is a public devoted to this class of writing, there will always be those who will supply the demand, while the more healthy and optimistic are courting sunshine even when the sky is most lowering and forbidding.

In the Garden. By MARGARET CAMERON. Illustrated. (Blackie and Son. 6d.)
Rambles in the Park. By WM. J. CLAXTON. Illustrated. (Blackie and Son. 9d.)

THESE are the latest additions to Messrs. Blackie's admirable series for the young, "The Rambler Nature Books." The first is for pupils of nine to eleven years of age, and the second for those a year or so older. They are bound in green limp cloth, and are altogether remarkably well got up for the low price at which they are published, the coloured page plates being particularly good; the smaller black and white illustrations in the text leave nothing to be desired either. The booklets are brightly written, and contain a fund of nature lore so pleasantly imparted that they cannot fail to interest and instruct the young readers for whom they are intended. "The course of Nature is the art of God," and those who find pleasure in studying her ways are better and happier for doing so; hence we cordially recommend this series to parents and teachers.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Eugenics Review. (Vol. IV., No. 2. 1s. net.)

THE First International Eugenic Congress has just held its session, at which a number of interesting papers were read, provoking discussions not less interesting. Of these we hope to say a few words in a later issue. Meanwhile we feel we cannot do better in the cause of social regeneration than by calling attention to the quarterly review published by the Eugenics Education Society now before us. Many problems which have long puzzled the sociologist and economist are here discussed in an illuminating manner. In the essay upon "The Inheritance of Mental Characters" Mr. Cyril Burt presents a very strong case in favour of the doctrine of heredity as opposed to that of environmental modification. The journal also contains a number of excellent reviews of treatises bearing upon topics closely concerning the study of eugenics.

Fiction

The Chief Commissioner. By HILDA M. SWABEY. Evenden. 2s.)

THIS story concerns one Henderson, who, after marriage, found his wife so far beneath him in things intellectual that he left her and went to take up a post in the Indian Civil Service. This resulted in the chief commissionership, and here the book begins, leaving us to find out Henderson's earlier history as we go along. The unexpected arrival of Dora, the eldest daughter of the ill-assorted pair, rouses in Henderson an active animosity against his wife for sending the girl out, for he has practically forgotten his children as well as his wife in his ambitious projects. We see him as a dour, hard, upright, narrow-minded, bad-tempered Scot, and in Dora his temperament is partially reproduced, plus feminine intuition, but minus sexual impulses and a certain strength of character. In the ensuing contest between father and daughter, which gives scope for the display of a certain amount of quiet humour on the author's part, Dora succeeds in conquering her father's aversion, and leaves him a slightly better man than she found him.

This is practically all the story, and so slightly is it told that the three hundred odd pages seem rather a waste in the development of the plot. Yet the book contains some clever character-drawing; Henderson's warped temperament is well realised, and Dora, a singularly unlovable heroine, is quite convincing. Though a somewhat level monotony characterises the story, it is a high level, and the work is interesting throughout.

The Hidden Fear. By JAMES BLYTH. (F. V. White and Co. 6s.)

IN "The Hidden Fear" Mr. Blyth has given us a very fine novel indeed. The story is based on the theory of a dear old professor who will have it that all cases of insanity are hereditary, and who spent twelve years of his life endeavouring to prove that a man who was rendered insane by the fracture of his skull, consequent of a fall from his horse, is really the possessor of a certain specific micro-organism. It is not until a second accident occurs to the patient in exactly the same spot as the previous injury, which was cured by an operation that the old doctor will allow his pet theory to give way to the views of an eminent German specialist, who for the second time proves that the patient only requires surgical treatment in order to restore him to his normal condition. Winnie and Trixie, the daughters of the unfortunate man, are two very real and well-drawn characters. Winnie especially is a type of woman very seldom encountered in the pages of modern fiction. While loving passionately and devotedly Sir Richard Covehithe, who returns her affection, she has sufficient self-restraint and respect to claim him only as a friend until such time as the supposed ban of hereditary insanity is removed and she can honestly be his wife. The portrayal of Lady Whitestone, who, as her grandson Cyril says, is not "Victorian, but absolutely antediluvian," in her attitude to all the families who she considers are socially her inferiors, is delicious, and we only wish that Mr. Blyth had devoted a chapter to a meeting between the old county dame and the wife of the prosperous manufacturer who tried so hard to enter the ancestral mansion and at last succeeded in manœuvring an invitation from Cyril, who is only too glad to escape from the bonds of class seclusion. There are many other characters, particularly among the women, who make the book well worth reading, and we are certain that, while Mr. Blyth writes up to the standard of the present volume, his public will in no ways diminish.

The Vicar's Secret. By C. E. JEFFERY. (Murray and Evenden. 2s.

WHILE little or no sympathy can be extended to the insufferable cad who figures as the Rev. Hanbury-Greene in the pages of "The Vicar's Secret," we think that it would be advisable for the author to gain a more detailed knowledge of matters connected with the Church before he again attempts to depict one of her ministers. A priest does not usually regard a stole as a "useless" article, nor does a rector, however, "ritualistic," "entertain" penitents in his study, and we have yet to meet a preacher of the Gospel to whom a "belief in the supernatural was as a red rag to a bull." For the rest, we can only conclude that the author has at some time or another read "The Silence of Dean Maitland," and endeavoured to write a romance in a similar vein. The present book, however, has none of the force of the earlier work, and is much hampered by inelegant English and the frequent use of French expressions in places where the English equivalents would read very much better.

Lady Dorothy's Indiscretion. By ARTHUR APPLIN. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)

WE suppose that when novels from the pen of an author follow one another in such quick succession it is too much to expect that very great care can be extended on the production of each one. Lady Dorothy is a bright and light-hearted girl, with just a touch of daring in her composition. One day she comes across an airman overhauling his machine on a moor, where he has just alighted. Thirsting for adventure, nothing would suffice but that she must accompany him on his voyage, and in spite of many protestations on his part she has her way. The machine becomes unmanageable, and they alight, late at night, many miles from Lady Dorothy's home. From this point endless complications follow one another in quick succession, and Lady Dorothy, who is blackmailed by more than one despicable wretch, changes from a gay and winsome maiden into a worried and careworn woman. She, her lover, and his mother are the only three characters in the book who are worth a passing thought. The rest are mean and contemptible people, and are useful only to show up more clearly the better natures of those we have mentioned. All is well in the end, although we cannot say that we have very greatly enjoyed the lengthy working out of the various intricate situations.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Modernismus: Ein Weltraum-Roman. By O. SCHULTZKY. (A. Stein, Potsdam. 3 Marks.)

THIS is a strange book. It is a kind of romance, divided into two main parts, "Der Grossdenker" and "Leta eine Gottessidee," each of which is symmetrically divided into six sections, while each section again is made up of a triplet of knotty chapters. It is based on the newest psychological-evolutionary theories, tinctured with reminiscences of the second part of "Faust." The fourth dimension plays a certain part, and the curious conception of a "Weltraumstadt." It is all very suggestive, if not convincing. Psychical evolution is by now almost a truism, but the absolute conception of a superman has begun to lose some of its arrogant definiteness. Herr Schultzky's antagonism to "orthodoxy" amounts to an obsession, and makes us feel that, in spite of the universal character attributed to his hero's researches, his psychology is not very deep. Heterodoxy is the largest thing in the world; but it has a hundred heads: orthodoxy is an easier quarry for a moderate marksman.

The Theatre

"Autumn Manœuvres" at the Adelphi Theatre

A PLAY with music is the pleasant description which Mr. Henry Hamilton gives to his adaptation of the well-known German mélange of folly, love, fun, intrigue, and melody, but it might also be especially called a farce with actors. For, in its present form, in which it defies all weathers and draws enormous houses, the humour and popularity of the piece is largely the result of the efforts of Mr. Huntley Wright, who has never been quite so amusing as in the character of Captain Withers of the Broadshire Territorials. The delight of the thing is in its utter absurdity; the wild fun of it removes all possible offence, and prevents the feeling that there is any too bitter satire on a particular class of officer and gentleman. The joke may indeed do the Territorials good; such good-natured laughter can hurt no one. Mr. Edward Sass, who is always excellent, is particularly at home in his present rôle, and, like Mr. Evett and Mr. Mackinder, never allows the spirit of the comedy to flag for a moment. Of course, Mr. George Edwardes takes thought that the ladies of the cast shall lack nothing of fascination, and thus with Miss Hilda Anthony and Miss Gracie Leigh and a battalion of other alluring people the comedy and plot of "Autumn Manœuvres" swings through its three brilliant acts with easy grace.

For the many wise or wayward people who love laughter without too much thinking, for the holiday mood, the "play with music" at the Adelphi will prove a sure delight.

The Day of Short Plays

THE popularity of the larger music-halls and the new regulations in regard to stage plays have produced a fine crop of short dramas and old plays which have renewed their youth in a more compact form. One of the best examples of this selection or compression is seen in Mr. Henry Arthur Jones's "The Masqueraders," which appeared so exciting when all the world was young, some fifteen years ago, at the St. James's. At present it is being played at some of the music-halls of the outer London circle, but will soon, no doubt, be of the centre. Mr. Henry Arthur Jones has met the taste of the moment, also, in "Dolly's Little Bills." This Miss Ethel Irving makes even more delightful at the Hippodrome than she did some time ago, when this one-act comedy was a rather long-drawn play. Although there are, of course, a thousand and one motives that need the spacious four-act form, such adaptations as the "Little Bills" rather outlined the fact that we have been contented with a good deal of padding in the good old days, and may look forward to an increase of brisk action and vital phrase in future from our playwrights. For a time there will be many to regret the change, but as the ideal to be sought has always been a short and brilliant comedy which began at nine o'clock and ended at eleven, there is nothing to be said but words of praise for a development in dramatic art which is gaining ground so swiftly and so justly.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Some Irish Types

TALKING with a well-known London bookseller on Bray Head the other day, I learnt that it was his first visit to Ireland. He had come over for the annual Booksellers' Conference, that was held this year under the hospitality of the Dublin Branch, and I asked him what his impression of the country was. His reply was significant. "There seems to me as much difference in kind," said he, "between English people and Irish people as there is between the French and the English; I feel as far removed from England here as ever I have felt in France." To many his words will seem no more than trite; but he spoke with the air of one who had made a perplexing, if not astounding, discovery; and it was plain to see that he was revising a good many of his ideas with regard to the problems that lie unsettled between the two nations.

It was a remark one could not easily forget, if only because of the way in which it was made. It was as though one were to hear the sudden comment in Grafton Street in wonder at the number of blue eyes: when immediately the whole street seems to shine with the twinkle of blue eyes, and the mind begins to count up the percentage of eyes other than blue. For a few days after I had to be taking the weary day's travel between Dublin and the Far West; and, inasmuch as that comment was working away like yeast in my mind, I began to notice what otherwise I should have paid no particular heed to. An environment always gives a fitness to the people produced in it, and to be familiar with the environment is not to notice particularly the people who are framed in it, and who, indeed, are a portion of it; but I began to pick out the people from their environment and to notice those types that would defy attempts to frame them in any other surrounding than their own.

Outside, examples enough would have lent distinction to the thought. Outside, in fact, the types that would have borne transplanting without outrage would have attracted attention by reason of their rarity—especially as the journey grew more westward. But as the train crept insistently from station to station the railway carriage seemed like a net catching examples up for observation, and surrendering them when observed. There was a detachment, a remoteness and insularity, about it almost inhuman in its fascination. Indeed, it was absolutely inhuman, as far as any human study may be so.

The first was a woman who sat apart in a corner, rigid and immobile. There was a suggestion of humour and kindliness about her mouth, and in her deep blue eyes a soft light gleamed, although they seemed stern and sorrowful immutably. A plain shepherd's plaid shawl had been drawn over her head, but this had fallen to her shoulders, revealing jet-black hair pulled firmly back to a knot at the back of the head. Her hands were in her lap, and consequently her shoulders were a little pulled forward. But this seemed only to give a softness to the firm, almost hard, set of them as she sat with her eyes fixed on nothing terrestrial. Her face was tanned with many weathers; but there was, deeper than this, a swarthiness proper to her complexion; and it accorded well with her firmly-moulded but high cheek-bones. Her dress was of the poorest, but there was the memory of a high and ancient race in every line of her features and in each poise of her mien: a calm, patient, self-sufficient dignity that belongs to the older orders of the world when aristocracy was an instinct, not a cult. The rain beat against the windows of the carriage, and someone addressed a remark to her: "It's a rough day." A light seemed to travel in her eye as she brought it to a nearer focus, and her mouth softened as she replied: "It is so." Then her glance went round the carriage incuriously as she noticed her fellow-travellers; and she resumed her distant dream. Only now, I observed, the gleam of humour in her seemed curiously intensified; and it had a quality of its own. It was not the humour with which one may watch the play of children. It was rather the humour with which one might regard the war of worlds. Simple peasant woman she was; but as I sought for an expression to describe the light in her eyes, I could think only of "cosmic mockery." Then the train drew up at a station; she pulled her shawl over her head, took her parcel with her large hands, and the clank of heavy boots rang out on the stone platform as she stepped away with a dignity and calm not less instinctive than when she sat.

Beside her a man of a nature wholly different had been seated. The blue in his eye was brighter and merrier; and his shrewd attentive glance took in the characteristics of all his fellow-passengers. I recognised him at once as the man at Athlone who, when an inspector had pointed out his train to him, had at once asked: "But where's the engine to it?" He wore a tall hat like an old sugar-loaf cone, which, with his very bushy brows drawn over his eyes, and his prominent adventurous nose, gave him an aspect of keen inquiry. His long upper lip bespoke reflection; and his half-whiskers a certain gravity. He might in the hands of some artists have been made to serve as the typical, in the sense of traditional, Irishman; but in his kindly glance there was a reserve and dignity that would have defied such treatment. To his friend sitting beside him he was at times quite loquacious; but to a stranger that loquacity would have been a disguise and not information. For, as I compared and contrasted him with the woman beside him, dissimilar though they seemed, there was an indefinable oneness between them that one could not find a name for, nor an occasion, till the eye was turned about on the miles of desolate brown bog on every hand. The scene was dreary enough; yet it had a haunting dignity, the same that wrapped the man and the woman opposite me.

In the farther corner sat a man enveloped in his own mists of thought. He, too, had the long upper lip that caricature has fastened upon to identify the Irishman; but, whereas in the other it was contrasted with a short, somewhat receding forehead, with him it was given a different tone by his high, thin brow. He spoke to none, and seemed to notice nothing; yet when a woman wished to leave the carriage at a station, and complained excitedly that she could not do so, as she had seen the guard lock the carriage at the previous station, he turned about and quietly said, "Unlocking it he was that time," and lapsed again into his silence. He seemed to be some small farmer by his dress; but with his erect figure, his stern glance, and his iron-grey hair, he might have been accepted as an equal in any rank. Not that he would have recorded that equality. Indeed, that same difficulty of approach that I noticed about the others seemed intensified in him. And when, after some two hours' silent sitting in the train, he at last went out, I was considerably surprised to see a little woman from the other end of the carriage go out with him—evidently his wife. They walked silently down the platform of Claremorris.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

This reserve could not be claimed for the woman opposite him, whom, for all her vivacity, he scarcely looked at. The many jags in her row of teeth, the chin thrust out, and the skin of her face like tanned leather, well crinkled to fit over its prominent framework, spoke of the passage of years over her, but her eyes leapt and gleamed with irrepressible youth. Her glance was everywhere; not so much to evoke merriment from anyone else as to find a vent for her own. When someone addressed a question to her, it was answered with extraordinary heartiness and fulness. When her company was sought it was accorded with an exuberant vivacity; when it was not sought it was not offered, but her wonderful eyes continued to twinkle fun everywhere. They almost seemed to fill the carriage with light. And when she, too, went out the officials at her station greeted her heartily, though, I noticed, none of them, save one of the boys, with familiarity.

Did one set out to seek such types, distinct in their nationality, many more could be found; but here were these caught up in a carriage during one day's journey. Each of them had the indefinable furthermore of personality, that strange something that cannot be caught and imprisoned in the description of words, but in their merely superficial presentment they challenged transplanting. They were of the race, racy; and each of them, in his or her degree, had that rarest of human qualities: spiritual dignity. DARRELL FIGGIS.

The Psychology of Error

IT is a grave matter if a man commit a crime, but it is a graver one still for him to make a mistake. In other words, it may be said that it is a mistake to commit a crime, but it is a crime to make a mistake. And in this view there is a certain amount of justice, for the consequences of a man's mistake, of a moment of carelessness or haste, may be far more serious than his deliberate crime. Among non-thinking, indulgent people the notion prevails that a mistake is just a mistake, nothing more, and that it is idle to discuss a matter further if it can be proved to have originated in a blunder. Even though hundreds of lives or thousands of pounds have been lost in consequence, these good-natured people cannot find it in their hearts to blame if it can be proved that the act was not wilfully intended. But all experience teaches the danger of this attitude. Men must be held responsible for their mistakes even more than for their crimes; the former are aggravated by the fact that they usually are so unforeseen and superfluous; whereas crimes are, generally speaking, the actions of abnormal people acting under strong temptations. One of the ironies of some of the greatest tragedies in history is that it appears afterward that they might so easily have been avoided or that they had such insignificant causes. It is this very spirit of laissez faire which is indirectly responsible for half or perhaps three-fourths of the evils of life.

Too common is the illusion that most of the evil of the world is brought about by malice or mean and base motives, or by deliberate design. Mistakes and indifference are responsible for more mischief and misfortune than all the machinations of the evil-minded, for the worst that these can do is little and is not lasting, and, indeed, generally defeats its own end; but the men who forget or neglect their duty, or blunder, are collectively more culpable and dangerous to the community. It cannot, therefore, be held an excuse that a man did not foresee, was inattentive, that he had never blundered before, or that others might have made the same mistake—a man is responsible for anything which happens disastrously under his administration if it be not an earthquake or something which none can control. This law of responsibility is illustrated in war when a sentry, found asleep at his post, often suffers the extreme penalty, whatever the circumstances may be; and since all men who are in a position of responsibility are the sentries of life against the approaches of death, or of good against all the hosts of evil, any dereliction of duty, any negligence, any inefficiency or want of prevision is usually liable to be as serious in its consequences and is punished as severely.

But mistakes are serious not only in great matters and in their public consequences; they are still serious in small affairs when they injure no man but the blunderer himself, because they make him ridiculous. In social life, for example, a solecism is an unpardonable crime, and from its consequences, if it is of a certain kind, a man never recovers. Character, capacity, culture, and antecedents are indicated in a man's mistakes much more than by his virtues and excellences, for virtue may be acquired and imitated and a man may avoid most common or other errors by rote, whereas in his mistakes one always glimpses what lies below the surface—he gives us an advantage, and we see the real stuff of which he is composed. There is, however, a wide difference between blunders which no man of sense or sound instinct would make twice and errors arising from an inferiority of capacity, a defect of education, or from what Dr. Johnson describes as "pure ignorance, madam." From the evidence of the pronunciation or the spelling of a single word it is often possible to know approximately a man's entire mentality, taste, education, and status. In the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table" the author instances in this respect the person who asks, "How's your health?" for "How are you?" or who says that he "remembers of" a certain incident, and quotes a visitor to one of his friends who asked if a statuette of Cupid in the parlour of her country house was "a 'statoo' of her deceased infant." One need not, however, cite errors so comically illiterate as this; there are a hundred degrees of inaccuracy between the correct and the grotesque, and it is in the easy and unconscious avoidance of these that the scholar, the gentleman, and the man of sense are known.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

It is almost alarming to think of how much a man may reveal of what he does not know or has never been told in a single slip of a certain kind, and of how difficult or even impossible it is to conceal for long anything that we do not know. The chief value of education does not lie in the possession of large stores of knowledge, but in the art of concealing or avoiding what is not known. It teaches not so much what to do as what to avoid, not so much what to say as what to leave unsaid, and an educated man is so called simply because, if he has been well educated, there are so few of still superior knowledge to whom he can give his ignorance away. It is, of course, perfectly true that even intelligent and clever people often cannot spell correctly and may even commit solecisms of speech, but it will invariably be found that their blunders are inaccuracies only, and that they never commit those ludicrous, vulgar, and banal errors which the illiterate, and even more, the half-illiterate, perpetrate daily and hourly. True, even the vulgar are not devoid of virtue or excellence, but men of natural sense always have the wit to confess or avoid the things of which they are ignorant and to discover and make good their defects at every opportunity. Even a man of talent and intellectual ability may blunder in matters in which he is chiefly self-taught and has not had opportunities of learning better, but it may be declared that no man of good sense blunders badly in the same way twice; he avoids anything with which he is not well conversant. Intelligence is best illustrated in an aptitude to learn and correct one's own errors in a capacity for improvement and progress. This capacity for self-correction and self-improvement always characterises an astute and intelligent mind, and goes far to repair and remove defects which arise merely from circumstances. A man of this kind invariably feels too deeply humiliated by any error he discovers himself to have made to allow himself to blunder in the same way again, always verifies doubtful points in his knowledge, and is never caught tripping twice. This, indeed, makes his progress. All science, it has been said, has been built upon mistakes, and this is true of all human progress, individual or collective. It is by doing wrong and suffering the consequences that men learn to avoid error. Experience, as has been said, wisely and wittily, is a name which everybody gives to his mistakes. F. H. M.

University Extension

EVERY sentiment being in the economy of Nature has to take the season's risk. Civilised man surrounds himself with an environment designed to deaden climatic shocks and changes, but the savage is Nature's partner in rain and storm. He has no need to study weather reports or tap barometers; one glance at the sky or the receipt of an unconscious air message suffices to telegraph to him prescience of snow or storm in store. The sailor and the woodlander have the savage's faculty in a lesser degree. It is one of the disastrous effects of our modern craze for bloated cities and the consequent blotting out of the countryside from the ken of vast hordes of the rising generation that the man or woman so reared is an artificially-limited product.

The thesis we advance is that the British race would acquire fresh vigour and tenacity if it became the fashion for the sons of the moneyed classes to spend a year in a Canadian or South African University, such University being specially designed as a school of hardihood. Our present system of School and University is producing a crop of men who are estranged from actual contact with the real issues of the common heritage of primitive folk. Their eternal patter about sport is a feeble substitute for the faculty which enables the young up-country Colonial to fend for himself when pitted against elemental conditions. In the Old Country we set about the same sort of training in amateurish fashion. A vast proportion of educated young Englishmen know nothing of the gamekeeper's art, of forestry, or of such physiography as has become an instinct with the up-country Colonial. Geology is a sealed book to them, and their powers of reconnaissance are atrophied. They have rung the changes on the usual games, they may perhaps have learnt to shoot driven pheasants and to do a little trout fishing, but a shepherd boy could give them points and beat them with ease in all countryside lore worth acquiring.

Let us then imagine a University established on some healthy spot in Canada or South Africa, far from the cities. A youngster has, let us say, taken his degree at home, and is then sent to our bush University for a final year's training. He would find there the University life maintained, that is, its discipline and culture would not be relaxed, but the young graduate would henceforth be systematically worked in the open air. He would spend a large proportion of his time in the saddle, would be drilled, made a marksman, and taught to take his share in the rough and tumble of a squatter's life. We venture to say that he would come back braced and stiffened to truer ideals. His horizon would be widened, his hold on essentials deepened. The ineffable young gentleman who is too familiar to us nowadays would have been taken down the necessary number of pegs by his Colonial training.

It may be objected that the course we suggest would habituate a growing lad with vagrant notions. That touring sometimes has such effect affords, however, no proof of a similar tendency under the conditions we advocate. It is hardly necessary to say that to attain the desired end the home and colonial Universities must needs work together, in order that there might be no hiatus between their respective dual courses. If the home and South African Treasuries and the Universities of the Old Country were to club together, a workable scheme could be readily evolved and its effects would be far-reaching. To knock the conceit out of the young British graduate, to make him a handy man instead of a dilettante, to show him that college success is a poor substitute for the capacity of taking his place in the fighting ranks of his fellow-men, to widen his chest, fill his lungs with pure air and exorcise the demon of ennui, would all be no trivial gains. But if to that be added the staying of the plague of reaction in South Africa, the stiffening of the Home connection and the enrichment of the race types of both lands, as the result of inevitable intermarriage, we surely have an ideal well worthy thought and effort. Expenditure on buildings in South Africa would be cut down to a minimum, as all our Colonial graduates would of course go under canvas for a considerable proportion of their term. The traditions of our resident Home Universities would not be copied in the South African University. The scheme of the latter would have for its object to engraft on the home growth, the product of the spoon meat of lectures and laboratories, the ideal of the noble savage. Let the young Englishman, before he settles down to the business of his life, for a year or so discard the respirator and spectacles of his home upbringing and catch the inspiration of wide vistas.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

We go a step further. We would make it a high prize for, say, 1,000 of our picked Boy Scouts that they should have a year's training in South Africa on the lines we have indicated as the basis of our University extension. In the Boy Scout organisation we have one of the most promising assets of the future. Its effect will be wider than that of the Volunteer movement, which was specifically designed to kill the idea of universal military service in this country. Every Boy Scout is a potential apostle of this. That universal service is inevitable, that the country is running a risk of national shipwreck so long as it evades its obvious duty of accepting the yoke, is patent to every man who is not a doctrinaire or a Little Englander. Britons must either face the music as their grandfathers did before them or give place to a hardier race-type. Conquest is not always settled on the stricken field. A walk through the dreary slumlands of London must convince anyone who is not "too blind to have desire to see" that England is half conquered already. In the 'seventies Disraeli boasted that no street corner agitator could attract an audience of half-a-dozen. Great measures of social reform characterised that period of our Parliamentary history and lack of proper excitement was not due to apathy. Now on every side we hear of industrial wars and rumours of wars. Vain would be the sophistry of Socialist and revolutionary if the worker did not feel, in some inarticulate fashion, that all was not well with his class, that the wheels of the chariot of State drive heavily.

The waste spaces of Greater Britain cry out for men to till and subdue them; the whole world is eager for masterhood, for leaders, seers, men whose vision is not limited by the narrowing gossip of the market-place. While in England during ten months or so of each year the best intellect we possess runs to waste watching the spectacle of degraded politics, the bone and muscle of the country is meanwhile watching cricket and football matches. The vital interests of the Empire may be ignored, provided those redoubtable politicians, Tite Barnacle and Co., are not detached from their coigns of vantage. Our legislators wear out human time and tissue with futile party strife. If any measure of real utility has to be discussed it is scandalously scamped under the guillotine. Meantime surely but slowly the conquest of Britain goes on, and we are slipping from our premier position of high renown, down the easy inclined plane of self-abasement.

Foreign Reviews

Die Deutsche Rundschau.

THE two principal items of the July number are a most vivid and picturesque account of Florence in the time of Dante by Herr Robert Davidsohn, and an appreciation of Count Aehrenthal from the pen of Herr Franz Zweybrück. The antecedents of the great Austrian statesman are explained, his tenacity and his services to his country are illustrated, and at least a partial justification is made out for the coup of Novibazar. An impression of a very forceful personality is conveyed, and the circumstances of his retirement and death are invested with a certain tragic significance. Herr Rudolf Holzer contributes the almost inevitable appreciation of August Strindberg. Herr Herbert Stegmann uses the recent work of Mme. Nicati as a peg on which to hang an enthusiastic study of Elizabeth Browning. Frau von Bunsen's Neckar travels are concluded, and Annette von Droste-Hülshoff's letters and "Stephana Schwertner" are continued.

Le Mercure de France.

July 1.—Léon Dierx receives a tribute from M. André Fontainas. M. Buffenoir discusses the authenticity of the reputed death-mask of Rousseau, and reviews the career of Houdon, the sculptor. The publication of some interesting "félibriste" correspondence, in which Jean Reboul and Théodore Aubanel figure, is begun. M. Norel draws a dark picture of the dangers of modern Atlantic crossings.

July 16.—Three long articles of extraordinary interest form the main body of this number. M. Beck, à propos Montaigne's journey, discusses the history of the taste for natural scenery, sometimes venturing on the most daring precision M. Guimbaud is admirable on Rousseau in England; the amenities of the sojourn at Wootton are contrasted with the quarrel with Hume,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

and the latter is made responsible for much of the trouble that followed. Finally, M. Dumesnil's account of Flaubert's connection with the theatre is to be recommended; there is a good deal of the original Flaubert in it, and the whole thing is well done. In the "Revue de la Quinzaine" M. Davray discusses Mr. Gosse's recent article on Rousseau.

La Revue.

July 1.—M. Gaston Riou, in the course of a "Lettre aux 'Jeune-France,'" a kind of Republican manifesto, analyses "les trois visions"—"le rêve ultramontain," "le rêve traditionaliste," and "le rêve Français," with which last he identifies his own political principles. M. Georg Brandès has some good stories of the vanity and simplicity of Hans Andersen. M. Faguet examines in piquant fashion the book of M. de Pradel de Lamase on the vicissitudes of his family under the Revolution and its existing claim to compensation. M. de Gallier presents some unpublished documents dealing with an officer of the eighteenth century.

July 15.—M. Normandy gives unpublished letters of Rollinat. M. Chuquet shows Murat in a bad light—inefficient as Napoleon's representative after Moscow and a faithless ally in his dependent kingdom. Signor Sighele, who, since his last pronouncement in the Revue, has been expelled from his Austrian property, continues his debate with M. Dauzat about Franco-Italian relations. The Futurist grievance, in a sane form, is to be noted in Signor Sighele's contribution. M. Faguet discusses M. Marcel Prévost's recent venture in "Pedagogy."

La Revue Bleue.

June 22.—M. Paul Bonnefon starts the publication of a large mass of correspondence of Ximénès Doudan. Mme. Frederika Macdonald discusses the enigma of Rousseau's children and of their alleged abandonment. M. Duboscq is very interesting on "La Question Albanaise" in its latest aspect.

June 29.—M. Paul Cambon and Sir Edward Grey are, according to M. Ernest Lémonon, "des diplomates, qui cachent des âmes de soldat"; Baron Marschall is "un soldat, avec une âme de diplomate." The latter has achieved great successes at Constantinople, but he does not appreciate the difference between that city and London; he is too full of "coups de poing," has, it seems, made a bad initial impression, and will achieve nothing. M. Paul Gaultier reinforces M. J. Reinach's indictment of alcohol as a national peril.

July 6.—M. Arthur Bauer in the first of a series of articles discusses the irreducible minimum of moral teaching in schools. M. Bourgin makes some general observations on the efforts of Mr. Sidney Webb and others to grapple with the problem of pauperism.

July 13.—M. R. G. Lévy, armed with statistics and general considerations, attacks the nationalisation of railways in France. M. de Glouvet writes charmingly of the relations between the fifth Duc de Guise and Anne de Gonzague-Nevers. M. Julien Roshem estimates Rousseau's influence on the conception of the duties of maternity.

L'Action Nationale.

The July number is devoted almost entirely to a series of well and profusely illustrated articles on French East Africa. The idea of a great black empire under French auspices has been gaining ground so steadily that this number is very much worth attention. M. Maurice Viollette, apart from some commonplace counsels, urges an extension of public works and the avoidance of concessions to private companies. M. L. Sonolet, in his remarks on the native troops, quotes Stanley as regretting that France had got the best of certain African partitions—"car elle a le pays des guerriers."

Revue des Etudes Napoléoniennes.

Colonel Camon, both by precept and by manifold example, sets himself to show that Napoleon had a system of generalship. Unfortunately he never wrote it down, though he started to do so. But in most of his campaigns and battles he "n'avait eu que deux systèmes de manœuvre et deux systèmes correspondants de bataille." The two systems were (a) La manœuvre sur les derrières, (b) La manœuvre sur position centrale. It is with the former and more frequent of these methods that Colonel Camon deals in the present article. Plans of the illustrative battles are inserted. M. Ballot deals with an odd side of Napoleon's political economy—his loans, frequently forced loans, to manufacturers, to assure stability of industry. M. Driault keeps us abreast of the French and Russian armies of 1812—dealings with Poland, the resignation of Jérôme, and the advocacy by Bagration of an offensive movement on the part of the Russians, bringing us down to the Battle of Smolensk and the subsequent forward movement. The other end of 1812 is supplied by the final instalment of Captain Fabry's contribution—the diary of Wittgenstein's army.

Revue de Métaphysique et de Morale.

The May-June number of this review is entirely devoted to Rousseau, and to admirers of the apostle of Geneva it is well worth the five francs for which it is to be obtained. Thirteen articles approach the subject from almost as many points of view, and most of them bear names of the very highest eminence. M. Boutroux, for instance, undertakes the difficult task of proving that Rousseau had a consistent philosophy; he finds consistency even in his inconsistencies. Professor Bosanquet is among those who deal with the political ideas, and disposes of some classical English misconceptions. M. Jaurès, in a lecture of 1889 on the same subject, is alternately brilliant and démodé. M. Levy-Brühl gives a clear account of the quarrel with Hume, and M. V. Delbos discusses Kant's debt to Rousseau.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

REVUE GERMANIQUE.

The July-August number of this little periodical is devoted to a review of English poetry for the year ending May, 1912. M. Floris Delattre is responsible for the whole number, and has carried out his task remarkably well. It is quite a useful synopsis, in the manner of Whittaker, of the events of the poetical year, and the criticisms are sound and suggestive. From a less accomplished bi-linguist the occasional "conseils" would seem a little out of place, but M. Delattre has a perfect right to give them, and it would be a keen critic that caught him tripping.

REVUE CRITIQUE D'HISTOIRE ET DE LITTÉRATURE.

June 22.—M. Marçais' "Textes arabes de Tanger" is praised as embodying sound linguistic methods—not confounding literary with spoken dialects. M. Cartier's great discovery—the only existing copy of Calvin's "Excuse de Noble Seigneur Jacques de Bourgogne"—is discussed. M. Bastide notices M. Delattre's book on fairies, and Mr. Bates' "Touring in 1600."

June 29.—M. Bastide writes a brilliant appreciation of M. Delattre's "Herrick," lately reviewed in THE ACADEMY. For the comparison with La Fontaine he substitutes the parallel with "l'abbé poudré et élégant" of the eighteenth century. M. Chuquet discusses M. Vulliod's essay on "Die Pietisterei im Fischbeinrocke"—Frau Gottsched's translation of Père Bougeant. M. Bastide also notices Mr. Westcott's work on new poems of James I. of England, and M. Feuillerat's "Arcadia."

July 6.—Mr. J. G. Robertson's "Nathan der Weise" receives high praise. Several German books on Goethe are noticed. M. Chuquet gives a précis of M. Masson's "Napoléon à Sainte-Hélène."

July 13.—Mr. J. C. Lawson's studies of modern Greek folklore and its connection with ancient religion are highly recommended for their suggestiveness. M. Roustan notices the "Oxford Book of German Verse," reviewed a short while ago, less favourably, in THE ACADEMY. M. Madelin and his revolutionary methods in relating the Revolution—no notes and all sorts of odd omissions—are discussed, not unkindly. Mr. Buck's book on Greek dialects is strongly recommended.

The Celluloid Danger

By WALTER F. REID, F.I.C., F.C.S.

FROM time to time the public conscience is shocked by fires due to celluloid, which burst out suddenly, generally in workshops where numbers of girls are employed. Individual accidents, caused by the same substance, such as the ignition of celluloid combs, are still more frequent, but rarely lead to loss of life.

Those not familiar with the industry naturally ask themselves whether steps could not be taken to prevent the loss of life that experience has shown may be expected during the handling of this substance, as now carried on. Many consider that celluloid is explosive, but this is not the case, although it can be ignited so quickly, and its combustion proceeds so rapidly, that it may, under some circumstances, become more dangerous than many explosives. The chief constituents of celluloid are collodion, cotton, and camphor, usually with a small percentage of castor oil to give the necessary flexibility and toughness. The camphor prevents the explosion of the collodion cotton under all circumstances; but, once the celluloid is ignited, the camphor is converted into vapour, which is itself highly inflammable. Owing to the presence of the nitro cellulose, the celluloid contains within itself enough oxygen to support combustion sufficiently to convey fire from one article to another, and, as the camphor vapour is a gas, combustion spreads with great rapidity.

Celluloid has become so essential to our comfort and daily wants that it would be impracticable to forbid its use, and there is at the present moment no substitute for it which possesses all its properties, and is yet less inflammable. Many such substitutes have been suggested, and some are being made on a commercial scale, but at the present moment celluloid cannot be completely replaced. The practical question then is: how can its manufacture and use be so regulated as to prevent the loss of life which is constantly occurring? In the factories themselves, where the celluloid is produced, accidents are rare on account of the precautions taken, especially with regard to the use of lights.

The explosive industry, which, under the superintendence of the Home Office in this country, has formed a model for other nations and for our own dominions, affords some indication of the direction in which we must look for practical means of safety. One of the most useful restrictions placed upon explosive manufacturers is the limitation of the quantity of explosive material present in any building at any one time; the number of workpeople allowed to be present in such a building is also limited, and these two limitations have probably saved more lives in explosive factories than any other regulations. It would be quite possible, without materially interfering with the industry, to limit the quantity of celluloid allowed to be present in any workshop in proportion to the number of workers present. In many cases this would merely mean passing the articles through the workshop in smaller batches, instead of allowing them to accumulate in large quantities. When finished off, the articles should be stored in safety rooms or buildings where no fire should be allowed on any consideration whatever. Similar restrictions are imposed in many other cases, especially in connection with the storing of benzoline, petroleum, spirits, and other substances scarcely more dangerous than celluloid. No doubt in some cases structural alterations might be required, but no manufacturer can claim the right to expose a number of workpeople, generally girls, to a danger which experience has shown is a very real one.

It is to be hoped that our authorities will take the necessary steps before some fresh disaster causes them to legislate in a panic, and thus hamper an industry the products of which have become indispensable to all of us.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

At St. Stephen's Shrine

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE.

LLOYD GEORGE sometimes forgets that he is not Prime Minister; it seems he spoke a little hastily when he promised "early legislation" on the subject of strikes in his speech on the adjournment on Tuesday, 23rd inst. Last week I described the Irish as "looking sick" at this promise of "early legislation," and the general impression is that John Redmond Dictator had seen Mr. Asquith, and told him that it was all nonsense: "early legislation" must mean when the Home Rule Bill is through and not before. There must be no promise about English legislation for strikes whilst the Home Rule Bill is still in the hands of the moulders; it must be cast before anything else is put in the cupola of the legislative foundry.

On Wednesday Bob Cecil asked Asquith when the Strike Bill would be introduced. The Premier, with the tail of his eye on John Redmond, "hoped" it would be next session. This mild interpretation of "early legislation" caused Lord Robert to ask sarcastically if this was "another obligation of honour." Asquith winced, but sententiously replied that it was an obligation of honour which would be performed in due course.

Mr. Barnes wanted to know if the noble lord was correct in describing the Bill as proposing compulsory legislation. Asquith skilfully parried this by saying that Lloyd George had described the Bill in "much more general terms." Mr. Brace showed the alarm of the Labour members by asking the Government to remember that the trades unions for years had declared by enormous majorities against compulsory arbitration. This is quite true, and the Labour men are bitterly angry with the Government; when they asked them last night to interfere, they meant that the Government should use compulsion to end the strike at once with the masters, not the men. In fact, the leaders have been so much in touch with the Government that they felt sure that in the end they would interfere in their behalf. They never dreamed of general legislation in favour of compulsory arbitration all round being introducd, it was "hoped," next session—what good was this to the men on strike to-day? No wonder when the news filtered down to the East End there were riots and charges of police with drawn batons. The day was devoted to more Navy Estimates, and the Radicals were astonished when that original shaver, Sir J. C. Compton-Rickett, ranged himself on the Imperial side. Sir Compton looks and is the essence of Liberal Yorkshire Nonconformity, but he has won the respect of the whole House by his impartiality as an able Chairman of Committees. His neighbours could not believe their ears when he concluded a weighty speech with the remark "that our social requirements were as nothing compared with our predominance on the sea, and, if that was challenged, we must accept the challenge." It was like the voice of one of Cromwell's Ironsides speaking across the centuries. Thirty-two Little Englanders supported the amendment to reduce the vote of £22,000,000 by £100, and were defeated by 249.

In the House of Lords Haldane threw over Mr. Outhwaite and his Single Tax.

If rumour and the evening papers are correct, Lloyd George is having a pretty rough time of it in the Cabinet. The Daily News had a naïve interview with Elibank on the subject, and that bland cherub felt it necessary to declare that Mr. Lloyd George was on intimate personal terms of friendship with the Premier.

On Thursday the debate on the defence of the Empire was continued. The speeches were on a high plane. Mr. Borden from Canada and Mr. Reitz from South Africa were again attentive listeners in the Distinguished Strangers' Gallery. Mr. Asquith told us something of the work of the Imperial Defence Committee which Mr. Balfour, with far-seeing statesmanship and in view of the days that are impending, had founded some ten years ago. It consists of men of all parties, and it gladdened my heart to-night to see unmistakable signs of the fact that, in the event of trouble, party disputes would vanish into thin air and the House and country rally as one man round the Premier.

Bonar Law made a splendid speech. He is still an untried man in several subjects of debate, but on each necessity he has risen to the occasion in a way that has surprised and delighted his followers. He refrained from saying, "We told you so," or indulging in vain regrets, beyond remarking that, if in the past there had been the "cool and methodical development" Winston now preached, the rivalry between ourselves and Germany might have been postponed. The Little Englanders, led by Ponsonby, bleated feebly against the increased expenditure, but the House was in no mood for talk of this kind, and they were again beaten by nearly 300 votes.

A close observer will admit that the present Government have had splendid luck all through. I have never belittled their cleverness and courage, but it is impossible not to see how time after time they have had all the luck as well, and it was again exemplified on Friday morning.

If Lloyd George had spoken for sixty seconds longer than he did, when he moved that the Supplementary Estimates for the new services should be taken on Monday, the Government would have been beaten, for, when the door of the Lobby was locked, it shut out eight Unionists, and three Radicals who were breathlessly tearing up the staircase. This would have given us a majority of two. The Government would not, of course, have gone out, but it would have shaken them horribly. Every Unionist paper throughout the country would have simply had on its placard, "Defeat of the Government," and the man in the street would have got it into his head that the end was near. He cannot understand a Government with a huge majority being actually defeated in the division lobby.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

There was much recrimination. The Radicals said it was sharp practice, and the Tories said everything had been open and above-board—there was no secret snap at all. The Radical Whips used scorpions in lashing their unhappy followers who strolled down "in time for lunch, don't you know," whilst our own late birds could have cried with vexation. And here, as the session draws to a close, I should like to pay a tribute to our Whips. People used to talk about "Bob Acres" (now Lord Chilston) as the best Whip of the century, but I doubt if he comes up to Lord Balcarres. "Bal." has all the qualities which go to make up a successful Whip—he is as genial and charming as Walrond (who was as lazy as a Circassian girl), while he has all Alec Hood's resource, without his cavalry sergeant-major's manner. He is never in a hurry, and he suffers bores and fools patiently, even taking notes of their suggestions, which sends them away content. Ned Talbot is always kind and affable, and far more successful than his easy-going predecessor in getting speakers. Pike Pease is an excellent lieutenant, contriving with rare abrogation to give other people the credit of the things he thinks of himself. He is probably the most popular man on our side. The rest are young men, all keen on their jobs, and the result has been such whipping as we have not seen for years and years.

I do not quite know what is the matter with that journalistic bear leader, H. W. Massingham. Last week he attacked Lloyd George, and on Monday he ran amok in the Daily News about Winston and his ways, and compared him to a startled steed. At the end of the article he pleaded for a new Radical peace-at-any-price party, with the pale-faced Ponsonby as leader. He is evidently very angry with the whole Cabinet.

At half-past three a red-haired, stalwart, thick-set-looking man arrived in the cloisters with his father. It was Ernest Craig, the victor of Crewe, come to take his seat, but not quite knowing how to do it. It was late, but he was rushed upstairs, and after due formalities was marched up the floor by Balcarres and Stewart, amid the deafening cheers of the Tories. Bob Cecil tried to tie the Government down as to when it was intended to bring in legislation about strikes, but luck has again favoured them. The strike is at an end, the holidays are just beginning, so that it can go over for the present. The "near future" of Lloyd George was now translated by John Redmond through the patent McKenna megaphone into May, next year.

We dealt with various supplementary estimates all the afternoon: George Kemp has at last been allowed to resign N.W. Manchester, and the supplementary vote for Uganda was absolutely necessary. Tim Healy is a great stickler for Parliamentary forms. He knows far more about the Standing Orders than ninety-nine men in a hundred, and in days gone by was a terror to Speakers. Nobody knew what he would be up to next, and then prove he was in order by the book. (I think it was he who once spoke from the Gallery.) Well, Tim was very much exercised over his favourite Uganda—a supplementary estimate ought to bear some relation to the size of the original estimate. To estimate a thing was going to cost £70,000, and then want half a million because you had made a little mistake was rubbish, and it was adding insult to injury to refuse information or to give details as to how it was going to be spent. He declared the legislation was bastard, wasteful, and illegal.

This was all very well for a purist like Tim, but when you have just lost Crewe, and want to save Manchester if you can, you can't expect a Government to allow trifles of that kind to stand in the way; so Uganda had her half-million.

Later on we discussed why another £42,000 was wanted for the Insurance Commission, and Masterman got his lank hair pulled in all directions, till he was quite cross and had a smart set-to with Worthington Evans, who went bald-headed for the inaccurate leaflets of the Government. Masterman tried to counter by complaining of a poster at Crewe, but unfortunately failed to quote the wording accurately, and nobody had the original to refer to.

At ten the guillotine fell, and the House filled up; all those guilty people who know that they have been absent from divisions came down to adjust averages. In an hour and a half we marched through the lobbies continuously, and voted without discussion sums amounting to sixty-eight millions sterling.

At the close of the night Bob Cecil raised a question of privilege. I was out of the Chamber at the moment, but rather fancy it had something to do with making payments without the leave of the House. It was evidently a point of some moment. "Where's Asquith?" somebody called out—he had apparently gone home. "Send for Ponsonby!" implored some wag on our side, but the new leader was also absent, so Cecil agreed to adjourn it.

On Tuesday our great Indian Empire's affairs were once more to the fore, but the interest chiefly lay in the questions and answers that went before.

The Opposition obtained a definite pledge from the Prime Minister that the new proposals with regard to land would not include a single tax. That does not mean, although it sounds so, that the land will not have a single tax on it, but that the particular doctrine preached with so much success by Hemmerde and Outhwaite in recent elections of a "single tax" had no foundation in fact; but, like the Chinese slavery lie, it has served its purpose and can go into limbo.

Birrell is throwing himself heart and soul into protecting workmen at Harland and Wolff's yard in Belfast, who are being molested by their fellow-workmen. Police and soldiers are being hurried to the scene, and members wanted to know why this was not done in the case of the Port of London riots. Why this difference of treatment by the Government officials between Belfast and London? The Chief Secretary does not know anything about London, declared the Speaker, with a face like granite, so we could not question him further.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Having regard to Asquith's well-known declaration in 1901 that no Liberal Government ought to remain in power at the mercy of the Irish vote, and having regard to the majority of three on Friday last, it was asked, did he intend to adhere to his view and resign? The Premier read the following reply:—

> The Government do not propose to resign office in view of the division referred to. The speech from which the hon. member quotes was made by me eleven years ago, and should be read as a whole. I think that the advice which it gave as to the conditions under which the Liberal Party should thereafter assume office was sound. I went fully into its application to existing circumstances in some observations which I made on the motion for the adjournment of the House on Wednesday, June 19.

Mr. Montagu then gave an optimistic address on the condition of India. It was very well put together; he spoke of the attempts of the India Office to make the lives of Indian students less lonely, and pleaded that Englishwomen might be more hospitable in letting the youths see something more of English home life. Some of us, however, have had experience of hospitality abused, whilst Ramsay MacDonald, with remembrances of the "Broken Road," doubted if Western education was good for the natives of India. However, he has been put on a Commission to consider and report on the public services in India, and there he ought to be very useful.

Mr. Mallet, a Radical politician who was badly beaten at Portsmouth, has been put into the position of superintending the Indian students at £1,000 a year. The appointment was much criticised: Unionists were inquisitive. What was his pension, if any? Had he passed any, and if so, what public examination? Did he understand any, and, if so, which, of the many Indian languages? But we obtained very little information from Mr. Montagu.

Indian Reviews

THE Wednesday Reviews (Trichinopoly) for June are as independent as usual. Indians never fail in critical capacity. The proceedings of the Mysore Economic Conference show how advanced the State is, but the editor, disagreeing with the Education Committee, does not advocate the founding of a University there. He quotes at length Lord Brassey's book on fiscal policy and Lord Inchcape's support of Free Trade for India, whereas all Indians are Protectionists. In the cause of temperance in India he advocates the extension of local option, a policy which has been officially condemned as inappropriate to India. The writer of the many papers on English life through Indian eyes has reached women in politics, and stageland. The articles on Hyderabad, the premier native State, its history and present aspects, afford materials for a standard account thereof. The editor strongly contests the conclusion, elsewhere advanced, that the Eurasian community hold the balance of the political situation in India, and that the continuation of British rule rests on their sweet will. It certainly would be news to the domiciled community themselves that they held the key to the political situation in the country. "A Citizen of the World," writing on Mahomedan Powers and Indian Moslems, challenges the main Moslem propaganda, the bond of religion. He points out that "the stress and struggle is economical and political all the world over, and religion has almost ceased to be a motive power in governing the mutual relations of nations."

The Collegian (Calcutta) for June has an interesting announcement of a contemplated college at Bombay for girls, to be taught by the Jesuit fathers. A committee to frame a scheme for a University at Dacca has been appointed. Free education is making a beginning in a small way. The new University projects hang fire for realisation of the promised subscriptions. Articles of Elizabethan prose and Indian history are useful contributions for students. The report of the Calcutta Imperial Library shows difficulties in its working. The experiment of having an Indian as librarian was a fatal measure. On his death he was found to have "borrowed" between 200 and 300 books, many of which must be regarded as lost.

The London-printed Rajput Herald for June has a character sketch of the Gaekwar of Baroda, remarkable for its plain speaking. "He is, judging by his net accomplishments, an average Indian ruler, possessed of qualities of commonplace statesmanship, but at the same time imbued with American ideals, especially in his hunting after publicity." An Indian critic on "What's Wrong with England?" supplies the answer that there is rampant in England's social life the utmost corruption which, if unchecked, must in due course evolve into dire catastrophe. "Political Science Among the Ancient Hindus" is an interesting historical study, but the "Real Cause of India's Downfall" has more practical bearing on the present: the cause assigned is security, leading to luxury, inaction, physical unfitness, degeneracy. "British Rule in India" is generally commended, as being without a parallel in the world's history, but not without a grumble at the insufficiency of the latest changes. The editorial notes on the Indian princes in London and on current Indian questions are well written, though the Indian view has always to be discounted.

The Hindustan Review for May-June has an encouraging paper on the development of the silk industry in Kashmir, which has made great progress. Irrigation in South India is a technical subject of great importance, but it is too dull for such a journal. "The English in the Court of the King of Ceylon" in the eighteenth century is an obscure chapter of Oriental history. A notice of some Indian reformers is a text for harping on Indian nationalism, which is an ideal not likely to be attained in our time. The miscellaneous reviews and notices in this journal are always useful, and it does a service in reproducing the full text of the presidential address at the United Provinces Conference at Cawnpore on "Some Imperial and Provincial Problems." Such an address concentrates advanced opinions on the prominent questions of the day.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Grammar for Futurists*

THE Futurist is certainly an amusing fellow, and, if at times his words and his tones make him rather compromising company, we may console ourselves with the thought that the metropolis of letters is a big place, and that it is odds against our being seen by any of our acquaintances. We have seen some of his pictures, we have read some of his poems, "La Bataille de Tripoli," a whole sheaf of his manifestos, and "Le Futurisme (cinquième édition)." It is this "cinquième édition" that supplies us with an excuse for writing about Futurism at all. The movement may not have deep roots, but it has a rapid and luxuriant growth, and we have no doubt that, beside the large number of Italians who sympathise with its sane, primary grievance, there exists a handful of persons who take the wilder words of its prophets as spoken in good faith. That they are not so spoken may be proved on the excellent evidence of Signor Marinetti himself. Confronted with an ironical representative of Le Temps, he has confessed that "le reste," that is everything but certain elementary, almost incontrovertible, principles, "n'est qu'arguments, et clairon, et coups de poing."

Readers of THE ACADEMY have heard of Futurism more than once, and have no need to be instructed in its principles. It is possible that they are not acquainted with all the ramifications of the movement—Futurist poetry, Futurist drama, Futurist music, and Futurist war-correspondence. A Futurist war is actually going on, and should not be the last of its kind; we have not yet heard of Futurist cooking.

Futurist grammar and syntax we have met with in their embryonic stage; we did not know that they would so soon be codified. Signor Marinetti has just launched the most fascinating of all his manifestos. "Ce fut en aéroplane" (as a passenger) that he first got the idea. Examples of how to write easily occurred to him from his own works. And here are some of the results of his cogitations, some excerpts from the "body of rules" that are to constitute the new art of literature:—

> Il faut détruire le syntaxe en disposant les substantifs au hasard de leur naissance.
> Il faut employer la verbe à l'infini.
> Il faut abolir l'adjectif.
> Il faut abolir l'adverbe.
> Plus de ponctuation—

mathematical and musical signs will give us all we want.

> Il faut orchestrer les images en les disposant suivant un maximum de désordre.

The result may be obscure. We may have to "renoncer à être compris." Tant pis! "Etre compris n'est pas nécessaire." So long as we chant for our own delectation the song of Matter, all will be well. "Après le vers libre, voici enfin les mots en liberté;" et les lettres? et les points sur les i? There is no end to the process, save, perhaps, Signor Marinetti's coming-of-age, or, at any rate, his fortieth birthday, when he has given leave to a new generation of Futurists to trample on his carcase. But in the meantime some over-literal supporter will have blown up the Pitti or the Forum.

Art

Whistler and Legros at the Tate Gallery

LAST week I spoke of the horrors of the London Salon. With the object of effacing the memory of the same from my mind, were it possible, I paid another visit to the loan collections at the Tate Gallery, which will remain on view until September in the case of Legros, and October in the case of Whistler. The two painters are as sharply contrasted as is possible. In Legros is wanting that inimitable airy grace which is indelibly stamped upon the works of Whistler. There is nothing light or fantastic about Legros: his was the grand style of painting: he painted what he saw, and painted it with consummate skill. Compare his portrait of Thomas Carlyle with that of Whistler. They both presented the man as he was, but Whistler gave us something in addition, namely, the concentrated, unsatisfied yearning of a lifetime.

Compare again Legros' "Le Grand Canal à Venise" with Whistler's pastels of Venice. No finer illustration could be found of the truth that you can paint every stone and every ripple, and yet fail to catch the spirit of the whole. When you look at Whistler's tiny pastel of Santa Maria della Salute from a distance, you suppose that upon a closer scrutiny you will find the most elaborate workmanship. No such thing: nothing beyond supremely skilful disposition of colour-masses. When I stand before such works as the nocturnes, my favourite amongst which is "The River at Westminster," or the portrait of Miss Cicely Henrietta Alexander, I am filled with sorrow at the thought that the author and creator of such beauty should have been all that Mr. Macfall recently told us in THE ACADEMY that he was. And the pity of it that he whose soul thirsted

* Manifeste Technique de la Littérature Futuriste.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

for beauty could ever have painted the appalling "Symphonies in White."

There is a curious little connecting link between these two loan collections in the fact that Whistler's much discussed "Piano Picture" was exhibited, after its rejection at the Salon of 1859, by Bonvin in company with Legros' portrait of his father. At that time the latter had not attained to the supreme mastery of portraiture which distinguishes his later works. Amongst the latter the finest examples now upon view are the ecclesiastical pictures—"Rehearsing the Service"; the portrait of Sir Edward Burne-Jones, with its visionary eyes and broad, contemplative forehead; the "Priest Saying Mass"; "St. Clement of Alexandria" (the same face appears in the largest of the canvases, "The Pilgrimage"); and the portrait of the Right Hon. C. G. Milnes Gaskell. The greatest of all Legros' themes is the rapt devotion of simple souls, and his grandest rendering of it is to be found in the large picture which I have just mentioned, "The Pilgrimage." In this and its sister picture, "Femmes en Prière," though the two were separated by seventeen years, one forgives the somewhat uncouth grouping and the lack of depth because of these wonderful faces. Both in subject and in rendering, "Le Repas des Pauvres" is completely Rembrandtesque.

In "The Barricade," an otherwise uninteresting composition, the face of the boy holding a pistol shows a marvellous rendering of expectant earnestness. There is in practically all the interiors and figure-groups a certain studied stiffness or formality of arrangement, most pronounced in the earliest works, which Legros scarcely ever succeeded in shaking off. He succeeded in the case of the "Fishmarket," at all events, save in the background. In the same picture he demonstrated an ability to portray still life far higher than one would have attributed to him. As I have said, he never seems to have caught the breath of the fields, the spirit of the open air. The more striking, therefore, is the anomaly presented by the masterly oil-sketch painted before the pupils of the Slade School of Art on Hampstead Heath in 1876, redolent as it is of breezy uplands.

One should not miss seeing a curious and interesting fragment called "L'Incendie." I am not greatly drawn to Legros' efforts in sculpture, though some of the bronze medallions are good; but amongst the collection of etchings, lithographs, and engravings which lines the walls of the Sculpture Gallery are many treasures. They are, principally, the gold points of Berlioz and Darwin and the dry point called "Le Cours de Phrénologie," an excessively rare plate, containing, also, a beautiful portrait of the artist's father; and an engraving in an early state called "La Mort du Vagabond." There is one painting which I have forgotten to mention, "The Leaf Burner." The date I do not know, but it is fraught with all that subtle appreciation of humble toil which belongs in so high a degree to Alphonse Legros.

R. E. N.

Notes and News

Messrs. Chatto and Windus are publishing a new edition of the popular "Bridge Catechism" by Robert Hammond. Arranged in the form of questions and answers, the new edition includes particulars of the Portland Club code, as well as the latest practices of the leading bridge clubs.

Arrangements are being made by the newly founded Blake Society for the compilation and publication in numbers of a bibliography of William Blake, a Blake concordance, and other works, which are to be issued gratis to members. The precise mode of procedure will be settled at the meeting of the society at Wyldes, North End, Hampstead, on August 12. The secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, Olney, Bucks.

In an article appearing in last week's issue of the Stage, Mr. Oswald Stoll says that it is estimated that in London alone nearly a million admissions are paid to picture theatres every Sunday. Mr. Stoll argues that the question of Sunday opening has reached such dimensions that a solution of it should no longer be delayed. He takes the position that, in fairness to other competitive forms of amusement, picture houses should not have this exceptional treatment, and should be closed on Sundays, or theatres and music-halls should be allowed to open in common with them.

The full prospectus of the eighteenth season of promenade concerts at Queen's Hall, under the conductorship of Sir Henry J. Wood, contains upwards of 500 separate items. Of these 300 are purely orchestral numbers (many of them quite new), 60 instrumental, and 120 vocal. The general scheme is framed upon the same lines as in recent years, viz.:—Mondays, Wagner; Wednesdays, symphony; Fridays, Beethoven; Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, popular. Dr. George Henschel has kindly consented to conduct the orchestra on September 30, October 1, 2, 3, and 4, during Sir Henry J. Wood's absence at the Birmingham Festival.

Messrs. Stanley Paul and Co. announce for immediate publication a new work by Virgil M. Harris, entitled "Ancient Curious and Famous Wills." The author is a lecturer at St. Louis University. His book deals with about 500 wills obtained from various parts of the world, beginning with the earliest times and coming down to the present day. These wills range from Plato, Aristotle, Virgil, and Augustus Cæsar, to Mary Stuart, Shakespeare, Voltaire, Wellington, Washington, Whittier, Longfellow, Barnum, and Brigham Young. The book contains many anecdotes, and is most entertaining. The same firm announce "The Romance of Sandro Botticelli," by A. J. Anderson.

Beginning on August 3, a full programme of events has been arranged at Stratford-upon-Avon in honour of Shakespeare and to further the revival of folk song and folk dance. The festival will continue till the end of the month. There will be representations of Shakespeare's plays by the F. R. Benson Company, and in the theatre garden demonstrations of morris and sword dances and folk songs. Classes will be held daily, where competent instructors will teach the steps and movements of the various dances, and the words and music of folk songs. The detailed programme may be had on application to Miss Rainbow, the Box Office, Memorial Theatre, Stratford-upon-Avon.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Gustaf Janson, who has been described as the Kipling of Sweden, has achieved a remarkable increase of vogue with his latest book "Lognerna" (i.e., "Lies"), which has been welcomed on the Continent not only by literary critics, but also by the leaders of the movement for international arbitration. It deals with the Turco-Italian War in Tripoli, and consists of seven stories, independent but closely related by their incidents and characters, by means of which Herr Janson shows the essential inhumanity of war as it appears to the officer, the conscript, and the Arab peasant. Under the title "Pride of War" an English translation will be published immediately by Messrs. Sidgwick and Jackson.

A musical gathering of great interest to musicians is being organised jointly by the Musical League and the Incorporated Society of Musicians, and will be held in Birmingham during the conference of the Incorporated Society of Musicians from December 30, 1912, to January 4, 1913. It is intended to give three concerts, one of orchestral works, one of choral works, and one or two of chamber music, and in the choice of works preference will be given to those of British composers which have not hitherto been performed. Members of both societies are invited to send in works to the Secretary of the Joint Committee, c/o the Incorporated Society of Musicians, 19, Berners Street, London, W., from whom all particulars can be obtained.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

BY LANCELOT LAWTON.

THE DAWN OF THE MEIJI ERA—SOME REFLECTIONS.

AT a time when the glorious features of the reign that has just been brought to so sad a close are receiving the treatment they merit in the columns of the Press, it may perhaps be of interest to recall some of the incidents that marked the early days of the restoration of the monarchy; for, from such a retrospect, the achievements of Japan during the brief period of her national transition can only appear the more remarkable. One of the first instances which went to show that the leaders of the new movement were in earnest in their desire to establish an era of genuine reform was the presentation, in 1868, of a memorial to the Government, signed by the ex-Princes of Echizen and Tosa and the Princes of Satsuma, Choshu, Geishiu, and Higo. In this quaintly worded document it was admitted that a mistake had been made in the past in closing the country to foreign intercourse, and in the following terms a new policy was advocated:—

> Let the foolish argument which has hitherto styled foreigners dogs and goats and barbarians, be abandoned. Let the Court ceremonies hitherto initiated from the Chinese be reformed, and the foreigners' representatives be invited to Court in the manner prescribed by the rules current among all nations, and let this be publicly notified throughout the country, so that the countless people may be taught what is the light in which they are to regard this subject.

In the same year an invitation was extended to the Diplomatic Corps to proceed to the Court at Kyoto. This was regarded as one of the most momentous events in the early days of the Restoration, for it was the first occasion on which foreigners had been permitted to approach the sacred presence of the Emperor. Unfortunately the visit was marred by the committal of an outrage which, in point of audacity, had never been equalled in the long series of savage attacks upon foreigners that had taken place since the opening of the country. The British Minister, Sir Harry Parkes, left his residence at the appointed hour on March 23, 1868. His escort consisted of eleven ex-constables of the London Police, under Inspector Peacock (who, until his recent death, remained a well-known figure at the British Embassy at Tokyo), and forty-eight men of the 9th Foot. As the escort turned the corner, two Japanese suddenly attacked them, and, slashing right and left with their long swords, succeeded in wounding nine out of the eleven police, one soldier, a Japanese groom, and five horses. A Japanese official of the Foreign Department, named Goto Shojiro, and an officer named Nakai Kozo, attacked one of the assailants, and after a severe fight, in the course of which the officer was wounded, cut him down and beheaded him. The other assailant was wounded by the escort and taken prisoner. The Court nobles subsequently presented apologies to the British Minister, and the surviving assassin had the unenviable distinction of being the first Samurai to be degraded previous to being executed as a common criminal. He was deprived of his sword, his name was erased from the list of warriors, and his head was exposed for three days. Three men who were implicated in the outrage were banished for life. The British Government, in recognition of the gallant defence made by the Japanese officers accompanying the procession, presented each of them with a sword of honour. Five days after the outrage upon Sir Harry Parkes the Emperor issued a decree, in the course of which the following striking passage occurred:—

> All persons in future guilty of murdering foreigners, or of committing any acts of violence towards them, will be not only acting in opposition to his Majesty's express orders, and be the cause of national misfortune, but will also be committing the heinous offence of causing the national dignity and good faith to suffer in the eyes of the Treaty Powers with whom his Majesty has declared himself bound by relations of amity. Such offenders shall be punished in proportion to the gravity of the offence, their names, if they be Samurai, being erased from the roll.

Apart, however, from the feeling of antagonism displayed towards foreigners—a feeling which, as has been shown, was not shared by the central administration—the country was not without its domestic tribulations. On the night of October 4, 1868, the citizens of the capital were alarmed by the news that the fleet of the ex-Shogun, which had been lying at anchor in the bay, had suddenly set sail. The fleet consisted of eight warships and steam transports, including the yacht presented by Queen Victoria to the Shogun, and a large paddle-steamer, with a total personnel of 3,000 men. The commander of this strange expedition was Enomoto Kamajiro, a naval captain who had studied navigation in Holland for five years. Several French officers, acting entirely on their own responsibility, joined the adventure. After recruiting men on the coast of Sendai, the fleet proceeded to Yezo (Hokkaido), where an army was landed. The Government officials at Hakodate fled precipitately, and the town was left unprotected. Enomoto was explicit in proclaiming that he intended no disloyalty towards the Throne, but that he merely wished to colonise Hokkaido. He proceeded to draw up a scheme for the establishment of a truly Gilbertian Republic. He was to become Governor-General, and was to be the supreme authority acting on behalf of the Emperor in the new colony.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Not until four months after Enomoto and his gallants had landed in Hokkaido was the Imperial Government able to organise a punitive expedition. Meanwhile the Republic had not proved a conspicuous success. The problem of food supplies presented great difficulties, and the task of maintaining law and order among so motley a band did not improve as conditions became worse. When the Imperial forces arrived, the rebels had little heart for fighting, and in a series of miniature engagements were defeated both on land and sea. They were treated with exceptional consideration, and many little courtesies were exchanged between the conquerors and the conquered. It is recorded that, when Enomoto realised that further resistance was futile, he sent the commander of the Imperial army a present of two volumes consisting of "The Complete Digest of the Maritime Laws of Nations," a work which had formed one of his principal studies when in Holland. The French officers surrendered to a warship belonging to their country, and were sent as prisoners to Saigon. The Emperor showed characteristic leniency in his treatment of the rebel leaders, who were merely sentenced to terms of imprisonment and afterwards pardoned. Enomoto lived to become a viscount and a vice-admiral, and on several occasions held Cabinet rank.

MOTORING

THE Royal Automobile Club again desires to draw the attention of motorists in Kent to the advisability of driving with consideration for the rights of other users of the road. It appears that the Club has received a number of complaints recently on the subject, and it warns the offending motorists that the inevitable result of a continuance of their practices will be the imposition of irksome restrictions by the authorities. There is a hint, moreover, of possible prosecutions by the Club itself, as the numbers of the offending cars are taken and transmitted to headquarters.

There were fourteen entrants for the second annual Standard Car Race, but several of these were rejected at the last moment for non-compliance with the regulations drawn up by the R.A.C., and one or two others, including the "Sunbeam," withdrew for one reason or another, so that there were only eight actual starters in the competition. These consisted of three Singers, a Vinot, a Gladiator, a Turcat-Mery, a Crespelle, and an S.C.A.R. One of the rejected entrants was the Star which was the winner of last year's event. On this occasion it was held not to conform to the more stringent conditions, which are that every competitor must be identical, so far as engine and chassis are concerned, with the standard selling models, except in size of petrol tank, rake of steering column, and adjustment of carburetter. It is this stipulation which renders the Standard Car Race of special value to prospective buyers and the most useful competition held under the auspices of the R.A.C. This year the event has again proved a triumph for Great Britain, one of the Singer team, driven by Mr. Haywood, securing first place after a tremendous struggle with the Gladiator, which was beaten by a fraction of a second. The whole distance of 277 miles was covered by the Singer and the Gladiator at an average speed of 57½ miles per hour. It is only right to mention that the Gladiator had considerably the smallest engine of any of the cars which competed in the race, with the single exception of the Vinot, the dimensions of which are the same. Every credit, therefore, must be given to the French car for its wonderfully fine performance.

That the use of simple plate glass for the windscreens of motor cars is attended with a certain element of danger is indisputable, many serious accidents having happened to the occupants of cars through the breakages of glass by collisions, etc. But although the danger is recognized, and although many attempts have been made by inventors to devise a means of eliminating it, no really satisfactory solution of the problem seems to have been found; or, if it has, it is not known to the generality of motorists.

"EVERY DROP LUBRICATES."
"Champion" Motor Oil
is the best for all types of Cars.
If not already using "Champion" send for trial tin to
S. BOWLEY & SON,
DISTILLERS OF BOWLEY'S MOTOR SPIRIT.
"Express" and "Bomo" Brands.
Wellington Works,
BATTERSEA, LONDON, S.W.
Established 1744.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Celluloid by itself is not an efficient substitute for glass, as it soon loses its transparency in use, and, moreover, is dangerously inflammable; mica is not sufficiently transparent for the purpose; and the method of strengthening glass by embedding it in fine wire netting in the process of manufacture does not appear likely to become popular. It adds considerably to the cost of the screen, is not by any means a perfect preventive against accident, and moreover, materially diminishes the transparency of the glass. Interest, therefore, attaches to an entirely new invention, called "triplex safety glass," which has recently been introduced, and which, it is claimed, combines the perfect transparency of ordinary plate glass with impossibility of breakage. The method of construction is as follows:—a sheet of specially selected clear celluloid is placed between two sheets of plate-glass, and the three sheets, after a patent treatment, are hydraulically welded together, the result being, it is stated, an unbreakable sheet as clear as the best plate glass. The celluloid, being hermetically sealed and protected from atmospheric conditions, retains its original transparency, and its toughness prevents the adhering glass from flying off in splinters however severe the shock or blow may be. In theory the "safety glass" sounds very plausible, and if it can be proved in practice to possess the qualities claimed for it another of the risks of motoring will have been removed.

Mr. H. Douglas Kerr, formerly advertising manager of the Continental Tyre Company, has just been appointed assistant manager of the tyre sales department of the North British Rubber Company, Limited, the manufacturers of Clincher tyres. For several years Mr. Kerr, who is well-known throughout the motor industry, has been the responsible head of the publicity department of the North British Company's tyre business, and he will, we understand, continue to act in that capacity in addition to fulfilling the duties attaching to his recent appointment.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE Stock Exchange, for lack of anything better, has talked Home Rails all the week, and on Saturday, if one had listened to the irresponsible chatter of the Street, you would have bought all Home Rails in the market and gone home satisfied that you would wake up on Monday morning a millionaire. But Saturday markets are always dangerous. Indeed, a careful gambler who is willing to sacrifice his week-end for the sake of making money, may pick up a very reasonable income by always jobbing against a Saturday market. Very few of the leading firms come to town on Saturdays. The House is only half full, and business is not taken seriously. As a result, anyone who wants to mark up a stock and make it look good, invariably chooses Saturday to effect his purpose. On the other hand, those who wish to buy shares cheap very often bang the market on Saturday. But Monday brings its revenge. Then the conditions of business are normal, and prices adjust themselves accurately to the state of the account. It is always a dangerous thing to follow a Saturday market, and it is usually quite safe to go against it. Therefore, I am suspicious of the enthusiasm displayed by the Stock Exchange in the matter of Home Rails.

The new issues continue to go badly. The Kansas-Oklahoma Oil is a prospectus principally remarkable for the large profit asked for by the promoters. The Anglo-French Mercantile and Finance was not an attractive proposition. The Oilfields of Mexico was an attempt to sell the Furber Oilfields to the British public. Opinion as to the value of these fields is divided, and it is a curious thing that no definite statement of past profits is included in the prospectus. It is a very gambling venture. We have had two important issues during the week. Messrs. Speyer Brothers offering one million 4½ per cent. debentures in the London General Omnibus Company, and one million 5 per cent. cumulative income debenture stock. The first debentures are, of course, an excellent security, but the income debentures are definitely speculative, and are really more in the nature of preference shares. The Omnibus Company is doing a very large business, but if its profits continue to increase, there is very little doubt that a good many people will start competitive omnibuses. Messrs. Speyers have done extremely well out of their omnibus deal, and the way in which they have pulled the Underground Electric out of the mud shows that the firm has not only immense courage and foresight, but also a remarkable capacity for finance.

The Emba Caspian prospectus is now issued. I do not wish to be too critical, because I believe that the land that the company will acquire is some of the best Oil land in Russia, but I think that the price to be paid, namely, one million roubles, is far too high. The Ural Caspian has more land, and its purchase price was only 327,500. The public are asked to subscribe for 1,140,000 shares, but they should understand that if the land is as valuable as is stated, it would be much better to buy Urals, for the Ural Company has been at work for a long time past, possesses a more valuable property, and works out at a cheaper rate per plot. There seems no end to the Canadian real estates companies. The Western Canadian City and Town Lands ask us for £80,000. There is hardly a person in England who has not had a gamble in Canadian land, and up to the present everybody has made money. But in the opinion of good judges who have studied Canada closely, a set-back seems inevitable. Then, only the companies which have moderate capitals and good land will be able to withstand the panic.

MONEY.—If the Government would only release its balances, we might have easy Money for a few weeks. But the American demand will prevent any lengthened period of cheap Money. Crops in the United States are good and will require to be financed. The Canadian crop is also good, and it is said that in Russia and Hungary much better crops than last year will be obtained. All these good crops mean a demand on the Money market. If we got a boom on the Stock Exchange in the autumn we should certainly see the Bank Rate go to 4 per cent.

CONSOLS.—There has been some buying of Consols, but it is declared that the bear account has vanished. It is difficult to know exactly how accounts stand to-day on the Stock Exchange, for most people pawn the stock with banks, and thus appear to be paying cash when they are really carrying over. I think Consols will improve.

FOREIGNERS.—Nothing has been done in the market. Paris continues to support Russians, and the big banks have just made an issue of Russian Railway bonds.

HOME RAILS.—The reports, as they come out, show that the working expenses of all the railways increased enormously during the past six months. The Great Central is in a bad plight, and few people expected that it would pass all Preference share dividend after 1874. I think, however, that the company has turned the corner. It will take some time before it reaps the benefit of its expenditure on the Immingham Docks, but it has a big future in front of it, and those who want a lock-up investment cannot do better than buy the '89 and '91 Preference. Whether they will get a dividend for the current half-year is, perhaps, doubtful, but each year that the company exists its position will grow stronger. North Eastern have made great savings. This is an admirably managed line, and the stock is cheap. Lancashire and Yorkshire should easily recover their position. The tip on the Stock Exchange is Dover A. The House always gambles in Little Chats and Dover A. I only repeat what I am told. I will not take the responsibility of advising a purchase. The Midland figures were not so bad as they appeared. This railway is well managed, and I think that the Preferred ordinary are a thoroughly sound investment. The Deferred look quite high enough. The Brighton figures are bad, and those who hold Brighton A should get out.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

YANKEES.—Mr. Pierpont Morgan has returned to New York, and he is said to be bullish. The tone is undoubtedly good, but I do not think that any important rise will take place before the autumn. Everyone is talking about a famous circular issued by the great Berlin house of Bleichroder, in which the big banker warns his clients not to gamble in Yankees. Copper oscillates in an uncertain fashion. Nevertheless, I feel sure that Anaconda will increase its dividend at the next distribution, and that Amalgamated will follow suit. Copper will remain strong during the whole of the present year, for the refineries have the position in their hands. Trade is good, and the supply unequal to the demand.

RUBBER.—The market in raw rubber has not strengthened as I expected. The contracts for the forthcoming year have been made, but no rise has ensued. This is unusual. Nevertheless, I see no chance of any drop in Rubber. There has been a steady investment demand for the leading shares. I see no advantage to the Selangor River shareholders in purchasing the two new estates. The capital of the company is increased, and dividends will be reduced, all for a prospective advantage. Were I a shareholder, I should attend the meeting, and vote against the increase in capital.

OIL.—The Oil market is fairly steady. The dealers have kept prices firm in view of the big Emba Caspian flotation. Mr. Barnett has now arranged to take the Moreni Oilfields into his combine, and this gives him additional working capital. I hope it will prove sufficient, but he has a big area to work, and he will require large sums. Urals appear to me a much cheaper purchase than Embas. The lawsuit with regard to the Emba Caspienne was settled by the payment of 22,500 shares, £6,000 in cash, and all costs. Everybody is now asking when these shares will come upon the market. The Shell people bid 3¼ for them, but the offer was refused. This hardly seems wise.

KAFFIRS AND RHODESIANS.—There is still talk of a rise in Amalgamated Props. I do not think that anything will be done before the autumn, but there is no doubt that this will be the first share to move. All the Rhodesian reports, as they come out, are very bad. Eldorado appears to be in a bad way, and there is no good news of Shamva. It is safe to keep out of all Kaffirs and Rhodesians until the holidays are over. Paris declares that she will have nothing more to do with the Kaffir market.

TIN.—The Tin market looks reasonably hard. It is said that the Bisichi have patched up their pipeline. All sorts of rumours are coming over with regard to the increased outputs, and there is no doubt that Nigeria will turn out a large amount of Tin within the next two months. Amalgamation is to be the order of the day. Nigerian Consolidated intend to amalgamate with Ningghi, and it is said that Anglo-Continental will absorb another company. Nassarawa, one of the most disgraceful companies floated during the boom, is in trouble, and people who have been landed with the shares are now determined to get their money back. I am afraid it is a hopeless business.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The news that Lord St. Davids had gone into Egypt should put heart into holders of Egyptian shares. His group is very powerful, and Abdy's Company will be re-organised. The shares look cheap.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE DOCK STRIKE—FREEDOM THE CLEAR ISSUE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—The community are greatly indebted to Lord Devonport and his colleagues for the clear and consistent stand they are making for freedom of labour in the Port of London. When estimating the representative character of Lord Devonport, the 18,000 men at work in the Port must be taken into account, to say nothing of those who have been coerced into striking.

The men on strike are not asked to surrender unconditionally, and one condition, as quoted in Lord Devonport's letter, published yesterday, is such as should be satisfactory to all who believe in freedom. The condition is that "men engaged undertake to work as directed by their employers, and they engage not to require the production of any union or federation ticket from any other man, however employed in the Port of London, whether afloat or ashore." The members of the unions are left free to remain members. Is it asking too much that it be a condition of their returning to work that they shall not interfere with the freedom of the non-unionists to remain outside the unions?

That freedom is the clear issue is manifest from facts recorded in Sir Edward Clarke's report on the origin of the strike, viz. :—James Thomas, in the employ of the Mercantile Lighterage Company, sixty-one years of age and a freeman of the River Thames, refused to join the Amalgamated Society of Watermen, Lightermen, and Watchmen of the River Thames, in spite of all attempts on the part of the society to induce him to do so. On April 30 last, a member of the society refused to work with Thomas; other members followed in this, and on May 16 all the firm's men were called out because of the continued employment of Thomas. This action not having the desired effect, the society on May 19 called out their men in other firms, and on May 21 the Stevedores and the Dockers' Union and the Carmen's Union passed resolutions supporting the strike.

Thus, what the leaders of the strike call recognition of the unions means annihilation of the non-union workers. The Report of the Royal Commission on the Railway Strike last year made an important pronouncement on this point. The Commissioners were unanimous in reporting that "Men have the right to determine their engagement by giving a lawful notice, but with the exercise of their freedom in this respect they should not, in our opinion, be permitted to incite or coerce by threats or any form of intimidation men who desire to give their labour."

The Royal Commission on the Trade Union Outrages in Sheffield, in their report in 1869, were most emphatic in their insistence on freedom for all. This report gave to trade unions their charter, and all trade unionists should take to heart the following paragraphs from this report :—

"With regard to the general question of the right of workmen to combine together for determining and stipulating with their employer the terms on which only they will consent to work for him, we think that full liberty be left to all other workmen to undertake the work which the parties combining have refused, and no obstruction be placed in the way of the employer resorting elsewhere in the search of a supply of labour; there is no ground of justice or policy for withholding such a right from the workmen. It cannot be doubted that a demand backed by the resolution of a large body of workmen to decline work if the demand be not acceded to comes with more force than that of an isolated workman; and we think that the workmen may reasonably claim to be allowed any advantage which they can derive from such concerted action, in bargaining with their employer from time to time as to the terms on which they will dispose of their labour. . . .

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

"But upon the same principle and for a precisely similar reason we think that, whilst conceding to such workmen a desire to exercise it an extended right to combine against their employers, especial care should be taken that an equal right be secured to those workmen who desire to keep aloof from the combination, to dispose of their labour with perfect freedom as they severally think fit. The power of working, and consequently the value of a man's labour, varies in different individuals according to their strength, their skill, and their industry. The workmen who think it for their advantage to combine together in the disposal of their labour are no more justified in constraining any other workman, who does not desire such association, to combine with them—to bring his labour into common stock, as it were, with theirs—than an association of capitalists in constraining an individual capitalist to bring his capital into common stock with theirs; and it is the more important that the law should protect the non-unionist workman in his right freely to dispose of his labour as he thinks fit, because, standing alone, he is the less able to protect himself."

If there were only 18 non-union workers employed in the Port of London to-day, instead of more than 18,000, their freedom should be maintained.

"In our halls is hung
Armoury of the invincible Knights of old:
We must be free or die, who speak the tongue
That Shakespeare spake, the faith and morals hold Which Milton held."

I am, etc.,

MARK H. JUDGE,
Chairman of Committee.

Societies of Free Workers, 7, Pall Mall, S.W.
July, 1912.

ANGLO-GERMAN RELATIONS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I have read Mr. T. G. Martin's letter in your issue of the 13th inst., and Mr. Immo Allen's and Mr. Turner's comments thereon, with sincere admiration for the patience with which these two gentlemen have replied to his long-winded and somewhat atrabilious dissertation. I had read Mr. Martin's letter with something of the amused interest with which I watched and listened to the impudent drollery of the Münchner Kasperl at the open-air theatre in the Bavarian capital last year. For the quality that extorts both one's merriment and—despite moral qualms—one's admiration in the German Punchinello is the rascal's reckless audacity and the impartial iniquity with which he distributes his blows, and plays his scurvy tricks on friend and foe alike. In one respect, too, he shares the distinction of another noted dramatic author; there is no moral in his tale, unless it be "toujours l'audace."

I cannot help suspecting that Mr. Martin must some time or other have loitered too long at the Marionetten Theatre in Munich, with the result that a whilom blameless character has suffered serious moral deterioration, while a saturnine humour has developed Mephistophelian qualities, albeit its lambent flames play about their subject harmlessly enough. For what is the upshot of the two columns which your correspondent has induced you, in a moment of surely thoughtless generosity, to grant him? A nasty blow for Mr. Allen, a would-be ally; a back-hander for "T. McL."—as far as three initials are vulnerable; a swipe for Lord Courtney of Penwith, and a wild lunge at poor Mr. Turner. But these exercises are merely hors-d'œuvres. Having got his hand in, our hero swings his flail round and round and runs amok among the nation at large, till one sees whole swathes laid low, pacifists and Jingoes, Norman Angells and English devils alike.

Surely, after all this pother we might expect to be treated to some inkling of the true and only gospel according to Mr. T. G. Martin. If everybody else is wrong we might at least hope for guidance by Sir Oracle after making our submission with becoming humility. But beyond dark hints—"I might, an I would, a tale unfold"—and a vague suggestion that war is not inevitable and might be averted by concessions which we could "afford to make," there is no light or leading for anxious inquirers. To add to the confusion we are told that "we are not likely to get on to the right track until we realise . . . . (2) that in order to avoid war it is necessary not only to get on to the right track and stick to it ourselves, but to see that other people who have it in their power to drag us into war follow our example"! As I am not one of those who hold peace or war in the hollow of their hand, I am only concerned to "get on to the right track" in order to avoid war; and I am all the more anxious for guidance as I am assured that a realisation of the necessity of getting on to the right track is the only way to get on to it.

It is all breathlessly bewildering. But in order to clear the ground I will conclude by asking Mr. Martin to answer a plain question. What are the concessions on our part which fulfil the dual condition, suggested by him, of having the power to avert war and at the same time being such as we can "afford to make" while "safeguarding our own interests"? I am Sir, yours faithfully,

GEORGE F. SHEE.

Streatham Hill, S.W.

POETRY AND THE PUBLIC.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—As a nation we certainly are not such sentimental lovers of poetry as they were in the Elizabethan age, "when even the pastrycooks were expert mythologists, and when at dinner select transformations of Ovid's metamorphoses were exhibited in confectionery, and the splendid icing of an immense historic plumcake was embossed with a delicious basso-relievo of the destruction of Troy." But although we do not nowadays make use of poetical extracts as they did in the time of Elizabeth, and although the present generation is dead to the harmony and thrilling vibrations of our best and noblest poems, there are, notwithstanding, more readers of poetry in this age than ever was known before. The reason why the better kind of poetry is not appreciated as it deserves to be, or why so many individuals who give themselves to the reading thereof do not feel the thrills of delight which vibrate through the soul of a true lover of poetry, is, I believe, chiefly due to the neglect of our present system of education in cultivating the feelings and emotions—in leaving them so entirely to the sway of the carnal propensities that the heart and the affections become defiled and corrupted at the root. The feelings and emotions of the present age are not dead. Of a truth, they are stronger than ever. But they have become so perverted and misdirected through too great a love of self, and so debased through love of worldly things, that good and noble thoughts have lost their power to thrill and draw man's soul into higher and happier states. It is said that during the Civil War and the Protectorate poetry and the drama were buried under the strife and anxiety of contending factions. And maybe another reason why good poetry does not appeal in these times more directly and extensively to the higher feelings and emotions in man is on account of the strife and contentions existing among all classes and conditions of mankind. Nevertheless, as all good poetry has something divine in it, it can never die. It may be neglected, but it is continually sowing the good seed; and the progress and happiness of all nations is, and has always been, greatly dependent upon the influence and the power the writings of the Muses exert over the feelings and emotions of mankind.—Yours faithfully,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

J. R. MORETON.

"Lynton," Brockley Rise, S.E.

QUESTIONABLE POLICY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In his article "Playing with Fire," Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett states that there are only two ways of facing the situation which he is discussing, namely :—

(1) To let Germany know that our patience is exhausted, and that we would just as soon fight now as later; or

(2) To build an unassailably predominant fleet by means of a Naval Loan.

I venture to suggest, however, that there is another and a wiser course open to us, namely :—

(3) To recognise Germany's absolute right to territorial expansion, and to assure her of our full sympathy and co-operation in her efforts to obtain a temperate colony into which her population may overflow.

I have always maintained, and I shall continue to maintain, that the attitude of ourselves and of the United States to Germany is selfish and ungenerous in the extreme. We British are obviously terror-struck at Germany's growing strength and are resolved to go to any lengths (short of actual fighting) to keep her within her present boundaries; and the United States have a similar feeling with regard to Japan. Let us, therefore, join together to keep the Teuton and the New Oriental in their respective places, while we, the Anglo-Saxon race, the crown of age-long civilisation, control the destinies of the world!

This is the broadly ethical view of the situation; but if we look at the matter from a merely practical standpoint, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett's "two ways" suggest two corresponding doubts :—

(1) If we were to fight now, would we necessarily be successful against Germany?

(2) If we build a predominant fleet at vast expense, is it not possible that some development in aerial navigation will render all these costly ships quite ineffective as a protection to our shores?

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

London Institution. IMMO S. ALLEN.

BOOKS RECEIVED

MISCELLANEOUS.

A Dictionary of Quotations. (Enclyclopædic Library.) By Colonel P. H. Dalbiac. (T. Nelson and Sons. 1s. net.)

The Good-Natured Man. She Stoops to Conquer. By Oliver Goldsmith. (Blackie and Son. 6d. each.)

The Doctor and His Work, with a Hint of His Destiny and Ideals. By Charles J. Whitby, M.D. (Stephen Swift and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

The National Insurance Act Explained. By O. H. Cooke, M.A. With a Preface by J. H. Whitehouse, M.P. Third Edition, Revised. (Murray and Evenden. 3d. net.)

A Comparative Study of the Law of Corporations, with Particular Reference to the Protection of Creditors and Shareholders. By Arthur K. Kuhn, Ph.D., LL.B. (P. S. King and Son. 6s.)

The Negro at Work in New York City: A Study in Economic Progress. By George Edmund Haynes, Ph.D. (P. S. King and Son. 5s.)

The Spirit of Chinese Philanthropy: A Study in Mutual Aid. By Yu-Yue Tsu, Ph.D. (P. S. King and Son. 4s.)

Provincial and Local Taxation in Canada. By Solomon Vineberg, Ph. D. (P. S. King and Son. 6s.)

The Shifting of Literary Values. By Albert Mordell. ("The International," Philadelphia.)

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS.

British Radicalism, 1791-1797. By Walter Phelps Hall. (P. S. King and Son. 8s.)

Dans l'Atlantique: Sainte-Hélène aux XVIIe et XVIIIe Siècles, etc. By Henri Dehérain. With Maps. (Hachette and Co. 3 fr. 50 c.)

Luke Shepherd: Ein Satirendichter der Englischen Reformationszeit. By Dr. Friedrich Germann. (Theodor Lampart, Augsburg. 2 marks 50.)

The Romance of Sandro Botticelli, Woven from His Paintings. By A. J. Anderson. Illustrated. (Stanley Paul and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

Adelaide Anne Procter: Ihr Leben und Ihre Werke. By Ferdinand Janku. (Wilhelm Braumüller, Vienna and Leipzig. 2 marks.)

Arthur Hugh Clough. By Paula Lutonsky. (Wilhelm Braumüller. 2 marks.)

L'Histoire des Arabes. By C. Huart. Tome I. (Paul Geuthner, Paris. The 2 vols, 20 fr.)

FICTION.

The Web of the Golden Spider. By F. O. Bartlett. Illustrated by Edmund Blomfield and Charles M. Relyea. (Frank Palmer. 6s.)

The Storm Dog: A Romance of Cornwall. By Lilian Arnold. (John Long. 6s.)

Basil Verely: A Study in Charterhouse Life. By Archibald K. Ingram. Illustrated by F. E. Hiley and H. L. Bacon. (G. Allen and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

Mightier than the Sword. By Alphonse Courlander. (T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

Marooned in the South Seas: A Tale of Adventure for Boys and Others. By F. L. Langdale. Illustrated by Mowbray Percy. (Murray and Evenden. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Confession of a Fool. By August Strindberg. Translated by Ellie Schleussner. (Stephen Swift and Co.)

The Reformer's Wife. By A. Jeans. (Murray and Evenden. 6s.)

Dr. Brown's Partner. By Ianthe Cavendish. (W. J. Ham-Smith. 6s.)

Pan's Garden: A Volume of Nature Stories. By Algernon Blackwood. Illustrated by W. Graham Robertson. (Macmillan and Co. 6s.)

From the Angle of Seventeen. By Eden Phillpotts. (John Murray. 3s. 6d. net.)

Paul Burdon. By Sir Wm. Magnay, Bt. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

A Member of Tatts. By Nat Gould. (John Long. 1s. net.)

PERIODICALS.

The Economic Review; Cornhill Magazine; Everyone's Story Magazine; Blackwood's Magazine; Windsor Magazine; Bookseller; London University Gazette; Fortnightly Review; Publishers' Circular; Literary Digest, N.Y.; The Idler; The Triad, Dunedin; Revue Bleue; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; The Antiquary.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Twelve years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC
OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO . . AND THROUGH CANADA . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service via Vancouver.

For further particulars apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE
TO
SOUTH AND EAST AFRICA.
WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.
VIA the SUEZ CANAL:
Calling at GIBRALTAR, MARSEILLES and NAPLES

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.
(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.
Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE
PLEASURE CRUISES
LIVERPOOL
to the
MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC
by the
"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"
. . . Ports of Call . . .
CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, ——PALERMO, NAPLES.——

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

P & O Passenger Services.
EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports.
(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)
Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises
Throughout the Year, according to Season.
AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.
Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,
102, Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours.

R.M.S.P. PLEASURE CRUISES.

To	Fare	Length of Tour	Sailing	From
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £22.	Days 23.	Every Thursday Fortnight.	London.
THE AZORES.	£17†	19.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£12.	8 upwards.	Weekly.	Southampton & Liverpool.
WEST INDIES.	From £40.	From 34.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
NORWAY.	From £1 a day	13 upwards.	June to August.	Grimsby & Leith.
BALTIC & RUSSIA.	From £1 a day.	24.	August 24.	Grimsby.
MEDITERRANEAN, HOLY LAND & EGYPT.	From £1 a day.	10.	September to November.	Southampton & Marseilles.

†Including Hotel Accommodation.

For further particulars apply:—

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY,
London: 18, Moorgate St., E.C., or 32, Cockspur St., S.W.

FEARLESS CRITICISM

In support of principle
In exposure of humbug
In scorn of cant

THE COMMENTATOR

A Weekly Review of Politics, Art, Music, Literature, and the Stage.

ONE PENNY WEEKLY of all Newsagents—or sent direct from the Publishers, for 6s. per annum (post free) or 3s. for six months.

COMMENTATOR, Ltd., 31, Essex St., London

Published for the Proprietor by Wm. Dawson and Sons, Limited, at Cannon House, Breams Buildings, London, E.C.
Branches in Canada: Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg; in South Africa: Capetown, Johannesburg, and Durban.
Printed by Bonner & Co., The Chancery Lane Press, Rolls Passage, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

CONTENTS

	PAGE
Notes of the Week	163
The Satyr	164
Romance	164
The Novels of Thomas Love Peacock (1785-1866) ...	165
To St. David's	166
Reviews:
Two Worlds	167
The Compleat Lyric-Taster	168
Egyptian Literature ...	169
Indian Imputations ...	170
A Victory of Criticism	171
The Noble Game ...	172
Fair Portugal	173
An American Traveller	173
The Satires of Horace	174
Shorter Reviews	175
Fiction	177
The Apotheosis of Mrs. Humphry Ward ...	178
Posterity and Boswell ...	179
A Martyr of Empire ...	180
A Correspondence with Mr. Andrew Lang ...	182
At St. Stephen's Shrine ...	183
Notes and News	186
Imperial and Foreign Affairs	186
Motoring	188
In the Temple of Mammon	189
Correspondence	191
Books Received	191

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C., where all communications to the Editor should be addressed.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Notes of the Week

THE opening of the holiday season has been marred by wretched weather, and, unhappily, by several accidents, many of which must be set down as caused by the storms and gales of the last week or two. The mishap to the cutter of the boy scouts off Sheppey is one of the saddest occurrences of the Bank Holiday week-end, and has cast a gloom over all who are interested in the movement. It is remarkable how often we have to be roused by some lamentable fatality before steps are taken to prevent the possibility of an accident or to minimise its effect; especially has this been emphasised lately. Through the loss of the Titanic fresh regulations as to the equipment of fast liners will undoubtedly come into operation; and now, after nine little boy scouts are drowned, we learn that "the Board of Trade has decided to provide life-saving apparatus for the Sheppey coast, and with the consent of the Admiralty it will be stored at Leysdown coast-guard station"—the very spot where such appliances might have saved their lives. As a nation, we seem adepts at the game of shutting the stable-door after the horse has gone in matters of this sort. The sensible thing would appear to be to use a little more fore-thought—to supply life-saving gear wherever it is likely to be needed, without waiting for the loss of life to prick us into belated activity.

Englishmen should really have learned by this time that if they propose to cruise in German waters their cameras should be left behind. We say nothing here as to the rights or wrongs of the arrest of the five young Englishmen who were sailing their yacht near Kiel a few days ago; but the probability seems to be that they were simply enjoying a harmless holiday in the best and most thoroughly English way—on the water. They ought to have known, however, that to be seen taking photographs in the vicinity of German fortifications was to ask for trouble; in view of recent occurrences it was a stupid thing to do—not long ago we were exercised over the case of a young German who sinned in the same way over here. These incidents are not calculated to improve the strained relations that unfortunately seem doomed to exist between two countries which by all considerations of reason should be friendly, and it is a pity that with their holiday equipment they did not include a larger proportion of common sense.

One by one our little illusions are vanishing, and during the last week another has gone. For years we have clearly understood that if we desired true happiness, a healthy bank account, fine weather for our holidays, immunity from colds in the head, and plum-pudding at Christmas, the absolutely infallible way to secure these and other blessings was to take a "cold tub" every morning. It was delicately intimated to us by enthusiasts that devotion to the icy morning dip had made us a great nation; that people who shirked it were cowards, of no worth physically or mentally. We have always admired the cold morning bath—from a distance; we have awakened with the lark and other distressingly early birds and thought, as we rearranged our pillows, how fine a thing it must be to take the plunge, to appear at breakfast-time on an equality with those tough young blades who, smiling loftily, recount their prowess at unearthly hours with towel and sponge. And now we learn from an octogenarian of Hampstead that his long life and jollity is solely attributable to—neglect of the cold bath, and a periodic indulgence in the hot bath. There is no arguing with an octogenarian, and so genial a one withal; nor do we wish to argue. We believe him, gratefully; and for once the process of shattering an illusion has been pleasant.

Another notion fairly common to most of us is that food and drink were necessary to support life; but even this, it seems, must be modified. "If a man is hungry," says Professor Bergonie, of Bordeaux, "give him electricity; if he asks for bread or a beefsteak, put him in an electric chair and turn on the current." The learned professor has discovered that certain currents passed through the body produce warmth and increase weight just as do more ordinary forms of nutriment, and that they "do not tax the digestive organs." We can well believe it. At the same time, we like our digestive organs to be taxed (in a strictly non-political sense). We are inclined to ask the professor to turn his busy brain to some more pleasant theme. One can carry scientific effects too far!

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Satyr

SOFT falls the dappled sunlight's print
Upon the lawn beneath the beeches:
It showers bright discs of yellow tint
Across her dress: like ripening peaches
They glimmer through the muslin's folds
And shine like oats among her hair.
Dropped in her spreading lap she holds
A heap of roses. Seated there,
She follows where her visions lead:
And to and fro behind her seat
A satyr pipes upon his reed
A music so forlorn and sweet
That, while it falls across her dream,
The tears grow starry in her eyes
For fauns and nymphs of wood and stream
And perished garden-deities.

MARTIN D. ARMSTRONG.

Romance

WHERE dwells Romance? The pessimist grumbles and groans, and with a wry face declares that there is no such divine thing as romance in this prosaic age. The townsman grieves at his constant imprisonment by bricks and mortar, and tells us that romance has fled to the country, affrighted; the countryman comes to London, and finds the city to be the very home of romance; the fact being that romance is as elusive as the cricket of the wayside hedge, whose song we hear, yet seek him in vain. It lies in ourselves, undoubtedly; but there is a sense in which we may judge the townsman to be nearer to the truth. For it seems certain that romance is not in the writing of books, or in the multitude of offices, or in the mechanical roaring of streets and high-roads; it must surely be nearer to the man whose concern is with the earth and sea, who wrests his living from the rich brown land, or spends his evenings at the wide seine, afloat in some little bay, enclosing a shoal of fish. He may not always feel it; but he often does, for we know of one old Cornishman who sits day after day watching the sky and sea before his little fleet of four or five boats, who said emphatically that his one day in London was enough for him. He couldn't stand it; he wouldn't live in town for anything; and he pitied those who had to earn their daily bread out of sight of the sea, far from the sound of its waves. And, confronted with his simple wisdom, we realised a tremendous contrast between the purity and perfect naturalness of his life, and the artificiality of the strenuous life of the city.

Nowhere, perhaps, is this contrast more evident than in some corners of the West Country. There is a tiny village, set in a cleft of the great rocky cliffs of Cornwall, betrayed even close at hand only by the thin smoke rising from its ivied chimneys, where not a murmur from the outer world ever comes. A little curved stone pier protects half-a-dozen fishing-boats from storm and wind and makes a fairy harbour, where Titania might well embark—for heather and foxglove bloom right down to the ridge of dry weed that marks high tide. Its whitewashed inn has no bar, and two old ladies welcome the traveller who knocks on its open door. Its post-office is distinguished by a painted board almost buried in purple clematis, and he who would buy stamps forgets his errand in breathless admiration of its garden crammed with flowers—with fuchsias whose trunks are thick as a young oak, and under whose living shower of blossom a man may rest in the shade. Hardly a murmur of sound can be heard save the gentle lapping of the waves, the lazy booming of bees, and occasionally quiet voices from open doorways. A few feet up the cliff on either hand, and you may turn to look down on the thatched roofs of this tiny world; a few feet more, and the village is lost to sight, and you are alone with the wind, the sailing gulls, and the eternal sea.

And what is this thrill that takes the heart when, with almost the feeling of an intruder, you walk its winding pathways—it has no street—and find that life is good? What but the rising of romance, that, like some stream long hidden underground, suddenly springs to a re-birth in the sunshine?

> So that I draw the breath of finer air
> Station is naught, nor footways laurel-strewn,
> Nor rivals tightly-belted for the race.

So sang Meredith, than whom none heard the call of earth more clearly. The city buries us; it breeds competitors at every turn, waiting for our failure that they may step higher; is it any wonder that we recapture some of the gracious influences of the earth when for a time we consider the less complex problems which men have to face in simpler spheres? To watch the sky, to row off to the nets at sunset, to gain the news of the day in faint echoes by chat in front of cottage doors; to feel a more lively interest in the ripening corn in a field on the cliff-side than in a dock strike or a possible German invasion; to find incidents and episodes in the flourishing of the gardens or the painting of the boats: these things are true and real and important, yet are of the very essence of romance. They are as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land; for a time the burden of the city slips from our shoulders. And, in fine, our argument amounts to this: that in seeking holiday away from towns, we are in reality only obeying a primal impulse that bids us seek romance, or that bids us, rather, seek a real, visible outlet for that romance which is implanted deeply within us, and which never withers nor dies.

W. L. R.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Novels of Thomas Love Peacock (1785-1866)

IT is an ill day for an author when he ceases to be known save as the friend of a more illustrious contemporary. On such days, alas! does Thomas Love Peacock appear to have fallen, for he is better known as the friend of Shelley than as the author of works which may justly be described as unique in English Literature. One reason of his obscurity is the atmosphere of pedantry in which he invariably enshrouded the most simple utterances and the most commonplace incidents: indeed, the flavour of Attic salt which permeates his novels is so pungent as to be distasteful to any save a strictly classical palate. Yet a taste for that flavour once acquired is not easily lost. No author is better skilled than Peacock in the art of heightening the piquancy of a ludicrous situation by the grandiloquence of the language in which it is described. Of Peacock as a poet it is not here our concern to speak save in so far as we happen to touch upon the fragments interspersed throughout the novels.

Like Horace, he shunned the heights of Parnassus, and he was too keen a critic ever to allow his imagination the freedom requisite for attainment thereunto. The position which he holds in English Literature is exceptional from many points of view and for many reasons. When one of our most eminent literary critics is driven to describe his style as "having something of Sallust, something of Tacitus, something of Lucian, and something of Voltaire," it is almost self-evident that his style is peculiarly his own. Not less peculiar to himself than his manner of expression are the sentiments which he expresses. So bitter was his enmity against the champions of what passes for social progress that one might be tempted to set him down as an advocate of the so-called simple life. But no greater injustice could be done to his memory than to suppose that he was an opponent of real progress. The main lesson which he is constantly seeking to enforce is the truth, now as in his day assiduously ignored, that more knowledge does not necessarily make a man wiser, nor an increase in the aggregate wealth of a community connote an increase in the happiness of the individuals composing it. Unfortunately, so inveterate was his habit of mixing chaff with grain, the gall of satire with the wine of edification, that the two are rarely severable; consequently Peacock never became more than an armchair reformer, and wasted his energies in a futile, though vigorous, laus temporis acti. Like many another critic, he was apt to forget that the denunciation of cant is in danger of degenerating into that against which it is directed.

The novels consist of the following, in their order of publication: "Headlong Hall" (1816), "Melincourt" (1817), "Nightmare Abbey" (1818), "Maid Marian" (1822), "The Misfortunes of Elphin" (1829), "Crotchet Castle" (1831), and "Gryll Grange" (1860). Many features are common to all of them: for example, the continuous fire of scorn and criticism aimed at parsons, paper money, universities, officialism, and Grub Street journalism. With the exception of the Reverend Dr. Opimian in "Gryll Grange," possibly also of Dr. Folliott in "Crotchet Castle" (who, however, is only follis optimus, folle ottimo—to wit, a windbag), the fraternity of the cloth is uniformly represented as seeking and caring for naught beside the good things of this world. Dr. Gaster in "Headlong Hall" is "venter, et praeterea nihil"; the Reverend Mr. Portpipe in "Melincourt" devotes most of his attention to the buzzing of bottles and kindred diversions. In the last-mentioned work the author portrayed the most despicable of all his characters, the Reverend Mr. Grovelgrub. A slightly more kindly view of the Church is presented in "Nightmare Abbey" in the person of Mr. Larynx, who is simply "a good-natured, accommodating divine."

The mere mention of paper money suffices to render Peacock rabid, and of universities he has no good word to say. In "Nightmare Abbey" Scythrop is sent to a private school, "where a little learning was painfully beaten into him, and from thence to the university, where it was carefully taken out of him." The University is described as "the house of mental bondage." Harry Headlong in "Headlong Hall" set off on an expedition to Oxford, to inquire for other varieties of the same genera, namely, men of taste and philosophers; but being assured by a learned professor that there were no such things in the University, he proceeded to London. In "Crotchet Castle" the Universities are denounced for their scornful neglect of Plato. The only thing in Oxford to which Dr. Folliott was inclined to pay the least respect was Friar Bacon's brazen nose adorning the portals of the college of that name. "That nose, sir, is the only thing to which I shall take off my hat, in all this Babylon of buried literature." Sir Telegraph, says Mr. Forester in "Melincourt," "had some learning when he went to college; but he was cured of it before he came away. Great indeed must be the zeal for improvement which an academical education cannot extinguish."

That Peacock extended such rancour to individuals matters little now that they have long passed away. Coleridge, Southey, Wordsworth, Shelley, and Byron all came in for liberal and insensate stripes of the tarred rope. The novels are pervaded by ironic humour of the kind which provokes laughter not loud but deep. The most romantic scenes and incidents do not escape this ironic treatment. Peacock was, above all things, a disciple of Rabelais, and everything in heaven and earth is viewed in the light of la haute sagesse Pantagrueline. He is inimitable in inventing and describing droll situations: typical of them is the passage in "Nightmare Abbey," descriptive of the first occasion upon which Scythrop is confronted jointly with his two fair charmers, Stella and Marionetta. "Scythrop knew not what to do. He could not attempt to conciliate the one without irreparably offending the other; and he was so fond of both that the idea of depriving himself for ever of the society of either was intolerable to him: he therefore retreated into his stronghold, mystery; maintained an impenetrable silence; and contented himself with stealing occasionally a deprecating glance at each of the objects of his idolatry."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The dialogue of the novels is replete with delicious repartee and bons mots. "I am sorry," says Matilda ("Maid Marian") to her father, "that you should have gone to bed supperless." "I did not go to bed supperless," said the baron; "I did not go to bed at all." "Small talk," says Escot in "Headlong Hall," "small indeed! The absolute minimum of the infinitely little." But few of Peacock's characters rise above the level of marionettes, created and maintained for the express and sole purpose of voicing certain sentiments, often incongruous with their supposed character. In fact, if more than a moderate dose of the literary tonic is taken at a single sitting the effect of one character after the other popping up and expatiating upon the favourite theme in the favourite way is apt to cloy. The novels are almost wholly deficient in plot, and even if it be conceded that Peacock occasionally succeeded in creating a male character, Seithenyn ap Seithyn, for example, he never made more of a female one than a doll. Again, he was guilty, from the point of view of technique, of the most flagrant faults. Fax and Forester in "Melincourt," supposed to be engaged in an anxious search for Anthelia, devote the greater part of their time to viewing local objects of interest and to protracted philosophical discussions. But no wise reader visits these tales for plot or delineation of character, and there is abundance of riches to compensate for that which is lacking in such respects.

Many of the songs and poems contained in the novels are of the greatest charm and the very highest literary merit. The war song of Dinas Vawr in "The Misfortunes of Elphin" has been described as "the succinctest piece of humorous modern poetry in the world":—

> The mountain sheep are sweeter,
> But the valley sheep are fatter;
> We therefore deemed it meeter
> To carry off the latter.

and the song of the seamen three in "Nightmare Abbey":—

> Seamen three! What men be ye?
> Gotham's three wise men we be—has substantial claims to be considered "the very best of all modern drinking songs." The glee song entitled "The Ghosts," in "Melincourt," is almost equally rich in artistic merits. Of the serious poems, whatever may be said in favour of the claims of "Love and Age" in "Gryll Grange" to pride of place, there can be no doubt concerning the beauty of the three little stanzas in "Crotchet Castle" beginning:—

> In the days of old
> Lovers felt true passion,
> Deeming years of sorrow
> By a smile repaid.
> Now the charms of gold
> Spells of pride and fashion
> Bid them say good morrow
> To the best-loved maid.

The lesson which Peacock learnt from those days of old and seeks to enforce upon his hearers is that the art of enjoying life lies "in the regulation of the mind, and not in the whisking about of the body," and a great part of his satire is directed against a generation which goes everywhere for the mere sake of going, "rejoicing in the rapidity with which they accomplish nothing." All of the novels are full of good things, such as the description of the character of King Melvas, who "did much mischief, not for mischief's sake, nor yet for the sake of excitement, but for the sake of something tangible." But let us not succumb to the temptations of citation; for no author within an equal space ever created more sayings which one itches to repeat than Thomas Love Peacock. R. E. N.

To St. David's

THE western sea was now not far off, and at the edge of it the only cathedral I ever set out to visit. The rocky land was divided by little rivers in deep valleys, and subdivided, except in the steep and bracken-covered spaces, by stone walls which were crested and sometimes fully and tightly clad with gorse. These gorsy walls lined the road, some of them displaying stones large enough to fill a cart. Few trees stood up, and those only in the valleys. It was near the end of the land and near the end of the year.

A dark isolated tower, all that remained of a castle, dominated like a lighthouse of gloom instead of light the waste of rocks, mud, and drowned grass, and the few small farmhouses or cottages or the ruins of them. All over the earth the sky was dark; but at the horizon before me, well upon the left hand, a pallid gleam descended from behind the clouds on to the sea and on to the high rocks of Ramsey Island: a black promontory, and a chain of black crags beyond, ran out almost to this region of light. Far from Ramsey and its gleam, almost at the verge of the dark sea, rose the azure island of Grassholm, so remote and so unlike earth that I regarded it less as a place on the map than as the island where men once found "a fair and regal spot overlooking the ocean," and a hall thereon where they rested and were glad, and forgot sorrow and all things of the past for four score years, and would have so continued until this day had not a man opened the forbidden door looking towards Cornwall, and thus broken the spell for ever.

I could hear the waves continually, but could not see their motion: the foam breaking on one distant crag hung always in the air as if suspended. Never had the sea and all that was on it appeared to me thus utterly unlike the land. The division between them was as that between the real and the unreal, the tangible and what has been dreamed, the present and the past: in fact, the division was not only as great but the same, and azure Grassholm was indeed a thousand years away, part of a vast dream which I was sharing. The sun came out, warming the bracken, lighting the floods and the white wings of gulls among the rushes, and was hidden again; but still Ramsey loomed pale in its far-off separate gleam, and Grassholm dark and so ancient that no longer did it receive the sun.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The pallid high rocks of Ramsey formed part of a broken ridge, now seen to be prolonged inland across my path, like a jawbone with four or five jagged fangs. Whenever I ascended out of a valley or from the shore I saw this ridge, stark and hungry, flashing its teeth at the heavens. Between it and me a few lonely white houses, whitened even over their roofs, shone out in the dark land which had yet fewer trees than houses. Black cattle moved across the fields, or stood looking over the gateways, always silent. But before me hung that pale ridge, haunting the mind, so that the beautiful bright houses seemed no more than fragments fallen away from it, until suddenly I said to myself: "The cathedral!"

That carved pile, apparently of white marble, about two miles in front, must be the cathedral. Not a house was near, no sign of village or city. The building was solitary, without sign of human possession, in the midst of the low dull land—ample and shining, but alone. That such a cathedral was rewarding my first pilgrimage filled me with gratitude and enthusiasm. I hurried forward eagerly, still with some astonishment that no one had ever given me any idea of the marble wonder at the edge of the land crowning this solitude. How proud and simple it was of the builders to place it, in spite of raiding and burning Norsemen, alone here in the open. A cathedral, divided by nearly twenty miles of wild land from a railway, without a tailor's, an old furniture shop, a picture postcard depôt, or a bookseller's where Paley's "Evidences" could be obtained, without lime trees and embowered Queen Anne residences, clergy and nursemaids, slow glossy carriages and swift butchers' carts—such a cathedral ought to have become one of the famous places of Britain, however unfit for popular resort.

My reason was overcome by this improbable cathedral. I began to think it had been deserted, except by jackdaws. Deserted by clergy, vergers and parasites, it might again become a goal for pilgrimages. I hurried enthusiastically. How extraordinary that no one had ever told me about this cathedral, as lonely as a ship or a windmill. Was it possible after all? Lacking a spire, and possessing hardly a tower, could it be a cathedral? I was inclined to doubt, to suspect that, after all, men had missed the opportunity of building a cathedral out here among two or three white farms and the silent black cattle. No. It could not be. I began to see that it was not one complex building—that it was not of marble—that the mass was resolving itself into two or three distinct insignificant buildings grouped about a more or less central round tower. Half a mile beyond, in St. David's itself, I learnt that this was Twr y Felyn, the Windmill Tower. I was to find that the real cathedral was almost equal to the one which nearness had disenchanted, but as different as possible. The marble cathedral, like a white hill in that stony, dark land, like a fortress, like a lighthouse, beautiful, austere, solitary, remoter even than Grassholm, in a world dreamier than the sea, exists perhaps nowhere except on this paper. EDWARD THOMAS.

REVIEWS

Two Worlds

Anglo-American Memories (Second Series). By G. W. SMALLEY, M.A. (Duckworth and Co. 12s. 6d. net.)

PATRIOTISM being by definition an exclusive passion, the possesson of two patriotisms seems at first sight a kind of bigamy. It is theoretically possible to have all the patriotisms, or, like the Hervéists, none at all, but the result would be a simple negation of morality. Mr. Smalley, by observing one essential condition, that is, by always thinking of his native land first, has honourably achieved the feat of having two countries of his own—America and England; nay, since every cultured and travelled American contains a Parisian, he may claim to be citizen of three lands. The case, within certain limits, may not be quite so rare as we have hinted. Lord Kitchener once said that every Englishman had two countries—England and Italy. The phrase was no doubt exaggerated to suit a particular occasion, but it contains more than a seasoning of truth. It is easy for an Englishman to project himself into the mind of an Italian, to share in the glories and sorrows of his past, and to look forward with him to the realisation of a splendid but not too Futurist future.

That which is true as between England and Italy should à fortiori hold good between England and America. Mr. Smalley makes the remark to Earl Spencer that he had "once heard Sir William Harcourt say that all the great Americans of that great period (Washington's) were English." Earl Spencer's reply, good as a retort—"True, but they were Englishmen who chose to be Americans"—does not invalidate our contention, nor justify, on the face of it, such a feeling as we have lately seen expressed by a judicious, if paradoxical, writer that "to him an American was a foreigner." Wars of independence and dividing seas are like marriages; they destroy but they create families. Misunderstanding is a necessary prelude to completer understanding.

Mr. Smalley in any case is capable of feeling, "à ses heures," like an Englishman; like an Englishman, it may be objected, of a certain caste and of a certain party; but this, after all, is exactly how an Englishman feels. As to the more patent of his patriotisms, we will quote the following bit of dialogue, merely mentioning that the subject was a dispatch destined for the Times and that the first speaker was called Theodore Roosevelt.

"But your point of view is very American."

"Why else do you suppose the Times chose an American as its American representative? It's the

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

American point of view they want. No other could be of so much use to them." ("Which I," adds the narrator, "thought obvious, but it seemed slightly to surprise Mr. Roosevelt at that time.")

This dialogue is illuminating in more ways than one; it proves that Mr. Smalley has not suffered a process of moral denationalisation, and it gives a clue to his conception of journalism. An international journalist, according to him, is an ambassador. He is to find out the facts and to present them as dispassionately as he can to his public. Having done this, he should try to direct opinion towards a certain end. If he has begun by presenting his facts clearly, the task of promoting a good understanding will be robbed of most of its difficulties. The points of sympathetic contact between any two nations, especially between England and America, are numerous, and it is the business of the journalist to emphasise them: which proves the importance of a sound diagnosis. For Mr. Smalley the chief point of contact consists in the social relations between the "governing classes" of the two countries; it is an undemocratic view, but we do not think we need give our grounds for believing it to be a true one. Democracy is blind with many bandages; aristocracy has temptations to fight against. For the unpolitically-minded amongst us, and our name is legion, the chief need is an interpreter, of unimpeachable qualifications, to show us that our national and international aristocracies are at least honest. Mr. Smalley possesses these qualifications; he has strong views of his own, but he moves in both camps, and is thus precluded from seeing his adversaries through distorted glasses; he does not confine his attention to politics in the narrow sense, but gives us glimpses of the other milieux of government—society, finance, art, etc.; finally he is writing, as regards the present work at any rate, of what now belongs definitely to the past, with the result that his judgments have become more matured, and that he can proclaim many things that he once had to keep locked within his breast. "Cessante ratione, cessat lex," as he pleads, in giving the story of a compact, secret at the time, with President Roosevelt.

The most remarkable fact about Mr. Smalley's "Memories" is their exhaustiveness. In the preface to the present volume he answers a hypothetical indicator of lacunæ by pointing out that many other names may be found in other books of his, "and there may be more hereafter." But the room of his International Portrait Gallery that he has just thrown open to us contains enough work for one day. In it we find portrayed three actual Cabinet Ministers, one great chief of Opposition, several departed or resting statesmen, Speakers, Ambassadors, American financiers, actors and artists; with one huge canvas of President Roosevelt to dominate the gallery. Some wear more or less conventional expressions; Lord Rosebery "has a respect for logic which the English people do not share with him"; so has Mr. Balfour. Gilbert sulks and Whistler storms. Others are seen in their less familiar aspects. "I should like to cram his jewelled sword down his Russian throat," says Lord Morley in reference to a certain presentation. As to Mr. Roosevelt, "let us admit, and regret, that he honestly believes it impossible to differ from him honestly."

There is so much that is absolutely new and so much that is new in its accurate form that we despair of indicating anything like a selection. We will merely mention Mr. Chamberlain's introduction into the front rank of politics, through the medium of Sir Charles Dilke, Lady Bathurst's successful campaign against Mr. Balfour, and the German attempt of 1898 to discredit Lord Pauncefote and to embroil England and America, as among the matters to be found recounted in this book.

Mr. Smalley has a theory, which at first sight seems decidedly fantastic, that the entente cordiale originated on the stage and in the green-rooms of London and Paris. "It would not seem an exaggeration in Paris, where the theatre has a direct and continuing influence upon life and upon opinion. Nor need it seem so even in London; or not always." Madame Sarah Bernhardt and Irving were the signatories of the first treaty. But there were other critical moments in the history of the entente: "You might date it, if you liked, from Mr. Gladstone's appearance at the theatre when Sarah was playing 'Phèdre'; the old man in a stage box, leaning forward; a book of the play before him; his hand to his ear; his blazing eyes fixed mostly on the tragédienne, for he needed the book only on account of his deafness; and, when it was over, going behind the scenes to offer his homage to the artist." A fine picture! One of many fine pictures, and perhaps nothing more. Yet it is a hint, to be taken with Mr. Smalley's other hints, as to the way the world is really governed, telling us in time what History can only tell too late, and what the daily newspapers can never reveal to us.

The Compleat Lyric-Taster

English Lyrical Poetry. By EDWARD BLISS REED, Ph.D. (Henry Frowde. 8s. 6d. net.)

IN times of dearth, hungry men have been known to abstain from food for a whole day that they might gratify a desire for satiety upon the day following. It is the practice of the hedonist. He thinks that life most admirable which is fullest of "mad magenta minutes." He is like a lover who, having heard that the pinnacle of happiness is attained at the moment when love is crowned with a kiss, bolts clumsily to the hill-top to court disaster, instead of proceeding by all those delicate gradations of feeling without which a kiss is an outrage.

Perhaps it is the poverty of the times; perhaps it is because the life of the average man has become full of noise; but whatever the cause, there seems to be an increasing indulgence, even among those who profess to care deeply for poetry, in the form of spiritual hedonism, which is ever waiting for the exquisite moment of the perfect lyric. To gratify this dilettante taste there has arisen a whole army of anthologists ever ready to chop off the heads of the tallest flowers in the poets' garden so that he who runs may have an opinion. And as prompters to these garden terrorists there is a school of criticism, with its Imperial Statute of Weights and Measures, ready to assess the emotion of a given lyric to the least drachm. We have seen criticism of the lyric which made the reader feel as if he were looking into a funnel where first this and then that glory of the language was rejected as being too concrete, until it seemed that nothing would pass the circular extremity but that perfect expression of lyrical feeling, the letter O.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

This is hardly the method of Professor Reed. He has written a truly monumental book of 616 pages. We can only hope that Ariel may not feel encumbered beneath such a burden. It is nothing less than a History of English Lyrical Poetry from its Origins to the Present Time; and if it be necessary to do for poetry what the "Encyclopædia Britannica" has done for all knowledge, no one could accomplish the task more thoroughly than Professor Reed. He passes down the ranks of lyrical poetry like an inspecting officer on parade, and in all the files there is not a uniform that escapes his vigilance. But the criticism of beauty (beauty that obeys no law save the law of life) is second only to the creation of beauty in its possibilities of self-revelation. Thus we find Professor Reed saying that "Donne was a romanticist at heart," and actually quoting these lines to illustrate his belief:—

> But he who loveliness within
> Hath found, all outward loathes,
> For he who colour loves, and skin,
> Loves but the oldest clothes;

that "Sidney is aware that his passion can lead only to a dishonourable conclusion," because that soul of honour wrote:—

> Alas, have I not pain enough, my friend?
> . . . . .
> But with your rhubarb words ye must contend
> To grieve me worse, in saying that Desire
> Doth plunge my well-formed soul even in the mire
> Of sinful thoughts, which do in ruin end, when the humblest student at Yale University knows that the sonnet continues:—

> If that be sin which doth the manners frame,
> Well staid with truth in word and faith in deed,
> Ready of wit, and fearing nought but shame;
> If that be sin, which in fix'd hearts doth breed
> A loathing of all loose unchastity,
> Then love is sin, and let me sinful be.

Shelley's conception of liberty is found to be "a vague ideal." "He would have rejoiced in the prospect of a second deluge." Wordsworth is "a deeper mystic than Blake"; and "Byron, the greatest personal force in English letters since Dean Swift." We are said to "hear the voice of Hamlet" when Byron allows this sort of thing to trickle from his pen:—

> It is that weariness which springs
> From all I meet, or hear, or see:
> To me no pleasure Beauty brings,
> Thine eyes have scarce a charm for me.

Such vagaries, instead of driving us with increased delight to the springs of Helicon, leave us querulous with the author. That is the bane of books of this kind. The desire for correctness of attitude makes whatever praise is bestowed seem thin or condescending, and more than half the blame to be founded upon misapprehension, the inevitable misapprehension of lesser minds attempting to assess the value of greater ones. We defy any lover of poetry to read this book through without experiencing the sensation of the auction-room.

As already hinted, Professor Reed allows the word lyric as wide a connotation as possible. The heading of Chapter I., "The Lyric Defined," is, however, misleading, for instead of receiving an answer to the vexed question "What is a lyric?" we are offered nothing more than a working formula. Even this, serviceable as it is for the purpose of the book, is wide enough to admit "Gray's Elegy," but too narrow for Milton's "Il Penseroso" and "L'Allegro."

Again, the work of Mr. Kipling, Mr. William Watson, and Mr. Noyes is considered, but space has not been found for Mr. Thomas Hardy or Mr. W. B. Yeats; which seems to us to show a faulty sense of values. Indeed, the valuation of contemporary verse is such a hazardous business that the book would gain by the loss of Chapter X., where we are once more disturbed by a critical sense which puts Stevenson's sentimental and unchildish "A Child's Garden of Verse" above Blake's marvels of intuition, the "Songs of Innocence."

No doubt this book will serve its avowed purpose and "be of use in college courses." We only hope that in spite of its limitations it will send many students to the masters themselves; for it is questionable whether, from the creative standpoint, more of the how and why of lyrical poetry may not be learnt from a single reading of Coleridge's "Ode to Dejection," than from the most laborious study of this dull but conscientious work.

> O pure of heart! thou need'st not ask of me
> What this strong music in the soul may be.

Egyptian Literature

Legends of the Gods. Annals of Nubian Kings. By E. A. WALLIS BUDGE. (Kegan Paul and Co. 6s. net each.)

THE object of these two volumes, in the well-known series of books on Egypt and Chaldæa, is to provide complete specimens of Egyptian literature by the publication of a series of groups of texts in which the actual works are printed in hieroglyphic type, and arranged with English translations, page by page.

Dr. Wallis Budge, whose interesting edition of the "Book of the Dead" we noticed in THE ACADEMY, November 5, 1910, writes excellent explanatory introductions, from which we learn of the original sources of the texts.

The first volume begins with the remarkable legend of the Creation, from a papyrus discovered on the Nile,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

near Thebes, in 1861. The date of this papyrus is established from a colophon—"the twelfth year of Pharaoh Alexander"—i.e., 311 B.C. This legend is entitled "The Book of Knowing the Evolutions of Rā, and of Overthrowing Apep." The doctrine of the immanence of God is almost inferred in the idea of "Nebertchen"—"Lord to the uttermost limit," "an almighty and invisible power which filled all space."

The sequence of creation is remarkable. First, there is presumed the existence of a vast mass of water, or world-ocean, called Nu, which contained the inert and helpless germs of all the living things yet to be formed. Then follow the sun and the moon; the latter curiously associated with the fertility of the earth, crops and harvests. Next, all creeping things and quadrupeds; while men and women spring, not from earth, but directly from the body of the god himself.

Other legends are parallel to stories in the Book of Genesis—for example, the legend of the destruction of mankind, in which one of the terrors was a darkness which covered the land; and formulæ are given of protection against bites of serpents, showing the great antiquity of the profession of the snake-charmer. "To this day water in which the written words of a text from the Kur'ân have been dissolved, or water drunk from a bowl on the inside of which religious texts have been written, is still regarded as a never-failing charm in Egypt and the Sûdân."

There is also a legend of a terrible famine which lasted seven years—the exact duration of a certain famine, when, as Mark Twain said, "Joseph created that little corner in corn in Egypt." The text of this legend is found in hieroglyphics on a block of granite on the Island of Sahal by the First Cataract. This famine took place in the reign of Tcheser, a king of the Third Dynasty. Such famines were common enough in Egypt, owing to insufficient Nile floods. One is recorded in the years 1066-1072 A.D., which nearly ruined the country.

The legend of the death and resurrection of Horus is very interesting, and contains some passages of beauty and pathos. Horus was stung by a scorpion, when Isis says: "I passed the day in seeking to provide food for the child, and on returning to take Horus into my arms I found him, Horus, the beautiful one of gold, the boy, the child, without life. . . . His body was motionless, his heart was powerless to move. . . . I sent forth a cry, saying: 'I, even I, lack a son to make answer for me. My two breasts are full, but my body is empty.' . . . The child was the desire of my heart, and I longed to protect him. . . . I cried then, saying: 'Who among the people will indeed let their hearts come round to me?' . . . And the people came forth to me from their houses, and they thronged about me at the sound of my voice, and they loudly bewailed with me the greatness of my affliction."

This legend is found on the famous "Metternich Stele," "given to Prince Metternich by Muhammad 'Ali Pâshâ: it was dug up in 1828 during the building of a cistern in a Franciscan monastery in Alexandria, and it mentions the name of the king in whose reign it was made, viz., Nectanebus I., who reigned from 378 B.C. to 360 B.C."

The awful terror of serpents, scorpions, and all noxious reptiles, which always possessed the Egyptians, is constantly illustrated by the magical spells for protection inserted throughout these remarkable legends.

The second volume gives the royal inscriptions from the Seven Stelæ (now at Cairo), which were discovered in the great temple at Gebel Barkal, some miles from the Fourth Cataract in the Egyptian Sûdân. They describe events which took place in the kingdom of Napata from the year 750 B.C. to 500 B.C.; but as there are many gaps, Dr. Wallis Budge has written an admirable historical introduction, tracing "the growth of Egypt's great colonial possessions in the Sûdân from the time of the great raid of Senefern, under the fourteenth dynasty, to that of the conquest of Egypt by Piānkhi." This conquest (about 721 B.C.) is described in the first of the actual texts.

Dr. Wallis Budge considers the stele of Piānkhi to be one of the most important monuments which have come down to us. The text describes a state of things in Egypt which, but for the evidence of this document, would be well-nigh incredible. There were several petty kings, and each wanted to be sovereign lord.

There was no capital, nor central government, and not long after the end of the twenty-second dynasty, whose kings had ruled Egypt for 200 years, Egypt had lost all her foreign possessions, and the chiefs of the Northern Sûdân ceased from paying tribute to Egypt, and the time became ripe for the Nubian conquest. Piānkhi's great campaign is described at length—his rapid forced marches, the surrender of city after city, his decision of character, his clemency, his love of brave men and of fine horses. He realised his aim, which was to prevent the Thebaïd from becoming an appanage of the kings of the Delta. He was practically the founder of the twenty-fifth dynasty, whose first king was his brother Shabaka.

The hieroglyphic texts of the other six stelæ are given in full, with translations and introductions. There are also twelve full-page plates, some of modern views, Gebel Barkal and its pyramids, ruins of the Temple of Tirhâkâh, others of scenes from the different stelæ.

Students of Egyptology will find these learned and well-edited volumes of great value, while the ordinary reader will welcome so important a contribution to the study of Egyptian history.

Indian Imputations

Britain's Dilemma. By M. DE P. WEBB, C.I.E. (P. S. King and Son. 7s. 6d. net.)

"BRITAIN'S DILEMMA" is a book which has a deceptive appearance of innocence. The author of it is a Fellow of the Royal Economic Society and a Fellow of the Royal Statistical Society, and it is natural that he should write in the following strain:—"In no period of British history has the national conscience been more keenly alive to the disabilities under which great masses of our population labour, or more genuinely anxious to alleviate those disabilities by the introduction of practical measures of reform, than at the present day. And nobody who visits the great mining and manufacturing centres of British industry, or inspects the poorer quarters of our largest and most famous cities, can doubt for a moment that there is much scope for the reformer's activities. At the same time, whilst there are many ready and able hands working at the amelioration of the social, industrial, and political conditions amidst which we are living, there is one factor in our national life—perhaps of greater importance than many others put together—to which the bulk of our people give little or no attention, yet which is at the present moment undergoing a change calculated to vitiate much of the good reforming work being done in other directions. I refer to the purchasing and measuring function of the nation's money."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

After this we expect to find that Mr. Webb is a worthy economist with the familiar limitations of the economist, that he believes incorrigibly in the possibility of stating and regulating social problems in the sphere of economics only, and that he is the thousand-and-first magician who has obtained the power of charming away "labour unrest" and other disquieting symptoms of our time by the adjustment of the purchasing power of a sovereign. That is a wrong conception of Mr. Webb's position. His remarks on economics may serve the purpose of making his theme appear topical, but they give no clue to the serious purpose of this book.

It is a very serious purpose; for Mr. Webb's arguments are intended to convey the impression that certain persons in posts of high responsibility have betrayed their trust, with the result that grievous damage is persistently and wilfully done to the interests of India. He refers to the problem confronting the India Office when the world's output of gold first reached its present vast bulk, and says: "Unfortunately the wrong counsels for the time being prevailed; and Lord Morley was led to place the power and prestige of the India Office at the disposal of that school of London financiers who, looking only to their own immediate interests, decided that, notwithstanding the coming deluge of gold, India should not be allowed to draw off one single drop more of the precious flood than could possibly be prevented. The means employed for this end were the continuous transfer to London of any and all State funds in India upon which the India Office could conveniently lay hands. Whether the India Office had any right to the money—whether the India Office had any use for the money—these were considerations that were wholly ignored, or, if considered, quietly put aside. It was sufficient that by transferring State funds from India to London the balance of indebtedness to India which could (and should) have been adjusted by shipments of sovereigns to India was temporarily changed, and gold thus saved to London for the time being, for the further use of the London money market."

Again, "the India Office is charged with misapplying vast sums of money—the property of the peoples and Government of India, and that, too, in face of continued protests from several quarters in India, not the least important being, so it is generally believed, the Government of India itself," and "it seems quite clear that the India Office has withdrawn money from India when it was very badly wanted, and where high rates of interest might have been obtained for its use, much to the benefit of India, and has lent out that money in London at much lower rates of interest (only about 2½ per cent.) to the inconvenience and loss of the general taxpayer of India."

The persons accused of exercising a malign influence upon Lord Morley for their own financial advantage are named by Mr. Webb, who indicates almost as plainly the Indian interests which he is concerned to advocate. There is no doubt that those interests will secure wide publicity in India for the allegations which Mr. Webb is eager to press, and in the hands of agitators and malcontents such a weapon may do incalculable mischief. It is of great importance that adequate attention to such an indictment should not be given in India only, and Mr. Webb's book ought to be publicly answered in this country

---

A Victory of Criticism

Le Roman Anglais Contemporain. By FIRMIN ROZ. (Hachette and Co. 3 fr. 50 c.)

M. FIRMIN ROZ is a great critic. He has achieved what we had almost thought impossible—a faithful representation of five writers belonging to another country and speaking another language than his own, because he has abundantly the great quality of sympathy, without which the labour and the learning of all the critics in the world would be as sounding brass. He has himself well stated the principle that should guide the literary raider: "La littérature comparée serait un jeu bien puéril si elle consistait à faire comparaître les œuvres étrangères devant un étalon national pour y mesurer leur valeur et les classer à l'avenant." This principle, or the principle we arrive at by negativing M. Roz' condition, is not only stated but also observed by him. While crossing, in spirit, the English Channel, he has thrown all his critical baggage into that boisterous arm of the sea, and has been enabled to view our strange literature with a detachment soon warmed into sympathy.

There are two principal elements in M. Roz' book. There are five studies of modern English novelists—the late Mr. George Meredith, Messrs. Kipling, Wells, and Thomas Hardy, and Mrs. Humphry Ward—and there is a continual attempt to arrive at a synthesis of the English novel. It is this second task that really tests the critic's resources. International conceptions have such a strong tendency to degenerate into the reproduction of a type that it is very hard to see with a single and unprejudiced eye. M. Roz seems to have started from one of these ready-made judgments, but he has developed it till he has made it into something new and his own. It was once almost a paradox to say that the English, as a nation, are anything but "practical." Lately the paradox has worn into a truism. Both sides, however, have forgotten to define what they meant by "practical." M. Roz returns to the old conception: Englishmen are practical in the sense that they see "things as they are," and recognise the limitations of the human mind. The English novelist is fundamentally "realistic," as no modern French author is; the latter has managed to "fausser la signification du mot jusqu'à le déshonorer." "Les réalités de la vie, telles quelles, dans leur complexité même . . . voilà ce que l'Anglo-Saxon opposa toujours d'instinct aux abstractions de l'idéologie." After this it is not surprising to find that, of the five novelists discussed, Mr. Wells, with his Utopianism and hatred of actuality, should meet with the least sympathetic treatment. But even Mr. Wells has one saving insular virtue—that of individualism, which, next to realism, is the great quality of the English novel—that is, if the diagnosis of M. Roz be a true one.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

We do not propose to discuss at length the judgments on the various writers. No one has ever written more enthusiastically on Mr. Kipling; M. Roz has seized on all the points in the Anglo-Indian stories and the private-soldier ballads; more than that, he sees that his author's Imperialism is something different from mere Chauvinism, that it is based on facts and is inspired with a soul. But there is one novelist to whom M. Roz has done more than justice. George Meredith is not an easy writer for a foreigner; he is ignored even by those of his own countrymen who dislike the "aliquid amari" of effort in their reading. But to M. Roz his divinity is apparent; he must be judged by divine standards. "La personnalité de George Meredith est si forte qu'il ne peut être autre qu'il n'est. Nous n'avons plus alors le droit de nous en offenser et c'est au contraire notre devoir de l'accepter, de nous élever jusqu'à lui." Again, if Meredith, "entre deux termes successifs de sa pensée, supprime comme oiseux tout intermédiaire," and "l'esprit n'a pas où se poser," it is not for the reader to complain. In his virile pages "l'individualisme joue à l'aise . . . car le fond est assuré." The English society of his time had solid bases. His style is the very antithesis of the French ideal; it aims at being "suggestif plutôt que définitif."

We have wondered once or twice whether, in our appreciation of M. Roz, we have not succumbed to the subtle arts of an inspired flatterer. It may be so, up to a point. We have found ourselves up in arms in one or two places—notably where "Stalky and Co" is being discussed. We do not agree with M. Roz that it is the Imperialist ingredient alone that has made this book one of the "livres de chevet" of so many of us; it is a product of the art that defies criticism, while apparently open to its attacks on all sides. We are glad to have discovered some passages where we think we have found M. Roz at fault; they only enhance our gratitude and admiration, and persuade us that we have not been simply cozened. We look forward with eagerness to the promised second series.

The Noble Game

The Art of Golf. By JOSHUA TAYLOR. (T. Werner Laurie. 2s. 6d. net.)

"THE ART OF GOLF" is a book that should be widely read by that ever-increasing section of the public of the present day who are continually on the look-out for hints as to how to improve their game at golf, or for correctives for faults all too easy to acquire and all too difficult to detect and remedy. There are many always ready to prescribe; the improving beginner is usually more ready than any in giving advice, but it is wise to turn a deaf ear to him and wiser to dip into the pages and digest all that Joshua Taylor, backed up by such a brother as the more renowned J. H. Taylor, has to say on the methods of using the various clubs and when and how to get the most out of them.

For mashie play the all important adjunct to one's short game, whereby matches are lost or won, there are no greater exponents than the brothers Taylor; what either of them has to say about this modern club is well worthy of serious note, and well has the author headed the chapter dealing with it as "The Mysteries of the Mashie." In the days not long gone by nearly all approaches were made by running up the ball with either an iron or a wooden putter, and when J. H. Taylor, about 1893, came forward with a new style of approaching by pitching the ball up to the hole, he was laughed at by the expert exponents of the game, who predicted that the new style would never answer. But when he won his second championship at St. Andrews, of all places the school of the noble game, and especially the school of the famous running-up shot, he completely won over his critics and mashie play became general. That there is an art in playing it no one will deny. Taylor lets us into the secret of that art if we will but only take the trouble to practise what he preaches to us. Nearly every club in the bag has its special chapter devoted to it. "Things Worth Knowing and Remembering" and "Some Faults and Their Cure" are worthy of being learnt by heart, but there is no chapter more useful to the man who wants to play and do well than that on "Powers of Concentration," which has already appeared as an article in the World of Golf. The question of temperament is all important, and temperament is largely bound up with the concentrative powers of the player:—

> Concentration and will-power are the two great things that help in golf. Concentrate your attention on how you want to hit the ball, and have will-power enough to make yourself hit in that way. You will not make many mistakes.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Secretaries of clubs and greenkeepers no doubt will read some parts of the book with a shudder; for instance, "There is one great fact about iron play which can, with benefit, be remembered by all classes of players, and that is, it is imperative that a piece of turf be cut out during the act of hitting the ball;" again, with reference to the mashie, "Make sure of hitting the ball low. Aim half-an-inch behind it, and be sure you take a piece of turf." We can imagine the nightmares of the much-harassed secretary and the painstaking greenkeeper at the thought of all the members carrying into effect this piece of sound advice. The book is distinctly useful, and by its usefulness and soundness makes up quite for its lack of literary style.

Fair Portugal

In Portugal. By AUBREY F. G. BELL. (John Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)

IN Iberian description Mr. Bell has already attained success in his previous work, "The Magic of Spain." Now he has turned his attention to the sister country, and has given us some sketches of Portugal which are both scholarly and graphic. We are ignorant of the length of his sojourn in this romantic westernmost land of Europe; but he appears to have delved fairly deeply into the life of its inhabitants, and to have attained an intimate acquaintance with those local characteristics and touches which go to distinguish a nation from its fellows. Indeed, our sole quarrel with Mr. Bell is that he appears a little over-anxious to display his knowledge of the Portuguese tongue and of local nomenclature, with the result that italics bestrew some of the pages as thickly as hailstones. So far as this indulgence in nomenclature is concerned, we would refer more especially to page 77, which almost in its entirety is occupied by a single bristling and formidable sentence of the kind.

When we have said so much, however, our fault-finding is at an end. Mr. Bell has shown a keen eye in his search for the jewels of Portugal. He has found them; he has held them up to view, and they sparkle with a genuine brilliance from the pages of his book. Unlike the majority of recent writers on the land of Camoens, he has relied upon no photographic material to assist his literary matter, but has allowed his text to shine alone, as well it may. He has not failed to emphasise those important temperamental distinctions which separate the character of the Portuguese from that of the Spaniards, differences of which the European in general—who is addicted in a haphazard fashion to classifying the two nations as one—is almost invariably profoundly ignorant.

The chapters on the Alemtejo and on the Algarve are specially happy; but, for the matter of that, there is not one in the book which does not possess its special charm. On one point alone do we think that the author has been a trifle too enthusiastic. It occurs in his description of the Bussaco forest. "Everywhere is a densest depth of green," says Mr. Bell; "the undergrowth trails and twines round the trunks of trees, and from leafy spaces beyond comes the cooing of doves. Or a nightingale sings as overhead the shadows deepen. . . ." Now, Mr. Bell has been exceptionally fortunate in these notes of the Bussaco birds. On the occasion of our own visits to the spot we have had occasion to lament the silence of the green aisles. The cooking-pots of the forest guards were insatiable in their lust for the bodies of even the purest songsters! The author must have lit upon a blissful interlude. Or did he succeed in softening the hearts and appetites of those sauntering guardians bearing firearms of so ancient a design?

An American Traveller

European Years: The Letters of an Idle Man. Edited by G. E. WOODBERRY. (Constable and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

IT is a commonplace that, in these days of telegrams, cheap postage, and rapid living, the art of letter writing has become extinct. But volumes of letters occasionally appear which contradict the universality of this dictum. The present book is evidence on the point. The author writes anonymously, though he may be traceable. He is admittedly a Bostonian; the letters describing his travels in Europe and Asia range over the thirty years, 1876-1905: he visited every European country, wandered in the East, chiefly in India and Japan; crossed the United States, and saw something of California. He does not adhere to his own principle that "a letter, if it is to be anything, should, of course, be an airy nothing; anecdotes are airy nothings: hence a letter may contain anecdotes." His productions are anything but the "trivial stuff," "altogether frivolous scriblet" he depreciatingly calls them.

His editor, without discussing the letters, rightly expresses a "delight in the vignettes of nature on the pages, singular in the power of brief descriptive strokes to give space, picturesqueness, sharp detail. The habitual and spontaneous response of the writer to nature, to her freshness and simplicity, to atmosphere as a physical thing, climate, and the real joys of country life is one of the traits of the book, which is rich in temperament." The editor makes two other points, that personality is the right substance of a letter, and that to be a good letter-writer one must be an idle man. The author certainly lets himself go, in his familiar talk on paper to intimate friends. Besides the usual traveller's account of places visited and their objects of interest, there are plenty of deeper thoughts, opinions, reflections, and acute remarks, which give some idea of the writer's personality: his airy anecdotes and quotations are sometimes perhaps too obviously wanting in spontaneity, but they serve to illustrate his sense of humour. Altogether the letters form a series which not only idle men can read with profit, but they show how different is the American from the English standpoint of observation. He disclaims the idea of being a fine writer.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Dresden is the place to which he most often returned; better than Paris in its simpler life, it suited his love of communion with nature. He preferred Germany to Paris, in which he did not care to remain. He found nothing so amazing in all history as the growth, within thirty and forty years, of wealth and luxury in Germany, accompanying an enormous expansion of population, under Protection. In Italy he noticed a vast amount of Socialism all over the country, Socialism of a destructive kind—not constructive as in Germany—incessant strikes and a chronic bitterness of the labouring classes; the hunger in Italy was harrying, the grinding of the lower classes by taxation altogether infamous. Six weeks in Spain afforded great pleasure; the landscapes, the towns, the architecture, the pictures were all worth seeing, but it would, he thought, be the least desirable country in Europe in which to dwell; he could only say that Spain was better than its reputation. Vienna he thought a handsomer city than Paris. Florence was a dreadful place in winter, almost intolerable at any other season. Milan was a fine city. At Rimini he moralised on "what shadows we are and always have been." Rome was truly delightful to him, and the place he would choose if he could live in any city; but he was restless.

The scenery, not the people of India, captivated him, especially the view of the Himalayas from Darjeeling: the sight was worth the journey to India. In about a page he disposes of India, but makes conflicting statements as to whether he saw or did not see Mount Everest. The climate of India in winter was to him divine, both in Calcutta and Bombay: with his limited experience he wrote, "India is the safest country, too, in winter; you could not possibly get sick there; I never heard of anybody being taken down in winter by any sickness." He must have been specially fortunate; many persons could correct him about the sickness even in a winter in India.

Repetitions sometimes occur, for instance, on the question of cremation or burial, and on Henry James's style, which he condemns as muddled, futile, and absurd. His anecdotes are many and good. "What can one expect when even a colonel in the British Army said to me in Rome when the newspapers reported Herbert Spencer's last illness, 'Who is Herbert Spencer?'" Again, someone complained to a farmer that his clock was not right. "Well, you see," said the farmer, "nobody don't understand much about that clock but me. When the hands of that clock stand at twelve then it strikes two, and then I know it's twenty minutes to seven." These letters are avowedly ephemeral literature, but they are amusing and instructive, never wearisome or didactic.

The Satires of Horace

Œuvres d'Horace—Satires. Texte Latin avec un Commentaire Critique et Explicatif. By PAUL LEJAY. (Hachette and Co. 15 fr.)

THERE are obvious advantages in reading a Latin author from a French point of view. In spite of all the tirades and paradoxes that are daily levelled against the teaching of the classics in France, the study of Latin is in that country a much easier and more real thing than it is, for instance, in England. Latin is to the Frenchman a far more living language than Anglo-Saxon to the modern Englishman. M. Lejay's edition of the Satires of Horace is a magnificent example of French scholarship illuminated by enthusiasm. There are no dry bones in it; the critical notes go straight to their aim, and seem to gain cogency from the kindred idiom.

It is a curious fact, alluded to in the introduction to M. Lejay's work, that this is part of the first really complete edition of Horace in French since 1681. Prima facie it would seem that the great Latin lyrist and satirist should make an irresistible appeal to the inheritors of the Latin tradition; many examples, the works of Boileau, for instance, prove how considerable has been his literary influence. But the scholarly commentator has somehow found his home in other lands —"dans les pays où s'est gardée la tradition des Bentley et des Orelli." This circumstance is not without its advantages; M. Lejay is debarred from inviting the reader to take many things on trust, and is constrained, a little malgré lui, to make a complete and self-sufficing edition of his text.

The introduction is a masterpiece of historical criticism, a miracle of breadth and lucidity, like some of the great French rivers. M. Lejay finds his parallels everywhere; the Capucin in "Wallensteins Lager," for instance, serves to illustrate a point. And it is impossible to read more than two or three pages without striking on a sentence that will throw a flood of light on the questions at issue, and that will root itself in the memory. For instance, when defending Horace's originality and discussing the conventionality of the genre satire—all satire, by the way, even the most informal and the least intended for publication, tends to be conventional—M. Lejay remarks, in parenthesis, that "toute la littérature de l'antiquité est une littérature de tradition."

On the subject of the ancient love of apostrophe and imaginary dissentients we find this excellent comment: "Nous écrivons dans le silence pour être lus dans le silence. Toute la littérature ancienne est faite pour être parlée. Toute œuvre littéraire de l'antiquité, si étrangère qu'elle soit à l'éloquence, est un discours suivi." M. Lejay combats the theory that the Greeks, after their enormous literary and linguistic loans to the Romans, took nothing back from them. Lucian, to take a single instance, was greatly indebted to Horace. The chapters on the early developments of the satire and on the Stoics and the Cynics are excellent, and so are most of the introductions to the individual satires.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Shorter Reviews

Miniatures. By GEORGE A. B. DEWAR. (Sidgwick and Jackson. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Cheerful Way. By LADY DOUGHTY. (A. and C. Black. 2s. 6d. net.)

THE essay in miniature has, in these days, taken the place of its more ponderous predecessors. It has much to recommend it, and this especially—that its author need say no more than he wishes to say. He is in no danger of exhausting his own interest or his reader's patience. An impression, too, may be as readily conveyed in 500 words as in 5,000. And it is in impressions rather than in ideas that the modern author is apt to deal.

Among these essayists in little Mr. G. A. B. Dewar occupies a recognisably honourable place. He unites a keen and sympathetic faculty for observation with a graceful style of writing which, though it never degenerates into mere colloquialism, always seems to preserve an air of warm intimacy and friendliness. Many of these small papers have the perfection of cameos. They are just brief, fleeting impressions and records of "things seen"—things seen, indeed, by everyone, but observed only by those who are deeply versed in Nature's secret lore. The lover of "open air" literature will find for this book a place in his library not far from Izaak Walton, or Gilbert White, or Richard Jefferies. For Mr. Dewar does indeed belong to that select band.

Lady Doughty is a writer of a different calibre. "The Cheerful Way" belongs to a certain type of "literature" that had an enormous vogue in the sentimental 'seventies, and that even yet is not entirely extinct. The type was known variously as "sunny" or "breezy" or "wholesome," and stood in the same relationship to literature (properly so called) that "I wonder if you miss me sometimes" does to a lyric of Shelley. Lady Doughty preserves, unimpaired, the best traditions of this type. This is how she rhapsodises on the subject of old love-letters:—

> Who does not know the pathos, the charm of old letters! Sweetest of all links with the past! Bridges to bear us from the precious present to the days of long ago! Magic wands to transport us back into youth again! Witchery to carry us to old scenes and friends of long ago! Old letters! What they conjure up of dearest associations! Some we tie with blue ribbon, and some with white, and some with rose. Some we lay in musk and lavender. . . .

And the rest of the book is in a similar style.

Sixty Years of Progress and Fiscal Policy. By EARL BRASSEY, G.C.B., D.C.L. New Edition. (The Free Trade Union. 1s. 6d. net.)

LORD BRASSEY'S book, now re-issued, originated as a pamphlet which appeared in 1904. This was enlarged and republished in 1906. In the preparation of the third edition Lord Brassey has had the assistance of Mr. John Hilton, of the Free Trade Union. The title and history of the volume sufficiently indicate that new arguments for use in the fiscal controversy are not to be found between its covers. Lord Brassey has made a compendious statement of the familiar case for free imports, to which some useful statistical appendices and a full index have been added. The style is that of a well-informed party lecturer who is able to avoid wearying his hearers if they are interested in his subject. Lord Brassey's fiscal opinions are summarised in the following sentences:—

> Thus far we have held our own. We have had the immense advantage given by Free Trade conditions. The splendid fabric of British industry rests on a Free Trade basis. To reverse our policy, now that we have gone so far forward as Free Traders, would be a Herculean task. The manufacturers who now clamour for Protection imperfectly realise the cost. The great consuming public would get nothing out of Protection.

Again, "Free Trade has presented nobler ideals. Nor has our generosity been without reward." The main object of the book is to show that the country adopted and has maintained the system of free imports for commercial reasons and to its own advantage, and it is difficult to see why the author has thought it worth while to drag in this example of cant about "nobler ideals" and "our generosity." There is nothing in the enlarged pamphlet which is likely to impress Tariff Reformers, who have not yet heard it explained why Liberals in one breath glorify Cobdenism as the one sound fiscal system and the source of unexampled prosperity, and in the next echo the late Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman's lament about the portentously high proportion of the population that lives on the verge of hunger and Mr. Lloyd George's more recent fulminations on the same subject.

The Supremacy of Public Opinion (?Parliament) in a Constitutional Empire. By "QUISQUE." (The Century Press. 2s. 6d. net.)

THE author of this book is anxious for a "paper constitution." Parliament, he contends, is no longer an entirely representative body. It has delegated—perhaps unconsciously—much of its power to that most potent organ of public opinion, the British Press. Hence the necessity for an Imperial State-owned and State-subsidised newspaper, which should aim at bringing the teeming millions who constitute our Empire into a direct relationship with the Home Government. It should be published at a halfpenny, and might, "Quisque" thinks, become a self-supporting concern.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

"Everything published would be recognised as possessing a strictly official status, and nothing would appear except under the authority of the Government or department concerned, and under the official signature of its chief or his deputy." It is a fascinating proposal; but it may well be doubted whether the establishment of such a newspaper would achieve the end aimed at. The representatives in Parliament of the various Government departments are notoriously reticent in the communication of information, and it is hardly likely that they would allow to be published in a newspaper details that are withheld from questioners in the House of Commons. The existence of the party system provides, too, a very serious obstacle to the successful working of such a scheme. For the first aim of a Government is invariably to defend itself against the attacks of its opponents, and the general policy of such a paper as that suggested by "Quisque" would inevitably be dictated by the party in power. It is due, however, to the author to say that he has stated his case with an admirable lucidity and precision.

Studies in Arcady. (Second Series.) By R. L. GALES. (Herbert and Daniel. 5s. net.)

THE title of these essays does not express the full scope of the work, of which a large part is taken up with "Discussions and Digressions" on many topics, such as French inns and French picture-books, the soul of Brittany, Pierrot, "Bestalissima Pazzia," etc. There is a section on "Folklore and Tradition" and another on "Speech and Language." All are well written in easy, pleasant style, the shrewd observations of a clever man of culture. The studies in Arcady show that some country clergy are beginning to get beneath the surface, not so deeply as Balzac—at least in print, that would be too much for Mrs. Grundy—but sufficiently to know something of the hidden feelings and difficulties of the poor. It is refreshing to find a parson writing a good word for the village public-house, which "represents a perennial human need and instinct just as the village church does—that it is, in fact, a necessary human thing." In short, Mr. Gales takes a good broad view of humanity, foreign to many clergy, and generally unknown to their wives. Too many "labour (with deplorable success) to realise an utterly dehumanised, mechanised world." These interesting studies give much food for reflection, and we commend them with pleasure.

The Collected Works of Henrik Ibsen. Vol. XII.—From Ibsen's Workshop: Notes, Scenarios, and Drafts of the Modern Plays. Translated by A. G. CHATER. With an Introduction by WILLIAM ARCHER. (Wm. Heinemann. 4s.)

THIS volume contains drafts and bits of drafts of plays from the "Pillars of Society" downwards. They are of the highest interest to enthusiastic Ibsen students, as revealing the mind of the playwright in his unguarded hours. These drafts were not apparently meant for publication, but, as Mr. Archer points out, Ibsen had his remedy in his own hands—he could have destroyed them: more than that, he gave his executors a free hand in dealing with all his papers, so that protest has no ground to stand upon. The most extraordinary thing about these initial sketches is that they contain few of the great "coups de théâtre" or the characteristic traits by which the plays are remembered. Ibsen seems to have groped his way to the light. "Little Eyolf," for instance, is here almost a different play; the lameness of Eyolf and all that depends on it only came into the final text; on the other hand, many might perhaps prefer the original version of the "Doll's House," with the famous macaroons left out.

Dante Gabriel Rossetti and German Literature: A Public Lecture delivered in Hilary Term, 1912, at the Taylor Institution, Oxford. By L. A. WILLOUGHBY, Taylorian Lecturer in German. (Henry Frowde. 1s. net.)

DR. WILLOUGHBY deals with a little-known aspect of Dante Gabriel Rossetti, whose German proclivities have hitherto received scant attention from literary historians, and whose studies of the German language came to a premature end. "I do not know that language," he is recorded as having said in later life. But Dr. Willoughby gives very good evidence for his having in his youth studied zealously both the language and the literature, the latter at first in translations, but subsequently in original texts, and to some purpose. Apart from the general influence of such works as Goethe's "Faust" and of romantic novels like "Undine" and "Peter Schlemihl," Rossetti owed a great deal to German in that his first considerable poetical achievement consisted of a translation from that language. Bürger's famous and oft-translated ballad "Lenore" was the subject of the venture. Rossetti followed this with renderings of a part of the "Nibelungenlied" and of "Der Arme Heinrich." Dr. Willoughby analyses these translations in the light of Rossetti's later tendencies.

The Child's Empire Picture Annual. (The Religious Tract Society. 3s. 6d.)

CHILDREN'S books generally connected with the Christmas season are already making their appearance, and one of the first to reach us is this new annual published by the Religious Tract Society. It is a bulky quarto volume, attractively bound and full of pictures, stories, and rhyming verse, which are sure to interest the younger children at all times and prove a pleasant companion to them from one year's end to another. There are, in addition to pictures in the text on almost every page, a large number of coloured plates, printed apart, the eight on art paper being exceedingly well executed. Four of these are by that children's favourite, Mrs. Arthur J. Elsley, and with the others form a notable feature of the volume. As the title implies, the

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Annual affords some glimpses of the lives of children in many lands, especially those of our own Empire and the countries with which we have most in common. It is thus an instructive as well as an entertaining book, which many parents will no doubt be only too pleased to place in the hands of their inquiring offspring.

The Tyranny of Trade Unions. By ONE WHO RESENTS IT. (Eveleigh Nash. 1s. net.)

THE anonymous author dedicates this small volume to the working men of the Anglo-Celtic race. In a thoroughly partisan spirit he presents the case against trade unionism, but we are at a loss to understand his motive in remaining unknown to his readers. The treatise deals with the recent coal strike, and with trade unionism in the United States and in Australia. The remedies proposed to meet the growing evil are private effort, mainly in the way of organising counter-attacks upon the trade unions by associations of employers, legislative effort, and, lastly, administrative effort. But the keystone of such a propaganda is personality, and we fear that the author, by choosing to remain anonymous, has defeated his own ends.

Fiction

The Touchstone of Fortune. By CHARLES MAJOR. (Macmillan and Co. 6s.)

THE author has a rather blunt, heavy method, which suggests that he found the task somewhat difficult; apart from that, "The Touchstone of Fortune" is an excellent story, telling how Charles the Second sold Dunkirk to the French, and more particularly how Mistress Frances Jennings, sister to Sarah of that family, played her part in the sale that she might win through to the man she loved.

George Hamilton, Frances' lover, is a fine character, and well worth knowing, as is his friend, Baron "Ned" Clyde, who let his title and estates slip willingly enough when he went to marry Bettina, daughter of the landlord at the Swan in "Gracious Street." In some respects Bettina is the best of a goodly company of players who strut for our amusement, and to some extent for our edification, for there are in the book some very realistic sketches of Whitehall society in Charles's time, my Lady Castlemain, Nell Gwynn, and others being well rendered. Plenty of exciting scenes and the necessary amount of rapier work to a story of the kind are given us.

The chief fault of the book is that the virtue of restraint is carried to excess. Melodramatic descriptiveness is not a desirable quality in a novel, but here the other extreme is reached, for the author never succeeds in being enthusiastic, even in his most exciting or emotional scenes, over his own work—the ponderous manner of stating facts and events is not shaken off. In spite of this, however, the book is one of deep and well-sustained interest from the first chapter to the final "note."

The Chief Constable. By VINCENT BROWN. (Chapman and Hall. 6s.)

TRUTH may be stranger than fiction, but we venture to suggest that truth seldom walks out in more unreal and sordid fashion than that in which this story is presented. Beatrice Lumley, having been adopted by old Gordon Broxworth, goes with him to Hyères, where he dies. Her brother Lewis circulates a report to the effect that she married Broxworth two days before his death, and, when she arrives back in England, persuades her—so the author tells us—to connive at the maintenance of the imposture. Lewis, weak to the point of criminality, makes his sister's life a burden for a matter of two or three years by his blackmailing demands, and finally escapes from England, with a warrant out against him, leaving Beatrice free to marry the chief constable, who has known of the imposture all the time, though he has given no hint of his knowledge to Beatrice.

In the face of a plot like this, with its working out extended over a period of years, we are asked to believe that Beatrice is a pure-minded girl, to whom the idea of deceit in any form is abhorrent—and she is not even given the excuse of deep affection for her criminal and neurotic brother. We are introduced to a number of more or less improbable persons, improbable mainly through the overdrawing of their eccentricities and undue accentuation of their various traits. The characters of the principal figures are so much at variance with their actions as to render them unconvincing, and the chief effect of the tale is that of dreary depression at the short-sightedness—and even meanness—of the world's good people.

The Top Farm. By ALGERNON GISSING. (F. V. White and Co. 6s.)

EVERYDAY people and everyday incidents make up this book, and the result is an engrossing story—until with the last incident comes a sense of unreality, due to a desire on the part of the author to achieve a happy ending. Looking beyond the end, we confess that we can see but little happiness for the hero and heroine; contentment, perhaps, and "the wind on the heath," quoted here from Borrow, may be possible, but the mistakes in both lives forbid more.

The plot tells how the heroine married and was widowed when the hero came into her life a second time as a grown man. Then both marry most unsuitable partners, who finally ride off together and get killed, leaving the way clear for the desired ending. Up to this catastrophe we are faced by strong, sincere work and a convincing atmosphere of reality—there is more than a suggestion of Eden Phillpotts' earlier work about this book—but when fate is made to cut the tangled cords in such a manner we refuse to see in fate anything but the author's desire that his characters should live happy ever after—they become puppets instead of personalities.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The "wind on the heath" pervades the book, which is grey and sombre with the sense of life lived hardly and seriously, close to nature. Here are primal passions and impulses, scarcely affected by the refinements of civilisation; the setting is twentieth century, but it might equally as well have been the tenth. We find it hard to forgive the author that last unfitting touch of melodrama, by which he has turned a great story into an average interesting novel.

Love Gilds the Scene and Women Guide the Plot. By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE. (Smith, Elder and Co. 6s.)

THOSE who already know the forerunners of "Love Gilds the Scene and Women Guide the Plot" will find pleasure in this, the latest of the series; while those to whom the writings of Mr. and Mrs. Castle have hitherto been an untrodden field will doubtless profit by the introduction now afforded them to seek to learn more of the Incomparable Bellairs, now known as my Lady Viscountess Kilcrony, and of the members of her set. The present book consists of a series of light sketches or episodes strung together by the personæ common to them all. They can be read as a whole or separately, and in either event will amuse and interest the jaded reader in search of some light mental refreshment. The authors have made the most of the romance of the period of which they treat, although the story, so far as there is one, cannot be said to have any plot; its whole strength rests in the portrayal of the characters. Concentrating on this, the authors have occasionally neglected the smooth joining of the various incidents which pursue one another from the first page of the book to the last. Thus at times we come across traces of haste in the composition; but as the book is intended merely to amuse, it certainly attains its object admirably. Incidentally, an origin is furnished or suggested for the style of ladies' headgear rendered so famous by Gainsborough.

A Little Aversion. By C. T. MARTIN. (T. W. Arrowsmith, Bristol. 6s.)

BY her grandfather's death and his peculiar will the heroine, Marion Annesley, is left alone in the world, and utterly unprovided for. Some old friends offer her a home, and she eventually fills the place of the longed-for children, who never arrived. The hero, Sir Jeffrey Clifford, falls in love with Marion, and so does his rival, Lawrence. The former detects the latter cheating at cards, thereby winning Clifford's best home farm. In a fit of quixotic gallantry Clifford throws the marked cards into the fire; but eventually Lawrence, in a mood of bravado, voluntarily confesses having won in a questionable manner. It is somewhat difficult throughout to discover which of Marion's numerous lovers is the favourite. To those who like an old-fashioned long-drawn-out novel, where the tale moves slowly and without enthusiasm or excitement, we commend "A Little Aversion."

The Damsel Dark: A Fool's Romance. By CLARA TURNBULL. (Andrew Melrose. 6s.)

"THE DAMSEL DARK" is a "first novel" which took a high place in the competition of 1911 arranged by Mr. Andrew Melrose. It is a tale of Stephen's time, when England was in a very turbulent state, each baron fighting for his own hand. The chronicler is a fool who becomes an esquire, but the story is centred round "the damsel dark," who, in the absence of a brother, raises the fortunes of her house and strikes terror into evil-doers. She unhorses her fighting uncle in a tourney before the king—quite an unwomanly thing to do.

The book is full of incident, and finishes with a wedding under romantic circumstances. There is also a grateful and rich Jew, who reminds one of Isaac of York.

The Apotheosis of Mrs. Humphry Ward

WE had thought that the days of hero-worshippers were over. There are many reminders of the fact that no man is a hero to his valet, and Mr. J. Stuart Walters* now sets out to prove that it is still possible for a woman to be a heroine to her biographer. Mrs. Humphry Ward is depicted as a moulder of the centuries. Shakespeare and Milton, Newton and Kant—these pale their ineffectual fires before the fierce radiance that glows and burns in the pages of "Robert Elsmere." Mr. Walters opens with an introductory chapter in which the "religious, political, and social conditions of England during the period immediately prior to the publication" of that immortal work are passed in rapid review. It was a period when a man was hanged for sheep-stealing, and English fiction was represented by the amateurish efforts of a Fielding, a Thackeray, a Dickens, or a Jane Austen. Then came the sound that shook the spheres. "Robert Elsmere" was written. Henceforward the whole aspect of humanity is changed, transformed; Fabian societies spring into being; social settlements appear—pharos-lights in the dark wastes of London. The mists of superstition melt before the light of the rising sun, and the pathway of a Campbell or a Clifford is prepared. And all of this is due, it appears, whether directly or indirectly, to "Robert Elsmere." Well, well!

A certain perverted industry must be placed to the credit of Mr. Walters. Just as in the old, idolatrous, pre-Elsmere days, a few silly people used to count the number of letters in the Bible and compare them with the number of acres in Yorkshire, so Mr. Walters has gone to the trouble of counting the number of quotations from English and foreign authors that are to be found in "Robert Elsmere." They are all solemnly set forth, together with the page on which they occur, and it appears that they total 75.

---

* Mrs. Humphry Ward, Her Work and Influence. By J. STUART WALTERS. (Kegan Paul and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Then follows one of the most amazing passages which it has been our fortune to read. Mr. Walters must be quoted in full:—

> Sometimes the authority is quoted, as on p. 554:—
> "I thought of a saying of Vinet's, 'C'est pour la religion que le peuple a le plus de talent; c'est en religion qu'il montre le plus d'esprit.'"
> Sometimes sub-quoted, as on p. 560:—
> "Like Heine, I am qualified to give lectures in heaven on the ignorance of doctors on earth."
> Sometimes merely referred to, as on p. 514:—
> "Then it would be the turn of his favourite poets—Wordsworth, Tennyson, Virgil"— > but always with a clear understanding, as the text shows, of the matters dealt with.
> There is perhaps a pardonable pride on the part of the young author discernible in this display of erudition, but it is never obtrusive, and the whole subject is one that could not have been handled except by a person of generous culture and reading.

It would be interesting to inquire whether a more banal passage has ever appeared in print. The answer, we are inclined to think, would be in the negative. Still, it is something to have established a record. "Perhaps that quality which is most lacking in Mrs. Ward's work is wit," continues the author. We should not have thought that wit was one of Mr. Walters' subjects.

On another page of the book the influence of French thought upon Mrs. Humphry Ward is stated to be discernible in the number of French words which she uses in "Miss Bretherton." They include such unfamiliar expressions as "finesse," "salon," "au naturel," "aide-de-camp," "rôle," "débutante," "matinée," "au revoir," and "en route." How very French!

The book abounds in curious facts. On page 33 we are gravely informed that John Stuart Mill, Hume, and Wesley were Nonconformists. It would be interesting, by the way, to hear Hume on the question—or even Wesley—while on page 200 we learn that Hell, "with its terrors of eternal burning and its utter elimination of hope," was a Victorian institution, which has been abolished by Dean Farrar and the Rev. Samuel Cox (of Nottingham); but that the labours of these pious abolitionists would hardly have availed had they not been supplemented by Mrs. Humphry Ward.

We will not pause to inquire what Mr. Walters means when he asserts that with the Æsthetic movement "the names of Ruskin, Wordsworth, Rossetti, and William Morris are immemorably connected." But we must take leave to point out that there is no such person as "his Grace the Bishop of London," and that the leader of the Education movement in the late 'sixties was the Right Hon. W. E. Forster—a name that will be imperfectly recognised as "Foster."

On the critical side the book is lamentably weak. It is a little unfair, indeed, to Mrs. Humphry Ward—by no means a negligible novelist—that she should have to bear the burden of such praise. Mrs. Ward has won for herself—it is the just reward of years of patient effort—a recognised place among contemporary writers of fiction, and, as Mr. Herbert Paul has aptly said, her novels are "an interesting 'end-of-the-century' example of the art of separating instruction from amusement." Few people, it is to be supposed, take "Robert Elsmere" very seriously to-day, while it is doubtful whether even the Labour Party reads "David Grieve." But in "Marcella" and "Sir George Tressady" we have careful and laborious studies of a certain type of English political life, and the future historian of the English people may well discover in these books much useful information. Those of us, however, who find in Mrs. Humphry Ward an interesting, rather than an epoch-making, novelist, can only regard such a volume as this with feelings of unmitigated bewilderment.

Posterity and Boswell

By HENRY STACE.

WE have a naive habit of entrusting to posterity the task of correcting our own crude judgments of the contemporary great. In our biographies and critical dissertations on their work we almost always adopt a tentative manner, and suggest, by implication or in as many words, that only by some later generation than our own, more enlightened and clear-sighted than we are, can the object of our admiration be truly comprehended, measured, and appraised.

No doubt those among us who secretly know that they are, or at some future time may be, among the great, look even more eagerly to posterity than the rest of us. They certainly have a stronger sense of the misunderstanding which is their lot in life; and it is natural that they should console themselves with the thought that their merits will be more clearly seen and valued, and their weaknesses viewed with a greater sympathy and comprehension by a wonderful race of clear-eyed, justly-thinking men to be evolved somehow out of the chaos of the present; a race which will make its happy advent at some not too remote period—say, about the year 2000 A.D.

Unfortunately, posterity is always in process of materialising out of the to-be into the actual; and as each succeeding generation marches out of the future into the present it reveals itself as being remarkably like its forbears. The bewildered public of our own day, with its contemporary whims, fads and crotchets, listening open-mouthed to its self-elected pundits, is the posterity of which, no doubt, the misunderstood great ones of some past century had happy and confident dreams; and it is not clear-eyed nor enlightened at all.

It is, on the contrary, as resolutely as ever set against comprehension of its departed heroes. It is generously ready to admire; and it is very easily intimidated and brought to its knees by the mere existence of a reputation. But its mental habits are anything rather than accurate and unbiassed. What it desires is not to comprehend, but to worship. And to worship even the greatest of men might be difficult if one saw too clearly not only his great achievements, but his follies and meannesses, his monstrous vanities and egoisms. It is intolerable to think that one's idol has at times fallen as far below the standard of the average citizen as he has occasionally risen above it; and accordingly we, this realised posterity of which we are all members, prudently decline to see too clearly. We ignore, deny, or explain away everything that makes worship difficult. The eye of posterity is a peculiar organ; it has its high magnifying powers, its distorting lenses, and its blind spots, adjustable at will to any angle. When it is applied to some hero of the past he obtains, not the sympathetic comprehension for which his soul may have panted, but transfiguration—which perhaps would in many cases have been quite as agreeable to him.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

It is sad to think that among the eminent there have been unhappy wights for whom even the eye of posterity could do nothing. Such an unfortunate was Boswell. It is due far less to any demerits of his own than to the fact that he happened to form a convenient theme for two of the most ruthless writers who have ever used the English tongue, that he has come down to us indelibly stamped, not with infamy, but with absurdity. If he had only been a ruffian or a coward, posterity might have contrived to avert its gaze from these faults, and have set him up as a minor deity in the literary Pantheon on the strength of his book and of his friendship with Johnson. But worship is incompatible with absurdity. When Boswell had passed through the hands of Macaulay and Carlyle his chance of apotheosis was for ever gone. He had become ridiculous.

Macaulay, who was always cold, precise, and moderate in praise, became fervent when the rage of vituperation was on him, and he seized upon poor Boswell as his predestined prey. He did his worst with him, but it is possible that Boswell might have survived his onslaught. Macaulay was far more of a controversialist than an artist, and he devoted his attention to what he chose to call infamous in Boswell rather than to what was absurd. His method was somewhat crude: he dealt his victim a rain of bludgeon strokes, though he had a neat thrust here and there. He repeated, it is true, some of the absurd things that Boswell did, but he did not succeed, as Carlyle did a year later, in making Boswell's name synonymous with absurdity. And there was just this in Boswell's favour, that a kind of cold malignance in Macaulay's abuse tends to awaken resentment in the reader. Probably no one has read the essay upon the poems of Mr. Robert Montgomery without feeling a sneaking sympathy with that unfortunate simpleton.

Carlyle took up the rags of Boswell's reputation left by Macaulay and tore them afresh into shreds and patches. Macaulay had dealt with him for his own sake, out of the savage love of the vituperative writer for his victim; Carlyle struck at him, as it were, in passing. Johnson was his true game. Boswell was to be blackened merely to emphasise the grandeur of Johnson—that imaginary Johnson who was to be created solely in order to embody the great arch-quack's hero-idea. But Carlyle's attack was infinitely more destructive than Macaulay's.

With all the pitiless unscrupulousness of the critic he seized upon poor Boswell's personal appearance to make him ridiculous. It was nothing that he called him a sycophant-coxcomb, a Scottish squirelet full of gulosity and gigmanity, that he wrote him down both fool and knave, that he drew attention to his gluttony and drunkenness. It was that terrible sentence describing his appearance that for ever destroyed poor Boswell. "In that cocked nose, cocked up partly in triumph over his weaker fellow-creatures, partly to snuff up the smell of coming pleasure and scent it from afar; in those bag cheeks, hanging like half-filled wine-skins, still able to contain more——" What virtue, courage, or intellectual glory could have survived this?

It is ludicrously unfair and exaggerated, but that matters not at all. Boswell has been made ridiculous to us, and so for him we make no allowances and no excuses. We admit that his book is the finest of biographies, and that he was the constant companion and friend of Johnson, of whom we think so highly, but we allow him scarcely any credit on those grounds. On him posterity never turns the blind spots in its eye. Gibbon had the cocked-up nose and the wine-bag cheeks at which Carlyle sneered, but in his case we do not see in them evidence of a contemptible nature. Nelson was almost as vain as Boswell, and as naive in his vanity. Cromwell, Warren Hastings, Wellington, and many another hero did ugly things. Wordsworth was certainly vainer than Boswell ever was. Poor Bozzy had not a fault, indeed, that we cannot find in at least as high a degree in the character of many a hero and poet whom we worship. But in thinking of them we never remember these matters. Our estimate of Shakespeare is not in the smallest degree affected by the common belief that he died after a drunken debauch. We either ignore this, or we attempt to disprove it. We give all our heroes the benefit of similar treatment. At poor, amiable, "babbling Bozzy" alone do we look with pitiless scrutiny; he who of all men was least fitted to bear it.

A Martyr of Empire—I

NO nation which has ceased to worship its heroes will continue to produce heroes. Cynicism is a narcotic habit which paralyses all sense of freedom and proportion. In an age of shallow artificiality the cheap cynic becomes a prophet new-inspired and the bourne of his teaching is that decay which is the fruit of self-seeking. No profounder word has ever been uttered of men or nations than this—he that loseth his life shall save it.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

In the year 1618 England may be said to have reached the nadir of her infamy, for in the October of that year, at the dictation of the foe whom she had caused to bite the dust, Sir Walter Raleigh was executed on the green facing Westminster Abbey. Nearly 300 years have since passed over the national fortunes. They have but served to burn into sharper contrast the lights and shadows of that scene. James I. during his reign was loathed and detested as a cold-hearted murderer. His memory has been held in increasing execration and contempt ever since. One may perchance be pardoned for recalling the salient outline of Raleigh's story. It cannot be told too often, for it is a parable of the nation that bred the man.

In the year in which he was born—1552—Elizabeth was nineteen. Under the snows of oppression lay a mighty national harvest, destined in the sunlight to leap into blade and ear. Raleigh sprang, as all the world knows, from the West country. The wise men came from the West in those days—Devon and Dorset men, slow of speech, but die-hards. The swarthy sailormen who sailed back to Plymouth Sound with strange birds and shells, and stranger yarns of "the Indies," must have dinned their golden legends into the boy's ears. Never had a youngster sharper ears and eyes, a quicker brain or a readier tongue. At the age of 17, such was the schooling of the sons of gentlemen in the great Tudor Queen's days, Raleigh fought as a Huguenot trooper in the Lowlands. There he saw the brutal side of war. The Prince of Condé with a broken leg was, we are told, captured by the Spaniards, who then mounted him on an ass and led him in derision before the soldiery. The Huguenots, in open revolt at the hardships they had to endure, were in this fight routed, and narrowly escaped destruction. Such war was a rough school, but it left young Raleigh keen as a fasting hawk. The next news we have of him is some six years later, when he is fighting in the French civil wars. Crossing the passes of Languedoc, his party come upon a body of Catholics hidden in a cave and forthwith proceed to smoke them out, gaining rich booty by their surrender. France in the struggle became one huge shambles. It was wild and bloody work, before which the ghastly horrors of the French Revolution pale.

At the age of 23 we find Raleigh a dandy about Town, with lodgings in the Temple. There we may be sure he ruffled it with the best. He published his poems, even as other gallants of his day—poems in which the high ideals of Feudalism were cloaked in a motley garb of words. We should nowadays call much of the verse of the day high-flown bombast, but it was typical of that transition period when masque and pageant were in the heart and not alone on the lips of men. Notwithstanding its dandyism, it was an age never surpassed for vital insight. Raleigh was physically of noble and commanding mien, and, as a young man, with his bold flattery, could melt the heart of any woman. We know that he mixed freely with the gallants of the Court, that his feet were already on the ladder of fame. Southampton was of the Essex faction, and therefore we may conclude that Shakespeare would be inclined to bite his thumb at Raleigh. Still he knew a man when he met one. May not the magic lines of Mark Antony have been suggested by Raleigh at this period of his career?—

> "His life was gentle; and the elements
> So mix'd in him that Nature might stand up
> And say to all the world, This was a man!"

But sterner work was at hand. His half-brother, Gilbert, was organising that expedition—ostensibly to Newfoundland—which was destined to lay in failure the foundation of our oversea dominions. Elizabeth was supposed to be hostile to raids such as this, and was careful to put her blind eye to the telescope of State, so as not to recognise them officially. She even, as a matter of form, imprisoned a few of the folk mixed up in them. In the State Paper Office is a "Discourse to the Queen," dated November 6, 1577. The signature is that of Gilbert, but the hand is the hand of Raleigh. In this document it is pointed out to Elizabeth that a policy of unofficial buccaneering may be made the instrument for conveniently ridding a kingdom of impending invasion and filling the State coffers with foreign gold. How pregnant was the wit of the writer may be judged from one sentence, which comes home to us today: "This realm, being an island, shall be discharged from all foreign pillage, if all the monarchs of the world should join against us, so long as Ireland shall be in safe keeping."

The crews gathered together for Gilbert's expedition were reckless sea-wolves, and they commenced operations by riotous living in the town of Plymouth. The expedition with Raleigh aboard ultimately set sail, but returned many months later in a shattered condition and without the promised treasure. Whither it had sailed can only be conjectured. It is probable that the leaders struck for the West Indies and the Spanish treasure ships. One thing is certain—Raleigh returned salted for the rough game of sea-fighting. He had tasted the bitter spindrift of adventure, and henceforward the sea was to be his mistress.

Elizabeth's court was seething with intrigue and treason, and Raleigh we may be sure did not neglect his chances, for the ear of the Queen was at this time open to him. Next follows the sordid brutality of the campaign in Ireland, Raleigh's share in which Charles Kingsley has faithfully narrated in "Westward Ho!"

Raleigh on his return to the Court from Ireland reached the zenith of his worldly career, for Elizabeth treated him with that extraordinary favour which she was wont to extend to one or another of the men about her. Doubtless the risks and chances of the realm, both internal and external, were such that in the policy of pitting one courtier against another she saw her best chance of escaping shipwreck for her Crown and State. Raleigh's heart was probably uplifted by the royal favour, and of this period we may guess was that intrigue with Bessy Throckmorton which brought him disgrace and remorse, but ultimately a true-hearted helpmeet, as faithful a wife as man ever had.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Meantime in 1582 Sir Humphrey Gilbert was preparing for his second voyage, and hoped that Raleigh would accompany him. This the Queen vetoed. Whether Raleigh's presence would have saved that ill-fated expedition from failure it is impossible to say. Gilbert was a noble patriot of single aim, reckless perhaps and inclined, in Raleigh's terse phrase, to trust in "the god of fools." He died a glorious death, and has enriched the annals of English manhood for ever, but his squadron came to hopeless undoing.

In the six years which elapse before the coming of the Armada Raleigh may almost be said to have founded the oversea empire of England. His counsel was predominant with Elizabeth, and, under her astute protection, were organised expeditions which not merely raided Spanish towns in the New World, but left scattered settlements of Englishmen to carry on the tradition of the race.

A Correspondence with Mr. Andrew Lang

IF we cannot say that the lamented death of Mr. Andrew Lang has "eclipsed the gaiety of nations," we may at least assert that it has suddenly arrested for the English-speaking peoples a seemingly inexhaustible fount of instruction and entertainment. It was my good fortune in the course of last year to receive from him a sequence of three letters, and, as these are of more than private interest, it seems right that the many readers who took delight in the workings of his acute and versatile intelligence should have an opportunity of appreciating them.

Everyone is aware of Mr. Lang's interest in psychical research, and that last year he was President of the society devoted to that object. Early in 1911 "The Life of Robert Browning" fell into his hands, and he at once fastened on the episode of the Brownings' presence at D. D. Home's séance in 1855. The outcome was the following letter, which reached me from St. Andrews on February 25:—

"Dear Sir,—While reading with keen interest your Life of Mr. Browning, I came across pp. 203-205. I lately read the catalogue of the books and MSS. of my old acquaintance, Mr. E. C. Steadman, in which was published a letter of Mr. Browning, written not more than three days after his one séance with D. D. Home. In that letter he expresses complete incredulity and suspicion, but speaks of no discovery or detection. Now, if he had 'caught hold of Home's foot under the table"—caught it in nefarious practices—he would have said so. Mr. R. B. Browning in your book says that he heard his father 'repeatedly describe' this incident. The late Mr. F. W. Greenwood published a much more odd (and impossible) story, in which he said that Mr. Browning told him about this matter. But as Mr. Browning's letter of the same week in July, 1855, refers to no detection, but to general suspicion, I must presume that the reporters of these legends are in error. I proved to Mr. Greenwood that his yarn was not possible, much to his surprise. You will understand that I am not backing Home, but the interesting point is that mythology, in the course of some forty years, took hold of the events. I think you can procure all the evidence, if you care to see it, though except to the student of modern mythology it is of no interest. Either Mr. Browning's memory became hallucinatory, or the persons to whom he spoke misrepresented him."

The letter to Mr. Steadman had, at this date, only lately been printed in the Times, so that it was not available when I compiled my account of the Home episode. In replying to Mr. Lang I cited evidence of the faultiness of Browning's memory, and suggested that Mr. Greenwood's memory must also have deceived him, since his version of the affair was an "impossible" one—as, indeed, it is. I could not end without thanking Mr. Lang for the pleasure his varied writings had given me for many a year. A few days later I received the following kind and interesting letter:—

"St. Andrews, March 1.

"My dear Sir,—I quite agree with your view of Mr. Browning's memory, but I am not sure that Mr. Greenwood's was wrong, for the story told to him was more recent in his memory than the old affair of 1855 in Browning's. Memory is a very hallucinatory faculty. I enclose a little book"—his "Historical Mysteries"—"which please do not return, containing the gist of what I can find about Home. Aïde's evidence is not easily explainable, and Sir W. Crookes is not a gibbering idiot. Unluckily your book has returned to Mudie's. Browning had a very queer yarn of his own about a clairvoyant, and another about meeting Horne (when he was in Australia) and walking up the Strand with him. I only met him (Browning) occasionally; he was always the best of company.—Believe me, faithfully yours,

"A. LANG."

The reference to Horne—man of letters, dramatist, Government official, and friend of the Brownings, whom the Australians wrongly supposed to have been the original of "Waring"—was too tantalising. I ventured to write once more, begging for details of the story. I also offered to lend Mr. Lang a copy of Sir Francis Burnand's "Reminiscences," which contains an account of Home's rising in the air and floating through a window, in the presence of Lord Dunraven and others—an episode more lightly touched in his own "Historical Mysteries." His reply is the more valuable in that it contains a psychical experience of his own:—

"St. Andrews, March 7.

"My dear Sir,—I don't think there was more than tattle about Home's private character. As to the levitation and Lord Dunraven, the evidence is all at sixes and sevens, no use, and I must not trouble you to send

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

'Burnand,' which I can see later in London. All these people, like Eusapia, run in and out, now cheats that a child can detect and now puzzling. It is evidence like Brewster's family letters and Aïde's diary that are best, for the light was good"—the reference here is to a séance at which Sir D. Brewster and Aïde were present, when both were puzzled by Home's manifestations. "The Horne story," proceeds the letter, "is too long to write, and ended in the man saying, 'Give my love to Horne," and then being lost sight of. Browning was interested in my meeting the Oxford Professor of Latin in the street, when he was suddenly dying a hundred miles away. If he had not been so very unmistakable, tall, etc., there would be nothing in it."

Such is the third and last letter which I received from Mr. Lang. Its conclusion is touching. At this sad juncture may we not, humbly and without offence, picture to ourselves other and less transient meetings of severed friends upon the happy plains of Elysium?

H. C. MINCHIN.

At St. Stephen's Shrine

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE.

WE have now entered upon the last lap. It has been a strenuous race, although up to now, to drop the metaphor, it has been singularly free from all-night sittings. It is a curious thing, but it has often been noticed that your Radical cannot and will not sit up all night. He does not seem to have the breed or the stamina. If he tries to, he is no good the following day, but lies asleep in a more or less elegant position in the Lobby.

On Wednesday, July 31, the Premier moved the Address to the King to convey the deep regret at the loss the country had sustained in the death of the Emperor of Japan. In a terse but excellent speech he approved of the Japanese Alliance, and wound up by saying he could not recall the name of a single ruler in history within the limits of whose single reign progress so vast and of so much meaning, both to his own subjects and to mankind, had been attained. This was seconded by Bonar Law, who referred to the fact that the alliance with Japan had been formed by one Government, carried further by another, and had done much to secure peace in the East. After this was carried without a dissentient voice, we once more plunged into party politics.

It was Irish Supply, and the Nationalists made it a pretext for an attack on the Opposition with reference to the disturbances in Harland and Wolff's yard. Devlin was in his best form. He stormed at the Ulstermen and painted the situation in lurid colours. The workmen in the great shipbuilding yard would never have ill-treated the Catholic Home Rulers, their fellow-workmen, in the way they had if it had not been for the speeches of Bonar Law and Carson at Blenheim. Carson got up to reply. He deemed it—nay, more, he claimed that, if he had not laid a restraining hand on the Ulstermen, there would have been rioting and bloodshed much earlier in the proceedings. He proved by dates that it was the Ancient Order of Hibernians who began the row by attacking a defenceless Sunday school at Castledawson. John Redmond then took a hand, and dared Bonar Law to repeat in the House of Commons the language he had used at Blenheim. Bonar Law has the singular knack of seeming to know what his opponents are going to say. He seems always prepared when one fears he may be at a loss. Sitting behind him in my humble seat under the gallery, when a fierce and clever attack has been made on him, I often picture myself in his place, and with a shudder of apprehension say to myself, "What the dickens should I say in answer to that?"

Not only did Bonar Law adhere to every word, but he said he was so impressed with the seriousness of the position that he carefully considered what he was going to say, and had actually written out the very words he uttered! He turned to his followers, and said perhaps some of them might think he had gone too far (there was a deep and sustained shout of "No!"), but for his part he believed that it was the most serious situation that had arisen since 1642. If there had been any sign that the Unionist Party throughout the country had disagreed with his views, he would, without hesitation, have resigned; but there was no such sign. He warned the Government that, if the Home Rule Bill passed in the autumn and became law eighteen months hence, there would be a feeling in Ireland with which the Government would find itself unable to cope. Had the Government a moral right to carry through a revolution? Under the Parliament Act (without the promised preamble being carried) they could do away with the Monarchy and set up a Republic. They had no more right to do one than the other, and they would be resisted to the last in either event.

Asquith always gives one the idea of trying to patronise Bonar Law in a way that he would not dare to try on Arthur Balfour. There is a sort of "You are a young man, and take heed what you do; you may in a single night wreck your reputation" kind of air about his remarks. He was surprised that a responsible statesman (meaning Bonar Law, but subtly conveying he was not a responsible statesman) should give utterance to such thoughts. Did he really mean force against constitutional government? What would happen if he were in power, and the large majority in Ireland tried on the same game? "If," chipped in Bonar Law, "that contingency arose, we should have gained power by clearly stating our intentions, which the present Government have not done." Asquith appeared to be very shocked, but the rank and file behind him for the first time seemed to realise that there was more than mere bluff in the utterance of the Leader of the Opposition. This was the last of the allotted days, and there were a number of reports on the various votes. Divisions were taken, but the Whips took care there were large majorities.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Any act of the Radicals of an unexpected nature they contrive to do in such a way that it looks as if it were a low but smart trick. Thus, on August 1, Mr. Buxton announced that the Government proposed to denounce the Sugar Convention. It is true we have been expecting this for some time, but why announce it just before the holidays, when there is no time to debate it? Mike Thompson began to be suspicious. When was the decision come to? But he got no direct answer, so Austen joined in, and Asquith had to admit that the decision had only been recently arrived at. Just so. It looks exactly as if this was another attempt to help the Free Traders in North-West Manchester.

I believe it was the late Lord Salisbury who as a young man in an early speech referred to the action of the Liberal Government of that day as "unworthy of a hedgerow attorney." The House was shocked in those days at such dreadful language, and everyone felt that Robert Cecil, as he was, had gone too far, and, like Bonar Law to-day, in danger of ruining his career. On the following day Robert Cecil came down and craved leave to make a personal explanation. The House cheered (it is always generous to young men who make mistakes and are willing frankly to own up to them), so it received Cecil with cordiality. "I have been thinking over what I said last night," said Cecil slowly and with diffidence, "and I am sorry for what I said. (Pause, and approving cheers.) On consideration, I must apologise—(pause; more cheers)—to the hedgerow attorney." (Cheering, bathos, rage, and indignation.)

Tim Healy seemed to feel like this about Uganda—another North-West Manchester bribe. I, alas! am old enough to remember what a favourite cock-shy Uganda used to be with the Radical Opposition in 1901. I can recollect John Burns, on the strength of one short trip to the East Coast when he was a "greaser," giving his experiences in sentences that had no ending. McKenna, Lloyd George, and all the noisy crew below the gangway used to pour ridicule on the whole project, and yet here they are realising that we were right and wanting more money for the scheme—quite unnecessary and useful, but done in the crooked, underhand way of the hedgerow attorney. Tim in his serio-comic way, with his head on one side like a mischievous magpie, poured out a stream of abuse on the Treasury bench. "Fraudulent statements come out of the mouth of the Secretary for the Treasury like ribbons out of the mouth of a conjurer," was one of his gems, whilst the unhappy Masterman looked more like a dentist's patient about to be given gas than a Maskelyne or Devant.

Various subjects were discussed—the Army when General Pole-Carew, in answer to a taunt from Seely, hoped he could have managed the Army better than "the voluble and plausible lawyer" who had "organised a sham and a make-believe." Persia and Putumayo took up the rest of the time till eleven, when, after the closure had been applied, the Appropriation Bill was read a second time. When the House went into Committee on the Finance Bill Austen rose to say it was perfectly scandalous to treat finance as the Government persisted in doing—they deliberately put it off to the end of the year to escape criticism, and it was a mockery of Parliamentary control to ask the House to consider a Bill of this importance at 11.30 p.m. Lloyd George persisted, and so we determined to give them a run for their money. Not a Radical dared move. There was a double supply of whips on the door, and from time to time the usual bolt holes were patrolled to see that men were not sneaking home to bed. The majority of our men went home comparatively early, but the rest stuck it out, and the House did not rise until nearly five.

Do you recollect in Edgar Allan Poe's story of the Missing Letter there is an essay on heads and tails and the way different minds approach the subject? This occupied the attention of the Radical whips on Thursday night. It will be remembered that on Friday, July 26, we nearly beat them, they escaping by a majority of 3. "They will never attempt it again this Friday. They know we shall be ready," said Whip No. 2. "Nay," retorted Elibank; "don't you think that they will reason that we shall reason that way and try it on again? That fellow Balcarres is capable of anything." So a double and urgent whip was sent out to the tired host still sitting on. But as we have said, Radicals cannot stand late sittings—in spite of what Sam Weller would have called a double-barrelled steam power, A1 at Lloyds, extra quality, jewelled-in-four-holes whip—the men turned up very badly, and Gulland's white skin seemed to look like alabaster against his black beard as he realised it was going to be a close thing. As a matter of fact, they won by 26, but it was no credit to the Government—it was the Irish who once more saved the situation.

Some members came down to the House on Bank Holiday with the air of conscious virtue worn by those who rise early, but in the best circles it is considered the thing to come down as a matter of course. We have no concern with anything so plebeian as the holiday we created for the benefit of the oi polloi; we can take our holidays when less favoured mortals cannot! So a goodly few of us turned up to discuss the third reading of the Appropriation Bill. The Government professed to hope it would be over early, and seemed to be surprised at the number of questions asked—payment of members, the Army, the Navy, the Insurance Act, and celluloid all came upon the carpet, and it was not until 9.45 that the division was called.

The Radical papers have recently been inveighing against "snaps," "mean advantages," "unworthy of a great party," "To what a loss of argument must the Unionist Party be reduced when they have to resort to tricks like these to turn our noble Government out," etc., etc., etc.

To-night, or rather to-morrow morning, there can be no such excuses in the Radical Press. Elibank must have known that the first division after a holiday would naturally be selected by a keen enemy for an attack, and taken means to meet it. As, in fact, he did, by means of a heavily loaded and leaded whip. But all to no purpose. The Radicals were not there. If the division could have taken place early, there is no doubt that the Government would have been beaten, and would have been bound to go; but, as a matter of fact, the division did not take place, as I have said, until six hours later, what time the Whips wore out their telephone and used up all the telegram forms at the counter of the post office (at least there were none there when I wanted one at 7 p.m.) in frantic endeavours to get men up.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

What was the result?—162 Unionists voted against 109 Radicals. The Government were saved by 62 Nationalists and 20 Labour men, showing a coalition majority of only 29. This was deplorable when you think that the Government possesses a nominal majority of 110. As a matter of fact, the Radicals are worn out and take no interest; they are like the French soldiers who retreated from Moscow—they prefer to lie down rather than continue the endless march (through the lobbies), in spite of what it entails. One member was so sleepy he lay down on a bench in the "No" Lobby and was with difficulty persuaded to vote, a Unionist peer kindly offering to put him in the petition bag behind the Speaker's chair, on the plea that it was another way to call the attention of the House to your views.

There are rumours to-night that Elibank is going to resign. I am not surprised. What is the use of being a general if your men will not obey the word of command? There are other changes announced, but it is not for me in a weekly review to prophesy, although I view some of the rumours with scepticism.

Negotiations went on all the afternoon over the Finance Bill. There were pages of amendments down, and it was obvious that breakfast-time would not see them half through. I think the division clinched the bargain, for after an hour and a half Austen got up and moved to report progress to enable Lloyd George to make a statement. The Chancellor accepted seven new clauses, including one making a concession to the growers of timber over the death duties, two or three licensing concessions, a narrower definition of what is a mineral, sea insurance, etc.

It was a notable victory. John Ward, voicing the opinion of the Labour men, looked with suspicion on the whole affair. They were all concessions to the rich, he inaccurately claimed, but subsequently admitted, after an explanation, that the first was not so bad as he thought. Wedgwood got it into his head that underwood was also excepted, because it afforded shelter for game, and was so persistent that he was finally driven to ask if heather in Scotland was treated as underwood. "No," said the Chancellor; "no more are thistles"—a retort that silenced Wedgwood for a time and made the House laugh.

A division was challenged, and the whole Unionist Party supported the Government, the figures being 319 to 17 men who love to show their independence when it is perfectly safe to do so.

It was explicitly stated by Austen that the bargain did not include other amendments being moved, and, to the surprise of the tired House, the Bill was not reported until 3.30 and there was scarcely a taxi left in Palace Yard.

It takes a bold man to defy the Speaker, as his patience adds to his difficulty. MacCallum Scott, a turbulent Northerner, kept on asking questions about some obscure dispute between the Colonial Office, the Khan of Hoti, Sir George Roos-Keppel, and himself. The House was not interested, but he wanted the House to know that the accusation which somebody had made against him that he had said Sir George Roos-Keppel was actuated by malice against the Khan was untrue. He persisted at question time, and then rose when the orders of the day were about to be called on. He stood while the Speaker stood, and neither Gulland nor Illingworth could get him to sit down. He persisted with angry obstinacy, and there was nothing for it but to name him, which the Speaker did, and Asquith moved that he be suspended for the rest of the session. A few recalcitrant spirits below the gangway shouted "No!" but had not the temerity to carry it to a division. As he went out, MacCallum Scott made a melodramatic bow, which most people thought very foolish.

The Labour men, on the whole, have been very loyal to the Radical Party throughout the session; indeed, some of the Socialists say they have been servile. Be that as it may, they were promised a reward, and that reward was the reversal of the Osborne Judgment.

Time ran on; questions were asked, and Mr. Asquith said, "All in good time," "Leave it to me," "Wait and see," and the result has been that on the penultimate of a hard-fought session the Trades Disputes Bill came on. Rufus Isaacs made a perfunctory speech on its behalf. He spoke about safeguards for the trade unionist who did not want to pay for the support of a candidate whose political views were opposed to his own.

Clavell, who is known as Dry Salter, because of his unemotional manner, dissected the scheme with care. It was "Your money we want" with the Socialists, and they were quite alive to the fact that they could only get it by compulsion.

The Labour men and Radicals spoke soft words, just as they did during the Trades Disputes Bill, and yet we have seen during the last few months the practical interpretation of peaceful picketing. They talked of the safeguard of the ballot. Anyone who has had anything to do with a trade union ballot knows perfectly well that it is a farce. The ballot paper is seen before it is put into the box, and very often marked for the man who is supposed to put it in, and any objection on the part of the voter leads to suspicion and the man is marked. It was all very well for Ramsay MacDonald, with a lofty air, to say "that the man who did not want to subscribe to the political fund would not be interfered with in the exercise of his liberty"! The Labour men themselves know that this is rubbish. The division against the rejection of the Bill was carried by a hundred, which greatly cheered and was greatly cheered by the dispirited majority.

The Government had kept their word, although they had broken it to the hope of the Labour men, who cannot, however, afford to say so. The Bill has received a second reading, but its chances of becoming law this year seem remote.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

We then plunged back into the Finance Bill on report. The usual amendments were proposed—encouragement of home-grown tobacco, a preferential duty on wine, and an extension of time for objections to provisional valuation. The Chancellor could not agree to any of them, but the House did not adjourn until 2.30 a.m.

The last day is generally devoted by the conscientious to tipping the servants and clearing the lockers of notes of forgotten and, alas! undelivered speeches.

In the intervals of these arduous duties I went into the smoking-room and saw the cartoon in Punch in which the three Bills in a dentist's waiting-room ask the Butler (Elibank) when the Dentist (Asquith) is going to finish them. This is one of the few cartoons in which Elibank has appeared, and it looks as if the Opposition had "finished him," if to-day's rumours as to his retiring into private life are correct.

Samuel insisted upon making a statement about the Marconi contract, and there was a discussion on sugar, but the House was in too much of a holiday mood to take anything seriously.

Looking back, the Opposition have no reason to be ashamed of their labours. The Government is in a very much weaker position than when the session started.

Notes and News

We understand that the author of the novel entitled "The Triuneverse" intends to devote all profits from sales to a benevolent fund to be nominated by the Press Association.

"Nervation of Plants" is the title of a popular nature-book about to be issued by Messrs. Williams and Norgate from the pen of Mr. Francis George Heath. It will be illustrated with about 200 plant figures.

Mrs. Pennell, the widow of Dr. T. L. Pennell, of Bannu, is engaged upon his biography, and would be grateful if those who have preserved any letters he or his mother wrote would lend them to her. Great care will be taken with them, and they will be returned to the owners as soon as possible. They should be sent to Messrs. Seeley, Service and Co., 38, Great Russell Street, W.C., who will acknowledge their receipt.

The School of Sociology and Social Economics, which has for nine years carried on the work of training those who wish to take part in the various forms of social and philanthropic effort, is about to be merged in the London School of Economics and Political Science, one of the schools of the University of London. The new course will begin early in October. Intending students should apply for particulars to the Secretary of the London School of Economics and Political Science, Clare Market, Kingsway, London, W.C. A committee to give advice as to the best methods of training has been appointed.

A University has been founded for Western Australia in Perth, the capital of that State. Sir Winthrop Hackett, a barrister and Editor of the Western Australian News, has been appointed Chancellor of the University, and the Senate has been constituted. It is intended shortly to appoint professors to eight Chairs at this University, viz., one for each of the following departments:—Agriculture, Biology, Chemistry, English, Geology, History and Economics, Mathematics and Physics, Mining and Engineering. It thus appears that some good appointments will shortly be open for capable young specialists from the old country, and it is to be hoped that the new University may obtain the services of men who will act as pioneers of knowledge in a young country with such a magnificent future before it as Western Australia. That vast territory has at present hardly one human being to every three square miles; the parent country has to be content with a single square mile for 370 persons. Emigration into this new country is taking place at the rate of 12,000 emigrants each year, and those who have settled there are nominating their relatives and friends for assisted passages at the rate of nearly 200 a week. The present population is only three hundred thousand; it is calculated that the State, if properly developed, could support five times the population of the mother country.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

BY LANCELOT LAWTON.

THE PEACE OF EUROPE.

IT is, nowadays, a matter of difficulty for the writer to discourse, be it never so lightly, upon the subject of alliances, ententes, or conventions, without leading a section of his readers to suppose that he is enunciating some form or other of bellicose doctrine. Particularly is this the case when the Triple Entente is brought forward for discussion. On such occasions we are told that this unholy compact is designed for the sole object of restraining Germany from exercising her legitimate activities throughout the world, and we are warned that the day is approaching when she will no longer submit to the dictates of France, Russia, and England. These friends of Germany—they are not her only friends in this country—who read into the Triple Entente the motive of offence, will never admit that its counterpoise was framed to any other end than that of defence, pure and simple. But great international groupings, however peaceable may have been the common objects which drew their various constituents together in the first place, are inclined to grow in strength and to upset that nice division of influence which we call the balance of power. The Triple Alliance is a case in point.

In view of the harmony established between Germany, Austria, and Italy in the councils of Europe, the natural necessity arose for some form of co-operation among the three great Powers who were excluded from the compact. History shows us that the surest safeguard of peace is the preservation of the Continental equilibrium; and Great Britain would have made a dangerous deviation from her traditional policy had she not elected to sink her differences with erstwhile enemies, with the object of forming an effective combination to counterbalance the powerful group already in existence. When the Government of the day arrived at this momentous decision they were observing a continuity of traditional policy by taking yet another factor into consideration. Over the centuries the tranquillity of Europe has been repeatedly disturbed by the rise to overwhelming power of some one among the nations, and it has ever been the task of England to lend her aid in resisting such threatened hegemony. Our statesmen, therefore, were wise in devising the policy of which King Edward was the chosen exponent, for they realised in time the dangerous potentialities of the Teutonic assertion.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

To appreciate this point of view it is necessary to draw a clear distinction between Germany's legitimate ambitions in the world at large and the perilous conditions that would arise were she to find herself in a position of overpowering supremacy in Europe. To prevent the latter possibility the Triple Entente has, among other things, been framed; but it was never deliberately intended to thwart the activities of the German people beyond their own borders. Whatever the critics may say, the utility of the Triple Entente as a factor making for peace has been frankly recognised by no less a personage than the German Emperor himself. At the recent meeting at Port Baltic he, together with the Tsar, gave sanction to the wording of an official communiqué, which stated that "there could be no question of new agreements, because there was no particular occasion for them, or of producing alterations of any kind in the grouping of the European Powers, the value of which, for the maintenance of equilibrium and of peace, has already been proved." No one, not even the friends of Germany, can lay the charge of insincerity against the Emperor William, who, before he took leave of his Imperial host on the Standart, gave utterance to the noble resolution that "we sovereigns, knowing well our responsibility for the happiness or unhappiness of our people, are firm in our determination to maintain peace."

The opponents of the Entente policy must not delude themselves into the belief that the leaders of thought, either in France or Russia, are unanimous on the advisability of seeking and retaining the close friendship of England. In the former country, however, adverse criticism rarely strays beyond the bounds of academic discussion, and may therefore be regarded as negligible. On the other hand, there exists in Russia a pro-German party, whose creed is that England constitutes the real menace to the peace of the world, and that in wresting from her the mastery of the sea, and thus for all time breaking her power, Germany will be rendering a service to mankind. This school preaches the doctrine of "Perfidious Albion," justifying itself on historical grounds by recalling the "altruistic" part played by Russia in the Napoleonic wars and the subsequent century of hostility which England displayed towards her. If Russia were to join France in assisting Great Britain to overthrow the power of Germany, it is contended that, in the event of success, the raison d'être of the Triple Entente would disappear, and with it the friendship of this country.

But the leaders of the pro-German party in Russia have an alternative to this cynical hypothesis. Either through the active participation of their own country, or the observance of a benevolent neutrality, they would like to see the triumph of German arms in final conflict with England. In this event, they argue, a victorious Germany would have scope for her activities in many quarters of the globe, thus leaving Russia in peace to work out her own destinies in Europe and Asia. The whole theory is, of course, destroyed by its ingenuousness. That human nature enters largely into the conduct of high policy the world over, no one will deny. But if the baser attributes of human nature are expected to betray themselves in the attitude of a triumphant England, why, our Russian critics should ask themselves, are these attributes likely to be absent from the actions of an all-conquering Germany? Is it not more than probable that, if France and England became engulfed in the Teuton flood, Russia herself would have to turn her eyes to the east to seek for the high ground of safety? The point of view of the Russian Anglophobists is merely instructive in that it shows the absurd lengths to which critics of the Entente policy are prone to be carried. Fortunately the conduct of foreign affairs is not left to a few visionaries whose personal predilections are allowed to obscure their reason. Whatever may be said against the policy of maintaining the Continental equilibrium by means of balancing one group of Powers against another, no effective alternative has ever been suggested; and so long as universal disarmament remains unattainable, alliances and ententes will continue to serve as the only guarantee of peace in Europe.

The most noteworthy developments that have taken place in the diplomatic world for some time past are the recent understanding arrived at between the partners of the Dual Alliance on the subject of naval matters and the visit of the French Premier to Russia. Although in Paris, and to a more marked degree in St. Petersburg, there has been a disposition in official quarters to minimise the importance of the Franco-Russian Naval Convention, there can no longer be any doubt that a most useful instrument has been devised for strengthening the bonds between the two Powers, and, consequently, between themselves and Great Britain. We must not expect any immediate result from the new understanding, unless it be, as will probably prove to be the case, the opening of the French money market to the Russian Government. It is, perhaps, to the years 1915-16 that we must look for the first-fruits of the Convention, a period the mere contemplation of which fills so many Englishmen with alarm. By that time Russia will possess a relatively strong force in the Baltic, a circumstance that not inconceivably may relieve the tension in the North Sea. Knowing as we do the frank interchange of ideas that constantly takes place between the partners of the Triple Entente, we may now form some reasonable conclusions as to the fundamental basis upon which Mr. Churchill framed his Estimates, and to the nature of the disclosures that were made to Mr. Borden and his colleagues. From the visit of M. Poincaré, Premier and Foreign Minister, to St. Petersburg, much is expected. The Naval Convention will be ratified, and every question at present preoccupying Europe will be frankly and fully discussed in an atmosphere of sympathy and sanity. Although the occasion is naturally reserved for the members of the Dual Alliance, Great Britain, by reason of her close partnership with both nations, is virtually represented. And so it may be said that the mission of M. Poincaré, which is a mission of peace, cannot fail to strengthen the bonds that unite in harmony the Powers of the Triple Entente.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

MOTORING

THE test to destruction of the four leading tyres—the Dunlop, Michelin, Continental, and Victor—began on Monday last, the first day's run being to Brighton and back, through Worthing. Colonel Harrison Hogge, a member of the General Committee of supervision, travelled on the car as observer, together with a representative of the Press, and this course of procedure will be followed throughout the trial—one member of the general and one of the Press committee being in constant attendance to ensure fairness. The latest additions to the Committee are the Bishop of Birmingham, Lord Tenterden, and Lord Deerhurst, which brings the total number of members of the aristocracy officially interested in the trial to about twenty. A singular feature about this trial is the great interest shown by distinguished motorists in the question as to which is the best tyre in the market.

It seems to be the general impression, among those best qualified to judge, that the present high price of petrol will be maintained indefinitely, while some authorities even go so far as to prophesy with confidence that we are on the eve of a substantial increase. Apart from the fact that the supply of petrol is to all intents and purposes in the hands of monopolists, who naturally want to make as much profit as possible out of their commodity, there is another tangible reason for anticipating a rise in the cost of the motorist's fuel. As is generally known, the manufacture of petrol involves the manufacture of a correspondingly larger quantity of paraffin, both being products of crude petroleum, and rapidly increasing demand for petrol, combined with the decreasing demand for paraffin as an illuminant (owing to the almost universal use of incandescent gas and electricity) is causing paraffin to be regarded by the distillers as, to some extent, a waste product. The distillers, therefore, will seek to compensate themselves for the loss on paraffin, the demand for which is diminishing, by raising the price of petrol, the demand for which is increasing. This reasoning seems to justify the pessimists in their gloomy prognostications; the more so as the difficulties in the way of organising effective opposition to the monopolist oil corporations appear practically insurmountable.

In the circumstances, it is not surprising to find that there is a strong tendency to seek for an alternative fuel as a solution of the position, and the most feasible of these seems to be ordinary paraffin, benzol being almost as expensive as petrol, and alcohol being debarred for fiscal reasons. The question arises—why is it that paraffin, which is richer than petrol in British thermol units, very much safer to handle, and very much cheaper, is not used as a substitute for the ordinary motor car fuel? The answer is that paraffin does not vaporise readily enough to enable the engine to be started from cold, and that it is not "lively" enough to adapt itself as a fuel to the continuous variations of speed which a motor car has necessarily to undergo. For many years inventors have been engaged upon attempts to evolve a carburettor which will surmount these difficulties, but that they have failed is proved by the fact that the use of petrol is still all but universal. A recent announcement, however, seems to suggest possibilities. A new type of carburettor, known as the "Bi-Fuel," has been invented, which uses petrol and paraffin (or any similar heavy oil) in conjunction, and in any desired proportions. The method of construction involves the placing of two separate jets side by side in the mixing chamber, one fed with petrol and the other with paraffin. The orifices of the jets are adjustable, so that any proportion of the two fuels can be obtained, and they are also proportioned to the area of the air inlet, all being simultaneously operated by the suction of the engine. It is stated that this paraffin-petrol carburettor has been in constant use for the past three months on road and track, and that the results have been eminently satisfactory. A saving of 40 per cent. in cost of fuel, together with increased power and efficiency, are claimed for the new device, and no doubt the combination-carburettor will soon be placed on the market as the panacea for the ills the present-day motorist endures. It will be as well, however, to await the results of an R.A.C. test before jumping to conclusions.

A few weeks ago we referred to the forthcoming trial of a 15 h.p. "Colonial" Napier over a course of exceptional severity—a circuit about 13 miles long in the roughest part of the South Downs—the object being to test the fitness of the latest Colonial model for all kinds of work on the undeveloped roads of over-sea countries. Without the aid of diagrams or pictorial representations it is not possible to convey an adequate idea of the difficulty of the course, and in the absence of independent and reliable confirmation it would not be easy to believe that any car could traverse it continuously for three consecutive days without being shaken to pieces. It is evident, however, from the official certificate of performance issued by the R.A.C., that the Napier succeeded in the task, and, moreover, with very creditable figures in the matters of average speed and fuel consumption. The circuit, every round of which involved the climbing of 1,563 feet, was covered 18 times, and the whole distance of 263 miles was travelled at an average speed (running time) of 14.4 miles an hour. On one occasion the fan belt was dressed before the day's run, but apart from this—and, of course, the necessary oiling and greasing—no work or adjustment of any kind was done to the car throughout the trial. The petrol consumption worked out at an average of 15.82 miles per gallon. After the road portion of the trial, the car was driven to Brooklands, where it covered the flying half-mile at the rate of 43.14 miles per hour. Taken altogether, the trial was one of the most successful and convincing of any to which the Napier has been subjected, but the significance of the figures quoted above cannot be properly appreciated unless one has seen the course covered.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

R. B. H.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE holidays are over. Whether it be the heavy rain, the snowstorms and the cold, I do not know; but business on the Stock Exchange is much brisker than one would expect in August Bank Holiday week. Really Great Britain is very prosperous, and it is making money so fast that it has to find channels into which it can pour its wealth. But the public is capricious. It declines to subscribe for new issues, although it will buy the same stocks a month after the prospectus has appeared at a premium. The whole trend of investment to-day is towards foreign securities giving from 5 to 6 per cent. English industrials are completely neglected. They yield even better returns than speculative foreign stocks, but no one will have anything to do with them. The excuse made is dislike of the present Government. But this objection is political and should therefore only apply to the Tory investor, whereas I find that the Radical rich man is just as averse to an English investment as is his opponent. I confess that I believe the whole thing to be a question of fashion. We cannot explain why at one time the whole of the money goes into home securities and at another time flows abroad. I believe that the tide is gradually changing. Perhaps if we got a change of Government we should all sell our foreign stocks and buy Home Rails and Industrials. In any case those who hold such stocks and shares should on no account realise. On the contrary, I believe it would pay them to average to-day. There have been no new issues of any importance since I last wrote. The Emba Caspian was applied for many times over, but principally by foreign speculators. The Kinemacolour de France was a company formed to deal with the well-known kinema colour patents in France. It is a speculative venture.

CONSOLS.—Big people have been buying Consols at their present low level. I do not agree with some who declare that Consols will permanently stand at a 3½ per cent. level. The craze for high interest bearing securities will die out. The British Empire will continue, and in the end safety will be the first consideration.

FOREIGNERS.—All foreign stocks have been steady, for Paris declares that peace between Italy and Turkey has been agreed upon. However, everyone in Paris is taking a holiday, and although there is no buying of foreigners there is certainly no selling. Tintos look very firm, and the big Paris bankers anticipate a rise here. A gamble in Perus is to be started. I would warn my readers against holding Perus as the position of the Corporation is not so strong as the newspapers would have us believe. The Germans have just secured a concession for a railway in Peru which will injure the company.

HOME RAILS.—The London and North Western Railway report was very bad. The company did fairly well with its traffic, but it spent £200,000 more in expenses. It ran less trains at a greater expense and seems to have been extravagant in all directions. The Great Western report was as good as the other was bad. The decrease in traffics was larger than that of the L. and N.W.R., but the saving in expenses was remarkable. Everything was cut down, and the company starts its new half year with the happiest prospects. Great Western Ordinary stock is worth buying to-day. All the railways appear to have done well with their holiday traffics. Midland deferred seems a very reasonable purchase, and I think that we shall have a rise in Great Northern deferred.

YANKEES.—The American market has disappointed us. Everybody in New York was looking for a rise, but no boom came. The general feeling throughout America is one of great confidence, the crops are splendid, and even the cotton crop, which was reported as bad, is now said to be much better than it looked a few weeks ago. The United States depends upon its crops; if they are good everyone makes money, if they are bad everyone is in the dumps. I think an autumn boom in Yankees quite certain. The Copper position still remains strong, the selling agencies refuse to be bluffed into selling electrolytic copper under the market price, and the refineries declare that they can control the output to meet the demand. Copper will continue to rise right through to the end of the year. The one feature of the week has been the tremendous jump in Canada Pacifics, which have been as high as 285. The Canadian crop is magnificent, consequently holders of "Can. Pacs." in England and in Canada decline to sell. The "bull" pool is managed in New York, where there is only a very small amount of stock. It is therefore the easiest thing in the world to manipulate a rise. Berlin gambles in Canadian Pacifics, but the floating supply of stocks is very small. Mr. O'Shaughnessy denies that he intends to issue fresh stock. This,

"EVERY DROP LUBRICATES."
"Champion" Motor Oil
is the best for all types of Cars.
If not already using "Champion" send for trial tin to
S. BOWLEY & SON,
DISTILLERS OF BOWLEY'S MOTOR SPIRIT,
"Express" and "Bomo" Brands.
Wellington Works,
BATTERSEA, LONDON, S.W.
Established 1744.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

however, is not believed. The railway is to be double tracked throughout the whole of its Rocky Mountain route. This will need very large sums of money, and sooner or later an issue must be made. It is, of course, very bad finance to issue common stock under the market price, but the Canadian Pacific Railway is too prosperous, and unless the capital is continually being watered the Government would be certain to interfere and cut down the rates charged.

RUBBER.—There is nothing new to report in the rubber market. The price of the raw material does not rise. This looks as though the dealers had not yet concluded their autumn contracts. I can see no fall, however, and rubber shares remain wonderfully steady. The outputs for July are all good.

OIL.—The Oil market is more or less firm, but there is very little business doing. The dealers declare that we shall have an autumn boom in oil, but I notice that Urals, the most speculative stock in the market, are down to 3. We must expect reduced outputs from Maikop. This unlucky place has now been flooded out. In the winter it was snowed up and all work was stopped. The output from the Victory is down 15 tons, and I think that these shares should be sold. Indeed, the only Maikop share that looks like going better is Maikop Pipe. Chelekens are being bid up, probably with a view to the flotation of the new Cheleken property that has been acquired by the Dalziel group.

KAFFIRS.—The Kaffir market has a much better tone. Prices have fallen so low and the dealers are all so short that the Barnato group decided to attempt to put up the market. Therefore, for some days we have had a general hardening in quotations. The British public is largely interested in Kaffirs, and it will welcome any rise in the market. No one should sell Kaffir shares to-day, and, indeed, I think that those who can afford it might average Village Deeps, City Deeps, Knights, Wit Deep, Nourse Mines, and Randfontein Central. These are all very low, and I believe that we shall see a rise before Christmas.

RHODESIANS.—The Rhodesian market has been stronger. The dealers are confident that Sir Abe Bailey has agreed with the Barnato group to mark up all Rhodesian land companies. Naturally, Amalgamated Props will be the first to move. Chartered are stronger, although it is officially denied that the Government intend to buy out certain rights of the Chartered Company on a basis of £2 a share. It was stated that certain officials had come home with the definite intention of arranging this deal. This also is denied. I believe that there is some basis of truth in the story.

TIN.—The Tin market has been very strong, but the market in shares hardly moves. There is still talk of a big rise in Pahangs, and the Willink ground is said to be turning out 10 per cent. tin. If this is true Pahangs will go much higher, but it must not be forgotten that only a month back these shares were about 4s. 6d., and to-day they are 10s. 9d. This is a big rise, and I expect a good many people will take their profits.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The Waring scheme is now out. I advised my readers to purchase these debentures at 25, and I should now suggest that they shall take their profit. There is no certainty that the new board will be able to make the business profitable. Messrs. Japhet and Co., the well-known bankers, guarantee £500,000 in first debentures, and the old debenture holders must exchange each hundred pound bond for £75 preference shares, but they have the option of subscribing for the new debentures, and will get a bonus of 100 shares for every £100 allotted. Mr. Sam Waring will remain as manager, and Mr. Kennedy Jones will be the chairman of the new company.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

THRELFALL'S BREWERY.

INCREASED PROFITS, NOTWITHSTANDING DIFFICULTIES.

THE twenty-fifth annual general meeting of Threlfall's Brewery Company, Ltd., was held on the 1st inst. at the Cannon Street Hotel, E.C., Mr. Charles Threlfall, J.P. (Chairman of the company), presiding.

The Secretary (Mr. W. J. Burnside, A.C.I.S.) having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors,

The Chairman said: Gentlemen,—It is a source of gratification to me to preside here to-day at this our twenty-fifth annual meeting, and to present to you such a satisfactory account of our business for the past year. In referring to our accounts, you will observe that our profit from trading account amounts to £193,742 9s. 1d., as against £185,598 0s. 11d. last year, being an increase of £8,144 8s. 2d. We have written off for depreciation the sum of £40,335 15s. 4d., against £30,105 1s. 11d., an increase of £10,230 13s. 5d., added £1,000 to the employees' compensation fund and carried forward the sum of £38,893 6s. 4d. to next year. I am very pleased to state that trade generally has improved during the past year, and there are indications of a continuance of this improvement, which we are hoping will compensate us in a measure for the increased cost of materials. I have now pleasure in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, and that dividends be paid at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum on the Preference Shares, and at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum on the Ordinary Shares for the year ended June 30th, 1912.

Mr. P. J. Feeny, J.P., seconded the motion.

The Chairman intimated that before putting the motion to the meeting he would be pleased to answer any questions which might be put.

A SHAREHOLDER'S CONGRATULATIONS.

Mr. John Hedges said he did not think the shareholders would have any questions to ask, because he took it that most of them were satisfied with the report submitted. (Hear, hear.) He rose, however, to congratulate the directors, considering the labour unrest and the difficulties they had had to contend with, upon presenting such a favourable report. He had been a shareholder in the company for a great number of years, and was aware of the difficulties undertakings connected with the licensed trade had had to meet. Legislation had not been in their favour, and they had not only had to meet heavy taxation, but also to make provision under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and no doubt in the future they would also have the unpleasant Insurance Act to contend with. Taking everything into consideration, they certainly had reason to congratulate themselves upon the results of the past year's working, and he would conclude by expressing the hope that they might have an even better report next year and an increase in the dividend. (Hear, hear.)

The Chairman thanked Mr. Hedges for his congratulatory remarks, and added that the fact that he himself had made the shortest speech he had delivered since he had been Chairman was in itself a good sign. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Hedges: Short and sweet. (Laughter.)

The motion was carried unanimously.

Mr. Feeny said he felt sure the next resolution would meet with the very warm approval of all present. It was, "That Captain C. M. Threlfall and Mr. George Barker, the retiring directors, be and they are hereby re-elected." With reference to the first name, he was sure that Captain Threlfall would prove a worthy successor of their late esteemed chairman, his uncle, Mr. Thomas Threlfall. (Hear, hear.) The second name in the resolution was one which would appeal to all in that room, and he was sure that the earnest wish of shareholders and directors alike was that Mr. Barker might have many re-elections in connection with this company. (Applause.)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Mr. William Griffin seconded the motion, and it was unanimously agreed to.

On the proposition of Mr. Hedges, seconded by Mr. Master, Messrs. Broads Paterson and Co. were re-appointed auditors.

THANKS TO DIRECTORS AND STAFF.

Mr. Buszard, K.C., said he had very great pleasure in moving that the best thanks of the shareholders be given to the Board and to the employees of the company for the satisfactory results which had been placed before them. He wished to congratulate the company and Mr. Charles Threlfall upon his reappearance in the chair on the present occasion. They very much regretted his absence a year ago, though he had in Mr. Feeny a most efficient and able representative. When they considered the difficulties to which Mr. Hedges had referred, it was certainly very gratifying that the directors had been able to report such a highly satisfactory state of affairs. The results achieved reflected the greatest credit not only upon the Board, but also upon the humblest individual who worked under them. In spite of the undue and disproportionate taxation under which the company was labouring, a result had been achieved which was very satisfactory.

Mr. Higgin seconded the vote, which was unanimously accorded.

The Chairman briefly thanked the shareholders, on behalf of the directors and staff, for this vote of thanks, adding that it was very pleasant when a chairman could come to a meeting feeling that there was not the slightest fear of hearing any disagreeable remarks, and he wished to express his obligation to Mr. Buszard and the other shareholders present for the kindly reception they had given to the report.

The proceedings then terminated.

CORRESPONDENCE

G. JERMENT ON THE BASKISH NEW TESTAMENT.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In THE ACADEMY of May 10, 1912, there is a letter about the earliest allusion occurring in any English book to Leiçarragas New Testament of the year 1571. No sooner had you published it than I saw that Jerment must have gotten his information in some way from "les Histoires de de Thou (liv. LI., année 1572)," as quoted by M. Julien Vinson on p. 29 of his "Bibliographie Basque." His expression, "in a most fine letter," corresponds to de Thous "elegantissimis typis." The Rev. J. B. McGovern, to whom my heartiest thanks are owing for his friendly notice of my newest book on "The Baskish Verb," kindly inserted by you in last Thursdays number of THE ACADEMY, has elicited in Notes and Queries, of July 13, 1912 (p. 37), a reply signed R. S. Robson, to tell us that G. Jermant, was a native of Peebles, studied at the University of Edinburgh, got the degree of D.D. from America, died, in his 60th year, on May 23, 1819, and was buried, like poor William Blake, in Bunhill Fields. It will be noticed that the name is spelt Jerment in the "Memoirs," published in 1804 and 1815 under the eye of that editor himself.

EDWARD S. DODGSON.

The Union Society, Oxford, July, 1912.

AN APPEAL.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Will you permit me, through your columns, to appeal to the well-to-do members of the community who are about to enjoy their own holidays to aid the children of their poorer brethren, who, but for this aid, must spend their holiday time in the streets of London. The Children's Country Holidays Fund has a great claim upon us all. It sends our children without distinction of creed; and while it collects from the parents such contributions as they are able to pay, when any contribution is clearly impossible the children are sent free of charge. It especially selects the delicate and ailing London children; and, on the other hand, its voluntary workers take pains, by inquiry and medical advice, to prevent children carrying any infectious or contagious disease to the country. Arrangements are made for the conveyance of an army of London children to their country homes; and by the kindness of voluntary helpers in various parts of the country these children are supervised on their arrival, and helped in all kinds of ways to enjoy their little piece of country life. That these efforts are successful is shown by the letters of appreciation and gratitude which are written by the little visitors on their return home. A contribution of 10s. gives a fortnight's holiday to one of our little children; a sum of £7,500 is still wanted to enable the Fund to send away the same number of children as went last year. I appeal to all to assist in this good work by sending their contributions to the Hon. Treasurer, the Earl of Arran, 18, Buckingham Street, Strand. The Archbishop of Canterbury wishes me to say how much he is in sympathy with the objects of the Fund. Yours faithfully,

A. F. LONDON.

Fulham Palace, S.W.
August 2nd, 1912.

BOOKS RECEIVED

PERIODICALS.

Cambridge University Reporter; Educational Times; Ulula; The Malthusian; English Review; Nineteenth Century and After; Oxford and Cambridge Review; Book Monthly; the Vineyard; School World; Bookseller; St. Nicholas; University Correspondent; Literary Digest, N.Y.; American Historical Review; Church Quarterly Review; Poetry Review; Empire Review; Mercure de France; Hindustan Review, Allahabad; Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly; Publishers' Circular; The Bibelot; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; Modern Language Teaching; The Twelfth Financial and Economic Annual of Japan, 1912, Department of Finance; La Revue; Century Magazine; Harper's Magazine; Land Union Journal.

HORLICK'S
MALTED MILK

MALTED BARLEY, WHEAT AND MILK, IN POWDER FORM.

THE COOLING SUMMER DRINK

MADE IN A MOMENT BY STIRRING BRISKLY IN COLD WATER.

Its cooling and thirst-quenching qualities, as well as its nourishing value, commend it to Athletes, Sportsmen, Golfers, Tennis Players, Cricketers, etc.

VERY REFRESHING WITH A DASH OF SODA.

SERVED IN REFRESHMENT ROOMS AND BARS, AT MANY SPORTS GROUNDS, AND IN RESTAURANTS AND CAFÉS.

Of all Chemists and Stores in Sterilised Glass Bottles, at 1s. 6d., 2s. 6d., and 11s.

Trial size free by post on application.

HORLICK'S MALTED MILK CO., SLOUGH, BUCKS., ENGLAND.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC
OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO . . AND THROUGH CANADA . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service via Vancouver.

For further particulars apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE
TO
SOUTH AND EAST AFRICA.
WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.
Vià the SUEZ CANAL:
Calling at GIBRALTAR, MARSEILLES and NAPLES

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.
(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—
DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.
Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE
PLEASURE CRUISES
LIVERPOOL
to the
MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC
by the
"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"
. . . Ports of Call . . .
CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—
THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

P & O Passenger Services.
EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports.
(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)
Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises Throughout the Year, according to Season.
AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.
Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—
PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,
102, Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours.

R.M.S.P. PLEASURE CRUISES.

To	Fare	Length of Tour	Sailing	From
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £22.	Days 23.	Every Thursday Fortnight.	London.
THE AZORES.	£17†	19.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£12.	8 upwards.	Weekly.	Southampton & Liverpool.
WEST INDIES.	From £40.	From 34.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
NORWAY.	From £1 a day	13 upwards.	June to August.	Grimsby & Leith.
BALTIC & RUSSIA.	From £1 a day.	24.	August 24.	Grimsby.
MEDITERRANEAN, HOLY LAND & EGYPT.	From £1 a day.	10.	September to November.	Southampton & Marseilles.

† Including Hotel Accommodation.

For further particulars apply:—
THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY,
London: 18, Moorgate St., E.C., or 32, Cockspur St., S.W.

FEARLESS CRITICISM

In support of principle
In exposure of humbug
In scorn of cant

THE COMMENTATOR

A Weekly Review of Politics, Art, Music, Literature, and the Stage.

ONE PENNY WEEKLY of all Newsagents—or sent direct from the Publishers, for 6s. per annum (post free) or 3s. for six months.

COMMENTATOR, Ltd., 31, Essex St., London

Published for the Proprietor by WM. DAWSON and SONS, Limited, at Cannon House, Breams Buildings, London, E.C.
Branches in Canada: Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg; in South Africa: Capetown, Johannesburg, and Durban.
Printed by BONNER & Co., The Chancery Lane Press, Rolls Passage, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

CONTENTS

	PAGE
Notes of the Week	195
In the Wilderness of Votes	196
Henley: A Memorandum...	197
Art and Imitation—I. ...	198
A Martyr of Empire—II. ...	199
Reviews:
Poetry and Prose... ...	201
A Fighting Admiral ...	202
Our Revolutionaries ...	203
Byron among the Moderns	204
The Real Napoleon ...	205
A Community in Difficulties	206
Children in the Sun ...	207
A French Sensation ...	207
Cornwall—Half Seen ...	208
Bombastes Futuristo as War-Correspondent	208
Shorter Reviews	209
Fiction	210
The Theatre: "Ready Money" at the New Theatre	213
On the River	214
The Cattle of the Andes ...	215
The Magazines	216
Notes and News	217
Imperial and Foreign Affairs	218
Motoring	219
In the Temple of Mammon	220
Correspondence	221
Books Received	222

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C., where all communications to the Editor should be addressed.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Notes of the Week

IN International questions we consistently deprecate strong language and weak action or no action at all. We hold that a business-like statement of divergences—if they exist—should be drawn up, and that nations which for the moment appear to be divided, should frankly examine their differences. If an amicable arrangement is possible, in the present age there is no likelihood that it will be rejected. The risks of war are too momentous, and the inevitable and lasting set back to progress is too grave for any nation lightly to engage in hostilities. We say, however, that if conflicting interests cannot be composed, it is clear that the arbitrament of war must determine the issue. But if war is inevitable proceed to make it, and do not go on talking about it after the manner of Pistol. Mock heroics are equally out of place whether we are referring to the action of the American Senate in the matter of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty or to the matter of our relations with Germany. As a business people we should take stock of our position, think clearly, and realise essentials as distinguished from non-essentials. When essentials are clearly recognised, we should not allow ourselves to be deflected by a single inch from doing that which the country's needs and the country's honour demand. In that way we shall prepare for success, and in any case meet our fate—whatever it may be—with dignity.

We give up all hope of ignoring the weather, after trying hard for weeks. It is difficult to twirl a stick jauntily, hum a stave from a gay opera, and greet the world with a smile, when harvest-time is noted for icicles, the hotels are resuming their winter menus, and the hot-potato man is hailed as a friend by the gamin of the street. The posters of the last week or two have been a pathetic study. "Blow, blow, thou winter wind!" says one; "Heat wave in the Arctic," says another. Even the most sober and dignified papers have devoted columns and leading articles to the uncomfortable August temperature, and holiday-making has become a farce. December, of course, has slipped into August's place; the worst of it is that nobody knows what has happened to August.

Meanwhile, an evening paper is asking, "Are we growing more serious?" In all conscience, we hope not; we are quite serious enough already; with another month of grey, ragged skies and no sunlight, we shall be simply grim and laughterless—a solemn, spectacled, jokeless race, gazing owlishly into one another's faces with cloudy eyes, afraid to raise our voices above a low monotone, afraid to shout or dance or sing. The umbrella will develop into a permanent article of clothing; our gait will become a kind of goose-step as we gain experience in the art of tip-toeing over puddles. Either this, or we shall all emigrate to some country where the sun is guaranteed to shine for at least four or five days per week. Then, perhaps, the faculty of laughter will return to us, and the serious question will be, "Are we growing more frivolous?"

"Memory," to quote Mr. Lang's remark in our last issue, "is a hallucinatory faculty." In what follows have we a further instance of the tricks it played with Robert Browning? "I suspect," he wrote of Dr. Furnivall's admiration for his work, "it is a late discovery with him—like that of Fontenelle, when, chancing on some out-of-the-way literature, he went about asking everybody, 'Do you know Habbakuk? He's a genius!'" The illustration is apt and amusing, but is it correct? At any rate, the anecdote has been narrated of La Fontaine. "It appears," writes a biographer of the fabulist, Mr. F. Tarver, "that his first approach to anything like serious thought on religious matters was attributed to an accidental study of the prophet Baruch, placed in his hands one day by Racine during a long service which he had induced La Fontaine to attend with him. For some time after, La Fontaine would constantly ask persons that he met, 'Have you read Baruch? He was a grand genius!'" "Someone has blundered"—but who?

Our readers will be interested to know that the article on "The Printing Press in South America," which appeared in the South American Number of THE ACADEMY last autumn, by Mr. George Parker Winship, of Providence, Rhode Island, has been reprinted as a booklet, of which two hundred copies have been issued.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

In The Wilderness of Votes

THE detachment of Mr. Churchill from his erstwhile compeer in bad language took place when the parity ceased, and the Chancellor easily won the Marathon. Mr. Churchill in his defeat became almost responsible and very nearly respectable. The wound had not, however, healed; like Themistocles, the trophies of Miltiades would not suffer him to sleep. No sooner was Mr. Lloyd George safely segregated in a foreign country, well-bitted and firmly held in restraînt by Sir Rufus Isaacs, than his rival, the ex-champion, reappeared on the scene.

Even now, however, the First Lord is wofully deficient in much of the rich imagery of the East End, in which his friend of other days triumphed in the Final Honour School. Mr. Churchill is blood-curdling rather than coarse, and assumes a virtue, clothing his strong language in the garb of a super-patriotism.

Mr. Bonar Law in a few well-chosen contemptuous sentences has disposed of his critic. Mr. Bonar Law has only thought it worth while to correct the First Lord on facts. That is what would be expected from the Leader of the Opposition. The task is unfortunately more onerous in respect of the present occupants of the Treasury Bench than at any previous period which we, with a very long political experience, can remember. We well recall the gentleman whose foible was omniscience, but we do not—at the moment—retain the memory of a Ministry which so excelled in inaccuracy.

We feel it is a little unkind to dismiss—as does Mr. Bonar Law—Mr. Churchill in a few sentences. The First Lord is trying to return to his extravasation, and it is only right to give respectful attention to his experiment.

We now proceed to glance at Mr. Churchill's argument. The fallacy which vitiates the whole position is that Home Rule—if passed by the present Parliament—will represent the will of the people. Mr. Bonar Law has, of course, at once noticed the fallacy, and exposed it. The will of the people is unrepresented in the present Parliament, as is consistently shown in every by-election which occurs. The will of the people is usually elusive and difficult to focus, but there is no excuse for saying that a House of Commons elected on the basis of free agency in any way represents the people, when it has bartered its independence for monetary advantage. If this fact be borne in mind, Mr. Churchill's argument appears in a sadly damaged light.

We can pass over with a smile the pictured nightmare of Mr. Bonar Law and Sir Edward Carson, instead of kissing hands on obtaining office, finding that there was nothing before them "but the bleak outlook of a felon's cell or place of execution." In our young days we were fond of full-blooded melodrama and delighted in the transpontine theatres—the Surrey and others—where such an entertainment was presented with appropriate mouthings. These performances were much more moving than is Mr. Churchill's letter to Sir George Ritchie.

When Mr. Churchill remarks:—

> In a constitutionally governed country, where Governments depend entirely upon parliamentary majorities, elected at short intervals by millions of voters, there is no need and no excuse for violence, we only suggest to Mr. Churchill and his colleagues to invite the judgment of the constituencies on the proceedings of his allies and his hireling followers; then, we admit, if the result is as he wishes, there will be "no need and no excuse for violence." The attempt to bribe the electorate has failed ignominiously; the degradation of the House of Commons by payment of members practically robs it of its representative character.

If that view is true, it is clear, however much the attempt may be made to cloak the issue beneath heroics or irrelevancies, that to pass Home Rule or any other measure which was not a primary issue at the late General Election would be a fraud, and, as fraud vitiates everything, resistance such as Mr. Bonar Law and Sir Edward Carson advise is entirely justifiable.

When on two previous occasions the electorate was appealed to on the question of Home Rule as a primary issue, the answers were emphatic negatives. All recent by-elections indicate that the answer would now be the same.

We do not wish to paint Ministers blacker than they choose to paint themselves, and therefore we must suppose, when the First Lord writes, "We have no intention of creating evils greater than those which we wish to remedy," that they really do not realise the tendency of their own acts. That may be a reason for relieving them of office, but certainly it is none for continuing them in power.

The fact is that the Government is fighting a desperate battle for its existence, and any and every resource is thought good enough as an expedient to avert temporarily inevitable eventual disaster. We believe that Mr. Churchill's re-awakened activity will in no way ease the position of the Minisfry. We think his latest effort is but the confession:—

> Too well I see and rue the dire event
> That with sad overthrow and foul defeat
> Hath lost us Heaven, and all this mighty Host
> In horrible destruction laid thus low.

And in that light it does credit to his perception of realities.

CECIL COWPER.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Henley: A Memorandum

WE are soon to have a life of the author of "The Song of the Sword," and, since it is to be written by Mr. Charles Whibley, it should take rank among modern biographies, beside Maitland's life of Leslie Stephen and Lady Burne-Jones's book on her husband. But by whomsoever written, the fact itself were one for rejoicing; for Henley has not yet been given his due.

He was not among the very great, either as poet, though he was a singer both sweet and strong, or yet, perhaps, as critic. In the latter capacity, however, his place was high enough. He may have lacked Pater's extreme subtlety (for which he had little reverence) and the divine lucidity of Arnold (for which he had much), but "Views and Reviews," especially the literary series, are a joy to read and re-read. Few essays are so tonic and so humane.

No doubt Henley was to some extent a swashbuckler. For a hundred years and more artists have been at loggerheads with the prevalent ideas of their times. This is the fault of the times; but it is also the misfortune of the artists. Art in revolt, though it may soar to the stars, must always lack something of sanity. One cannot at once be angry and serene. It was to the inestimable advantage of the Athenian artists (Sophocles, at least, and Phidias) that the age and the men were at one. And the art of our Elizabethans who were probably—on a general estimate—both technically and intellectually inferior to the moderns, has at its best a surer, more final note than anything written since their day.

The romantics were in revolt against materialism. Henley, heir not only to the industrial revolution, but to the puritan revival, was in revolt also against the mawkish. Hence the Burns; hence the Stevenson, which got him into such trouble; hence the violence of certain poems. He craved for Elizabethan vitality. Maybe he Elizabethanised a thought too deliberately: a man not at one with his generation is bound to be self-conscious. But those who think of him merely as a literary Bombastes Furioso had better read him on Matthew Arnold, and learn his particular enthusiasm for "Balder Dead," than which there is no great English poem more restrained and austere. Henley had none of the stupid narrowness which, because it loathes the whine of Praise-God Barebones, denies the genius of Milton: anti-puritanism, this, as negative as any puritanism.

To him life was the supremely important fact; art, one of its manifestations. He never separated the work from the man behind it. He did not believe mere skill in the pretty arrangement of words sufficient excuse for writing; at least, if he was prepared to consider writers like Banville, he was not prepared to consider them very seriously. A man must have a sense of language (which makes literature an art), but he must also have something worth saying, and, having said it adequately, need not trouble about trimmings. Hence Henley's admiration for Arnold. Mental gymnastics he disliked, holding them to be a failing and not a virtue in Meredith, of whom the work which pleased him best was "Rhoda Fleming," the humanest, least scintillant, of all the novels. He loved Dickens, was very tender to Tom Hood. He thought the indecency of Wycherley and Vanbrugh more excusable, though grosser, than that of Congreve; because theirs was spontaneous, his intellectual. Cant of all kinds he detested. He could not away with any meanness, and found Thackeray's flunkeyism distasteful. He did not mind how much purpose an author had, so long as it was a fine and honest purpose. The moral is constantly one of his critical touchstones, though his code is hardly that of the Victorians. He never tires of inveighing against the young lady's influence in English letters. But if he loved strong writers like Chaucer and Dunbar and Burns, he recognised that they and their like are moralists to a man, and that it is only the decadent who prates about the non-morality of art.

Henley railed at his country and generation, but for all that he was English of the English. Not only was he a staunch Imperialist, and the maker of one or two of the finest patriotic poems in the language. He was national by virtue of something more intimate than that. The savour of his work is the savour, rich, frank and human, of Chaucer and Herrick and Hazlitt. He stood in the direct line of the English tradition and upheld it to the top of his power. There lies his significance for us. Of a man who does that, too much in these days cannot be made For to be English is out of fashion; nowhere more so than in this island. When Arnold, some fifty years ago, delicately suggested that there were qualities abroad which it would do us no harm to consider and perhaps to assimilate, the case was different. England was surrounded by an impregnable wall of self-sufficiency. The foreign was the inferior; nay, the negligible. We had to be taught to think rather less of ourselves, rather more of Europe. Even when Henley wrote, in the fat days before the war, we were, in spite of Arnold, still comfortably insular, not much disturbed by the odd altar or two raised to Verlaine, or the little flutter about Ibsen. The nervous exhaustion and morbid self-depreciation from which we are at present suffering were not yet manifest. For if in Arnold's day and in Henley's England was provincial, it is now tending to become in intellectual matters a geographical expression. We leave our criticism, like our trade and our naval supremacy, to Germany and America. It is for a Frenchman, M. Delattre, to write the best book on Herrick, than whom none of our poets is more characteristically national. Our own critics are busy with the continentals. Such a book as Mr. Masefield's "Shakespeare" is exceptional; but then Mr. Masefield is himself national and exceptional. Englishmen must write like Frenchmen, like Russians; like anything but themselves. By no means let us relapse to the provincial; let us be courteous to foreign ideas and welcome Schnitzler and Strindberg to our theatres. But self-effacement can be carried too far.

Once it was a commonplace that English was the greatest of all literatures; the greatest, at any rate, since the Greek. This was rather absurd. Every healthy nation has its peculiar qualities, which are not to be measured against those of another. It is only when literatures are beginning to lose their national characteristics that comparison becomes possible. We have no warrant for saying that English poetry is greater than French or Italian poetry. Neither is it less. It is different. And the difference is the mark of the nation and also its guarantee, and the emphatic negation of the pale ideal of cosmopolitanism. We and our culture may perhaps be absorbed by another race, but we need not flatter ourselves that we shall remain that race's equal.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Let us then assert our difference. For if we may not boast that the literature and the nation which include Shakespeare are greater than those which include Molière and Dante and Goethe and Cervantes, they have, at any rate, their own kind of greatness. Henley's merit is that he did assert the difference. Therefore should Englishmen read him.

FRANCIS BICKLEY.

Art and Imitation—I

IT is impossible to formulate any general æsthetic, unless we allow that music is imitative in the same way that painting and poetry are imitative, yet no theory has yet been put forward showing clearly what and how music imitates.

Whatever view we take of the question, we are met by insuperable difficulties; for if music does not draw its material from experience, it must have recourse to some domain outside experience: in that case we should receive from music thoughts and feelings hitherto unknown to us, but this is not the case; music may speak to us things hitherto unuttered, but not things hitherto unknown or unfelt. We are led, then, to infer that music, like the other arts, draws its material from nature; but music resembles nothing in nature. In a good imitation we instantly recognise the thing imitated, but in most music we fail to discern the likeness of anything to which we can with certainty attach a name.

There is, of course, one very obvious way in which music can imitate nature. By playing a fourth and a first in succession we can imitate the note of the cuckoo, and by descending suddenly from a tenth to its tonic we can imitate the voice of the donkey; by beating a big drum we can imitate the sound of thunder, and by playing chimes on the "Glockenspiel" we can imitate church-bells. Clearly, however, this is not the sort of imitation with which art is properly concerned; it has no more æsthetic value than if a painter should represent foliage by pasting leaves on to his canvas; we may compare it with the naïve practice of those old painters who used gold paint to colour the golden halos of their saints. The limit in this direction is reached by Tchaïkowsky in his "1812" Overture, in which the noise of artillery is "imitated" by letting off cannon; here it is manifest that the thing ostensibly depicted is not depicted at all, but bodily transplanted.

There are other and less obvious ways in which music can imitate natural facts. A certain variety of "triple time" bears a strong resemblance to the triple rhythm of a wheel impelled by a treadle, and so can be used to suggest the revolution of an old-fashioned spinning-wheel: this fact is responsible for a whole family of musical compositions; indeed, there are almost as many spinning-songs as musical composers. In this class we may place the recurring theme in Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overture, designed to represent the movement of breaking waves, and perhaps also the "fire motive" in Wagner's "Valkyrie," which emerges first fitfully and intermittently, mixed with alien themes and obscured by dissonant harmonies, like flame in conflict with the grosser elements, and gaining steadily in strength and frequency, is heard at length, clear and unmixed, rising and falling in unbroken sequence, like fire that reigns triumphant and alone. Such examples, however, are few and far between; they cannot, therefore, be allied to the inner being of music, and it is clear that if music is imitative in this sense only it is not essentially imitative. Even literature is capable of using the sensible qualities of its medium to represent the sensible qualities of natural objects; witness the "Mouse's Tale" in "Alice in Wonderland." This poem is printed in constantly decreasing type, and is distributed across the page in undulating curves in such a way as to resemble "a tail." This is, of course, admittedly a jeu d'esprit on the author's part. The same, however, is true of the above-mentioned instances of musical imitation: they are jokes inasmuch as they are concerned with accidental resemblances instead of essential ones; they differ only in belonging to the unamusing variety.

A far more subtle theory than this, however, has been put forward to explain the expressiveness of music. The question is debated by Aristotle in his 29th problem. "Why is it," he says, "that sound and sound alone of sensuous perceptions has moral character; for melody even if it be without words has this quality; but colour has it not, neither has it smell nor taste. Is it because sound alone has motion, and motions constitute action, and actions are evidence of character?" This view has been accepted in a modified form by Helmholz. "Every motion," he says, "is an expression of the power which produces it, and we instinctively measure the motive force by the amount of motion which it produces. In this way melodic progression can become the expression of the most diverse conditions of human disposition. Our thoughts may move fast or slow, may wander about restlessly or aimlessly in anxious excitement, or may keep a determinate aim distinctly in view; they may lounge about without care or effort in pleasing fancies. or, driven back by some sad memories, may return slowly and heavily from the spot with short, weak steps. All this may be imitated by the melodic motion of the tune."

The main objection to this explanation is that

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

music is capable of arousing the very opposite emotion to that which its rhythm suggests; thus Oliver Goldsmith, writing of Pergolese, says, "This great master's art consisted in knowing how to excite our passions by sounds which seem frequently opposite to the passion they would express; by slow solemn sounds he is sometimes known to throw us into all the rage of battle, and even by faster movements he excites melancholy in every heart that sounds are capable of affecting. We are unable to tell why such sounds affect us; they seem in no way imitative of the passion they would express, but operate on us by an inexpressible sympathy, the original of which is as inscrutable as the secret springs of life itself." To show the truth of this we may instance Chopin's "Berçeuse," in which the most strenuous exertions on the part of the pianist are requisitioned to induce a mood of tranquil melancholy in the mind of the listener.

Furthermore, it can be shown that poetry also is capable of imitating physical movement, yet is not solely or even mainly dependent on this capacity for its expressiveness:—

When Ajax strives some rock's vast weight to throw,
The line, too, labours, and the words move slow.
Not so when swift Camilla scours the plain,
Flies o'er the unbending corn, and skims along the main.

In poetry of this sort the function of rhythm is simply to enhance or accentuate the meaning of the words; it is quite incapable of conveying meaning or emotion by itself. If this be so, we are forced to seek in music something corresponding to the expressiveness of words, as such, independently of their capacity of rhythmic imitation.

There is little doubt that if music expresses anything it expresses human emotion. Now, part of the difficulty of showing how music effects this results from a mistaken idea of what constitutes emotion. Psychologists are in the habit of distinguishing under this head such mental affections as pity, love, anger, solicitude, and so on. Spinoza distinguishes forty-eight such emotions; Professor Bain nineteen. Now, if these or any similar classifications of emotion are valid, it is certain that music cannot express emotion, that is to say, it cannot represent pity as distinct from love, or jealousy as distinct from anger. A moment's thought, however, will reveal the fact that these are not classifications of the emotions, but of the ideas which arouse emotion. Considered by itself, emotion has only two phases, which for want of a better name we will call joy and sadness; every emotional state is compounded of these two in varying proportions. Music is compounded of two elements corresponding to these two states, the major and minor chords; and the capacity of music to imitate emotion seems to depend on its power to induce these moods in the same succession in which they occur in nature. Thus, if hope is a mood of predominant cheerfulness interspersed with moments of sadness, caused by the apprehension of failure, it will be possible for music to arouse these moods in the same order and in the same proportion, not in such a way as to be cognisable under the concept hope, but in such a way as to be recognisable as an emotion previously felt; hence there is a measure of truth in the commonplace that music expresses the ineffable, for our emotional states derive their names from the ideas which arouse them; severed from these, they have no names and are incapable of being named.

To this theory, it will be objected that the power of music resides more in melody than in harmony; in fact, harmony is quite a modern invention, whereas melody is of prehistoric antiquity. This objection is quite illusory; it is true that the notes of a melody are heard separately, but they are mixed together in the mind; no melody can be formed of notes which are not harmonically related, and the character of this relation determines the character of the melody.

The real weakness of this theory is that it leaves half the problem quite unanswered; it shows no reason why the major and minor chords are associated in our minds with feelings of joy and sadness. It is true that acoustical researches have proved dissonance to be an irregular stimulation of the auditory sense and consonance a regular stimulation; this explains why dissonance is disagreeable, but the quality of roughness or irregularity is common to many other disagreeable sensations. Hence acoustics leave us still confronted by Aristotle's enigma in a slightly altered form. Why is it that a disagreeable sound induces a mood of ethereal sadness, but a disagreeable smell or a disagreeable taste does nothing of the sort? The answer to this riddle we must reserve for a future occasion.

A Martyr of Empire—II

NOW follows the story of the Armada. In the perils of that glorious business Raleigh took his full share. He hung on the skirt of the flying foe and joined in the full-voiced pæan of national rejoicing at their annihilation. But when the white heat of great deeds began to cool, reaction, as ever, followed. The Court had never ceased to be the arena of deadly feud and duels of wit. Essex was starting on his career of infamy, which ultimately brought him to the block. Meantime, Raleigh, plunged in the disgrace of the Throcmorton intrigue, learnt what the fierce displeasure of his royal mistress meant. He was committed to the Tower. However acute and deserved was his abasement, in due course he won his way from the dark purlieus of imprisonment, for Raleigh was a great naval tactician. He foresaw that in war a merely defensive policy is futile—that the fleet which strikes its foes in their own ports is playing the winning game. By taking your fortunes at the flood, he said in effect, by terrorising trade routes, the treasure of the enemy in transit lies at your mercy. In accordance with this policy, the seizure of the Madre de Dios by Raleigh's

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

squadron was carried out. It glutted England with treasure and inflamed men's minds under a sense of English prestige and Spanish ineptitude.

But Raleigh on his return from this expedition was still in disgrace at Court. No adventure would have been too wild could it but have brought him back to favour with the Queen. In all this we see the paramount allegiance which Elizabeth compelled over men's hearts, not only as sovereign but as woman. The personal note runs through every detail of the records of her time. So it came about that Raleigh obtained permission for another voyage, his long-dreamt voyage to Guiana. He was firmly convinced that he was bound for El Dorado, where gold could be had for the picking up. Legends and myths were in plenty. Now, it is an astounding proof of the prescience of Raleigh that although, owing to climatic and other difficulties, an exodus of gold-seekers has not yet reached the fields of Guiana, a gold-bearing area of vast richness does exist on the borderland of British Guiana and Venezuela—the very district for which he struck. Expectation of the Guiana expedition ran high, and Shakespeare has several references to it, but Raleigh returned empty-handed of treasure—a fact as to which little curs about the Court barked loudly. His description of Guiana is of photographic accuracy, and Schomburgk confirmed the truth of Raleigh's word-pictures 260 years later. The royal favour being still withheld, Raleigh organised and took prime part in that dashing attack on Cadiz which filled Spanish hearts with dismay and loaded English ships with booty. At Fero, in Portugal, he landed, and, finding the town deserted, ransacked the episcopal palace. He carried off the library of Bishop Osorius, and this, presented on his return to Sir Thomas Bodley, has grown into the Bodleian Library. After the triumph of this expedition came complete reconciliation at Court.

Elizabeth was ageing fast, and the insolence of Essex towards his sovereign reached its climax, when, at the Council, he turned his back upon her, receiving a resounding box on the ear for his pains. "The sea faction," of which Raleigh was the central figure, gained as Essex and his fellow-malcontents dropped out of Court favour. The presentment before Essex of Shakespeare's Richard II and the talk in Court circles of its deposition scenes doubtless helped to widen the breach between that nobleman and the Queen.

We get a glimpse of the masterful passions which Elizabeth by her woman's wit had to curb in the succeeding story of the "Island Voyage." A squadron was dispatched to the Azores under Essex, Raleigh being Vice-Admiral. Raleigh with some of the ships entered Fayal Harbour, and there, before storming the town, lay awaiting Essex, his commander, who deliberately absented himself. After many days' delay, during which Raleigh's own crew were becoming restive and the foe arrogant, he decided on action. He landed and swept everything before him. After his exploit Essex tardily sailed into the harbour, and a fierce duel of words ensued. Court-martial followed, and but for the timely withdrawal of Raleigh to his flagship he would have been hanged for treason had a fight between the two half-squadrons of the fleet gone against him. The drama of the great sea captain's days was thus nearly ending in mingled farce and tragedy.

The upstart Essex, on the return home of the expedition, grew daily more intolerable in his bearing toward the Queen. His gibe about her "crooked carcase" must have helped to inflame her wrath, and, after his puerile rising in the Strand—Raleigh guarding the royal palace—and again, after the base plot which nearly brought about the assassination of Elizabeth, all England must have breathed more freely when the traitor's head fell on Tower Hill.

Now follows the curtain to the splendid pageant of Elizabeth's reign. The story is one of the most pitiful in history. Worn out in body and mind, she opened Parliament in 1601, the aged Queen who in her prime had held Europe at bay, and served her people as sovereign never did before. The crowds watched her progress through the capital coldly. She had had her day, and so she died in weariness and despair.

England suffered eclipse, for unctuous treachery and vile arts reigned in her stead. Poison and every detestable instrument of soulless cunning were at work. Raleigh and his faction fell. James favoured a Spanish alliance by marriage, and therefore every obstacle to that end had to be sacrificed. Cecil trimmed his sails to the new breeze, and came out in his true colours. He and his royal master were a worthy pair. So we drift on to the crowning iniquity of Raleigh's trial and condemnation to the Tower, where, with the shadow of the headsman's axe ever lying across his path, he was destined to spend thirteen years—years which to his soaring eagle spirit must have been worse than death. The presence of his faithful wife and their two sons doubtless helped to console him. In his prison Raleigh showed himself as great a master of nervous English as formerly he had been great in war and diplomacy. Sordid to the end, James ultimately allowed him to go, a broken man and with a halter about his neck, on that second expedition to Guiana, out of which James thought money might be forthcoming for his base necessities. Raleigh's heart was crushed by his men's mutiny and desertion. In Guiana also his elder boy's grave was made, and thus he returned, spent and foiled, to meet a martyr death.

> E'en such is Time, that takes on trust
> Our youth, our joys, our all we have,
> And pays us with age and dust.

So he wrote on his last night in the Gate House at Westminster. In the morning he rose debonnair. He took a last whiff of his beloved tobacco and bantered all, even his wife and the axeman, with jests worthy of Mercutio. Thus the great spirit returned to its Maker. The Britain of to-day owes to him and such as he not alone material empire, but that indomitable spirit of independence, the traditions of hardihood and daring, which have saved our shores inviolate from invasion.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

REVIEWS

Poetry and Prose

The Iscariot. By EDEN PHILLPOTTS. (John Murray. 3s. 6d. net.)
Songs at Random. By OLIVER DAVIES. (J. M. Dent and Sons. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Lure of the Sea. By J. E. PATTERSON. (Wm. Heinemann. 5s. net.)
Homeland and Outland Song and Story. By H. J. WHITE. (Webb and Son, Adelaide. 1s. 6d.)
'Prentice Days, and Other Poems. By H. J. WHITE. (Webb and Son, Adelaide. 2s. 6d.)
Some Poems of Lionel Johnson. Newly Selected. With an Introduction by LOUISE IMOGEN GUINEY. (Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.)
Anima Fanciulla. By STANHOPE BAYLEY. (Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.)

MR. EDEN PHILLPOTTS, exquisite artist as he is in prose, still cherishes an ambition to wear the sister bays, and this volume sees him arrived at the important stage of a "long poem." It takes the form of a dramatic monologue in blank verse, purporting to be Judas' self-vindication before the Sanhedrim. Mr. Phillpotts' conception of the Iscariot's character is the now familiar and more probable one, which regards the Betrayal as a blundering and tragic attempt to force the issue and bring about a dramatic realisation of Christ's unique kingly power. Around this central idea the poet works, skilfully eliciting and elaborating, until the Iscariot stands limned for us, subtly enough from his own lips—a very plausible and human piece of artistry, to say the least. He is, of course, something of an egoist, deeming himself, of all the Twelve, the only one who has penetrated their Master's purpose. Obviously, too, a very zealot, swayed by a passionate patriotism; and, finally, much of an artist and a poet. Thus he pauses ere he reaches the climax of his utterance to describe the dreamy nocturne of the Garden (and here Mr. Phillpotts' power of poetic description finds its opportunity) and the artistic setting of the lonely Figure in the midst:—

> How small he looked—
> How small and shrunk and desolate . . . .
> . . . . Round about his feet
> The blood-red wind-flowers blew, their colour sucked
> Away by the white moon, and through the bough.
> Low stars flashed largely from a fret of leaves
> Where dim, innumerable olives dreamed
> Like smoke of myrrh and storax.

Egoist though the Betrayer is, however, he is under the spell of a loftier, more magnetic power, which not even the utter devastation of his hopes can break, so that in the end he pleads passionately that his own life may redeem the death-sentence that impends over his Master.

This character-work, needless to say, is the accomplishment of a practised and gifted novelist, and it guarantees, in the main, the framework of the poem. For the rest, Mr. Phillpotts has had to struggle with the self-imposed limitations of his plan, and there are passages which strike a little out of harmony with this. Take, for instance, the elaborated image of the ship on pp. 21 to 23, which seems altogether too studied and decorative even for a poetic Judas in such a hot and impassioned deliverance. Mr. Phillpotts might also have resisted the temptation to bring in the rather threadbare device of making the trees in the Garden cast the shadow of a cross where Christ prays. But the blank verse never fails of a fitting dignity and sonority, the pulse increasing as the poem proceeds to its climax, and there are many passages that tempt quotation, particularly a very powerful rendering of remorse on pp. 46-47. The poem is in many ways, both for Mr. Phillpotts and for poetry-lovers, a notable production. Mr. Frank Brangwyn contributes a characteristic frontispiece to the book.

We have found considerable interest in Mr. Oliver Davies' slender volume. In the first place, his poems have the merit of individuality. He has apparently sat at the feet of Mr. Bridges in the matter of metre and prosody, but his own qualities are strongly marked. The poems give evidence alike of thought and of sincere emotion, and there is about them a distinct strain of mysticism. They are written, moreover, with a simplicity of diction that rather heightens their effect than otherwise. Mr. Davies is of those who believe that "what is, is best," but this does not mean that his attitude is one of easy acquiescence. He rather arrives at his philosophy through the challenging and testing of experience. His lyric aptitude is of the genuine order, as may be seen in two stanzas of the little poem entitled "Triumph":—

> There's a song in the West,
> There's a banner unfurled,
> There are three in the world,
> She and I and the rest. . . .
>
> She and I on the height,
> All the rest down below;
> What has Heaven to show
> That we see not to-night?

For a more pronounced mystical flavour we might instance "Ideas" or "Far Away" or "Twofold." We cannot, however, resist quoting the curious but wonderfully eloquent little poem which bears the title "Immune":—

> If Heaven had blundered
> In making her lover,
> I should not have wondered
> Some day to discover
> A rogue with a pistol,
> Who bade me deliver
> The beautiful crystal
> I found in Truth's river.

The poet who could say so much in eight lines, and had the grace to leave it at that, belongs to the true kindred. This is a day of many singers; few of them sing with a more authentic note of pure poetry than Mr. Davies.

After this, Mr. Patterson's more pretentious volume is a disappointment. We are aware that he knows the sea—has spent with her not a little of his "vagabondage," but something more than acquaintanceship is necessary to sing her lure with anything like adequacy. In fairness, Mr. Patterson states himself, quite frankly, that he is conscious his work is not "of that real poetry of the ocean which we . . . should have put before the world long ago." Alas! that he is unequal to it, but so, indeed, it is. He has neither the spiritual insight nor the requisite dignity of rhythm and diction to fit him for that high destiny. To be quite candid, the greater part of this volume scarcely rises to the level of poetry at all. There is too much of this sort of thing:—

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

> Keep ye your Eastern beauties with > Their dark and luminous eyes,
> Where sparks of hazy passion lie,
> Like stars in midnight skies;
> Keep ye their sensuous movements and > Their wealths of jetty hair,—
> Though rise they high, they come not nigh
> Our English girls so rare.

One can imagine it cradled in musical comedy, thence descending to the barrel-organ. Now, here is the tragedy of Mr. Patterson's most considerable effort. This is a tale of old-time pirates who foolishly slighted Pluto, and through his agency were lured to death by the sirens. The author lets us into the secret of its inception. Long ago he fell asleep one sunny afternoon on the coast of Greece, and had a dream of ancient pirates beaching their galley there and landing to sacrifice to Poseidon. Now, thirty years after, he has taken out his pretty dream and—eheu!—furbished it and tricked it out in the proportions of the story indicated above. He ought to have known it was a perilous proceeding; and see the result. The main narrative varies between blank verse and rhymed couplets, much of it very respectable work, with some passages of real merit—and some of undeniable prose. Something, at any rate, still lingers about it of the beauty of his dream. But those imported sirens are as surely low-comedy ladies as Etty's pictured examples are early Victorian belles. Here is part of one "lyric strain":—

> O, I am a wild sea-maiden,
> Who sport with the waves at will,
> And look for the ship deep-laden,
> When winds do the waters thrill,
> And the Furies have their fill—
> Their fill, their fill,
> And the Furies have their fill.

Mr. Patterson's only excuse—if it be one—is that he seems to have written much of this stuff with a view to musical setting, and, as it is apparently a recognised thing in these matters that "words are a detail," some aspiring composer may perchance make it immortal. He can never make it poetry.

Mr. H. J. White is an Australian, and he has written far too much. At least, he would have done better to have published a very small selection of these verses which, in the two volumes, cover 340 closely printed pages. He has this merit, though, that he has tried to sing his own country, and on that score his song will offer most interest to readers at home. He shows considerable descriptive power, and his verse is sincere and musical. He is at his best in his narrative poems, for which he has drawn on the stirring stories of the bush and on aboriginal idylls. Some of these would find acceptance as pieces for recitation.

The increasing number of Lionel Johnson's admirers will be glad to have this further selection from his work. It contains specimens of all the poet's noble enthusiasms—for Ireland, for his friends, for the classics—and includes some of his loveliest achievements. Every poetry-lover owes a debt to Johnson for the sheer beauty of those simple lines "To Morfydd" and the exquisite little gem called "Cadgwith." Some of these poems originally saw the light in the columns of THE ACADEMY. Miss Guiney's sympathetic and discerning study of the poet forms a valuable introduction to the little collection.

Mr. Stanhope Bayley is a poet in prose, and this booklet is composed of a series of very delicate little Italian studies. They are unlaboured and instinct with quiet beauty—a sheer delight to read.

A Fighting Admiral

The Life of Edward Mountagu, K.G., First Earl of Sandwich (1625-1672). By F. R. HARRIS. 2 Vols., with Portraits and Illustrations. (John Murray. 24s.)

EDWARD MOUNTAGU is a typical example of the class which fought and conquered Charles I in the great Civil War, and then in the fulness of time brought back his son to reign in his stead. The popular idea of the struggle as one in which the gentlemen of England were ranged in a solid body on the side of the King, while his opponents were the lower middle class led by a brewer and a cobbler and a few renegade gentry has, it need hardly be said, no foundation in fact. English affairs were not and are not managed in that way; no great popular movement has achieved success in the long run except under the leadership of the governing classes, any apparent exceptions of present-day politics to the contrary notwithstanding. The opposition to Charles I was composed of the country gentleman class, one which had risen in importance by the annihilation of the old nobility in the Wars of the Roses and the attainders of the Tudors, while the King found his chief support in the new nobility of the Tudors and his father, and in the dependents of the Court. Edward Mountagu came of a Northamptonshire family, which first achieved prominence in the person of a Chief Justice of Henry VII, his father, Sir Sydney Mountagu, being Master of Requests under Charles I. It appears, indeed, from a curious document entitled "Genealogy of Edward, First Earl of Sandwich," printed as an appendix to these volumes, that the family claim descent from the Montacutes, Earls of Salisbury, but the document should have been set out in proper form, with the necessary dates, since the claim is not generally accepted.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Life began early in those days, and Mountagu was married at seventeen, probably to escape the risks of wardship if his father (who was sixty) should die, and by eighteen the Civil War had broken out, and he was committed to the Parliamentary cause. He raised a regiment in his county, and for three years fought at its head, till in October, 1645, he became a member of the Long Parliament. After Pride's Purge he returned to Hinchingbrooke, and remained there till summoned as a member of Barebones' Parliament in 1653. A few days later he became one of the Council of State. Under Cromwell's first Protectorate he remained a member of Council and became a Commissioner of the Treasury. In September, 1655, he was a Commissioner of the Admiralty, and on January 2, 1656, he was appointed joint commander of the fleet with Robert Blake. He returned to England in October with the silver of a captured galleon, and next year was put in sole charge of the Channel fleet against the Spanish. After the death of Blake, Mountagu was the recognised chief of the Generals-at-Sea, and in 1658 blockaded Dunkirk. In 1659 he was again at sea, watching the turn of affairs in the Baltic, and by September he was back in England and a private person. When Monck came to London, Mountagu was sent back to the fleet as joint commander with him, and by the end of February he had reorganised the commands. He came aboard on March 23, and two months later Charles II embarked on his ship at Scheveningen. An earldom and the Garter were his reward, with rents to produce £4,000 yearly. He took over Tangier from the Portuguese, brought Catherine of Braganza to England, and advised the sale of Dunkirk. A period of home life followed, but, when the second Dutch War broke out, Sandwich was called to command under James, and worthily upheld the credit of British seamanship by breaking the Dutch line in the Battle of Lowestoft. The unfortunate Bergen affair followed, with a miserable squabble about prize-money, and Sandwich was sent off as Ambassador to Spain as an honourable way out of the trouble. The history of the Embassy is very well told by Mr. Harris; it was a great success, and Sandwich returned to England to be appointed Lord President of the Committee of Council for Trade and Plantations. The third Dutch War took him back to sea, and in the Battle of Southwold Bay he lost his life, after an heroic struggle against overwhelming odds.

Mr. Harris's biography is an excellent piece of work. He leaves us with a clear impression of his hero's part in the history of the time, as soldier, legislator, seaman, and ambassador. It is as a seaman that he did his best work: he is one of the first in the line of our great fighting admirals, and, though he cannot be said to have initiated any new naval tactics, yet his part in their development is a most important one. As a biographer of the man, Mr. Harris is perhaps a little too subdued by his medium, a little too inclined to treat a gartered Earl in the spirit of the seventeenth century rather than of the twentieth. Lord Sandwich is an old acquaintance of the readers of Pepys, and, if we may so express it, we should have liked to see a picture of him from the level instead of from a position of adoring humility. There is evidently plenty of material for it in the Sandwich papers and letters, to judge from the extracts Mr. Harris has given. We ourselves were specially interested in his liking for music, which confirms the impression of the universality of good musical training in the seventeenth century that Pepys produces. We like to see the Admiral of the Fleet, on the eve of the Restoration, playing a trio of Locke's with Pepys and Will Howe, or, three years later, playing a good Fancy because he cannot endure a merry tune. A Fancy, by the way, is not "a fantasia tune much in vogue," but a set of variations on an air. The notes on the Spanish taste in music are very interesting, and those who have heard "John, come kisse mee now" at a Dolmetsch concert will sympathise with his astonishment at hearing it on the organ in chapel. Don Juan, the son of Philip IV, had, it seems, added another string to the usual six on the treble viol to compete with the violin in the upper registers, and played on it while Sandwich took the bass viol part in Lawe's Royal Concert for three instruments. Then his Highness took the bass while Sandwich played the violin. Afterwards the Prince gave an exhibition on the theorbo and harpsichord, playing from a figured bass, and altogether they seem to have had a pleasant afternoon's concert.

One or two slips may be mentioned. On p. 165 Mountagu does not refer to the declaration from the Navy, as Mr. Harris says (p. 166), but to the proclamation by the Committee of Safety issued on December 14, 1659, calendared in "Tudor and Stuart Proclamations." Moreover, if he had consulted this work, he would have seen that the "stop of the Exchequer" (ii., 241) was not made by proclamation at all. The references are sometimes carelessly worded, e.g., that on p. 34, and the note on the Complete Peerage on p. 12 seems to have been written under a misapprehension. We mention these things for reference in a future edition, and because we wish to repay the author for some of the pleasure we have had in reading a very well constructed book, a notable addition to the literature of the Civil War and Restoration.

Our Revolutionaries

Syndicalism and the General Strike: An Explanation. By ARTHUR D. LEWIS. (T. Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)
Syndicalism: A Critical Examination. By J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, M.P. (Constable and Co. 1s. net.)

MUCH print and paper have been consumed of recent times in discussions on the causes of so-called "Labour Unrest," and the evolutions, in regard both to organisation and to tactics, through which some working-class associations appear to be passing. The question as to how far the unrest has been due to material or moral causes supplied matter for a controversy in which Mr. H. G. Wells took a conspicuous part; and another question, that of how far this unrest has been brought about by revolutionary incitement, was raised in connection with the legal proceedings against Messrs. Bowman and Tom Mann, the last-named of whom is generally regarded as the chief advocate of so-called Syndicalism in this country.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

From a Conservative point of view the case against Syndicalism was ably presented by Sir Arthur Clay in a volume entitled "Syndicalism and Labour," which Mr. John Murray published last year. Of the two books now before us, that by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald states the case from the standpoint of the parliamentarians of the British Labour Party, whilst Mr. Lewis's work is a general exposition of the various Syndicalist theories current in different countries, theories which occasionally clash one with another. Mr. Lewis has certainly brought a great deal of information together in his volume, and has made an effort to write impartially. It is difficult to tell what are his personal opinions. His chapter entitled "Objections to Syndicalism" leaves the issue very confused, for it contains quite as much theorising in favour of Syndicalism as against it, and this circumstance, coupled with some of Mr. Lewis's "General Reflections," incline us to the view that he may perhaps have a little sympathy with the Syndicalist movement. On the whole, his book is rather one for those students of politics and sociology who do not desire to be guided in their opinions, but are competent to weigh all the pros and cons of a question and to decide it for themselves.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's little book is very different. It is more direct, it is more lucid, and it may well appeal to a considerable section of the public. As we have previously said, Mr. MacDonald writes from the standpoint of his own party, which is not ours; but it is satisfactory to find that he is as much opposed to Syndicalism as any moderate-minded man can be. We are pleased to see him acknowledge that the interests of labour and capital are dependent upon a far-reaching process of interchange of services, and we agree with him that Syndicalism is "the impatient, frenzied, thoughtless child" of disappointment and irresponsibility. It is, moreover, unquestionable that, if society is to undergo any evolution, the interests of the whole community require that this should be brought about by peaceable and not by violent means. Now Syndicalism, as imported into England, signifies revolutionary violence, and we can quite understand all sensible trade unionists opposing it.

There is one point which is not very clearly brought out in either of the volumes before us. This is that Syndicalism is largely an evolution of Anarchism. Indeed, the Spanish Anarchists, both those of Barcelona and of Andalusia, have practised a kind of syndicalism ever since Fanelli carried Bakunin's "gospel" across the Pyrenees some forty years ago. In views and methods of organisation they have always differed from the Anarchists of other countries, as was pointed out by Mr. Vizetelly in his history of the Anarchist movement published early this year; and Mr. Lewis rightly says that the Catalonian "Solidaridad obrera" is certainly syndicalist in character. The name of Syndicalism, however, originated in France, where several of the most prominent Syndicalists are ex-Anarchists. There is the notable instance of Emile Pouget, one of the secretaries of the General Confederation of Labour, in which the Syndicalist idea has become embodied. This individual, whose writings are frequently quoted by Mr. Lewis, began life as a shop assistant, blossomed forth as a prominent Anarchist, founded and edited the most scurrilous and obscene of all the French Anarchist journals, the once notorious "Père Peinard" (an imitation of the filthy "Père Duchesne" of the first French Revolution), and underwent various sentences for Anarchist propaganda by word or deed, before he at last turned to Syndicalism and became one of its chief organisers and expounders. He and others brought with them several of the principal Communist-Anarchist ideas—incessant, unrelenting class warfare, the general strike, sabotage, rejection of all parliamentary action and the destruction of all central government.

The fact is that many of the French Anarchists, expelled long ago from the Socialist bodies, gradually found that they had lost all hold on the working classes, and finally deemed it advisable to drop or modify a few theories, draw closer to the form of Anarchism long current in Spain, discard a thoroughly discredited appellation and assume another of an apparently innocuous character—their hope being that they might thus gain supporters. Mr. MacDonald tells us, however, that whilst there are eleven million wage-earners in France who might join a trade union, only one million of them are organised, that of these only about 400,000 belong to the General Confederation, and that at least 250,000 of the last number are opposed to the violent actions and the revolutionary doctrines of the committee to which Pouget and his friends belong. Thus Syndicalism, in spite of strenuous efforts during more than a decade, has made no great headway in France. An overwhelming majority of the French workers has had the good sense to reject it. As for our own workers, whose Anglo-Saxon blood is far less inclined than that of the Latin nations to violent, revolutionary courses, we are confident that they will reject it also, and by an even greater majority, notwithstanding all the insidious incitements of a few self-seeking and unscrupulous individuals among their own countrymen, and of the many undesirable foreigners whom the mal-administration of the Aliens Act allows in their midst, not only to compete with them in their work, but to corrupt them, if possible, by demoralising propaganda.

Byron Among the Moderns

One of Us: A Novel in Verse. By GILBERT FRANKAU. (Chatto and Windus. 3s. 6d. net.)

MR. GILBERT FRANKAU is not lacking in the quality of courage. What Byron has done, others, he appears to think, may do, and he has boldly essayed the task of competing with that great master of poetic satire.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

"One of Us" is an experiment in that form of metre which Byron in "Don Juan" made peculiarly his own. And it is as witty, as cynical, as unblushingly impudent as "Don Juan's" self. The foibles and the follies, the selfishness and the sin of modern society—and particularly that section of it which loves to be known as the "Smart Set"—are unsparingly exposed. But Mr. Frankau's way is not that of the moralist. Nor is it that of the sterner satirists—such as Swift. He laúghs all the time, sometimes good-humouredly enough, sometimes with the unmistakable suggestion of a leer. The book, it has to be admitted, has moments that are hardly pleasant, but it is undeniably clever.

The hero of this novel in verse is first discovered as a schoolboy at Eton, where he becomes involved in a not too creditable amatory episode. Detection is followed by the dread sentence, "Immediate Expulsion."

> Lopped at one sweep of that relentless axe,
> Drops the bright blossom of a lad's career.
> As other Jills have ruined other Jacks,
> As Lancelot was damned for Guinevere,
> Once more a noble knight shall pay the tax
> Levied on them that hold the sex too dear.
> He must away; the carefully-worded wire
> Heralds his advent, warns his anxious sire.

His, however, is not the type of character that learns wisdom by experience. A visit to America throws him into the company of a very charming group of women, and Jack learns much from them about the ways of Jills, which is to stand him in good stead in after-days.

Next we see him plunged into the giddy maelstrom of London society. He is a familiar figure at Romano's. He is often seen—too often, indeed—in the company of girls from the Gaiety. He "paints Paris red." Afterwards, one reads of a breathless incident on the upper reaches of the Thames. So the gilded butterfly flutters his wings in the modern Capri, and, though tailors press and duns are distressingly exigent, he contrives to have a good time. You foresee the end of all this? A forged cheque, disgrace, imprisonment—or, perhaps, flight. Not so, however. Jack pursues his ruinous career, magnificently impenitent, taking the gifts the gods—or possibly some less celestial benefactors—provide him with, with open hands. And, all the while, in her quiet Devonshire home, "faithful Alice" awaits her prodigal lover. With her we leave him—at the altar. The rest is silence.

> Was reformation but another phase?
> Or did you fare the straight path and the narrow,
> To bonded bliss and ordered country ways?
> Is there now sprung from hero-loins and marrow
> An hireling Jack to cheer your riper days,
> And bear the name that Eton flecked—to Harrow?
> Do you hunt foxes and adore your spouse,
> Or take the saner view of wedding-vows?
>
> There is no torch to light the road you went:
> No fairy voice to whisper in mine ears
> If cocoa-kisses kept you continent
> Down the long orbit of the sober years;
> Or if you 'scaped from that entanglement,
> In one last poignant scene of tempest-tears
> That left my boy ashamed, my Alice wilted;
> Or if she was the jiltress—you, the jilted.

Apart from the central interest of the poem, it should be read for its topical allusions, which range from the Suffragettes to Mr. Gordon Selfridge. It is, taking it all in all, the most brilliantly audacious piece of work that has been produced in our time.

The Real Napoleon

The Crime of 1812 and its Retribution. A new rendering into English of Labaume's "Rélation circonstanciée de la Campagne de Russie en 1812." By T. DUNDAS PILLANS. With an Introduction by W. T. STEAD. (Andrew Melrose. 9s. net.)

The Battle of Waterloo. By HILAIRE BELLOC. (Stephen Swift and Co. 1s. net.)

LABAUME went through the campaign of 1812 from beginning to end, and was an eye-witness of the events which he narrates. Those events comprised some of the most ghastly which have ever befallen in the history of war. There was no need of comment upon them—not even of the meagre comment which he bestows. For we have but to read the story of the advance to Moscow, and of the retreat, to realise the magnitude and the direfulness of the disaster. None of the elements of the Greek tragedy is wanting—Hubris followed by Nemesis: and, till the final crash, the spectacle of the central figure blinded by Fate to the real meaning of that which is happening around him. What rich material for the "irony" of a Sophocles that proclamation at Wilkowiski on June 22! "Russia is drawn on by Fate. Her destinies must be fulfilled."

Step by step we see the Grande Armée "drawn on by Fate," ever anticipating a decisive battle, yet never able to come to grips with the elusive foe. "As a matter of fact, we were almost certain that we should soon meet with resistance," but with the exception of the actions at Witepsk and Smolensk the resistance never came until Borodino. There at last the Russians make a stand—and lose. Curious it is to think that only a hundred years ago battles were commenced to order, as it were, "and it only remained for the preconcerted signal to be given." But Borodino really means the ruin of the Grande Armée: for now the victors are free to enter Moscow, and there their doom is consummated. Napoleon's one hope of salvation was to retire immediately, and that hope he sacrificed. Even now the army "had lost a third of its strength merely by the rapidity of its marching." But its leader, "in his insane vanity, hoped to control the seasons as he governed men, and by a gross abuse of his lucky star he imagined that 'the sun of Austerlitz' would shine upon him to the pole, or that, like another Joshua, he could arrest the luminary in its course to guide him on his wanderings."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

So nothing is done to prepare for the Russian winter. Then at last, when it is too late, the retirement begins. The retirement becomes a retreat, the retreat becomes a rout, the rout becomes the blind struggle onwards of tattered shreds of humanity who are no longer men, let alone soldiers—creatures who no longer obey their officers, and have long ago thrown away their arms. But ever urging them on are the relentless Cossacks. Better to die at the hand of Nature than at their hand. And so ever onwards, fulfilling the will of him whose "monstrous Machiavellism plunged France into war with the whole human race, so that the salvation of the nation might depend on the preservation of his person." With what reward? To be deserted at the last by that leader for whom his followers had so freely poured out their blood. The flight of Napoleon meant the end of the last remaining vestiges of discipline. Of the fourth corps Prince Eugene "succeeded in getting together about twelve hundred cripples, the miserable remains of fifty-two thousand men." And thus ended the year 1812 and the Grande Armée. The translation is sufficiently literal to lose nothing of the vividness of the original.

In this other little book one may read in a concise form the short story of the final overthrow of that leader whose fortunes in 1812 we have just been following. In reading the history of battles the lay-reader is too often tempted to conceive them as isolated, often almost as fortuitous, events. We therefore welcome the amount of attention devoted by Mr. Belloc to the preliminary events, both political and military, which brought it about that the Battle of Waterloo was fought just when and how it was. Another feature which we most heartily commend is the use of the explanatory sketches interspersed through the text. There are very many accounts of the battle, but we have not yet come across a more lucid or concise one than that of Mr. Belloc.

A Community in Difficulties

Our Reproach in India. By H. P. K. SKIPTON. (A. R. Mowbray and Co. 1s. net.)

THE object of this little work is to draw attention to the circumstances of the domiciled community in India, who used to be generally called Eurasians, have sometimes been termed Indo-Europeans, and have lately made a curious claim to be described as Anglo-Indians, though that particular designation has long since been adopted by persons who are not and never have been domiciled in India. As there is no disparagement involved or intended in the word Eurasian, Mr. Skipton is right in adhering to it throughout, and in combating the too-prevalent idea that the Eurasian has the vices of both races and the virtues of neither. The domiciled community now numbers, according to the best recent estimates, apparently supported by the authority of the Bishop of Bombay, so many as 250,000 to 300,000 souls, who must form a large proportion of the non-native population of India. In advocating their cause it has been asserted that their economic position has reached a pitch so perilous as to be a menace to the safety of the Empire. This warning is unnecessarily strong. Nor can the travelling American Bishop's remark that if we ever lost the country it would be due to our neglect of the domiciled community be accepted as sound. But the question is undoubtedly a serious one. Bishop Heber, Lord Canning, Archdeacon Baly, and many others have drawn attention to it. The Government of India thirty years ago recognised the state of things to be lamentable from every point of view, and acknowledged the necessity for Government to come to the assistance of the education of the "uninstructed European population." Twenty years ago the Bengal Government thoroughly investigated the problem in Calcutta. The Pauperism Committee's report, which Mr. Skipton quotes, showed the prevalence of excessive poverty and the dependence of the community on charitable relief. Things have gone from bad to worse.

The Eurasians have fallen between two lines of action. Missionary effort is devoted to the reclamation of the heathen, the Government education system is mainly for the natives of India. In the struggle for Government appointments the educated natives have, with their natural ability and various advantages, beaten the Eurasians generally. And latterly a special difficulty has overtaken the portion of the Eurasian community which belongs to the Anglican Church. For some years past the Roman Catholic Church has deliberately aimed at capturing the Eurasian community throughout India. With its superior organisation and command of great financial resources, its efforts have admittedly been crowned with success. Mr. Skipton reproduces a long paper by Archdeacon Hyde showing the development of the Roman Church in India. This is of historical interest, but the account of their proceedings at the present time is more to the point. To meet this competition the Anglican Church and the Nonconformist bodies are acting jointly in an endeavour to raise the large sum of a quarter of a million of money for Eurasian education. The idea of the scheme is to secure the secular efficiency of the schools by preventing overlapping and improving the teaching staff, without touching the religious status of the schools. The Indian Church Aid Association has made this subject its special care. It is largely a matter of money. The Government of India, pledged to religious neutrality, can only afford assistance on certain principles, and to a limited extent.

The future of the Eurasian community depends, for education at any rate, on private efforts, on their personal conduct and on the funds that can be collected. The community has produced individuals who have distinguished themselves in many capacities, but as a community it has certain disqualifications for success which require to be corrected. Among these the inability of the Protestant portion to pay for proper education is a most serious consideration, and Mr. Skipton's endeavours to present the case in a clear light deserve to meet with cordial response. The political importance of the Eurasian question in India cannot be ignored.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Children in the Sun

On the Backwaters of the Nile. By A. L. KITCHING, M.A. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

IN Luganda, the language spoken by the most advanced tribes of which this book treats, the expressions signifying love as applied to God or any fellow-mortal, and preference for meat rather than potatoes, for instance, are both rendered by the same word. It may be gathered from this that the races so admirably described by Mr. Kitching are composed of children grown up, but not less children in intellect. "Sanctified commonsense" is recommended as a means of elevating and enlarging these infant minds, with whose every twist and turn the author is thoroughly familiar, and which—in spite of some little dealing in split infinitives—he pictures interestingly and well.

It is of more than passing interest to learn that the introduction of clothes, among tribes previously guiltless of all but paint and a few armlets, is a deterrent rather than a help to morality, as well as a reason for the sudden springing up of pulmonary ailments. The girl of the tribe, in putting on clothing, adds self-consciousness and prudery to her other vices. Again, the coming of civilisation has caused a tendency, especially among the Baganda, to avoid marriage, for the native who can obtain fixed work at regular wages needs no fields to support him, and consequently no wives to till the fields. Hence the proverbial immorality of these particular Bantu tribes is on the increase, and it is a rather startling reflection that civilisation and clothing are two of the chief causes for this state of affairs.

But, then, they are children all, these tribes of Uganda, and governed by the view-point of those who live lazily in the sun. The development of intellect in temperate zones has been due, mainly, to larger needs than (from a strictly utilitarian standpoint) are experienced in the tropics, and at the same time freedom from the deadening effect of arctic desolation. Here among first necessities are clothes, the means of transporting foodstuffs to unfertile districts, and here, too, is the stimulating effect of a temperate climate. There, in the sun, nature gives food freely in return for little effort on man's part; clothing is not a necessity, and man remains primitive and simple, having known no complex needs to waken complex ideas, and lulled to drowse by the warmth in which his life is spent, instead of being wakened to the restlessness which cultivates beyond present need and colonises for the sake of generations unborn.

So they are children all, animal in their lusts and desires, almost devoid of finer feelings, and unchildlike only in the existence among them of deep-rooted suspicion of all things new. The witch-doctor is to be preferred to the missionary in case of illness, for the missionary declines to believe in the charm that caused the illness. "Did you ever meet Jesus in England?" was the question evoked by a magic-lantern picture of Christ stilling the storm. Here are two out of the many instances of the native point of view as given by the author.

As a missionary, Mr. Kitching has spent many years among these children in the sun; he has mastered not only their language, but their mode of thought, and so well does he render it here that after a careful perusal of his book we find ourselves able to sympathise with the savage in his real, though sometimes ludicrous, difficulties—we can appreciate his way of looking at things. The book is valuable as an anthropological record; it is packed with matters of strong human interest, and stands also as a contribution to the history of that great work in which the author and men like him are engaged—a work whose value we of to-day cannot judge fully, since its fruits await ripening and reaping in years as yet far off.

A French Sensation

A Night in the Luxembourg. By REMY DE GOURMONT. With Preface and Appendix by ARTHUR RANSOME. (Stephen Swift and Co. 5s. net.)

IN order to be in a position to appreciate critically a work which, though it will probably meet with condemnation, most certainly merits unbiased criticism, the reader would be well-advised to begin by reading Mr. Ransome's appendix, reprinted from the Fortnightly Review, in which he gives us some notion of M. de Gourmont as a man and an author. He will then be able the better to understand the translator's preface and the text itself.

For our own part, our judgment is adverse. Mr. Ransome talks of the "nobility of the book's philosophy": we have failed to perceive it. "It may shock some people to find that the principal speaker in the book is a god who claims to have inspired, not Christ alone, but Pythagoras, Epicurus, Lucretius, St. Paul, and Spinoza with the most valuable of their doctrines. It will not, I think, shock any student of comparative religion." Mr. Ransome thinks wrongly. The person of all others most likely to be shocked by the profanity of the book is the student of comparative religion. In nearly every religion that ever flourished under the face of the sun are to be found elements of truth and elements of beauty. M. de Gourmont does not attempt to teach that fact. The general impression which he leaves upon the mind of the reader is one of absolute negation of all religious idealism; all he leaves us beside that is the doctrine, bare and unabashed, that the only real thing in life is love—not love in its grand, high sense, but love in the sense of animal passion. "When one is happy, one no longer loves anything but one's own happiness."

Such is the author's hedonistic view of human bliss.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

As for the ideal moral system, this is it: "I bring you no commandment. I submit a system to you: the living of one's life. What do those movements of the world matter to you that do not touch your sensibility? Keep your tears for your own pains, and for those that scratch you like brambles as you pass. There is no other ethic than this: the conquest of pain."

Vanitas vanitatum, omnia vanitas. "The idea of God is only the shadow of man projected in the infinite. Make use of this sentence as supreme refutation, and you will find few minds capable of disentangling its meaning, or even of relishing its irony." The redeeming feature of the dupe of this intellectual mockery is that in the end he, too, is seized with doubt of the mocker. "My master, still seated there, was looking at me, but with eyes in which I thought I saw I know not what cruel mockery, I know not what mournful reproaches."

The book is said to have created a "sensation" in France. If the same result follows its publication in England, we shall be grievously disappointed, for therein we cannot fail to see a breaking down of that firm moral calibre which we proudly regard as essentially English.

Cornwall—Half Seen

The Cornish Coast and Moors. By A. G. FOLLIOTT-STOKES. Illustrated. (Greening and Co. 12s. 6d. net.)

IF only enthusiasm went hand in hand with literary accomplishment, what a superb volume this would have been! The author, of course, knows his Cornwall thoroughly, and we share his delight in the fair West Country; but his knowledge has not given him that command of language which might have enabled him to describe that lovely coast-line to the best effect. There is far too much guide-book diction. For example, on page 155 a paragraph begins: "We will now follow a moorland path to the southward . . ."; on page 161, "We will now retrace our steps . . ."; page 163, "We will now go out on to the Gurnard's Head . . ."; page 165, "We will now make another detour . . ."; page 165 again, "We will now climb Little Galva in a diagonal direction . . ."; page 168, "We will now retrace our steps . . ."; page 173, "We will now make our last excursion into the moor . . ."; and so on. We are irresistibly reminded of the Metropolitan Railway's "Country Walks" booklets: "Leaving a stile on our left, we soon reach . . ."; and we are inevitably disappointed that with so exquisite a theme the author has done so little.

Nor can we always agree with him. On the south coast he has completely overlooked Trenarren, one of the loveliest and sleepiest villages in the Duchy; he misses the beauty of Porthpean and its tiny bay, with its beaches accessible only by boat, its cool caves and rock archways, noticing merely the "horrible smell" of the seaweed and the water "stained with clay"—neither of which drawbacks have we encountered on any of our several visits at various seasons of the year. On the other hand, little Polkerris, hidden in a cleft behind Fowey, receives fully its deserved praise, and picturesque "Troy Town" itself, with its curiously amphibian aspect (almost every house on the river-front has its flight of steps leading down to the water), has pages of adequate appreciation; though the "large house" by Ready Money Cove is called "Point Neptune," not "Neptune's Point."

There are excellent passages in the book, and they come when the author relieves himself of the task of directing the stranger on his way. Some capital stories, too, are included, as might be expected in a county where smuggling was rife until comparatively recent years. The wonderful bird and animal life of Cornwall also receive attention, and there are pages which prove that Mr. Folliott-Stokes has occasionally the touch of the true artist. If he had fine weather all the way round the coast, he is to be envied, for Cornwall can be very unkind in the matter of rain; it is hardly correct, however, to say that "there is no heat in summer, no cold in winter." One need only live there for a few weeks at either season to disprove that. With the reservations we have mentioned, this book—which is plentifully and beautifully illustrated by photographs—is well worth the close attention of anyone who contemplates a stay in the Duchy.

Bombastes Futuristo as War-Correspondent

La Bataille de Tripoli (26 Octobre, 1911). By F. T. MARINETTI. ("Poesia," Milan.)

THE best commentary, and we are sorry we have not got it by our elbow at this moment to quote textually, on Signor Marinetti's extraordinary piece of war-correspondence, is Stevenson's "Suicide Club." The philosophy of the remarkable institution described in this haunting narrative is summarised in the confidences of the "honorary member," Mr. Malthus; he has tried all the sensations and all the emotions, and he has found only one that never loses its freshness: it is Fear. "Envy me," says the paralytic man. "I am a coward." Nor is Prince Florizel's criticism of the Club without its application: he says, in substance, "If a man wishes to kill himself, then in God's name let him do so like a gentleman, without unnecessary fuss."

We do not suppose that Signor Marinetti meant to kill himself at Tripoli, nor do we accuse him of being more of a coward than most of us, but the tale of his emotions during the various stages of the battle is, to say the least of it, cloying, and, in view of the position of a war-correspondent on the side of the big battalions, ridiculous. War is an "infernally dirty business," and the present campaign is one of the least epic of all that have darkened the pages of history. Nearly all the great warriors have known how to comment their campaigns—when comment was necessary—"like gentlemen"; they have recognised that they were in the hands of mysterious and immeasurable forces, and that idle words must not be spoken, for thin partitions divide courage from pusillanimity even in the bravest soul. Least of all have they exulted over the destruction of brave but ill-equipped enemies; it is this last trait that completes the ugliness of Signor Marinetti's effusion. We could quote a dozen frenzied lyrical passages expressive of his delight at the ravages of the shells. We will content ourselves, however, with one from the chapter entitled "La Grande Symphonie des Obus," in which the intrepid journalist apostrophises the missiles:—

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

> Je vous envie, je vous envie, obus dansants et fous! . . . Que ne suis-je avec vous . . . l'un de vous? Oh! qu'il doit être bon de faire sauter ainsi les innombrables éclats de son corps métallique dans les yeux, dans le nez, dans le ventre épouvantablement ouvert de ses ennemis.
>
> Car je suis furieusement jeune comme vous, et plein de violence réprimée. Il faut que je dilate brusquement les parois de mon corps! . . . Non! Non! bien plus. . . . Oh! que ma tête saute ainsi qu'une fusée à percussion sur l'infini!

We will pause at this amazing and apparently fulfilled aspiration to take breath, skip a paragraph, and continue:—

> O mon père, toi qui m'as si bien chargé d'héroïsme cruel et de courage téméraire, dis-moi pour qui veux-tu me réserver? . . . . Quelle est donc la rangée de visages que j'écrabouillerai avec mes os sautés tels des éclats d'obus, les lanières cinglantes de ma chair incendiaire et le fulmi-coton de mon cœur ubiquiste?

We commend this specimen of Futurist poetry to visitors to the recent London Exhibition of Futurist painting; it may help them to judge the pictures. We were tempted for a moment to make a literal translation, but we finally preferred to give the passage in its naked simplicity. There is force and vigour, no doubt, but so there is in a mad dog. Elsewhere there are charming images, sexual or culled from the dust-heap. The brochure has reached its sixteenth thousand; we suppose that a majority of its readers have read it only to laugh, but there must be a residue to whom it means something. Properly used, it should be a powerful instrument in the hands of the "Podagres," the "Paralytiques" (not Mr. Malthus this time), and the "immonde race des pacifistes, désormais terrés dans les caves profondes de leur ridicule Palais de la Haye"; and to any officer and gentleman of any army we know of who should happen to stumble across it, it should bring a feeling of "utter lamentation and woe."

Shorter Reviews

Beauty and Ugliness and other Studies in Psychological Æsthetics. By VERNON LEE and C. ANSTRUTHER-THOMSON. (John Lane. 12s. 6d. net.)

THE title of this volume is a little misleading, for the book is less concerned with the actual content of beauty and ugliness than with a consideration of the mental processes whereby they are apprehended. Some years ago Vernon Lee, with her collaborator, contributed an article to the Contemporary Review, which became, as it were, the germ of this work. In that article the writers sought to prove that the appreciation of form in art "implies an active participation of the most important organs of animal life, a constant alteration in vital processes requiring stringent regulations for the benefit of the total organism." Both Vernon Lee and Miss Anstruther-Thomson were at the time unacquainted with the work of Professor Lipps, the celebrated German æsthetician, who, they subsequently discovered, had anticipated them in certain of their conclusions.

Now, the contribution of Lipps to the science of psychological æsthetics may be briefly stated. Developing a suggestion of Lotze, he propounded the theory that the appreciation of a work of art depended upon the capacity of the spectator to project his personality into the object of contemplation. One had to "feel oneself into it." Thus we talk of a river flowing or a column rising—terms borrowed from our own experience, and, as applied to the river or the column, only intelligible in the light of that experience. This mental process he called by the name of Einfühlung, or, as it has been translated, Empathy.

So far, Professor Lipps and our authors are at one. But Lipps parts company with the writers of this volume in precluding the possibility of physiological accompaniments of æsthetic contemplation, and it is upon these that Vernon Lee and her gifted collaborator take their stand. From a series of experiments, extending over many years, the authors have arrived at the conclusion that the appreciative study of any work of art is necessarily accompanied by certain physiological changes or disturbances, and a large portion of this book is devoted to a minute and detailed classification of these.

The problem to students of æsthetics is one of no small importance, and these will be grateful to the authors for the industry and acumen with which they have approached a subject abstruse in itself and bristling with difficulties. It is not, perhaps, easy to express oneself in simple phraseology when dealing with such a subject, but Vernon Lee appears to us to court at times a quite unnecessary obscurity. The book, however, is one that cannot be neglected.

Strother's Journal. Edited by CÆSAR CAINE, Vicar of Cleator. (A. Brown and Sons. 3s. net.)

DO you ask, who was Strother? For that matter, he was a tradesman of York and Hull in the mid-eighteenth century. Who was Pepys, pray, but the son of a tailor and a sort of glorified Civil Service clerk? He kept a very entertaining and ingenuous diary—that's the thing; and even so did Strother. True, the immortal Samuel kept it going for the delectation of posterity some eight and a half years, while Strother became persuaded of the vanity of such pursuits within about a ninth of that time. Let this later diarist, then, stand designated as Pepys Minimus, if you will; it shall suffice for us that he is of the same kindred.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

But who was Strother? A haberdasher with aspirations and a pedigree. Room enough there for romance—the tragi-comic romance of common humanity. 'Tis a cramped world poor Strother inhabits, and he must have this satellite-retreat of a journal wherein to discuss unconstrained his "thoughts and proceedings"—the temerarious "thoughts" that so outrun the poor "proceedings"! For, truth to tell, haberdashery commands not his heart; it hath no promise of a future. So we find Master Strother making careful note of the sleek, pursy burgesses of his acquaintance, marking the success of their respective businesses, and how from obscure beginnings they rose to the city council-chambers; nor are we surprised presently to come upon the memorandum of a precise and, we doubt not, much polished letter from "with respect, your most humble servant," aspiring to the position of "clerk in your accompting house." We even discover him having the Strother Arms engraved, "Gules, Bend Argent, three Eagles displayed Azure." (Alas! there should have been a Cage Or for those eagles.) But what would you in a haberdasher with a pedigree?

So much for the real human interest of this document. As for the antiquarian, which Mr. Caine probably has had most in mind, there are careful notes of the prices of brass and treacle in 1785, a lively topography of the countryside as Strother rides in the diligence from Hull to York (a stirring and adventurous time!), and many references to vanished landmarks in the two Yorkshire cities for those who have an interest therein.

Reminiscences of a Blackwall Midshipman. By W. I. DOWNIE. With Frontispiece. (W. J. Ham-Smith. 3s. 6d. net.)

OF the three reasons given by the author in the introduction for the publication of this small volume the second alone should suffice to render it welcome to many readers: "I thought such an account might interest people who, though well acquainted with the luxurious travel of the twentieth century, know little or nothing of the circumstances under which their fathers used to get about the world." And, indeed, in these times of speedy ocean voyages it is of considerable interest to read of the more leisurely travel of the past. Leisurely, after all, is but a comparative term, for those were the days which the author describes as the "zenith of the sailing-ship era, which afterwards collapsed with such startling rapidity. The finest sailing vessels the world had ever seen were to be found breaking record after record in all the waters of the globe."

Yet, as Mr. Downie points out, the encomiums bestowed so lavishly by admirers upon these speedy clippers were but their "swan song," foretelling the rapidly-approaching time when they would be nothing but cherished memories, and the trade of the Empire would be carried on in possibly more efficient, but certainly much less beautiful craft. Whoever desires information upon the subject of life on board of these splendid frigate-built ships, life seen from the point of view of a "mid," and consequently full of incidents, is certain of spending pleasant hours in reading these reminiscences.

La Vie Politique dans les Deux Mondes (October, 1910—September, 1911). Edited by A. VIALLATE and M. CAUDEL. (Félix Alcan, Paris. 10 frs.)

THIS annual compilation, made by Professors and former pupils of the "Ecole des Sciences Politiques," is a valuable book for reference. The matter is much the same as that of the annual summaries in Whitaker, though expanded to form a "fort volume in 8o de 600 pages" odd. The synopsis is admirably lucid, and, being compiled by experts in what we will concede to be the "science" of politics, and with the most impartial aims, should have permanent value. The gist of every matter is generally to be found under an appropriate heading. Nine-tenths of the volume are allotted to the various countries, with suitable sub-divisions for each. Thus under the British Empire, which claims about fifty pages, we have six main headings: The Constitutional Crisis—The General Election—The Parliament Bill—Other Affairs—The Empire (general)—The Empire (the Colonies in detail). International questions are dealt with more than once, in relation to the various countries concerned. The last fifty pages are devoted to three special chapters on International Acts, Economics, and Socialism.

The Journal of a Sporting Nomad. By J. T. STUDLEY. Illustrated. (John Lane. 12s. 6d. net.)

The Strong life that never knows harness,
The wilds where the Caribou call,
The freshness, the freedom, the farness,
O God, how I'm stuck on it all.

THIS is the author's head-note to the first chapter of a book dealing with sport in countries as far apart as Spitzbergen and Cape Town, Alaska and the West Coast of Africa. The spot itself varies from caribou and mountain sheep to tarpon fishing and lions, and is described in quite an informal and unpretentious style. The subjects are so varied that there is no necessity for haste in reading, and a pipe and a chapter go very well together. The author ends his narrative by saying that the days and nights spent "far from the madding crowd" were the happiest of his life, and we can well believe it. The illustrations are quite good and appropriate.

Fiction

A Latter-Day Saint

The Lions of the Lord. By HARRY LEON WILSON. Illustrated. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

AMONG the ethical developments of the nineteenth century the rise and continued existence of Mormonism is surely the most singular. The religions of the world and their subdivisions

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

are innumerable, but the founders of new religions and sects and the preachers of new doctrines have, in every case, from Moses to Guru Nanak, played the part of reformers and teachers of a higher morality than that they found already existing. It was reserved for the nineteenth century to produce, in the heart of a Christian community, a new religion that was a long step down in the scale of ethics, preached by the vulgarest impostor that ever gathered round him a devoted band of followers. Even the Arabian prophet, when he sanctioned polygamy to the extent of four wives, intended it as a restriction on the unbridled profligacy he found existing among the Arabs; but Joseph Smith inculcated on his disciples the necessity of unlimited polygamy, justifying it on the grounds that, after death, the glory of the departed saints is in direct proportion to the number of their wives and children.

This doctrine of compulsory polygamy, together with the doctrine of blood-atonement—in other words, the cold-blooded murder of apostates, dissenters, and all who questioned the divine authority of Joseph Smith and his successor, Brigham Young—have always appeared to the outer world as the most prominent features of Mormonism. The worst horrors have always been perpetrated in the name of religion. Mr. Wilson has with much skill shown that there is also a side of Mormonism deserving more attention and sympathy than are generally bestowed upon it. Though Joseph Smith was a profligate scoundrel, Brigham Young a rank impostor, and the "Book of Mormon" a farrago of nonsense, they managed to evoke among their followers an unquestioning belief in their divine pretensions, and a spirit of self-sacrifice that would have dignified a higher cause.

The story has to do with Mormonism during the most eventful years in the history of the sect, beginning with the Illinois persecution in 1846, and ending with the vindication of United States authority in Salt Lake City some twenty years later. As the author rightly says in the preface, the actual facts are so remarkable that invention was unnecessary. The flight from Illinois, the thousand miles' trek of men, women, and children in search of the Promised Land, the establishment of the State of Deseret, and the building up of a flourishing community in almost slavish subjection to Brigham Young, who directed and controlled all public and private affairs, from the building of the temple "down to the ribbons a woman should wear, or the setting up of a stocking," testify alike to the grit and the credulity of his disciples.

In Joel Rae, the "Lute of the Holy Ghost," we are shown the embodiment of this consuming zeal, coupled with unquestioning, childlike credulity. His fervent belief, that they are the special objects of divine care, helps the emigrants in their perilous journey to the Salt Lake, while his belief in the Prophet's miraculous powers causes embarrassment to Brigham Young himself. Filled with hatred against the Gentiles for the injuries suffered by his family, he cannot cast out from his mind the memory of the Gentile maiden he had once hoped to marry. Naturally an upright and kind-hearted man, he feels there is something wrong when the doctrine of blood-atonement is set to work. For years he had preached that all Gentiles were to be cut off, without exception and without mercy; but, when engaged for the first time in giving practical effect to his own teaching, his mind revolts at the idea of killing defenceless women and children in the notorious Mountain Meadows massacre, and the full horror of the whole circumstances bursts upon him when he becomes aware that he has taken part in the murder of the woman to whom his heart had remained faithful through all his trials.

Still maintaining his faith in the Prophet, his zeal has left him. Others will be saved, but for him there can be no forgiveness. He knows that he is condemned to all eternity, and he is prepared for the Avenger of Blood in whatever shape he may present himself. How atonement is made, some fifteen years later, and how the "Little Man of Sorrows" finds rest at last, is the essence of the tale. Mr. Wilson has broken new ground, and written an excellent story; but it is not improved by the illustrations, and the unnecessary introduction of the British tourist in the last pages strikes a discordant note.

La Troisième Puissance. Roman traduit du Hongrois de Géza Gárdonyi.
Byzance. Pièce en trois Actes traduit du Hongrois de François Herczeg. (Honoré Champion, Paris.)

IT would be rash to generalise about modern Hungarian literature on the strength of these two little books. It would seem, however, that no Hungarian writer of merit can escape being compared with his famous compatriot, Maurice Jokäi. This comparison is to be found in the short introductions to both these works. The novel and the play are so very different in their subjects, conception, and treatment that it is hard to believe that they are representative of one national literature.

"La Troisième Puissance" suggests a curious blend of the ideas of Mr. Bernard Shaw, as contained, for example, in "Man and Superman," and the manner of Tolstoï. We attribute the ideas, for the sake of brevity, to Mr. Shaw, but we suspect that they are really a great deal older than that brilliant writer. At any rate, the development given to them by M. Gárdonyi is unexpected and entertaining. We will just quote one phrase, which practically contains the definition of his title: "Tu obéis comme un bœuf stupide à cet anonyme mystérieux qui n'existe pas, mais qui veut être."

"Byzance" has the most markedly exotic flavour. This play deals with the last days of Constantinople before its capture by the Turks, and its chief motive is the contrast between the heroically-minded Emperor Constantine, the last sovereign of an effete dynasty, and his ignoble courtiers. A good specimen of a rather crude irony is to be found in the words of the Patriarch during the final scene of the tragedy: Prince Dimitri has exclaimed, "Chrétiens, prions!" The

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Churchman's answer is, "Non, n'excitons pas la colère des païens."

Into Thy Hands. By ARTHUR APPLIN. (F. V. White and Co. 6s.)

MR. APPLIN does not overcrowd his pages with numerous characters; so that it is not necessary to wait until two or three chapters are read before the different persons can be nicely sorted out. "Into Thy Hands" contains only four, or at the most five, people who have any real bearing on the story. When we come to the plot, however, matters do not appear to be quite so clear. A certain amount of sensation is aimed at, and in seeking after this effect, the reader's credulity is strained too far. For instance, at the beginning of the story there is a hint of one man preventing another from making a wreck of his life, and a suggestion of a woman's soul being played with. This ushers in a mystery; but it is only a bait to catch the reader's interest, for the next thing we hear is that Dr. Desmond, the same man who previously talked about saving his friend, Sir Paul Lust, is now spoken of as being the protector of the woman, for whom he neither then nor afterwards cared, except as a friend. There is a good deal of talk about a packet of incriminating letters that had passed between Dr. Desmond and the woman, although why letters between a man and woman who are mere acquaintances should be incriminating is not stated. Rose Farley, the doctor's sweetheart, is convincing while she stays in the country, but her journey to town and her engagement at the theatre help only to add one more stone to the pillar of unreality, whose shadow falls so darkly across the pages of the book.

Stories Old and New:—Granny's Wonderful Chair. From the Story by FRANCIS BROWNE. Illustrated. Alice's Adventures in Wonderland. By LEWIS CARROLL. Illustrated. (Blackie and Son. 9d. each.)

Le Savetier des Fées. Adapted by E. MAGEE. Illustrated. (Blackie and Son. 4d.)

MESSRS. BLACKIE AND SON are deservedly popular as purveyors of books for children, and, in addition to the young folk who are most directly concerned, parents will not fail to appreciate their efforts in this direction. The juvenile works issued by this firm are always attractively produced, and some of the smaller volumes are so daintily got up that any child will be sure to prize them. These two English stories have long been established favourites, they have been issued in various forms, and at prices to suit every purse, and new editions are constantly in request. The present volumes leave nothing to be desired, and their handsome binding, clear print, and coloured plates will win them many admirers. The French fairy tale belongs to the "Petits Contes pour les Enfants" series. It is in a less ambitious form than the others, and it is intended for very young children learning French. The booklet contains two short illustrated stories, with a set of questions and a complete vocabulary at the end. In the hands of a French nursery governess, or one conversant with that language, it will help the little ones to spend many a happy hour, besides preparing them for the further study of the speech of "la belle France."

Knickerbocker Days. By HARRIS TWEED. (John Ouseley. 1s. net.)

THE boy in literature is usually a portentous prig, a polymorphous presentment ranging from Kim to Eric, yet with the same basic unnaturalness. The failure of the printed boy as a type arises from the fact that his biographer has been educated out of such sense of humour as may have been his birthright. The boy can, in a sense, be father to the man, but it is a wise child that knows its own parent, and the wisdom does not apparently survive the years between. In some respects, this little record of boyhood memories in the matter of pets, parties, peccadilloes, and such-like retrospect of what is, rightly yet not without a sense of paradox, called the happiest time of life offends somewhat less against the realities than many more pretentious chronicles of immaturity. Nevertheless, there remains a hint of the stiffness seemingly inseparable from such efforts, and we cannot wholly lack sympathy with the candid critic invoked in the last chapter. The most that can perhaps be said is that Mr. Harris Tweed has undertaken a difficult task with less than the average measure of failure.

The Things That Women Do. By FLORENCE WARDEN. (F. V. White and Co.)

SEBASTIAN RIVERS is the person principally concerned in this story. He bravely saves a young woman who is being brutally attacked by ruffians in a wood, and, contrary to expectation, does not marry her in the last chapter. He is accused of murdering one of the ruffians, and in order to gain time before the trial he imagines he will have to face, with his sister's aid escapes to London. Here he has an enemy and rival in one, Jerrard, and a lively combat ensues until Sebastian is accused of attempting to kill his father's old enemy, who threatened to visit his hatred on the son. Sebastian is fortunate enough to possess the friendship of a brave and fearless damsel, and in the end all is well. Jealousy is the force on which the story is sustained, and, for the type of novel usually associated with the author's name, it is not badly worked out, although the man Jerrard allows his hatred and animosity such a wide range that in real life it would not be possible to imagine him escaping his deserts for such a protracted period; but we are reading fiction, and as it was necessary to fill a certain number of pages, we must make no further complaint.

A Member of Tatt's. By NAT GOULD. (John Long. 1s. net.)

IN "A Member of Tatt's" we are once more face to face with all the old favourites who have helped to give Mr. Nat Gould the grip he has upon that section of readers to whom sport—and especially horse-racing—

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

always appeals. The accounts of the races are set forth with all the zeal and relish that we have always looked for, and never failed to find, in this popular writer's romances. The love interest generally occupies a secondary place to that of the great races, but it creeps in quite naturally, and, owing to success which always attends these sporting heroes, there is seldom or ever any lack of the necessary capital on which to start housekeeping. George Dhering, the member of Tatt's, is a shrewd man of business and carries all before him so far as ensuring his position in the racing world is concerned. Leslie Hillyar runs George very close for an important place in the story, as it is against him and his supposed lawlessness that the attacks of two fanatics are directed, Leslie wishing to marry the daughter of one of them. All is well in the end; the fanatics realise that a racing man is not necessarily a scamp, while Leslie's love for his sweetheart proves itself to be greater than his reckless liking for questionable companions. As long as Mr. Gould continues to write in the strain of this, his last venture, he will be sure to retain his hold on his appreciative public.

Ush.: The Revelation of Bandobast Wilderness. By "ADELPHOS." (John Ouseley. 2s. net.)

THE "revelation" referred to consists of a series of most weird wanderings of a young English officer in India, guided by an old fakir. This peculiar person prostrates himself before the young officer and tells him that he has been waiting for him "twelve long years," and soon after away they go on their extraordinary journey. What they see and do forms the whole of the book. Why they go and the object of it all is not clear. Those who like to read about weird incantations may find the story interesting. There are many dangers, and a lovely Princess; the latter, however, dies in order that her soul may be nearer to the one for whom all the trouble is taken, and the old fakir disappears somewhere in the clouds or in a cleft of a rock, and the mighty Bandobast is left alone. Half a page at the beginning of each chapter is taken up with quotations, and there is a photo of the Princess.

The Theatre

"Ready Money" at the New Theatre

MR. ALLAN AYNESWORTH has so long delighted us as an actor that he was sure of a warm welcome as manager, even on a wintry August night. On Monday evening last he produced a capital play—for the provinces. It contains a kind of "Brewster's Millions," a suggestion of "Find the Woman" and a reminiscence or two of other American plays with which we have been lately familiar—with the trite, proverbial result. However, "Ready Money" is called, quaintly perhaps, an original comedy, and therefore the dialogue is of the character known to the more commonplace American as bright, and to us as forced, would-be swank, and, unfortunately, frequently ineffective. Take some seventeen loosely drawn and rather uninteresting characters, superimpose generous handfuls of American police melodrama, and highly flavour with dollars and mines, forgery and that sort of thing, add a feeble touch of love motive, boil for three brisk acts—and there you are. "Ready Money," an excellent title, will give pleasure to those who do not take their drama very critically and perhaps delight those of simple faith in things theatrical. Although it is easy to recall the plot perfectly—for every point of it is underlined as who should say there be fools in the house and we will make 'em understand—it would be dull reading.

Mr. Aynesworth—with a clever make-up—was not overtaxed by his part. He appeared as a physically solid but psychologically amorphous personage, labelled—after a style long disused in Europe, but popular with American authors—as "an international character." I know one or two such people, but they do not happen to be very clever in the reproduction of 1,000-dollar bills, nor very familiar and billing with the police, nor much inclined to act the god in the machinery to young gentlemen who have muddled mining affairs. But Mr. Jackson Ives or Walker and, I fancy, Potter also, is an international character of that kind, and his interference in the affairs of Stephen Baird—owner of the "Sky Rocket" Mine, as the programme kindly tells us—leads to a lot of trouble about forged bills, ultimately to a great deal of victory for young Mr. Baird, and, incidentally, to the production of the play. There is one very nice thing about all this. It is that Mr. Kenneth Douglas plays Baird and shows that art with so little can do so much. Since "Rosemary" Mr. Douglas has caused us to enjoy many parts, but it is doubtful if he has ever before been able to give substantial form to so slight a creation of the author. It will not make history, of course, yet it is an extraordinary achievement. His art thwarts the author's artifice; he makes the unreal tangible, the feeble and elusive distinctive and distinguished. But this sincerity and simplicity undoes the conventions of the play to some extent and makes the other characters, even that of Mr. Allan Aynesworth, more meretricious than they would otherwise seem. Miss Hilda Antony has nothing much more to do than look beautiful in some becoming and some rather unbecoming gowns. This she does to perfection, and she uses her fine eyes after a manner nicely adjusted to the older conventions of the stage.

Seriously, it is rather curious to think that probably "Ready Money" will be quite a successful play, and that the sort of thing that would have entertained the last generation is equally welcome to our day. This sort of play is nothing but a vague pretence, a shallow misleading mélange of old tricks and new turns—the shadow of the shade of the sort of stuff of which drama is justly made. Had Sardou been a modern American who was quite interested in the eternal niceties, he might have constructed something like Mr. James

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Montgomery's " Ready Money." For there is neatness and directness and resource in the plot, sharpness in the dialogue, and a good deal of obvious satire on the " get on or get out " system of life.

Two pleasant points shine out in the original comedy. The impersonation of Baird by Mr. Douglas and the skilful production of the piece by Mr. Aynesworth. " An Object Lesson," by Mr. Frederic Sargent, preceded the longer play. It is the story of a quite natural woman who loves her husband and is strongly inclined to fall in love with her lover. This not unknown complication is neatly straightened out. The husband and wife are made happy, the would-be lover is made good, and Mr. Jerrold Robertshaw, Miss Lillemore Halvarsen, and Mr. Frank Tennant show some sincerity and a strong sense of the conventions of the stage.

EGAN MEW.

On the River

By PUNTER.

THERE is no other river in the wide world quite like the Thames, and the life on the Thames during the summer months is different from life anywhere else. There are some who revel in it, and some who declare, after a very brief experience, that they are never coming near the Thames again, because they do not like the crowds, the strange people they encounter, and the singers, or the nigger minstrels. There is a good deal to be said for both these points of view. The life on the Thames is a unique mixture of beauty and vulgarity, and the two may be said to balance one another pretty evenly. Nature has done her best to make the surroundings perfect, and man has done his best to vulgarise the work of Nature. The river is undoubtedly beautiful. Only the most exigeant will deny this, and on week-days, when the great exodus from town has not yet begun, it is delightful to spend the afternoon in a canoe or in a punt, or cruising through the locks in an electric launch. On week-days one can see something of the river and admire its charm, but on Saturday and Sunday one is far too much occupied in avoiding collisions with other canoes, boats, punts, steam launches, and huge excursion steamers to have any time left to admire the beauties of the scene. These remarks are not of course applicable to every reach of the upper Thames.

Truly at the week-ends the Thames as we refer to it is an extraordinary spectacle. In places the boats are so thick that it would be possible to walk across them from one bank to another without touching the water. The number of boats is only equalled by their variety. There are huge excursion steamers bearing trippers up from London at two shillings a head, with a lunch thrown in for one shilling extra. These people cannot move about without music and singing; therefore each steamer has an improvised band which plays, hour after hour, the latest craze of the music-hall stage. Then there are the private steam and electric launches, some slow and others of great speed, and of all designs and colours. These require careful steering to avoid dashing into the numerous smaller craft, the great majority of which should bear the flag, " Not under control," so unskilful are the oarsmen and punters. Then there are rowing boats—eights, fours, and twos—and queer-looking old tubs which resemble ancient British coracles, and which seem to be favourites with grey-haired old veterans who have spent every summer Sunday on the Thames for fifty years past. Mixed up with the boats are canoes and a few gondolas, some of which are propelled by Italian ice-cream vendors dressed up for the occasion as gondoliers. They are ferocious in aspect but quite harmless to meet.

If one wishes to be really chic, the correct thing is to move about the river in a punt, and in the punt must be a beautiful lady. The punt is the most graceful of all the river craft, and it is far and away the most comfortable to sit in, or, rather, in which to recline on soft cushions. While the man with the pole does all the work you sit from necessity almost locked in a fond embrace with the fair one you have succeeded in enticing on board. But the punt problem is a serious one, and needs careful adjustment. It is usually the natural desire of every man to be alone with a beautiful lady and not to share her with several other companions who may get a larger proportion of her attentions than himself, although if you take her alone in a punt you are faced with a grave dilemma. One of you must punt, in which case she will be reclining amongst the cushions all by herself, or, if she punts, you find yourself left all alone. Therefore, it is wiser to take a friend who delights in violent exercise, and who can be relied upon not to attempt to usurp your seat by the fair one's side. There is another way of propelling a punt which is delightful because it obviates the necessity of having a third party on board. That is by paddling. Then you and the fair one can sit together in the stern and paddle gently up and down stream until some attractive backwater is reached where you can tie your craft to the shore and lie among the cushions, at peace with the world. Do not attempt to punt unless you are really skilful at the game. It looks easy, but in reality it is most difficult. Your punt will go round and round and generally ends in drifting down stream sideways, colliding with every other boat on the river and producing scenes of consternation.

Now if the craft on the Thames vary, the people who fill the boats and launches and steamers vary still more. They range from the so-called highest respectability down through all the varying social grades of the river's patrons, plentiful amongst whom are the ladies of the Stage. The river without chorus girls would be dull indeed. You may see whole families—papa, mamma, sister, and brother—all out together pretending they are having a good time, but all eyes are fixed on the punts in which repose the favourites of the stage. They seem to own the river. Every other craft seems to make way for one which is the proud bearer of a stage beauty, and those who are fortunate enough to be in possession for the time being carry themselves with a haughtiness and pride which no others dare assume.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Now the heart of the Thames is at Skindles Hotel. Here is the great rallying point at night time. Hundreds of frail craft with their still frailer contents come from all parts of the river, and tie up at Skindles lawn while their occupants listen to the soft music which is discoursed by a travelling troupe of ladies and gentlemen. The music is more suited to the tastes of the company than to the beauty of the scene. Sometimes a sentimental love song is indulged in, but these are few and far between. Chorus girls and the ladies of the Thames have little time to waste over sentiment; they prefer something more substantial, and love songs recall the unwelcome fact that they are spending the evening with a banker rather than a lover. Therefore sentiment is precluded as far as possible, and as the pale moon looks down and the stars twinkle overhead and as the river rolls slowly on its eternal way the sentimental hours are made hideous by the constant repetition of some music-hall refrain.

Poor old Father Thames! of some of your daughters it may be truly writ:—

His women, insolent, and self-caressed,
By vanity's unweared finger dressed,
Forget the blush that virgin fears impart
To modest cheeks, and borrow one from art;
Curled, scented, furbelowed, and flounced around,
With feet too delicate to touch the ground,
They stretch the neck and roll the wanton eye,
And sigh for every fool that passes by.

The Cattle of the Andes

By W. H. KOEBEL

FROM out of the heart of the lands of vast solitude the peaks of the Andes are soaring boldly upwards, climbing giddily against the blue of the sky. No vestige of leaf or of verdure of any kind relieves the surface of the mountains. Peaks and chasms, precipices and plateaux, all are gaunt and utterly bare. Not that colour is lacking; far from it. The naked masses of rock are painted in a hundred hues. Blue, red, green, grey, yellow, pink, black, white, and scores of shades hesitate between the more defined colours—strange tints which would defy the eye of any but a trained artist to name.

Of the others, some are extraordinarily bold. Many, indeed, it would be easy enough to associate with the paintings on canvas, but that they should be met with, daubed by unaided nature on such a surface as rock, would almost pass belief were they not there in all their brilliant majesty to convince the eye of the doubter. Here and there the darker hues are accentuated by a patch of brilliant relief. Wedged in the hollows and crevices, and spread over many of the small plateaux, are sheets of glistening snow. Far down below it is autumn still, and there the air remains balmy and the sun-rays warm. But here it is otherwise. The light winds that pierce the gullies strike with a biting chill in defiance of the sun that hangs so brilliantly overhead. The boulders which hedge in the narrow head-waters of a stream near by are hung with long and stout icicles, the work of the previous night. They are the first threats of the early winter which is about to take the neighbourhood in its grip.

A mile or so distant is Lake Inca, the great sheet of water which, by reason of some freak or other, has come to fill in one of these loftily-pitched valleys. Just now it is as a sheet of clear-cut sapphire, from the sides of which the coloured rocks leap upwards. Not a branch to hang over its surface; not a leaf which may fleck its transparency. Nothing but water and rock, beautiful in colour both, but infinitely cold, frostily repelling. One could not lie by the shores of Lake Inca, even to bask in the rays of a midsummer's sun. Apart from the mere adamantine confusion of the rock, the spot was never meant to be approached in so intimate a fashion. It is a place that gives a frosty welcome, whatever may be the state of the atmosphere. You may look for awhile, and admire, but then you should pass on and leave the deep waters to their solitude.

Not that this loneliness is confined to the shores of Lake Inca. At the first glimpse the steep slopes which shut in the horizon on all sides seem entirely destitute of life. Here and there is a cairn, and at one point the lowly dome of a small shelter hut constructed of massive stone swells out its roundness in contrast to the jagged edges of its surroundings. Lower down the slopes are other, and ruder, shelters—rough walls of piled stones behind which men and beast may crouch for awhile, and thus preserve their bodies from the stormy blasts of a winter's squall. But these few insignificant stony things are merely eloquent of man's passage; they tell nothing of his presence.

Nevertheless a closer scrutiny will reveal more than this. High up on one of the mountain sides is a collection of tiny dots which appear to be moving slowly down the rocky wall. The progress, viewed from this distance, seems infinitely slow. For a while there is a forward movement; then the atoms bunch closely together in a halt, the whole standing out as a single mass, until the specks advance once more from the main body, and the patch of life slowly disintegrates.

It needs no peculiar intelligence to discover what comprises this procession. The distant specks are cattle which have just crossed the frontier, and are entering upon Chilian soil. They have tramped stolidly up to the Cumbre, the topmost stretches of the lofty pass, where the gigantic figure of the Christ rises benignly to guard the loneliness. Now they have just entered on their downward way—a career the end of which can spell nothing else but very sudden death.

Fortunately for them, they are profoundly ignorant of anything of the kind. The significance of this leaving the land of their birth and of this crossing of the frontier means nothing to them. If anything at all occurs to their bovine brains it is doubtless the fact that they have finished the long climb, and have begun the descent. If they are wondering at all, it is in all probability as to which is the more arduous of the two, and whether a stumble uphill is preferable to one on the down grade. And it must be admitted that these are the most important matters of the moment.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

All the while the procession has been creeping down the mountain side. The dots have assumed colour and shape, and here and there the figure of a mounted man pricks up above the rest. As they approach still nearer the sound of long-drawn human calls and of the bellowings of the oxen comes clearly wafted across the keen, thin air, yet for some reason or other one cannot help regarding the whole collection with some feeling of surprise. They are strange men and beasts these. It is as though they have come into life from the back of nowhere, to pass like ghosts along these solitudes of rock and snow.

But this is only until they have approached quite near. Then the men have clearly become human, and the beasts undoubtedly animals. The red, yellow, and brown ponchos of the riders stand out in marked contrast to the stone and snow of their background. Their lassos are whirling overhead to descend with a smart thud upon the backs of the hesitating cattle. And their prolonged calls sound distinctly now, wailing out above the trampling noises and the bellowings of their charges.

Thus the procession passes slowly by, a trailing company of waving horns and lumbering bodies. Between the various squadrons ride the men, each jealously guarding the particular section in his charge. What an existence! will exclaim the dweller in towns. To pass one's life making these passages through the aching loneliness of this unclothed land, and all for the few pesos for which the toil is rewarded at the end of the week! This may be so; but everyone to his métier. These riders may be thinking similar thoughts concerning the life of the townsman, who knows?

In the meanwhile the progress of the troop has continued. It has struck upon a small plateau, and the way is more easy just now. But there is much to do ere the first sagebush and cacti of the lower lands are sighted. And, rising from behind the topmost range of jagged peaks are great rounded masses of cloud of unusually dense and solid appearance. There is snow in the air, and soon enough it will be upon the ground. How rapid and deep will be the fall is the secret of these clouds alone.

In any case the menace is no empty one, as the paisanos know full well. There may be need to seek such shelter as the inhospitable region may afford, or the company may with luck have reached more sheltered and warmer lands ere the flakes fall in grim earnest. Quien sabe? Should the former prove the case, the herd will, likely enough, lose some of the number of its mess and a few more horns and bones will lie bleaching on the rocks. If the latter, the outcome will be a stroke of good fortune for all. Even for the cattle, since it will allow them to complete the already short span of life allotted them.

In the meanwhile, since there is nothing to be done, it is best to take the matter philosophically. No one understands this better than these drivers. No hay remedio—there is no alternative, they will gravely explain. So the entire procession goes thudding and stumbling and crashing downwards with minds as equable as the exigencies of the road permit. Far down below are pastures and cities, flowers and streets. It is a question of patience. So far as that is concerned it is simple enough. No other frame of mind would be possible in this tremendous and awe-inspiring convulsion of rock which seems to hang halfway between earth and sky. As to the procession, it has passed on its way. It has become once more a collection of ants clinging to the mountain side.

The Magazines

WE should like cordially to welcome the Oxford and Cambridge Review at its reduced price of a shilling, and to wish it the success at this price that it undoubtedly deserves; but our greeting would be more unqualified had it not been for an extraordinary blot that appears in the present number. A glance at our columns should be sufficient to prove that we have small concern with the sycophancy that tricks itself out as literary criticism; but to believe that all names, from the least to the greatest, must stand open to adverse attack, if need be, is one thing, while ill-mannered spleen is quite another. And Mr. G. H. Powell's article on Thomas Hardy, under the title of "The Weird of Wessex," is just such a piece of ill-tempered injustice. How else can such sentences as the following be explained? "He is not going to tell them or us how the universe ought to be managed, nor stir a finger to save Wessex or Great Britain from a well-deserved final combustion. He stands by with a melancholy snigger, not quite outspoken enough to say all he means, or hesitating perhaps to put all his literary eggs into the one pessimistic basket." We do not know which is the more gratuitously offensive: the unfair suggestion of the first sentence or the "melancholy snigger" of the second. And who would recognise the hills and great spaces that give the setting to the novels under the phrase, "tented atmosphere of stuffy provinciality"? We ourselves are not admirers of Mr. Hardy's pessimism; and we think the time is not too young for a critical estimate of him; but an attack of this kind is another matter altogether. Dr. Smythe Palmer, in the same magazine, writes with learning and interest on "Some Literary Blunders."

The English Review this month is unexpectedly rich in titular glory. Lady Margaret Sackville has a poem of no astonishing merit. Lord Sheffield writes on "English Popular Education"; and Earl Russell on "When Marriage Should be Dissolved." It is curious to read a long article on the question of education, and then to sit down and wonder what this education is that seems so necessary. Stuffing the minds of children, or the minds of adults, for that matter, with adventitious pieces of stray knowledge in order that they may mingle in the slush of commercialism, is certainly not education, whatever else it may be. One of the best articles in the present number is "The Story of Ogemagigito," by "Viator." Apparently Mr. George Moore could go on writing for ever without saying anything. In his essay, "Jubilation in the Garden," he makes a good attempt in that direction. It is charming—when one does not get too much of it. Mr. Rawlinson, dealing with "The Gold Supply, Currency, and the Labour Unrest," puts forward an excellent plea for the standardisation of the value of gold in respect to indispensable commodities of life. Until something of this kind is done it will be found impossible to make any social reforms of permanent effect.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Fortnightly has a number of interesting articles, while still serving the old-time magazine tradition of thinking that one literary article to ten political is a wise percentage. Mr. Wilfrid Scawen Blunt, whether one agrees with him or not, is always interesting; moreover his knowledge of Egyptian matters is not to be lightly esteemed. His article "Lord Kitchener and His Friends," therefore, is worth reading. Mr. James Milne, in "The New Political America," writes with knowledge of the chief personalities that figure in modern American matters; and some of the anecdotes he has to tell are as illuminating as they are interesting. Especially so is one that he tells of Roosevelt. Someone once asked him, "Don't you in your speeches sometimes use caricature?" "Yes, perhaps," he answered; and then, after thinking for a moment, he added, "No, not caricature; but I speak in bill-posters, on to a large canvas." Among literary matters, Mr. Francis Gribble has another scissors-and-paste article on "The Last Adventures of Mlle. Clairon." Mr. Walter Jerrold deals with the famous "Rejected Addresses" under the somewhat untrue title of "The Centenary of Parody." Mr. Alfred Noyes writes upon "The Poems of Edmund Gosse," and takes occasion to tilt his lance at certain critics whom it is not altogether easy to identify. Mr. E. A. Baughan deals thoughtfully with "The Question of Opera." One of the great faults of this writer is that, in drama and in music, he has become blasé. One can trace this in all his work. Nevertheless, in substance his article has more reason and wisdom in it than anything we have read on the perplexed question of permanent opera in London. On the Continent, opera is a permanent pleasure for all; here it is a sporadic luxury for the wealthy.

In the Nineteenth Century Mr. Arthur Weigall writes upon "The Morality of Excavation." Mr. Weigall is an unintentional humourist. Dealing with the charge that it is sacrilegious to defile the tombs of the dead under any circumstances whatever, he puts up as his defence that "the archæologist . . . before he raises the lid of the shell in which the dead man lies . . . has obtained pictures of the intact coffin at every angle; before he unrolls the bandages from the mummy he has photographed it again and again; there is a rough decency in his dealings with the dead, and a care in handling the contents of the graves which would have been gratifying to their original owner"! He also declares that robbers sometimes desecrate the tombs. One would have thought it possible to protect the graves at half the cost it takes to rifle them; but Mr. Weigall remarks, again with unintentional humour, that "the scientific excavator anticipates the robber whenever it is possible to do so"! It is certainly a bland kind of defence for a highly irreligious proceeding. As an instance of the extravagance of modern times, "Recent Art Sales," by Mr. W. Roberts, makes instructive reading. Mr. Heathcote Statham, on "The Handel Festival," writes both admirably and enthusiastically—which is admittedly an excellent combination. Perhaps, as he suggests, there would be more critics to admire Handel if there were more critics who went to hear his music.

The Cornhill this month contains some good articles. Mr. M. Miall writes "On Moravian Brethren"—a sect that is even now more powerful in missionary stations than most people imagine. In his "Sixty Years in the Wilderness," Sir Henry Lucy gives this month some reminiscences of one of the most remarkable temperaments that ever entered Parliament—Parnell. Canon Rawnsley writes an essay entitled "At Asolo: A Browning Memory," but does not impart much substantial information. In Blackwood's there is an excellent amount of "The Making of the Panama Canal," by Mr. Charles Paxton Markham. As a trophy of man's material progress it makes fascinating reading: though there is always the chastening reflection that by these means attention has been distracted from the fact that man's spiritual state and powers are rapidly on the decline. Mr. St. John Lucas has a delicate story in the same number entitled "The Lady of the Canaries."

Notes and News

Messrs. Dent have in the press a translation from the French of M. Henri Provin, by Miss Phœbe Allen, entitled "The Last Legitimate King of France." The story of Louis XVII is well known, and the present work provides evidence to show that his supposed death in the Tower of the Temple was a ghastly piece of play-acting.

Readers of the Onlooker will be interested to learn that the publication of the paper has been taken over by the Swift Press. A notable feature of the current issue is an article by the Right Hon. F. E. Smith, K.C., M.P., upon "The Naval Crisis—Canadian Intervention," which will be followed in due course by similar contributions from other prominent men of the day.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Mr. John Long will shortly publish a new work entitled "King Charles I: A Study," by Walter Phelps Dodge, author of "Piers Gaveston" and "The Real Sir Richard Burton." In this book the author displays a deep sympathy with King Charles both as monarch and man, and his appreciation of his many undoubted qualities is in strong contrast to the scorn which he heaps upon Cromwell and his Roundhead friends.

Following up their recent success with Dr. Audsley's "Colour in Dress," Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston, and Co. announce that they have arranged with Mr. Julius M. Price, artist, author, and traveller, to write a book entitled "Dame Fashion," treating of feminine modes since the year 1786. The work will be very fully illustrated, and will be modelled on the lines of another book issued by the same firm, Palliser's "History of Lace."

Mr. Frank Brangwyn, A.R.A., the well-known artist and illustrator of the "Arabian Nights" (Lane's translation), "The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam," "Don Quixote," Southey's "Life of Nelson," etc., etc., has been engaged for some time past upon a series of pictures to illustrate Kinglake's "Eothen," which the publishers, Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston and Co., announce for publication in the autumn. It is expected to rank as one of the best art books of the season.

Messrs. Stanley Paul and Co. are publishing immediately a new book by Mrs. Maude M. Holbach, entitled "In the Footsteps of Richard Cœur de Lion." The author is on familiar ground in following her hero in his many adventures through mediæval France and England to Cyprus and the Holy Land, and back along the Adriatic shores to the place of his captivity on the Danube, and finally to his tragic death in the land of his boyhood. Many interesting sidelights are thrown on the great historical personages of the day, including Richard's mother, "that luxurious lady of the South," and Fulk Nera, the great castle-building Count of Anjou. The work is fully illustrated with photographs secured by the author. The same firm publish immediately a new story by Mr. A. Kirby Gill, "The Marble Aphrodite"; "Captain Hawks," by Oswald Kendall; and "A Modern Aham," by Miss Theodora Wilson Wilson.

Several acquisitions of considerable importance have recently been made in the Department of Metalwork, Victoria and Albert Museum. At the recent Taylor sale, five objects of great rarity and beauty were fortunately secured. Of these, perhaps the most noticeable is a small pendant reliquary in the form of a plaque with a figure of St. Catherine in brilliant translucent enamel on silver, set in a silver-gilt frame. It is probably the work of a craftsman of Cologne in the late fourteenth century. An Elizabethan tazza of silver-gilt, a reliquary of silver-gilt elaborately chased (Spanish), a French incense-boat of the fifteenth century, and a silver-gilt cup and cover of the sixteenth century are other fine items. The Department has also acquired a pair of candlesticks of silver cast and chased, which bear the Paris mark of 1714-15, and are examples of the finest work of the time. These and others are exhibited for the present in the West Hall, Room 48.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

By Lancelot Lawton.

ITALY AND TURKEY—PEACE IN SIGHT.

THERE would at last seem to be reasonable grounds for hope that the Turco-Italian conflict is drawing to a close. For some time past it has been known that, through the medium of unofficial peace plenipotentiaries who have chosen Lausanne as a meeting-place, the Governments of the two countries have sought to find an acceptable basis upon which to frame a treaty of peace. But hitherto all efforts in this direction have failed, primarily because of Turkey's reluctance to recognise the "annexation" of Tripoli. Other points of difference have existed, involving the amour propre no less than the material interests of the combatants; and from time to time we have been told that, if peace were to be restored, then it would have to be at the price of international intervention.

It can well be imagined that the mere contemplation of such a solution could not fail to be distasteful to a nation occupying the status of Italy, and so it is not surprising that she should have advanced considerably more than half-way in endeavouring to meet the requirements of an extremely delicate situation. Whatever may be said on the debatable question of her cause, or on the subject of her purely military conduct throughout the war, Italy's diplomacy has been admirable; and if, as is now stated in the best-informed quarters, a peace with honour is to be one of the realities of the near future, the credit will be due as much to her enlightened initiative as to any inevitable or accidental combination of circumstances.

At the same time, however, it would be wrong to discount altogether either of those agencies which I have termed the inevitable and accidental combination of circumstances. In all campaigns there comes a time when belligerents, weary of hostilities and no longer able to command that most valuable asset, national enthusiasm, look forward to a truce as eagerly as once they yearned to take up arms. But, having embarked on war, it is not an easy matter suddenly to conclude a peace which shall embrace all the requirements of national honour. And it is here that the inevitable and accidental circumstances play so large a part in determining the course of events during a period of international hostilities. It will be recalled that at the precise moment when Japan was resting after her triumphs at Moukden and Tiehling, when Count Witte and Marquis Komura were approaching America from opposite directions, the Russians were for the first time able to place a properly equipped force in the field, the numerical equal of their enemy. The moment had come, so it seemed, for the armies of the Tsar to retrieve their lost fortunes, and many able critics give it as their opinion to-day that, had an advance been made, the Japanese would have found themselves driven back on to the Liaotung Peninsula and Korea. But other agencies were at work to frustrate all schemes for the perpetuation of the war. In Russia, revolution claimed the undivided attention of the Administration and the Executive; in Japan the Government was faced with an impoverished exchequer, and a country literally bereft of its manhood, the latter circumstance precluding all possibility of sending reinforcements to the front. And so in the case of Italy and Turkey we find a combination of circumstances making irresistibly for peace. Both countries have reached the stage already alluded to, when the military forces and the civil population are hungering for the restoration of tranquillity. It is realised that nothing in the nature of a national quarrel brought about through racial antipathy, or through economic or military rivalry, exists, and that the prolongation of the war has ceased to have any warrant. Moreover, in the case of Italy, national exigencies demand some measure of financial retrenchment, at the same time pointing to the inadvisability of concentrating so large a proportion of her forces in the barren wastes of Tripoli. As far as Turkey is concerned, the conclusion of any sort of peace has never ceased to be a desideratum. Hedged in, as it were, by States the racial origin and the religion of which are identical with those of many thousands of her alien subjects, Turkey is constantly threatened with aggression on her frontiers; but never has the danger been so acute as at the present moment. Although for the time being the Montenegrin dispute is believed to be settled, the temper of King Ferdinand's subjects, aroused by the terrible massacre in Kochana, has been strained to the breaking point, and it is not inconceivable that the Sofia Government will be forced to adopt measures which may very well have the gravest consequences to the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. The establishment of peace, therefore, has become a vital necessity, both to Italy and Turkey. It only remains to be added that the reassuring news of the past few days has coincided significantly with the momentous conversations that have taken place between M. Poincaré and MM. Kokovtzoff and Sazonoff..

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

JAPAN IN KOREA.

At the time of writing, Mr. F. A. McKenzie's letter to the Times of August 13, dealing with the trial of Christians in Korea, has passed unnoticed. With the Putamayo atrocities still fresh in the mind, it is, perhaps, asking too much of the public to extend their attention to the country that until yesterday was known as the Hermit Kingdom. And yet, were they to do so, they would discover that under the so-called beneficent rule of the Japanese, who, never weary of reminding the world that it is their mission to improve upon the civilisation of the West, terrible cruelties in the form of physical torture are being perpetrated on Korean subjects with the object of extracting confessions as to complicity in a crime they never even contemplated. The crime is supposed to be a plot to assassinate the Governor-General, Count Terauchi. But whether the men now under arrest are guilty or innocent, nothing can excuse the conduct of the authorities, who have resorted to those hideous practices of barbarity which China herself has abandoned for all time. The Tokyo Government will do well for the credit of the nation if they insist upon a thorough, and for once an impartial, investigation into the whole circumstances of this disgraceful affair; and they will earn the respect of the world if they see to it that to every official, high and low, who may prove to have been implicated in the atrocities is meted out the severest punishment permissible by law.

MOTORING

IT is becoming the fashion in certain quarters to question the utility of the patrol organisation of the A.A. & M.U., and one or two writers in the motor Press have made themselves conspicuous recently for their persistent criticisms of what they term the "liveried loafers" of the road. Perhaps the following record of the special services rendered to road users by the A.A. patrols during the holidays, in addition to their ordinary duties, will convince the critics that after all the much maligned "scouts" do something to justify their existence. From the reports received by the Secretary of the Association, it transpires that the patrols rendered first-aid services (every patrol has now to qualify in this department) to cyclists, pedestrians,

For That Tired Feeling!
Induced by trying to sell a second-hand car privately
CONSULT
McCURD MOTOR DEALER
McCurds, Ltd., Store Street, Tottenham Court Road, London.
UNDER THE SOLE CONTROL
W. A. McCURD
Telegrams: McCURDS, LONDON. Telephone: 2916 City.

"EVERY DROP LUBRICATES."
"Champion" Motor Oil
is the best for all types of Cars.
If not already using "Champion" send for trial tin to
S. BOWLEY & SON,
DISTILLERS OF BOWLEY'S MOTOR SPIRIT,
"Express" and "Bomo" Brands.
Wellington Works,
BATTERSEA, LONDON, S.W.
Established 1744.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

and motorists in over 40 cases. A dozen cars broke down beyond the possibility of road-side repair, and the patrols procured the necessary assistance for getting them towed or taken to garages.

In other cases of break-downs of cars and motor cycles, however, the patrols utilised their mechanical knowledge, and executed quick repairs, cleaned ignition plugs, dissembled choked carburettors, mended belts, remedied slipping clutches, adjusted valves, dealt with overheating troubles, etc.—in fact, rectified the many troubles to which every motorist is still constantly liable on the road, and which, while of comparatively little importance to the experienced driver, are to the novice almost as formidable as a complete break-down. No fewer than 140 motor cars and motor cycles were assisted in this manner. Tyre troubles, empty petrol tanks, and other minor causes of stoppages were also promptly remedied by the patrols. Over 100 punctured tyres were mended for members, and numerous cases of assistance in fixing spare wheels and detachable rims were recorded in the holiday reports sent in by the men.

All this was in addition to the rendering of ordinary services, such as answering inquiries regarding routes and places of interest, preventing collisions at cross roads, and the keeping of children out of the road at dangerous points. This record of services rendered during three days—a record which would doubtless have been considerably lengthened had not the bad weather kept many cars off the roads—will surprise those who seem to think that the patrols exist solely for the purpose of exposing police traps. As a matter of simple fact, the A.A. and M.U. is invaluable to the motorists of the country, and its wonderfully complete organisation is a tribute to the genius of its Secretary, Mr. Stenson Cooke, who from the beginning has been the guiding force of the Association. As for those of its 52,000 members who feel inclined to grumble at the benefits they receive in return for their modest annual subscription—well, perhaps it is enough to say that the Association could very well dispense with them.

By way of compensation for the run of really bad luck experienced by the Vauxhall cars in the Grand Prix of France race a notable series of successes is being chronicled to their credit in open competitions abroad—especially in Russia, where the reputation of the Vauxhall stands second to none. Advices recently to hand from the agent of Vauxhall Motors, Ltd., in Russia are to the effect that in the contest for the Tsar's Cup the 20 h.p. Vauxhall secured the following prizes:—first in the Kieff hill-climb; first in the Riga kilometre race; and the Tsar's prize—a very fine silver vase—in the Warsaw kilometre race. In addition, the driver of the car was awarded a gold medal by the Moscow Automobile Club for covering the whole distance without any mechanical trouble. These performances have enhanced the reputation gained by the Vauxhall last year in the great Russian reliability trial, when it travelled from Petersburg to Sebastopol without losing a single mark.

On the 10th inst., the British Petroleum Company created a good deal of surprise in motoring circles, both private and trade, by announcing a reduction in the price of their petrol, the retail price of "Shell" being reduced to 1s. 4d. and that of "Crown" to 1s. 3d. (from 1s. 6d. and 1s. 4d. respectively). These approximations to a reasonable price would be better than nothing, small as they are, if they could be obtained, but it would be interesting to know where they are in force. Since the 10th the writer has been unable to obtain "Shell" under 1s. 6d., or "Crown" under 1s. 5d. —an advance instead of a reduction, the retailers affirming that, far from being notified of any reduction, they have had to pay an increased price for "Crown" during the last few days, and the same price for "Shell." What the announcement of the British Petroleum Company means, therefore, it is difficult to say. In any case, little importance is to be attached to it. The fact is that during the last few weeks many motorists have deserted the lighter brands of spirit in favour of the heavier and slightly cheaper qualities —which some say are fully as good in every way— and the oil companies are finding that their stocks of the former are accumulating unduly. Hence the announced reduction, and the reducing of the difference in price to one penny per gallon instead of twopence. The Motor confidently anticipates that as soon as the stocks of "Shell" are eased and things have readjusted themselves up will go the prices again. As an illustration of the enormous and continuous increase in the consumption of motor spirit, it is worth while to record the import figures in July last, July, 1911, and July, 1910—namely, 12,000,000 galls., 6,000,000 galls., and 3,530,000 galls. respectively.

R. B. H.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE tone in the City continues good. There is now a fair amount of business, and brokers who had intended to go away for a holiday prefer to sit in their offices and make money. We have seldom had a busier August. Prices have not rushed up wildly, but they are wonderfully steady, and fortunately there are plenty of stale "bulls" who are glad to realise. A raging tearing boom would be the worst possible thing. Only the professionals make money out of such a boom, for the public seems quite incapable of selling. This is the British temperament. It is an excellent thing for a business-man to possess dogged determination, but such a quality is quite out of place in stock gambling. A queer combination of dash which looks like courage and caution which looks like cowardice is the only thing that pays on the Stock Exchange.

I think that we may safely buy almost anything to-day. The whole tone and tendency is upwards. The carry over was hardly worth considering, and in some securities a small "bear" account was disclosed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Munga Tobacco Plantation is the only issue that has dared to face the holiday period. Rhodesian Tobacco is gradually making a name for itself, but can only become profitable when capitalised on a moderate basis. As the acreage under cultivation is only 200 acres the purchase price seems to me exorbitant.

MONEY.—The money position is gradually becoming harder. This is in great measure due to the early crops. In Egypt the cotton crop will be at least three weeks earlier than usual, and all over Europe the period of harvest has been advanced. In the United States and Canada the crops are enormous, and will require big money to move them. These huge crops everywhere call for heavy financing. In Russia it is said that the wheat crop will be much above the average. We may pride ourselves on our manufactories, our mines, and our merchant business, but the wealth of the world depends upon agriculture. Everywhere crops are good; even in France, where last year's poor crop had a tremendous influence upon the whole political situation, the present crop is said to be up to the average, and the French will not require to import foodstuffs. We must look, therefore, for tight money in the autumn, and it will be accompanied by great prosperity.

CONSOLS.—British Government securities have been allowed to fall too low. They are now recovering. As I said last week, the fashion is changing, not rapidly, but imperceptibly. Consols will go back to 75 this year, and they will gradually appreciate. No one should be scared by silly newspaper talk and sacrifice sound securities at rubbish prices. Do not forget that Irish Land Stock is just as safe as Consols, and that it stands at an attractive price.

FOREIGNERS.—There has been very little business doing in Foreigners, but the price is hard. Paris is taking a holiday. Perus are a shade weaker, probably in consequence of the article that appeared in the Stockbroker. Tintos have improved; no one should be afraid of buying them, for the copper position is strong.

HOME RAILS.—The Home Railway market is strong and people now realise that they were very foolish to be scared out by the bad dividends. I do not say that the management of our English Railways is good, but I do say that there are no lines in the world that serve such densely populated districts, and it is certain that only very small economies would increase the dividends for the December half year. The Underground Electric report showed good results. The preliminary expenses have been rigorously written down, and the directors might easily have paid the full 6 per cent. on the income bonds had they been less conservative. I think the £10 shares cheap to-day.

YANKEES.—With good crops and a reasonable chance of a President who will not disturb the financial quarter, we look like getting an autumn boom in Yankee Rails. Chesapeakes are talked higher and Unions are very cheap. The copper position showed an increase in stocks, but as long as the copper kings of America can finance their copper we are not likely to get any fall in prices. Electrolytic remains hard at 17½ cents, and no notice whatever is taken of the fluctuations on the London market in Standard Copper. Amalgamated should be bought because Anaconda will increase its dividend at the September quarter.

RUBBER.—The Rubber market has been very firm, and almost all the shares have been marked up. It is clear that the public is willing to invest a small portion of its savings in rubber shares. I can only say that people will be very foolish if they are attracted by low-priced shares. I repeat what I have so often said before, that it is only safe to buy the best, and the best are not cheap.

OIL.—Oil has been almost as cheerful as rubber. Shells have been up to just under 5½, and Spies are quoted 26/3. There is likely to be a move in these shares shortly. Urals fluctuate round about 3, generally managing to keep over the figure. The Maikop properties are not doing particularly well just now, and the production is certainly not satisfactory. British Maikop showed a production of 613 tons, Maikop Spies 233 tons, and Maikop Victory 612 tons.

KAFFIRS.—A good many people appear to have taken their profits in the Kaffir market without waiting for the magnates to come in and support quotations. I think that these people are wrong, for I am convinced that a serious effort will be made to mark up prices within the next few weeks. Those who held good shares should average.

RHODESIANS.—Chartered have been put up to 30s., and the tale that the company will sell out at £2 is now believed by many members of the House. Next week a move will be made in Planets. This mine is distinctly rich, but very pockety, and does not appear to go down at depth. Those who got in at par when the company was floated should certainly take a profit when the market is made.

TIN.—The Tin market is fairly good, and as the returns come in so will the market improve. There is a tap on in Zaaiplaats, and in spite of the good returns and dividends that have been made by this company, the price continues to weaken. Anglo-Continentals have been bid for, probably by "bears" who wish to even up their books.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The Marconi market remains very weak, and it is evident that there are many "bulls" who are getting nervous, and want their money back. I look to see these shares down at £2 again before very long. Associated Cements have been a feature, and it is said that they are to be manipulated once again. The rise in P. and O. deferred, now 340, does not look like coming to an end, and Royal Mails are also talked much higher. The Waring and Gillow scheme frightened out a good many holders of debentures, and there was a heavy fall, but as I write the price shows signs of recovery. There has been also a demand for Egyptian shares.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

ANGLO-GERMAN RELATIONS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—It is evident from Mr. George F. Shee's letter, in your issue of August 3rd, that I have not made my views sufficiently clear. I trust you will not be deterred by Mr. Shee's disapproval of your thoughtless generosity from allowing me to make another attempt to do so.

As regards South America, I am in thorough agreement with Mr. Immo Allen in thinking that England has no interest whatever in the maintenance of the Monroe Doctrine. I think that our present policy of allowing Germany to believe that we should, if called upon by the United States, fight to prevent Germany from acquiring colonies in South America is as foolish as it is dangerous. I think that a declaration on our part to the effect that we do not mean to take such a course would go far towards bringing about better feeling between Germany and ourselves.

As regards Holland, I thoroughly agree with Lord Courtney that England would have no right of interference in the case of a friendly union between Holland and Germany. I doubt very much whether such a union would be against our interests. I am convinced that it would not, under any circumstances, be possible for England, standing alone, permanently to prevent such a union if the two countries concerned wished to enter into it. I think it is highly probable that, if the freedom of the Scheldt can be assured, French hostility to such a union would prove to be by no means insuperable. Therefore I think that our proper policy would be (1) to make it quite clear to Germany that if France does not object to such a union we shall not, and (2) to try to induce France and Belgium to see that, if the freedom of the Scheldt be secured they have more to gain by consenting to such a union than by opposing it. My opinions may be erroneous, but I hope I have made them sufficiently clear to satisfy the most captious critic.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

I venture to ask for yet a little more space in which to deal with Mr. McLeod's letter published in your issue of July 27th. The upshot of Mr. McLeod's arguments is, I regret to see, that war is inevitable. He speaks, it is true, of doing away with the apprehension felt by England "by being so strong as to make it impossible for Germany to attempt to coerce any concession." But does he really think it possible that we should ever develop such strength? The present population of Germany is, I believe, just about the same as the white population of our entire Empire. Germany's population is increasing far faster than ours: the already existing demands on the national resources are immeasurably greater in our case than in the case of Germany: what leads Mr. McLeod to think that we could ever, under any system, establish such superiority as to make it impossible for Germany to attempt to gain her end by force?

Mr. McLeod's other contention is almost as debatable as the one I have just dealt with. "Germany's great need" (which he sets forth with, in my opinion, perfect accuracy) "can only be satisfied at the cost of other nations. To concede to Germany what Germany wants, to assist Germany to become a great world Empire, would be tantamount to the betrayal of England."

Does not Mr. McLeod see that the whole question at issue is whether the satisfaction of Germany's great need would injure British interests in any way? If Germany were to buy or lease part of Brazil, it is surely obvious that the transaction would be of the greatest benefit to Brazil, to England, and especially to the United States. Who are the nations who would suffer by it? And on what grounds are we who would welcome such a transaction to be accused of approving of the betrayal of England? Are we expected to look on it as self-evident that English consent to the incorporation of Holland in the German Empire would injure British interests more than they are likely to be injured by a continuance of our present attitude? One would like to hear Mr. McLeod develop his thesis about the betrayal of England, and I beg of you, Sir, to give him whatever space he may require for the purpose. I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

T. G. MARTIN.

ROMANCE VERSUS REALITY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—If your paragraphist really wishes to understand the drift of my article on the above subject, he had better read it. He would then see that the concluding paragraph (of which he quotes half with one of those vague and unmeaning sniggers that so often do duty for criticism in these hurried times) is a simple attempt to summarize a certain amount of argument and reflection clearly elucidated in the preceding ten pages.

When, however, he ventures to advance from precept to example and roundly asserts (by way of showing me what I should have said) that "Romance and Reality are, of course, only interchangeable terms," and that they "envisage no antithesis," he is surely plunging headforemost into the very pit which he imagines himself to have digged, or found lying ready, for another. The phrase "envisage no antithesis" (brief as it is) appears to me nothing but long-winded nonsense, the "antithesis," whatever its nature, being a commonplace familiar to every mind and pervading all literature.

To observe that two such highly distinctive terms are merely "interchangeable" is not criticism of the matter, but a petulant refusal to recognise its existence. Why, then, do the two substantives exist? I do not suggest that anyone is bound to discuss the question, but if my reflections are unintelligible how can your critic know that he "would no doubt heartily agree with" them if they were not. He would reply perhaps that this is irony. I would urge that it is mere jaded and tasteless claptrap quite unworthy of the traditions to which THE ACADEMY weekly recalls our attention. I am, Sir, yours, etc.,

G. H. POWELL.

Bayswater, W.

THE COOPERS AND JOHN HOSKINS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Being engaged on an illustrated work dealing with the "incomparable Samuel Cooper" (acknowledged to be the greatest English miniature painter), his brother Alexander, and uncle John Hoskins, etc., I should be greatly obliged if owners of originals by these artists would very kindly favour me with particulars of authenticated examples in their possession, or known to them, with a view to the same being included in my lists. A full description with the provenance of the miniature, and, where practicable, a sight of the original, would be especially esteemed by

J. J. FOSTER,
Author of "Miniature Painters, British and Foreign," "The Stuarts in Art," etc.

Aldwick, Sutton, Surrey.

JONAS HANWAY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—It may be of some interest to your readers to recall the fact that the old burial ground of Hanwell Parish Church, which has lately been badly damaged by fire, contains the grave of Jonas Hanway, the philanthropist, famous as the man who first walked the streets of London with an umbrella over his head. But there is unfortunately no tombstone to mark his last resting-place, as I discovered when attempting to visit it a few years ago. Jonas Hanway, however, is honoured by a memorial tablet in Westminster Abbey. Yours very obediently,

ALGERNON ASHTON.

10, Holmdale Road, W. Hampstead, July 29.

BOOKS RECEIVED

MISCELLANEOUS.

Indoor Gardens. By T. W. Sanders, F.L.S. Illustrated. (London Agricultural and Horticultural Association. 1d.)

Hindle Wakes. A Play in Three Acts. By Stanley Houghton. (Sidgwick and Jackson. 1s. 6d. net.)

The First Signs of Insanity: Their Prevention and Treatment. By Bernard Hollander, M.D. (Stanley Paul and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

Makeshifts and Realities. Two Plays. By Gertrude Robins. (T. Werner Laurie. 6d.)

Home Rule, A Spiritual Need: An Open Letter to Sir Edward Carson and His Supporters. By "Tara." (Lynwood and Co. 2d.)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Spoof: A Little Book of Men and Other Things. Written by W. Burton Baldry. Illustrated by Alfred Leete. (John Ouseley. 1s. net.)

An Athenian Critic of Athenian Democracy. A Translation of the "De Republica Atheniensium." By Francis Brooks, M.A. (David Nutt. 1s. 6d. net.)

Catholic Studies in Social Reform.—III. The Housing Problem. Edited by Leslie A. St. L. Toke, B.A.—IV. The Church and Eugenics. By the Rev. Thomas J. Gerrard. (P. S. King and Son. 6d. net. each.)

The Conservative Party and the Future: A Programme for Tory Democracy. By Pierse Loftus. (Stephen Swift and Co. 1s. net.)

The Elizabethan Translations of Seneca's Tragedies. By E. M. Spearing. (W. Heffer and Sons, Cambridge. 2s. net.)

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS.

A History of the British Army. Vol. VII, 1809-1810. By the Hon. J. W. Fortescue. With Maps. (Macmillan and Co. 21s. net.)

Disestablished and Disendowed: The Fate of an Elderly Curate. By H. C. White, B.A. (John Ouseley. 5s. net.)

Die syrische Barbara-Legende. Mit einem Anhang: Die syrische Kosmas- und Damian-Legende in deutscher Uebersetzung. By Dr. Wilhelm Weyh. (Gust. Fock, Leipzig. 1 mark 50.)

Bayreuth and the Wagner Theatre. By Anna Bahr-Mildenburg and Hermann Bahr. Translated by T. W. Makepeace. (T. Fisher Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Poets' Chantry. By Katherine Brégy. Illustrated. (Herbert and Daniel.)

FICTION.

La Meilleure Part. By Emile Poiteau. (Bernard Grasset, Paris. 3 fr. 50 c.)

Lord and Lady Kitty. By L. T. Meade. (F. V. White and Co. 6s.)

The Parrot-Faced Man. By C. Ranger Gull. (F. V. White and Co. 6s.)

Mirabel's Island. By Louis Tracy. Illustrated. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)

Mighty Mayfair. By Coronet. (John Long. 1s. net.)

The Goodly Fellowship. By Rachel Capen Schauffler. (Macmillan and Co. 6s.)

Clara: Some Scattered Chapters in the Life of a Hussy. By A. Neil Lyons. (John Lane. 6s.)

Sunshine Sketches of a Little Town. By Stephen Leacock. With a Frontispiece in Colour by Cyrus Cuneo. (John Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

The Mystery Queen. By Fergus Hume. Illustrated. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)

The Street Called Straight. By the Author of "The Inner Shrine." (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

The Demon. By C. N. and A. M. Williamson. (Methuen and Co. 1s. net.)

Written in the Sand. By G. R. Duval. (W. J. Ham-Smith. 6s.)

Lonesome Land. By B. M. Bower. Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

The Confessions of Perpetua. By Alice M. Diehl. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

Neighbours of Mine. By R. Andom. Illustrated by L. Gunnis. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

The Pearl of the East. By M. T. Hainsselin. (Greening and Co. 6s.)

The White Rose: A Romance of Richard, Duke of York. By Auguste Maquet. Translated by Ernest Tristan. (Greening and Co. 6s.)

The Man with the Red Beard: A Story of Moscow and London. By David Whitelaw. (Greening and Co. 6d.)

VERSE.

Of the Valley and the Sea, and Other Verses. By Fanny Purdy Palmer. (Kegan Paul and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

Poems of Love and Earth. By John Drinkwater. (David Nutt.)

The Lover's Calendar. Compiled and Edited by Mrs. Havelock Ellis. (Kegan Paul and Co. 5s. net.)

The Titanic. By Robert Blake. (Arthur H. Stockwell. 1s. net.)

A Western Wakening. By Bligh Talbot-Crosbie. Second Edition, Revised, with Glossary. (Hodges, Figgis and Co., Dublin. 2s. 6d. net.)

Legends and Lays of the Wight. By Percy G. Stone. (Constable and Co. 5s. net.)

Hyacinthus. By W. E. Walkardine. (W. Heffer and Sons, Cambridge.)

Chinese Poems. Translated by Charles Budd. (Henry Frowde. 3s. 6d. net.)

Things by the Way: Some Rhymes of Chance and Circumstance. By B. A. Bruen Corkran. (Elliot Stock. 2s. 6d. net.)

EDUCATIONAL.

La Mare au Diable. By George Sand. Edited, with Notes, by F. Victor Massard. (Rivingtons. 1s. 6d.)

Bug-Jargal. By Victor Hugo. Edited, with Notes, by F. Victor Massard. (Rivingtons. 2s.)

English History from Original Sources, 1066-1216. By N. L. Frazer, M.A. Illustrated. (A. and C. Black. 2s. 6d.)

A First Book of General Geography. By B. C. Wallis, B.Sc., F.R.G.S. With Maps and Illustrations. (Macmillan and Co. 1s. 6d.)

Le Savetier des Fées. Adapted, with Questions and Vocabulary, by E. Magee. Illustrated. (Blackie and Son. 4d.)

The Rambler Nature Books:—Familar Friends at Home. By Margaret Cameron, L.L.A. Illustrated. Round About the Seashore. By Margaret Cameron, L.L.A. Illustrated. (Blackie and Son. 6d. each.)

THEOLOGY.

Joy in Suffering on the Redemptive Cross of Suffering. By C. B. Mayne. (The S.P.C.K. 1s.)

Creative Revelation: Four Lectures on the Miraculous Christ. By J. G. Simpson, D.D. (A. R. Mowbray and Co. 2s. net.)

Homely Thoughts on the Way of Development in the Light of Science and Religion. By John Coutts. (M. L. Hutchinson, Wood Green, N. 2d.)

The Gospel of Freedom. By Henry D. A. Major, M.A. (T. Fisher Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.)

PERIODICALS.

United Empire; Eighth Report of the Catholic Record Society; Deutsche Rundschau; St. George's Magazine; The Young Liberal; Bookseller; Literary Digest, N.Y.; The International and Review of Two Worlds, N.Y.; Publishers' Circular; London University Gazette; Tourist Magazine, N.Y.; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; Cambridge University Reporter; The Collegian, Calcutta; Revue Bleue; Book Review, N.Y.; Transactions of the Essex Archæological Society.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Twelve years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC
OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO . . AND THROUGH CANADA . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service via Vancouver.

For further particulars apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE
TO
SOUTH AND EAST AFRICA.
WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.
Via the SUEZ CANAL.
Calling at GIBRALTAR, MARSEILLES and NAPLES

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.
(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.
Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE
PLEASURE CRUISES
LIVERPOOL
to the
MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC
by the
"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"
. . . Ports of Call . . .
CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

P & O Passenger Services.
EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports.
(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)
Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises
Throughout the Year, according to Season.
AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.
Programme on Application.
For Passage, Freight and all information apply—
PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,
102, Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours.

R.M.S.P. PLEASURE CRUISES.

To	Fare	Length of Tour	Sailing	From
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £22.	Days 23.	Every Thursday Fortnight.	London.
THE AZORES.	£17†	19.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£12.	8 upwards.	Weekly.	Southampton & Liverpool.
WEST INDIES.	From £40.	From 34.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
NORWAY.	From £1 a day	13 upwards.	June to August.	Grimsby & Leith.
BALTIC & RUSSIA.	From £1 a day.	24.	August 24.	Grimsby.
MEDITERRANEAN, HOLY LAND & EGYPT.	From £1 a day.	10.	September to November.	Southampton & Marseilles.

†Including Hotel Accommodation.

For further particulars apply:—
THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY,
London: 18, Moorgate St., E.C., or 32, Cockspur St., S.W.

FEARLESS CRITICISM

In support of principle
In exposure of humbug
In scorn of cant

A Weekly Review of Politics, Art, Music, Literature, and the Stage.

THE COMMENTATOR

ONE PENNY WEEKLY of all Newsagents—or sent direct from the Publishers, for 6s. per annum (post free) or 3s. for six months.

COMMENTATOR, Ltd., 31, Essex St., London

Published for the Proprietor by Wm. Dawson and Sons, Limited, at Cannon House, Breams Buildings, London, E.C.
Branches in Canada: Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg; in South Africa: Capetown, Johannesburg, and Durban.
Printed by Bonner & Co., The Chancery Lane Press, Rolls Passage, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

CONTENTS

	PAGE
Notes of the Week	227
Sunset	228
The Boy and His Book ...	228
Massenet and His Operas ...	229
A Satiated Public	230
Reviews:
"Guarantism"	231
From Sail to Steam ...	233
The Geography of the Head	233
A Diary in Japan ...	234
Heralds of the Dawn ...	235
Aboriginals Indeed ...	236
A Difficult Question ...	236
Modern Problems... ...	237
War and the Law ...	237
Shorter Reviews	238
Fiction	240
Mr. Frohman's Triple Bill	242
Music	243
Lafecadio Hearn Appraised	245
Art and Imitation—II ...	246
The Stratford Shakespeare Festival	248
Some Tolstoyan Exhibits ...	249
Germans Abroad	249
Notes and News	250
Imperial and Foreign Affairs	250
Motoring	251
In the Temple of Mammon	252
Correspondence	253
Books Received	255

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C., where all communications to the Editor should be addressed.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Notes of the Week

AUTHORS who have made their name, whether as novelists or as contributors to responsible papers, are threatened with a rather serious annoyance if the trouble which has befallen Mr. Pett Ridge becomes at all common. It seems that a story in the "English Illustrated Magazine" for July, under his signature, was not written by him, but by some enterprising and unscrupulous person whose own manuscripts, no doubt, have been "declined with thanks," and who had the brilliant idea of sending in work under a false but well-known name. The editor, having corresponded with his contributor, cannot be blamed, and it seems that finger-print records, or at least specimens of the handwriting of noted authors, will have to be stored as a precaution in each office open to assault. The work of the literary forger is a peculiarly mean and contemptible form of fraud, a confession of incompetence in itself; by its very nature, however, it may on occasion be delightfully easy and a capital method of "earning" a living—until found out.

Since the Olympic Games took place at Stockholm, a few weeks ago, a more or less spasmodic attention has been given to the question of the muscular development of the young man of to-day, and it has been asked whether, both mentally and physically, he is keeping "up to standard." We have some splendid old men among us, still fully occupied and doing good work; are the young men likely to wear as well in the future years? An evening contemporary, obtaining the views of the veterans, quotes Lord Sherborne (who is over eighty) as saying that it is "only when the educator gets hold of the youths of the present day that physical deterioration begins," and that no fixed rules as regards habits or diet have aided him to his lengthy life. Lord Courtown, on the other hand, does not perceive any decay in the present generation, and attributes his long activity of eighty-nine years to "regular habits, thorough rest of mind and body on Sunday, and an inherited constitution." All these symposiums from experts in the art of life leave us much where we were—convinced that the victorious, specially trained athlete no more accurately represents the nation than does the anæmic, round-shouldered clerk; but that the best criterion is our unfailing devotion, in sun or rain, to those outdoor recreations which Englishmen must and will have, be they at home or abroad.

The melodrama written round some sensational event, such as a murder, a race-meeting, a rescue, seems not to appeal to the London theatre-goer as much as it used to years ago; in America, however, the production of "spine-thrillers" reaches a fine art. "Give me a good, thrilling news-story, a pair of patent-leather shoes, and some cigarettes for the villain, and a soft, blue flannel shirt for the hero, and I'll guarantee to turn the national spine into money," says an authority on the subject; and herein lies a mystery to us. Why should patent shoes and cigarettes be associated with villainy; and why is it demanded by the populace that the hero must wear a "soft, blue flannel shirt"? Again, why is the country lying between New York and Pittsburg in ecstasy over "The Fatal Wedding," while farther west the mildly sentimental is the only sure thing for the hungry box-office? It is the fashion to sneer at melodrama nowadays; but, after all, we may as well remember that most of the big "thrillers" of the last decade were adapted from newspaper columns, and had at least a foundation in real life; some of the "intellectual" plays of the present imitative vogue lose their grip by being pretentious pictures of a life that exists only in their authors' too vivid imagination.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Sunset

TEN thousand years ago, maybe,
The sense forlorn now fallen on me
Of alien light and of the wide
Indifferent calm of evening tide,
Troubled no less the soul of one
Who standing here at set of sun
Looked forth upon the day's decline
With grief as wild and strange as mine.

And haply with a selfsame sense
Another climbing long years hence
By well-known ways to this green height
While yet the west is filled with light,
Shall watch, forlorn of soul as I,
The streaming glories pass him by
And as the great sun disappears
Be moved, he knows not why, to tears.

W. G. HOLE.

The Boy and His Book

IT was the fashion, years ago (and may be now with many people, for all we know) to regard the average boy as a thoroughly practical, unimaginative little specimen of humanity, whose character the inner and secret life of thought and dreams had no part in forming. Such books as were written purposely for him presented him with a picture of himself in lurid colours as a person more than usually endowed with original sin, and set up for his example and hopeless imitation a mythical "good boy" who never overstepped the bounds of propriety in language, never soiled his clothes, gave his pennies to the gardener's sick child, and radiated good advice in the most annoying way on every available occasion. Too often these stories ruined their possible effect by sending the cherished infant into an early decline—perhaps to get rid of him. Later on came healthy school stories—those of the Rev. H. C. Adams, "The Cherrystones" and "The First of June" are instances—where, although the moral was very definitely pointed, it sometimes succeeded in really adorning the tale.

With R. M. Ballantyne and his period the situation changed rapidly. It became obvious that the boy possessed—surprising discovery!—imagination and fancy; that he was capable of projecting himself into the adventures of his heroes, of being a hero by virtue of exchanged identity; that he was of kin to the poet, inasmuch as he could live in a dream-world of his own. Ballantyne had an astonishing vogue; less astonishing, perhaps, when we remember that he had few competitors. In the 'eighties the boy's author had the field all to himself; or, rather, the spheres of his rivals were so definitely limited that he had no trouble in winning especial laurels and retaining them undisturbed. Kingston's sea stories made no intrusion upon Ballantyne's ground; Marryat's tales of adventure and Mayne Reid's more highly coloured fantasies held a place apart; Jules Verne, idolised by youngsters of a scientific turn of mind, had nothing to fear from any other writer—he was the only man in those days who could work out plausibly the idea of a projectile with human freight shot "From the Earth to the Moon," or the notion, then so wild, now becoming commonplace, of an airship, excellently named the "Clipper of the Clouds," that should travel long distances and ascend or descend at the will of its captain. These men knew the boy's mind to perfection; the "Boys' Own Paper" encouraged many of them, and did wonders in the way of providing healthy literature for that comparatively new phenomenon—the boy with a vivid imagination.

Then, alas! came the inevitable commercial exploitation of the increasing appetite for knowledge and adventure. Millions of boys must have millions of books: let us then commission a thousand writers to grind out detective stories, tales of blood and braggadocio; not because they or we understand the boy and love him, but because there's money in it. And let us, above all, make them cheap, so that the boy himself shall not wait to have them given to him at Christmas or to apply for them at the free library, but shall buy them with his own penny whenever he likes; and to secure that penny we will have pictures of feathered savages and pirates and muscular pale-face heroes on the front page. So reasoned the speculators; and soon into each little newspaper shop and tobacconist's crept insidiously rows of roughly printed stories, written in curious English, fiercely illustrated; stories of Cherokee Indians, by men who had never been farther abroad than Boulogne; of pirates, by men who would have curled up and died if they had met one; of terrible shooting affrays, by men who didn't know how to load a revolver; of daring rescues, by men who had hardly rescued a fly from a cup of tea. By men, in short, who had just learned the trick, were clever enough to know that the young readers would not be too critical, and wanted the money. Even the school story, so finely done by Talbot Baines Reed in the bygone years, was prostituted. And these men, or their successors, are writing to-day.

Fortunately there is now a large number of writers who realise the pity of this machine-made stuff, and who, watching the possibilities of the developing mind, set themselves definitely to counteract it by work which shall lack no qualities of excitement, but which shall be on a higher level and of a finer tone altogether; men who understand the Boy Scout movement, and who publish, not two stories a week, but one or two good books a year. They cannot compete with the flood; they cannot, unhappily, write penny stories for the errand-boy—who must have his catchy title and his tempting front page, since he also possesses a lively, hungry imagination; but they are taking, to some extent, the place once held by the honoured writers of the 'eighties, left vacant for so long.

WILFRID L. RANDELL.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Massenet and His Operas

ALTHOUGH the late Jules Emile Frédéric Massenet cannot—with all possible deference to each morning paper claiming the "largest circulation"—be described as a "great" composer, he will at least go down to posterity as an extremely popular one. Several of the machine-made operas following his fascinating and more or less skilfully characterised "Manon" are uninspired, and even common-place, while page upon page exploits the cloying Massenet musical idiom ad nauseam. But only ignorant persons (among whom are those who dub him "great") will deny a feeling for melody and atmosphere, and a certain grace, charm and sympathy which generally permeate his music. Indeed, had the prolific musician not been so fatally industrious, had he, in short, limited a life's output to, say, a dozen operas, instead of tempting fate with more than double that number, each might have equalled "Manon." Prolificacy, however, was in the composer's blood, for it was his misfortune to be one of twenty-one children.

Born at Montaud, near St. Etienne, May 12, 1842, in very humble circumstances, Massenet was intended for the priesthood, a calling upon which his parents had set their hearts. Judge, then, of their disappointment when the little Jules Emile Frédéric, throwing aside the assumed mask of obedience and docility, calmly announced that he felt his true vocation to be stage-music. "Mais c'est trop fort!" declared the parental Massenets, "le petit n'a que dix ans!" Eventually finding that the future Officer of the Legion of Honour and Member of the Académie had developed a will of his own, a year later they reluctantly consented to his entering the Paris Conservatoire. In 1863 the abnormally hard-working lad, who had supplemented a most meagre subsistence-allowance by playing the kettle-drums and the triangle at various theatres, carried off the Grand Prix—with a cantata entitled "David Rizzio." The next three years, as is customary with Grand Prix winners, were spent at the Villa Medici, Rome, in Hungary and in Germany, the student's mind also being enlarged by visits to innumerable places which are said to fan the sacred fire. Finally, the young man (who, in the meantime, had been foolish enough to marry on the proverbial twopence halfpenny) returned to Paris, ready to set the Seine on fire.

At this period in Massenet's career dark clouds loomed thickly ahead. Without private means or influential friends, and saddled with a dowerless wife, the improvident fellow endeavoured to make ends meet by giving piano-lessons and piano-recitals. He even took up his first instrument, the drum, obtaining an engagement under the conductor of the Porte-Saint-Martin Theatre—a sad come-down for an aspirant whose career at the Conservatoire had been so distinguished. Happily, at this juncture fortune smiled on the necessitous drummer; the management made it possible for his "Suite d'Orchestre" to be played at an important concert, and life began to be rose-coloured. Making useful friends, the ex-instrumentalist, who was then twenty-five, impressed the authorities of the Opéra Comique with the good qualities of "La Grand' Tante," his first essay in the field of opera, and it was accorded sixteen performances at the historic house.

During the next ten years he composed "Esméralda," which was neither printed nor performed; "Méduse," which also remained unpublished; "La Coupe du Roi de Thulé," which the composer thought fit to suppress; the popular "Don César de Bazan"; "L'Adorable Bel-Boul," also withdrawn from performance; "Bérengère et Anatole," which was played only in private; and "Le Roi de Lahore"—a work of considerable merit. Then came a well-advised four years' holiday, after which "Hérodiade," a singularly unsatisfying attempt, broke the silence, to be followed—in rapid succession—by the charming (and still greatly appreciated) "Manon" and the scarcely less successful "Le Cid." "Manon," by the way, was performed throughout the English provinces in the mid 'eighties, with Joseph Maas, Leslie Crotty and Marie Röze, a most distinguished trio; but a particularly inept and absurd vernacular adaptation helped to ruin the opera's chances of permanent success—a circumstance of which the composer, who did not know English, remained unaware till his dying day. Next, close (too close) upon each other's heels, came "Marie Magdeleine," originally an oratorio; "Esclarmonde," known as "Massenet's Wagnerian confession of faith," because in it he attempted to emulate Wagner's example; "Le Mage," founded on Marion Crawford's novel "Zoroaster"; the sombre "Werther," of which, curiously enough, the volatile French are inordinately fond; the salacious "Thaïs"; "Le Portrait de Manon," and "La Navarraise," a noisy, unmusical, and consequently, displeasing thing.

The monumentally dull "Sapho," the pretty, fanciful "Cendrillon," the very attractive "Grisélidis," and the unequal—but always sympathetic—"Jongleur de Notre-Dame," made their appearance between 1897 and 1902, thus attesting the diligent Massenet's marvellous capability for continuous application. "Chérubin," much of which is charmingly tuneful, "Ariane," "Thérèse," "Bacchus," with Catulle Mendès as librettist, "Roma" and "Don Quichotte"—an opera of very great merit and distinction—complete the list. "Don Quichotte," it is interesting to note, has had a succès fou throughout France, the most exacting critics, both professional and amateur, having loudly acclaimed a work which comes within measurable distance of being a masterpiece. When, however, London had the opportunity of making its very desirable acquaintance, unmusical dullards, vitiated by a long course of musical comedy, ballad concerts, and other inanities, neglected to avail themselves of the occasion.

Massenet, who had passed the allotted age of man by three months, was ever a captive to the wiles of 'witching women. Adoring and adored, the impressionable composer was so dominated by love that scarcely any other theme appealed to the musical side of his nature. The feminist of opera, most of his works are named after the heroine; and each resolves itself into a study of female temperament, the medium of expression often being of the sickly-sentimental, treacly description, and, consequently, inappropriate to the subject. Nor does Massenet's music exhibit many signs of progression, or even variety; the methods which he employed in 1867 served him in 1912, thus making for an unwelcome sameness, while the orchestration, except when its refreshing simplicity is justifiable, is frequently primitive to the verge of childishness. In both "La Grand' Tante" and "Roma," his first and last operas, this fault is apparent.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

It is doubtful if much of Massenet's work will endure "Manon" should certainly hold the Continental stage for years to come, and those of his operas which have been in the répertoire for some time will probably be given as long as the present generation of singers lasts. But it is difficult to conceive a similar compliment being extended to the others, especially as the composer's personal popularity and influence (which, alas! must die with him) were a potent factor in his artistic prosperity. Meanwhile, posterity should be eternally grateful to him for "Manon" and "Don Quichotte."

GEORGE CECIL.

A Satiated Public

THE station bookstall, even more than the bookseller's shop, presents a problem to which it offers no solution. To what end are these piles of rival magazines, in clashing colours, elbowing each other? Why should these many-hued weeklies, so sedulously punctual, and, for the most part, so amazingly inane; these endless "series" and "libraries" upon the shelves; these hundredweights of a fiction that is neither life nor romance, be produced at all? Of course the obvious answer is—for profit. But is that to be the end of it?

The public, the profit-provider, is not greatly interested in this imposing show. The public, indeed, appears a little bored. Round it is a clamouring army of book-makers, of magazine-makers, of series-makers, of short-cuts-to-knowledge-makers, each raising a terrific din about his wares, each crying, with passionate iteration, "Buy me: I am the best!" One sees the public as a patient flock of geese, or, if you like, a horde of children, not waiting to be fed, but having food thrust down their throats. Again one sees it as a bewildered giant, a Cyclops whose eye rolls distractedly in search of a point of rest. Or, again, it is a rich and simple innocent, open to the exploitation of every nostrum, whether of pills or print.

The leading fact that emerges from all this is the bewildered passivity of the public. It seems almost to have lost the power of individual selection. No longer has it to search for what it wants; it knows nothing of the joys of discovery. It has only to put out its hand, and immediately something is given, and it doesn't seem to mind much what it is. How can it, thus beset, and besought, and beguiled? It has no knowledge of the innumerable gentlemen sitting in numberless offices racking their brains for a "new idea" in periodicals, nor does it hear the click of thousands and thousands of typewriters and the drone of weary voices, dictating, dictating endless copy that it is devoutly hoped may "catch on." The public is there to be fooled, according to the code.

To try to prophesy where this multiplication of print—particularly illustrated periodical print—will finally lead us would be idle, but the immediate result is plain, and it is precisely this: that the average person who reads in the objectless spirit upon which this octopus of print lives is extraordinarily muddled—muddled not only about what he reads, but also about life. He loses perspective, proportion, and in time he will almost lose the power of consecutive thought. The mind adapts itself more readily to trivial things than to the things that matter; it becomes a kind of feeble Anarchist, plotting its own overthrow. That is the result of being crammed with "periodical literature."

Of the many "series" and "libraries" we can only speak with respect; they are admirable in themselves. We are assured by the publishers that they "bring true literature to the million"; that they "provide intellectual food for the rising generation"; that they "bring the greatest minds of the world into the home." Yes, we know all about that. We know that it is easy enough to "bring them into the home." We bring them tied up in a neat brown paper parcel, and feel infinitely proud and virtuous. There they are. But what happens to them then?

The classics cannot very well be assailed—there is no quarrel with them. But to read the classics, or any work that has thought behind it, a certain amount of detachment is necessary, and a good deal of concentration is indispensable. The actual and born student knows this by natural instinct, but the average reader, who is the average buyer, does not. The student, in all ages, has found his own way, series or no series, and he will continue to find it. But what does the buyer of these masterpieces make of his long rows of pretty books? Often they are on his shelves just because they are pretty books, and because most men like to be credited with that "tincture of letters" which is supposed to be like the final polish on lacquer work. An ordinarily intelligent man in most of the affairs of life recently devoted a month of evenings to a couple of volumes of Montaigne. He became more and more perplexed; he could make neither head nor tail of that inimitable pagan. But, more conscientious than some, he had bought Montaigne in a series, and meant to get his money's worth. Now what is there in Montaigne to puzzle a man who can concentrate, or half-concentrate, his mind? You may question Montaigne's philosophy, but there is no doubt about what he means. This man was incapable of concentration, he could grasp nothing but the "mean style" of which Aristotle speaks. He had the periodical habit.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Ask any intelligent examiner, and he will tell you that it is the same with most modern students of literature, the conscientious learners. What they lack is grip. They, too, cannot concentrate. They may be amused by a paradox, but they are bemused by a synthesis. Many of these minds lack neither alertness nor intelligence, but they are often lost when it comes to following the constructive processes of thought. They have read, indeed, but to what end? The finer fiction eludes them, though they will read, and quote with horrible appreciation, the rank banalities of the minor novelist. These are not clay in the hands of the potter; at best they are but as sand, taking the obliterative impressions of the moment. They are gorged with print. It is the disgorging process that is needed here.

No wise man complains of desultory reading; it may be termed the pick and shovel work that shall disclose the vein of gold, henceforth to be followed to a life's end. Turn a boy—or a girl, for that matter—into a library, and let him browse at will. And if it be a right library the table will not be encumbered with piles of periodicals. There will be room on it for the careful opening of tall folios, and there will be a smaller table, near the light, where the reader may take his fill of high romance. Twenty good books may make a library, and a thousand only a chaos.

The fact is that this patient public is glutted with printed matter. It does not know where to choose; and still the sellers cry and cry. Our age has evolved an almost incredible anomaly, a new vice. It is the vice of reading the casual, the foolish, the trivial, without knowing them to be casual, trivial, and foolish. And in the welter of it all stands, imperturbable, the figure of Irony, his lips a little awry, but with pity in his eyes.

REVIEWS

"Guarantism"

Modern Democracy: A Study in Tendencies. By BROUGHAM VILLIERS. (T. Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)

MR. F. J. SHAW has—the wrapper and title-page of the book here reviewed proclaim the fact—adopted the pseudonym of Brougham Villiers, possibly because Mr. F. J. Shaw is hardly likely to be thought of as the Mr. Shaw while Mr. G. B. Shaw is still in rivalry with him, and Brougham Villiers, having done what he could to educate his fellow-creatures by presenting them with a volume on "The Socialist Movement in England" and a volume on "The Opportunity of Liberalism," has now further contributed to their facilities for intellectual advancement by publishing a work on "Modern Democracy." Elderly readers who like to have the impressions of their early manhood recalled should read this record of the Villiers dispensation, for it revives omniscience. Of course omniscience has never been wholly extinct; Mr. H. G. Wells is omniscient; Mr. G. K. Chesterton is omniscient, and so in all geniality is Mr. Hilaire Belloc. But none of these has the full-flavoured omniscience that was the privilege of mid-Victorian economists and mid-Victorian editors of learnedly written weekly papers. That was an omniscience which so impressed itself and the devout beholders, moved so ponderously and seriously, contradicted itself from decade to decade with such sublime solemnity, and damned humane sentiment on the one side and common sense on the other so authoritatively that its audacity hypnotised the educated world of its day irresistibly. One cannot say that Brougham Villiers has reintroduced this glorious vintage, but there is the smack, the flavour, of it in his output.

His present object, besides correcting the mental operations of his fellow-men by means of his superiority, is to expound a new "ism." This is "guarantism." The word is not pretty, it has a mongrel look; but Fourier, not Brougham Villiers, is its begetter. And when we turn from the word to the thing signified we find that "guarantism" is a name for the vaguely Socialistic political tendencies represented by the more obscure members of the Labour party in the House of Commons. Fourier, we learn, "seems to have foreseen the coming of an age of universal insurance, in which, while the capitalist form of industry would remain intact, there would be an ever-growing, ever more elaborate organisation to guarantee all the members of society against the worst evils of poverty." In the opinion of Brougham Villiers, "This anticipation of the natural trend of things was a piece of marvellous insight" to the credit of Fourier. Perhaps so. But recognition of the forces making for "guarantism" is hardly "a piece of insight" with anything marvellous about it in the case of one who writes with experience of the Labour movement that led up to the unappreciated Minimum Wage Act.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

"Guarantism" is manifestly akin to the kind of Socialism which is called "revisionist," that is, to the milder sort of Socialism, which Mr. Ramsay MacDonald exemplifies. It is anathema to the full-blooded Socialist nurtured in the pristine doctrine of Marx. He denounces it with paroxysms of wrath and spasms of sorrow, believing that it will establish a contented "wage-slave" class in society, who will lick the hand that feeds them and refuse to bay for the social revolution. Perhaps if Brougham Villiers had merely described his book as an apology for the policy of the Labour Party—or borrowing a worse word than "guarantism"—a defence of Lib-Labism, he would hardly have commanded attention. "Guarantism" has its uses, and it is fair to Mr. F. J. Shaw to say that he has performed the difficult task of making a volume of 293 pages interesting in spite of the reiterated bombastic note and the tedium which is apt to attach to the topics of current politics when they are recapitulated in a book.

Brougham Villiers appears to have arrived at acquiescence in—it might be too much to say approval of—guarantism by a process of exhaustion. Everything else is so bad. Take the feudal system in its later development. "The average squire found his feudal duties a burden, and, though probably as conscientious as most men, tended to become more and more lax in fulfilling them. Without consciously shirking, it was easy, unless sharply reminded, to forget each feudal duty while remembering each feudal right." One may condescend to forgiveness of these landed gentry, but one cannot approve them. Then we must not expect too much from the persons of exceptional gifts—in the political sphere, at least. "People of genius or insight who 'see the end from the beginning,' however useful they may be in inspiring others, will have little influence on contemporary politics." The orthodox Liberalism of the laisses-faire period is extinct for all purposes of utility. "With the extension of the franchise to the working men in the towns and in the country, though the Liberal leaders seem not to have expected such a thing, all these ideas became at once hopelessly out of date." But while we recognise that "Liberalism has been driven by hard necessity further and further away from theoretic individualism," we must not assume that Henry George and Mr. Joseph Fels were born to set it right. "The propaganda of the Single Tax is a vigorous survival of old-fashioned Radicalism"—worthy of a favourable glance, but not what is wanted. Tariff Reform is a "cure-all," which must be condemned with bimetallism. In fact, "a return to Protection would be a vast disaster to us." And in this direction Brougham Villiers descries danger. "Declining trades, whatever the real cause of the decline, are apt to listen to the nonsense of the Tariff Reformer, even when 'the foreigner' has nothing whatever to do with the matter, for drowning men catch at straws."

Worse than the Tariff Reformers are the Imperialists. "The most important, menacing, and powerful of these sectional interests are those connected with the Army and Navy. Four or five per cent. of the total earnings of the British people are spent every year by the War Office and the Admiralty, and, in spite of the protests of common sense and of the friends of peace, the expenditure is rapidly rising." The Little Englander, conscious that he voices the protest of common sense and is the friend of peace—for he would be the last to keep the national house as a strong man armed—must not look with an admiring eye on the administration in which the backsliding Mr. J. M. Robertson now sits as a swashbuckler. In the matter of expenditure on preparation for war, "the present Liberal Government is one of the worst sinners, in spite of its promises before taking office."

There is a lesson to be learned from "the progress of Mr. John Burns from a revolutionary agitator to the Presidency of the Local Government Board." It is that "the man who enters politics will end—a politician." And the principle thus enunciated has a bearing on Syndicalism. "While the Syndicalists have correctly stated the tendency of political Socialism, it by no means follows that they have escaped the same dilemma. On the contrary, they have fled from the frying-pan into the fire." And it is in the fire that Mr. Tom Mann will copy the evolutions of Mr. John Burns. If Syndicalism is impaled on one horn or the other of a dilemma, it is in no worse case than ordinary Socialism, which, badly guided, has fallen into confusion of thought. We learn this from a consideration of the Clarion school. "Of all leading Socialists, Mr. Blatchford is the least capable of co-ordinating his ideas, and the least able to avoid glaring contradictions of thought."

It is a dreary political world that opens before our gaze. But is there no ray of warm, bright, and solacing sunshine? Yes. It slants upon us from the Budget of 1909. "Mr. Lloyd George's scheme carries us, as indeed any finance scheme, however drastic, could only do, a very little way on the road of social reconstruction, but it renders the problem much more simple than it was before," and "it formed an excellent framework on which the democracy of the future can build up virtually any system they like. If popular pressure is sufficiently strong and intelligent, there are provisions in it which, gradually extended, may completely reconstruct society, or rather aid it, in so far as national finance can do so, in reconstructing itself."

Due consideration of the train of thought to which this eulogy leads will enable us to discern the position now occupied by Brougham Villiers. "Instead of a 'class-conscious' proletarian movement embracing vast numbers of men and women who definitely aim at overthrowing the Capitalist system, we have a party, numbering hundreds of thousands, having nothing in common but the Guarantist determination to improve the immediate conditions of life. In close alliance with them are the I.L.P. and the Fabians, Socialists who see the end from the beginning. Guarantists, as well as Socialists, they acquire influence because of their Guarantism, and know how to use it because of their

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Socialism." Surely if Brougham Villiers became a candidate for admission to Parliament, Mr. Lloyd George would recommend Mr. F. J. Shaw to the constituency on which the light of his countenance shone so warmly when the Chancellor of the Exchequer once urged the claims of Mr. Lansbury, who has since shown such ingratitude about the Insurance Act.

A last glance at Mr. Shaw's volume will show us Brougham Villiers in his most sublime moment. "Mr. Chiozza Money," he writes, "Mr. Chiozza Money, whose services to the democracy I have already gladly acknowledged——" What need to continue the sentence to its end? A Guarantist who can patronise Mr. Chiozza Money in the name of the entire democracy has attained the full fruition of ambition in the sphere of the finite. He may deceive himself by thinking there is more to come. But the rest could only be anti-climax.

From Sail to Steam

My Life at Sea. By COMMANDER W. CAIUS CRUTCHLEY. Illustrated. (Chapman and Hall. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE passing of the sailing ship is a subject which has often been treated with a good deal of sentimentality. That event, as the chief engineer of the Breslau was aware, has not altogether meant the destruction of romance at sea; indeed, romance has rather risen a giant refreshed from the transformation. And, beautiful sight as the old sailing ship was, life on board her was apt to be anything but beautiful. Of the brutalities of that life Captain Crutchley had a considerable share. Irons and punitory starvation were matters not outside his experience, and the rope's end was a condiment which seasoned most of his apprentice days. As a result of the tyranny of an all-powerful skipper, he headed a revolt at Adelaide and made off down the coast. Happily this extreme remedy did not interfere much with his prospects—a circumstance which throws a strong light upon the sea life of the age. When the time came for him to say farewell to sail, he said it with regret, although he was fully alive to the march of events. "In the museum of the Royal United Service Institution" he says:—

> is to be seen a fully-rigged model of the old Cornwallis. Stand by the side of it and try to realise the exquisite skill that was necessary to rig that vessel, and then keep the masts in her through all the experiences that would befall. How, pitching in a head sea, every stay must bear its due proportion of strain, or something would go. Consider the friction and chafe that was constantly taking place with rope rigging, ... and then, if you know enough to realise what it meant, sneer if you will at the days of stick and string, but forgive those who look back with regret at what was the inevitable eclipse of a notable phase in a very noble calling.

Captain Crutchley rose to be master of one of the finest ships of the Union Steamship Company, for many years the successful rival of the Castle Line. In a period of retrenchment he exchanged reluctantly into the New Zealand Company, in whose service he for a long time commanded the finest and smartest steamship at that time sailing between London and the New Zealand ports.

Captain Crutchley writes as a man of action. He narrates without fervour; he is bald when he is not cold-blooded. He dwells little on the picturesque, and betrays slight enthusiasm even in alluding to his favourite harbours. He likes to indulge in little side-discussions of points of seamanship, which are too technical to be interesting to the unskilled. It is rather in spite of him than by his aid that one sees the variety and breadth of such a life as his; but the variety and breadth are there, the magnets which continue to draw so many able young men into one of the worst-paid and most laborious professions in the world. Although his life, as the sailor's life goes, has not been an adventurous or remarkable one, Captain Crutchley has known famous people and been a witness of interesting events, in describing or alluding to which he conveys a convincing portrait of himself as a courageous and resourceful man, no kid-glove skipper or sea sentimentalist, nor yet a hard man, but a mariner practical to his finger-tips, and extremely fond of his own way. His book can hardly be called an autobiography, for it tells us nothing of his private life, but it has the interest common to nearly all first-hand narratives, and is written in a vigorous and masculine style.

The Geography of the Head

The Brain Book and How to Read It. By H. C. DONOVAN. (Jarrold and Sons. 6s. net.)

As the title implies, Mr. Donovan has given his readers an exposition of phrenology in both theory and practice. Utilising the notebooks of his father, the late Dr. Donovan, the author has prepared a series of instructions which should enable the painstaking and interested student to set out on a tour of observation. Methods of manipulation of the human head are exhibited by means of numerous illustrations, but the volume seems to lack completeness, no chart being given by which the geography of the "bumps" may be studied. With this exception, Mr. Donovan has compiled a work which is thoroughly entertaining and instructive, both to the believer and to the agnostic. We do not suggest that we accept all the author's conclusions; in fact, at times, chiefly through enthusiasm for his subject, he indulges in confused thinking. "The proper study of mankind is man" seems to be interpreted by the author (who, by the way, misquotes Pope's line) to refer to the great need for the study of phrenology. Phrenology is not "the science of the mind": except to an individual who has neither the power of self-analysis nor candid friends, phrenology only supplies a sort of tu quoque. It may tell us how we differ from each other, but it never tells us why we differ. The practice of phrenology, too, is one which is open to abuse by the rogue and the charlatan.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Let us illustrate this confusion of thought. While he admits that "friendship is no guarantee of character," Mr. Donovan completely misstates the application of empirical physiognomy—that is, our ability to form opinions of character by facial observations. The ordinary man does not confuse physical beauty and mental beauty. A constituency does not elect an M.P. because of his face, but votes for its owner's party. An infelicitous marriage may be due to the worship of physical beauty or of the Almighty Dollar. If we have to add phrenology and physiognomy to eugenics, where shall we end? Again, the author, quoting Lord Abercrombie on friendship, says that his lordship falls into error through ignorance of phrenology. Who amongst us possesses absolute truth? We write what is in us. Mr. Donovan does not realise the eternal interlocking of cause and effect—the development of the "bump" of independence is not the cause of our independence: it may be the result thereof. When we have discovered the developed faculties, it is a long step to their satisfactory connection. For instance, Mr. Donovan analyses the character of Nora Helmer from "A Doll's House," and thereby illustrates the pitfalls of his subject. He says that Ibsen portrayed Nora as possessing undeveloped independence until the final act, where she kicks over the traces and renounces home and children. The author therefore concludes that the character is unnatural and impossible. We should rather say the early acts, in which we hear of Nora's cringing ways and forgery, exhibit that independence which "stoops to conquer." Her forgery to save her husband's life thoroughly proves this, and, in addition, shows the possession of secretiveness. Mr. Donovan also confuses electrical energy and electromotive force in one of his analogies.

In spite of these criticisms we must reiterate the interest with which we read this book. The duties of parents, the misdirection of the education of children, the assumption in our educational system that all children are of the same calibre, and the dangers of the Englishman's huge self-esteem, all give us food for thought.

A Diary in Japan

Fourteen Years of Diplomatic Life in Japan. Leaves from the Diary of Baroness Albert d'Anethan. With an Introduction by H. E. Baron Kato. Illustrated. (Stanley Paul and Co. 18s. net.)

The late Baron Albert d'Anethan represented the Belgian Government at the Court of Tokyo for over sixteen years, and in 1894 was appointed Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the King of the Belgians. During most of that time his wife, who is a sister of Sir Rider Haggard, kept a diary. The desire of her husband that she should publish these personal notes has resulted in the volume before us. No attempt has been made to convert the diary into "a literary production." It is simply a sketchy and unconventional account of her daily doings in Japan, together with a number of very superficial impressions of that country, and cannot, of course, be compared with Mrs. Hugh Fraser's notable book, "A Diplomatist's Wife in Japan." The Baroness does not deal with diplomacy, but is chiefly concerned in describing various social functions, is careful to name the distinguished people she happens to have on either side of her at various dinners, and busies herself in lightly discussing earthquakes, amateur theatricals, funerals, balls, receptions, her sensational but patriotic poetry, and numerous other subjects.

We are naturally diffident in attempting to criticise a lady's diary, but, after fully recognising her unconventional medium, we cannot help feeling regret that the Baroness, who has had so many unique opportunities of studying Japanese life, should have been content to write almost entirely from a pleasure-loving point of view. We should have expected from a fourteen-year-old diary a certain amount of material that should add considerably to our knowledge of Japan; but such is not the case, and more than once the lady's light, sketchy pages have irritated us by their vacuity, vain repetition, and their exasperating number of trivial and utterly useless details. There is no real discernment in this lengthy diary, no sympathetic understanding of the Japanese mind. The temples are quaint, the No dance is funny, and Fuji-yama is just a pretty mountain it is necessary to climb after the manner of an American globe-trotter.

On one occasion the Baroness went to the Imperial University, and was informed by Professor Milne that she might expect an earthquake that evening. On her return to the Legation she placed her most valuable Chinese vases and bowls on sofas. "I was quite disappointed," she writes, "and felt somehow as if I had been cheated when no earthquake took place." However, she was not to be permanently disappointed in the way of seismic disturbances, for about two months later she experienced a real Japanese earthquake. "It was certainly most alarming, and all the Japanese ran out of the Legation. E. rushed into our room, and the house shook terribly. A. (the Baron) got up, but, the ruling passion being strong in death, he promptly, but with the greatest sang-froid, filled his pyjama pockets with cigarettes, and, quietly lighting a match, he started smoking." Sang-froid and cigarettes often go together, but during subsequent earthquakes some of the inmates failed to emulate the Baron's presence of mind. The cook, when the Legation was rocking badly, always made a point of fainting and afterwards enjoying a good fit of hysterics. The Baroness writes:—

> I heard that during the big earthquake on the 20th a certain friend of ours was taking a bath. He made a hasty exit into the street, his only adornments being a high silk hat, a walking-stick, and an eye-glass!

The Baroness narrates an amusing conversation of her old Japanese maid Saku, who, upon being asked why she had divorced her husband, replied:—

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

> "Lady, he very bad man, he like young wife, he no like old wife, he love my adopted daughter, so I say, 'Take her and all her beautiful kimonos and obis and furniture which I gave wicked girl, take all my money and live with new wife,' but old wife she say, Sayonara (good-bye) and she finish with bad husband." "And now you are happy, Saku?" I asked. "Yes, now, I very happy with lady; but oh! my! I bad, bad time before. My husband very bad man, he spend much money on geisha girl, but"—this with a sigh of certain regret—"he very handsome gentleman."

Those who have no deep love for Japan, and those who would like to know that on a certain occasion "Princess Kan-in looked sweet, and wore a lovely eau-de-nil Liberty satin dress," or that the Empress "was dressed in a fabrication evidently straight from Paris, of lovely mauve broché satin, with a gilet of pale pink," will find much to interest them in this book. The only pages we have lingered over with real enjoyment are those depicting illustrations from Professor Conder's "The Floral Art of Japan."

Heralds of the Dawn

The Heralds of the Dawn. A Play by WILLIAM WATSON. (John Lane. 4s. 6d. net.)

IN all the course of Mr. Watson's books there is no hint that he would ever take to the writing of dramatic work. Indeed, he has, in one of his poems, declared his conception of the poet's task; and it does not accord very well with that intensity and force that one looks for in drama. He has rather avoided that force than sought it; and he has even seemed to make that avoidance into an artistic creed. And he has carried his method into the writing of this play, "The Heralds of the Dawn," with the result that we feel that, whatever else the play may be, it assuredly is not drama.

So little forceful is it that one wonders exactly what the title has to do with the play. The story and name of the prince, Hesperus, seem to indicate that it is he who shall usher in the dawn of the age to be; and there is some deliberate symbolism of a cedar tree, with whose life the life of the king is intervolved, to suggest the passing of the old estate of things. But these are not sufficient of themselves to bear up the responsibility of the title Mr. Watson has chosen. And, indeed, the whole structure of the play is deliberate, with more of the semblance of machinery than the sway of warm life. For example, in the first of the "eight scenes" that constitute the play, when Volmar, the General of Ideonia, who is returning from a brutal victory over an adjacent enemy, has gone into his tent, Abbo of the Woods, one of the vanquished enemy, comes on to the scene. There are none to guard the General; and inasmuch as Abbo declares his intention of killing him, there seems little reason why he should not do so. But as he "moves forward to cross the stream," "a loose stone slips from under his foot with a loud noise," and he "draws back into the thicket." Why this should be so transpires in Scene 5: for there Abbo again appears, and kills Volmar at the very moment of the king's celebration of his triumph.

In the end, at the trial of Abbo, the prince steps into the function of his defender. There it comes out that Abbo, in some old hunting escapade of the prince, saved his life—a fortunate fact that Hesperus recalls from the haunting familiarity of the man's face. The king will have nothing to do with it; but the prince wins the voice of the people (who a few days before had attempted to lynch Abbo), and so pursues his way in the teeth of the king's intention. Zoraya, a prophetess, bids him:—

> Lay down thy Kingship;
> Then shall a King succeed, who hath not yet
> Pledged him to cast out Mercy, but will rather > Beckon her to an almost equal seat
> Beside great Justice.

Thereupon the king breaks the seal of a ring that he has always worn, full of poison, and so makes an end.

> After this tangled life, death seems a thing
> Most excellently simple, he says; and, in spite of the simple beauty of the lines, one cannot but feel that that particular death is rather too simple a thing from the dramatist's point of view.

Apart from the fact that the play disappoints because it hints but never fulfils the title, it disappoints for a yet deeper reason. For it never gives us that conflict that one looks for in drama. The contention between the king and his son is only an artificial one, because the characters themselves are artificial. Vitality of characterisation is always a deeper matter in drama than the conflict demanded by philosophical thinkers of the theory of art; and for this reason, that it is almost impossible to conceive of a collection of vital characters without an implicit and explicit contention between them. It is therefore this characterisation that one demands of Mr. Watson, in common with all other intending dramatists; and from him one asks it in vain. Hesperus is at best rather an insipid young man, with moral intentions that belong to the stage rather than to warm blood. And his father is not a man at all, but a continued pose. When one turns to Venora, one wonders why she was introduced. She has no dramatic cause of being—unless it be part of a dramatic setting that Hesperus must needs have a betrothed. There is a hinted contrast between Politan and Parnenio, the two politicians: indeed, in themselves, had they been developed, they would almost have been sufficient to give an element of life to the play: but they are not developed, and the contrast remains no more than a hint.

But if "The Heralds of the Dawn" be not drama, it is at least marked by that skill of metrical balance that marks all Mr. Watson's verse. We imagine that he would probably regard this as the highest praise that could be accorded him. But it is our opinion that the time for this has passed, as the all-sufficiency of poetry. Poetry must find a new artistry. It will not be essentially different, we are firmly convinced, from that which has ruled in the past; but it will not be an obvious artistry. It will not be obvious until its inspiration has had time to find acceptance. That is to say, its technique will derive from its inspiration, forming part of it, and not, as in this play, be a thing apart, by itself, its own all-sufficiency. The result in "The Heralds of Dawn" is indisputable. For we may admire its skill, but we shall not have our imagination or blood stirred by it. Faults and stumblings are to be forgiven where the fire of inspiration burns hot; but perfection and skill are not so easily endured when the fires of inspiration are damped.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Aboriginals Indeed

The Mafulu Mountain People. By R. W. WILLIAMSON. Illustrated. (Macmillan and Co. 14s. net.)

AS a rule, there is a certain definite order in which the waves of civilisation advance on savage races; the hunter, or explorer with commercial interests of some sort, comes first, to be followed by the missionary, who in turn is followed by the trader—more often than not a Scotchman. At long last comes the anthropologist, to find the difficulties of his work increased tenfold by the change which has come over the aboriginals through contact with the various types of civilised men. Here, however, Mr. Williamson's only predecessors were the Mission Fathers of the Sacred Heart, and he was able to study a tribe ignorant alike of the decorative effects of empty cartridge cases and the sensations induced by indulgence in trade gin.

Wisely enough, as the author points out, the Mission Fathers have not attempted to induce these naked Mafulu to assume clothing, so colds and pneumonia are at present unknown, and infectious skin diseases make little headway, until short-sighted conventionality in the shape of some missionary of another sect shall start the trouble. A custom that civilisation will probably alter is that of the vengeance taken by a whole clan for injury done to any member of that clan. In this primitive tribe there is little law, and this clan-spirit apparently takes the place of judicial award and punishment. Civilisation, which usually teaches the savage that he lives at the expense of rather than for the benefit of his fellows, will probably destroy this fraternal feeling among the Mafulu when the trader arrives to increase the needs and decrease the means of the tribe.

These, however, are but opinions evoked by the way. After reading Mr. Williamson's volume, we own to being impressed by the quantity of data he has gathered concerning this people, by the immense amount of careful work and study of which his book bears evidence, and by the paucity of his conclusions. He has traced the Mafulu from infancy to the grave, collected details of primitive industries, arts, customs, feasts and fasts, marriage and burial ceremonies, food, and we had almost added raiment, but, as that has little, if any, existence among the Mafulu, we may add ornament. He has verified his researches by references to the Mission Fathers, to Dr. Seligmann, that pioneer of Melanesian anthropology, and others, and has gathered information of real value in the study of the most interesting of all animals. This information he has set down coldly, and precisely, not yielding to the temptation to warm to his subject and draw conclusions, but limiting himself to facts.

One of his very few conclusions is the possible negrito origin of these Mafulu people. It is no far cry from their home in British New Guinea to the lands peopled by negroid races, and the euphonic similarity in languages—the "babe" for "father," as an instance—lends a fictitious weight to the theory which the author rightly ignores. He advances his view of the tribe's possible origin tentatively—throughout the book he is careful never to exceed actual evidence in his statements. We cannot recommend this work to the sensation-seeking reader of travel records, for it is not a book for the casual reader, but a solid and valuable contribution to anthropological science.

A Difficult Question

Râma and Homer: An Argument that in the Indian Epics Homer found the Theme of his Two Great Poems. By ARTHUR LILLIE. Illustrated. (Kegan Paul and Co. 5s. net.)

THIS little book cannot be recommended: it is more confusing than illuminating, it carries no conviction, and it will repel possible students of Indian and Greek mythology. The author served in the Lucknow Regiment for some time, as he mentions the dramatic festivals which took place "once a year in the barrack square of my old Bengal regiment." His death, before the publication of his book, must mitigate criticism on his production, but it is impossible to overlook the carelessness of the posthumous editor who passed proofs containing such mistakes as Bumouf for Burnouf, Canbal for Caubul, Long for Lang, Trimulus for Tumulus, bhagala (paddy-bird) for bagula, and the Greek word hyperoön (which means an upper room), as if it were a "super-egg" from which Helen was born. The very title of the book, "Rama and Homer," is anomalous; it puts in juxtaposition the hero of one epic and the author of another: it would be equally absurd to write on "Akbar and Shakespeare," or "Columbus and Dante." It should, of course, have been called: "Valmiki and Homer." The "soldier-author" shows himself in various passages, and there is no harm in the use of military language if the facts are correct.

The main object of the work is said to be "an argument that in the Indian epics (the Mahabharata and the Ramayana) Homer found the theme of his two great poems. It may be said at once that the argument fails to satisfy, because the dates of the Indian and Greek epics respectively can only be stated approximately, and because the connection between the Indian and the Greek cannot be established. The statement that there are certain resemblances between the Indian and Greek epics does not prove the argument. The author had "a strong presumption that Homer must have seen the Ramayana of Valmiki": a Greek writer, on the other hand, believed that Homer had actually been translated into the language of India. Burnouf regarded the Greek epics as not original but derived from the banks of the Ganges. Monier Williams saw most obvious features of similarity or difference between the Indian and Greek epics, but his conclusion was that the Ramayana and the Iliad are quite independent of each other. (The Ramayana is generally regarded as the Indian Odyssey.) The author contests Max Muller's theories, those of Professor Jacobi, and Professor Webb's contention that the Ramayana first appeared as a Buddhist parable in 400 A.D., and that the Homeric incidents were subsequently added. He disputes "the theory of Oxford professors that the Homeric poems and the Eleusinian mysteries are immensly older than Sankhya philosophy," and he considers that "other parts of Professor Jebb's analysis seem to fade away." Where it is a question of authority it is hardly necessary, perhaps, to say that the illustrious scholars just mentioned are more likely to be trustworthy guides than the late Mr. Arthur Lillie. Ne sutor ultra crepidam. The whole subject is not particularly inviting, and the only verdict that can be given on the author's case must be "not proven." Some of his later chapters on "Animal Worship" and "A Pregnant Discovery" appear to be irrelevant to the argument. The editor would have done better to have consigned his friend's manuscript to—oblivion.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Modern Problems

Psychology and Crime. By THOMAS HOLMES. (J. M. Dent and Sons. 1s. net.)

"IT had been better for this man had he never been born." To most of the subjects of Mr. Holmes' book this text would surely apply; but as they are in the world, and a notable part thereof, the question is how best to prevent their being both a menace and an expense to the community at large.

We do not think it matters very much whether there is or is not a distinct criminal class. The fact remains that a large proportion of those who should take their share in working for the well-being of themselves and their country turn their efforts in the other direction. Criminals, as a whole, may be divided into two classes —accidental and intentional. With the former every practical sympathy should be shown, both by condoning their offences by the use of the Probation Act, which has proved of great service, especially amongst young offenders, or, in the event of their being sent to prison, by helping them on their discharge to start again. Much good work is done in this direction by the various discharged prisoners' aid societies, although their efforts and help are sometimes abused. The intentional or professional criminal should be kept under lock and key as much as possible, and made to work to a profitable end. Short sentences are worse than useless for this class.

Imprisonment for non-payment of a fine should also be eliminated as much as possible. To send a man or woman to prison for not paying a fine of, say, 5s., which he or she does not at the moment possess, is making a criminal at a very great present expense and trouble to the State, let alone the future. They should always be given time to pay.

Mr. Holmes makes a great point of persons being treated as criminals who are epileptic, kleptomaniacs, etc., but his suggestion of a classification prison, or rather home, to which sentenced persons of these and other classes should be sent in the first instance, would be very expensive to carry into practice and to maintain. It might be possible to certify epileptics as such on their first imprisonment, and to do with them as such thereafter. The cases where hardship is wrought are not so numerous as one might imagine; some of them might easily be prevented, at all events in the upper classes, by greater care being taken by those cognisant of the weakness. The State has much to do already, and financial burdens on taxpayers are daily increasing, so that every side of the question must be considered.

In any case, Mr. Holmes has added to the knowledge of a subject which is becoming more interesting on every ground, and his opportunities have given him the right to speak with an authority which many writers of similar literature have not possessed. He has for twenty-five years been at work on the subject, and as secretary of the Howard Association has had unusual facilities for investigation.

War and the Law

War and the Private Citizen: Studies in International Law. By A. PEARCE HIGGINS, M.A., LL.D. With an Introductory Note by the Right Honourable ARTHUR COHEN, K.C. (P. S. King and Son. 5s. net.)

THE writer of the introductory note to these studies pays a striking tribute to the ability and impartiality of their author, and a perusal of this small volume alone should enable one not acquainted with the author's other contributions to the study of international law to appreciate the fact that such tribute is well earned. That war is still possible—nay, probable—between civilised States is an unfortunate truth rightly insisted upon in the opening pages. The author then proceeds to explain the manner in which private citizens are affected by war and the laws of war, and thereafter deals with the vexed problems of hospital ships, naval war-correspondents, the conversion of merchant vessels into ships of war, and the question of neutrals and closed trade. In the chapter intituled "The Laws of War" we are shown the fallacy of the popular saying, "All's fair in love and war."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

With regard to the question discussed in Section III of the same chapter, readers of General Sir F. Maurice's "Hostilities without Declaration of War" will remember that in a period of 171 years—namely, from 1700 to 1870—107 wars were "commenced by the subjects of European Powers or of the United States against other Powers without declaration of war." The commencement of the Russo-Japanese War, therefore, did not present any startling innovation. We fully agree with the author when he laments that, by reason of the fact that no European Power, with the exception of Great Britain and Austria, signed the declaration agreed to at the Hague Conference in 1907, prohibiting the discharge of projectiles and explosives from balloons and airships, an opportunity was lost of "making a beginning in the limitation of military budgets." We also notice with approval the sarcastic allusion to "the objection by fashionable watering-places that military manœuvres interfere with summer visitors."

In the chapter upon hospital ships is discussed the problem: "Does a hospital ship lose her immunities if she is used for the carriage of crews and passengers in good health, taken from enemy or neutral ships destroyed by a belligerent?" And in the next chapter the author deals with the highly difficult and interesting question of what restrictions should be placed upon naval war-correspondents in time of war by sea. In the concluding chapter upon neutrals and closed trade Dr. Higgins arrives at the conclusion, which appears to be the only reasonable one, that the rule of 1756, the gist of which was that the intervention of a neutral for the commercial benefit of a belligerent was as inconsistent with neutrality as it would be to help him with men or arms, should be adopted as a generally accepted international legal doctrine.

Shorter Reviews

La Chronique de l'An 1911, qui contient le Récit des Négociations officielles et des Négociations secrètes à propos du Maroc et du Congo. By MERMEIX. (Bernard Grasset, Paris. 3 fr. 50 c.)

THE publishers assure us on the fly-leaf that, if this "Chronique" meets with any success, it will become an annual institution. We should be disposed to prognosticate a very complete success for a really sensational, and apparently authoritative, account of the Morocco negotiations. What is at first sight rather baffling is the assumption that every year will bring forth some incident of the same calibre as the "coup d'Agadir." M. Mermeix does not neglect the other events, but Morocco monopolises nearly three-quarters of the present volume. There is a good deal to be said for the method, provided that the superlative event of the year is always as obvious as it was in 1911.

M. Mermeix gives us all the sensations that we are entitled to expect from a book of Secret History. He makes out a very good case for the policy that was not adopted at Agadir—the sending of a French ship to counter the German move. He gives us to understand that Brazza, the founder of the French Congo, regarded his conquest as a mere hostage for the eventual annexation of Morocco. The German Foreign Secretary is represented as having been very sensitive about the frequent recurrence in French newspapers of the word "marchandage," as applied to the summer negotiations. We are given the text of the famous telegram that added a domestic brawl to the diplomatic troubles of the French: "On désire que ces propositions ne soient pas communiquées à M. Cambon." The French Ambassador is credited with a very good retort to Herr von Kiderlen-Waechter. The German statesman had remarked:—

"Eh bien! mon cher ambassadeur, ou a donc, de Paris, appelé à l'aide le grand frère anglais."

M. Cambon's reply was:—

"C'est ce que, mon cher ministre, vous faites depuis trente ans que vous appelez au secours contre nous vos deux petites sœurs."

We must indicate one grave defect in this narrative. There is no allusion to the meteorological conditions. The Franco-German détente of 1911 can only be properly understood by continual reference to the thermometric and barometric charts of that year.

Sunshine Sketches of a Little Town. By STEPHEN LEACOCK (John Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

As Mr. Charles Lee's "Our Little Town" appealed to all Cornishmen so Professor Leacock's "Sunshine Sketches of a Little Town" must be hailed with great delight by all Canadians; and the charm of both books is such that as the popularity of "Our Little Town" extended far beyond the duchy about which it was immediately concerned so "Sunshine Sketches of a Little Town" will surely reach a public far away from the little hamlet on the banks of Lake Wissanotti. Mariposa—the town referred to—> is not a real town. On the contrary, it is about seventy or eighty of them. You may find them all the way from Lake Superior to the Sea, with the same square streets and the same maple trees and the same churches and hotels, and everywhere the sunshine of the land of hope. Similarly, the Reverend Mr. Drone is not one person, but about eight or ten. To make him I clapped the gaiters of one ecclesiastic round the legs of another, added the sermons of a third and the character of a fourth. . . . As for Mr. Smith, with his two hundred and eighty pounds, his hoarse voice, his loud check suit, his diamonds, the roughness of his address and the goodness of his heart—all of this is known by everybody to be a necessary and universal adjunct of the hotel business.

These are by no means the only persons dealt with in the book. There is Jefferson Thorpe, the speculative barber, whose savings were all lost in "Cuban Renovated"; the passengers on board the "Mariposa Belle"—a rickety excursion steamer, periodically given to sinking on the reeds and mud as far as the lower deck, unless the cracks between the timbers had had their weekly attention and been filled up with cotton waste; the lifeboat crew who come to the rescue, but whose boat lets water at every seam until it is only by pulling their hardest that they manage to reach the distressed vessel and be hauled aboard just before their own leaky boat sinks under them. These and many other characters help to form one of the best and most enjoyable series of sketches that we have read for some time. In his introduction Professor Leacock tells us that the writing of them is "an arduous contrivance." If this be so there is no hint of them being laboured; they are all bright and sparkling, and bristle with wit and humour. Occasionally there is a slight leaning towards the pathetic, but our author does not pursue that phase and at once glides off again into the realms of laughter. He thoroughly understands the people about whom he writes and he has the story-teller's art; hence in "Sunshine Sketches of a Little Town" we have a book both interesting and entertaining.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

With Dante in Modern Florence. By MARY E. LACY. Illustrated. (John Murray. 6s. net.)

MISS LACY has rendered a great service to lovers of Dante by the publication of this excellent volume, and it will take a prominent place among the copious literature devoted to this inexhaustible subject. She has succeeded in revealing the Florence of six centuries ago. Not only do we see the City of Flowers when the poet walked through her streets, but the writer has very cleverly and very suggestively given us an account of Dante's life and work. Miss Lacy writes: "The object of this little book is to help the reader to reconstruct as far as may be the Florence of Dante, and to gather together whatever is still left in the city that will serve to throw light either on the 'Divina Commedia' or on the history of the author." Manuscripts relating to Dante and his work are unfortunately scattered all over Florence, and Miss Lacy suggests that these treasures might with advantage be housed in the Casa di Dante, and so form "a regular museum." Much has been written against Gemma, Dante's wife, and no doubt some of the adverse criticism is well deserved. She may not have been a lovable woman, but she was, nevertheless, fully aware of her husband's genius, and it was due to her forethought that she was able to preserve the first seven cantos of the "Divine Comedy." When Dante received the precious manuscript, he exclaimed: "The restoration of my greatest work and the return of my honour for many centuries."

We are never tired of reading about Dante's love of Beatrice, for it is without a doubt the greatest love story in the world. Other women have influenced great poets in their work, have been the cause of masterpieces inspired by human love; but Beatrice stands side by side with the Madonna, a radiant being who quickened Dante's love into the divinely sublime. If the cynic is right when he says that marriage leads to disillusionment, then we are glad that Dante never married Beatrice, for had he wedded that crimson-robed maiden we should never have had the "Divina Commedia." His exquisite love stands out in sharp contrast against that dark background of unbridled passion depicted by Boccaccio. The death of Beatrice was the end of youthful romance, but it unlocked a sacred door; it revealed the great Vision. Miss Lacy writes: "The devotion he had felt on earth was about to be transfigured and spiritualised on the other side of the veil, and the same gracious figure that had saluted him in Florence would then come to meet him serene and radiant amid the glories of the Triumph of the Church, with those divine words on her lips: 'I, even I, am Beatrice.'"

Geschichte der Freien Stadt Frankfurt, A.M. (Vol. II—1814-1866). By RICHARD SCHWEMER. (Joseph Baer, Frankfurt. 12 m.)

THIS is the second instalment of a monumental work. A period of less than twenty years forms the subject of the 720 pages, but we are not in the least disposed to accuse the author of prolixity. It is an official work, being published under the auspices of the Frankfort Historical Commission; but, except in the matter of diplomatic history, which is dealt with in rather overconscientious fashion, it bears the impress of the scholarly historian rather than that of the able archivist. The period is an inspiring one; ideals were alive, and held up their heads unashamed. The ideal that the free city of Frankfort represented belongs to history rather than to actuality, but it was a noble ideal, and was nobly voiced—by the artist-statesman Thomas, for instance. The conception beloved by the old-fashioned Frankforter was that of the City-State, not very far removed in form from the politics of classical Greece and mediæval Italy. This conception was in less than half-sympathy with German nationalism, and in sharp opposition to the imperial survivals of Austria and the imperial aspirations of Prussia. The latter called forth the strongest protest, and the struggle with the Zollverein is the salient event of the period.

Frankfort must at times have appeared to German eyes as very near to a traitor, especially by her attempts to enter into a commercial alliance with England. But the Free City was old, and Germany was scarcely born. Frankfort, not Austria, was the true opponent of the German Empire. A problematical common gain must have seemed to the most prosperous city in the land an indifferent substitute for her undoubted individual success. The new times were uncertain: "Europa leidet an unheilbarer Altersschwäche," was the theory of one of the great traditionalists. But the new times had taken hold within the walls of Frankfort—the societies, the newspapers, the riots, the changed position of the Jews are evidences—and it is really to the swan-song of the old Free City that Herr Schwemer bids us listen.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Philippe II, Roi d'Espagne: Etude sur sa Vie et son Caractère. By CHARLES BRATLI. With a Preface by COMTE BAGUENAULT DE PUCHESSE. (Honoré Champion, Paris. 7 fr. 50 c.)

IN one aspect this is merely the introduction to a complete history of Philip II and his times, which it may be hoped that M. Bratli will one day set himself to achieve. The store of material, notes, bibliography, and so forth, that furnish the appendices of the present work, supports almost too easily the 120 pages of critical history that constitute the main body of the volume. From another point of view it is a good essay in rehabilitation, which is one of the historical manifestations of our modern levelling tendencies. So many of the verdicts of history have recently been reversed that it is unsafe to despair of anyone. The severity or mauvaise foi of the first judges is one of the best weapons in the hands of the defence; it is thus that Richard III, Tiberius, and Catilius have had a new lease of reputation. Philip II has suffered severely at the hands of the historians—particularly the Protestant historians, who always command the majority—and, though he has received some reparation in the recent works of Colonel Martin Hume, there are still many pleas to be urged in his favour. M. Bratli is a very fair and effective advocate; he has striven to see the history of Europe exclusively through the eyes of the Catholic king. He has laid many malignant slanders to rest, and has an explanation even for the difficult matter of the death of Don Carlos. He shows that Philip was actuated by no blind religiosity, but was as severe for the unworthy representatives of orthodoxy as for the heretics themselves, besides being free of all extraneous superstition. He was a magnificent administrator, if rather too ubiquitous, and he was devoid of personal cruelty. His merits as a patron of art are unquestionable, but, in view of many historical parallels, we think they should not receive too much consideration in the balance-sheet of his reign.

Fiction

Treasure Hunting

The Big Fish. By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

The Web of the Golden Spider. By FREDERICK ORIN BARTLETT. Illustrated. (Frank Palmer. 6s.)

Marooned in the South Seas: A Tale of Adventure for Boys and Others. By F. L. LANGDALE. Illustrated. (Murray and Evenden. 2s. 6d. net.)

THE search for buried treasure has always been a favourite theme with writers of adventure stories, and the three books before us show that the subject is still as popular as ever with such authors and their readers.

In "The Big Fish," Mr. H. B. Marriott Watson takes us to the mountains of Peru in search of the buried treasure of the Incas. There are several parties after it, and their adventures are exciting enough, though need occasionally the proverbial grain of salt to aid in their digestion by the hypercritical. Yet, so long as there is a fair amount of verisimilitude in narratives of this description, we should fain be satisfied; and it may at once be admitted that Mr. Watson's volume makes exciting reading.

When the oppressed Incas were flying from the Spaniards they took with them all their possessions, including the royal treasure reputed to be of untold value. Finding themselves hard pressed, they buried a part of this treasure in the mountains, and tradition gave it the name of "The Little Fish"; but the great bulk of their wealth they carried farther afield, and succeeded in hiding it before they were scattered to the winds. "The Little Fish" was discovered some time in the eighteenth century, and made the finders millionaires; but the far greater treasure, "The Big Fish," was still safely hidden when Mr. Watson sent his several expeditions after it. Whether it was ever discovered is for our readers to find out for themselves by reading from start to finish this record of stirring adventure.

The story is told by John Poindexter, who is one of the seekers; and he tells it very well, were it not that he has a constant habit of saying or doing something or other "dryly." Such expressions as "I said dryly," "I added dryly," "I answered dryly," "I asked dryly," occur so frequently that they grate upon one's nerves; and to add to the torment there is a "cleft stick" in which one of the seekers after another is more than once being metaphorically held. But when one of Mr. Watson's villains "shook his head with his smile" (p. 26), we jumped at the chance of getting a bit of our own back, and promptly shook our smile with our head, which seems an easier and more natural thing to do.

Mr. Bartlett's story bears some resemblance to Mr. Watson's, inasmuch as his hidden treasure is also buried in the mountains of South America, and the volume teems with adventures as extraordinary, not to say improbable. The objective of this particular expedition is Guadiva, a small lake located in the extinct volcanic cone of Mt. Veneza, beyond the upper Cordilleras, which, according to tradition, is the hiding-place of a supposed vast treasure concealed by the Chibcas that it might escape the greedy hands of Quesada, one of the Spanish conquistadors. He unsuccessfully sought to drain the lake, and after him Raleigh, Drake, and Leigh also failed in their quest of the Sun God's treasure, valued at quite half a billion dollars in gold and precious stones scattered about his altar beneath the waters. David Wilson and Jonathan Stubbs were more fortunate, and after thrilling experiences secured a goodly portion of the hoard; the remainder now lies buried under a fallen mountain, awaiting other adventurous spirits with the lust of gold upon them.

The author is thoroughly up-to-date in his story, which opens with a crystal-gazer, not a professional

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

one, in Boston, Mass., "the hub of the solar system," whence naturally anything connected with the Sun God should emanate; and before we are taken to the mysterious lake, which does not really hold the treasure, it having been removed elsewhere centuries ago, we are made to witness a miniature South American revolution. How the treasure is ultimately discovered is an exciting piece of reading, and the description of it and the way the major portion is lost is graphically told, and shows that Mr. Bartlett has the gift of imagination. He is also, apparently, a firm believer in the efficacy of brandy; for there are many cracked skulls in the course of the story, but each victim invariably comes round immediately "after a good swig" of the fiery spirit. The events taking place under the auspices of the Monroe Doctrine, such Yankeeisms as "She threw off her dripping waist" and "You needn't feel obliged to 'fess up to me" are, we suppose, allowable. The illustrations are good, though the one facing page 46 does not agree with the frontispiece as it should do, the girl's costume being quite different.

"Marooned in the South Seas" takes us to a different part of the world, though not so very far off either, the scene being laid in the tropical regions of the South Pacific, about the middle of the eighteenth century. It introduces us to a mutiny on board a merchantman, to piratical craft, with a blood-curdling description of the walking of the plank, to buried treasure on an uninhabited island, to South Sea cannibals and their ways of cooking "long pig," and many other matters too numerous to mention. It is an instructive book also, and will prove acceptable reading to lads of an inquiring mind. The illustrations will make the volume more attractive, and atone in part, we hope, for the unusual number of printer's errors which disfigure the text. In these three works the love element is not wanting; there are charming girls in each, who will help their lovers to forget the horrors they have passed through.

The Courts of the Angels. By JUSTUS M. FORMAN. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)

MR. FORMAN hardly does himself justice in his latest tale of artistic life in Paris. An irritating feature of the book, which is almost unpardonable in a writer of the author's experience, is the constant repetition of French phrases, or rather phrases in French, which would just as easily have been rendered in English. Surely the "Merry month of May" from English lips sounds better than "le joli moi de mai," nor is there a claim to any thing idiomatic in the French rendering of "it is not so bad as all that." We are quite willing to take Mr. Forman's knowledge of French for granted, but when he writes a book in English he would do well to keep to English, unless compelled to fall back upon French for an expression for which there is no exact equivalent in his native tongue. Saint-Cère, the copyist of Morma Lisa, is a splendid character, just a little perhaps overdrawn. Even his absorbing passion for Anina Radonur, who turns out to be a very great personage, is curbed by an almost superhuman sense of duty. After that we are not surprised to meet a rich American lady with Bohemian tendencies, who assumes poverty to secure her Andy, the teller of the tale, though he, too, nearly throws away their mutual happiness because of the superfluity of dollars. We are asked to believe that upon Anina coming to her own, her turbulent countrymen are content to allow at least three aliens to assume the leading posts in her government, but while probably Moravia is a law unto herself among the Balkan States, the British Foreign Office is not in the habit of giving official recognition to their own countrymen who may wish to represent foreign Powers at St. James'.

The Temple of Dreams. By PAUL BO'LD. (W. J. Ham-Smith. 6s.)

TO adopt a slightly vulgar but exceedingly expressive phrase, this story is a little too thin. An English archæologist, visiting Peru, stumbles on the last living representatives of an ancient royal race, these two being an old man and his inevitable daughter. Of course, the archæologist marries the daughter, for they always do that; before this comes to pass, though, the old man puts his future son-in-law to sleep, and makes him dream of the fall of the ancient civilisation, which occurred at a point contemporary with the beginning of the Christian era. The king of that period tries to alter his court and country to Christian principles, and suffers Christ's fate even to crucifixion during an earthquake. Then the archæologist wakes up, and we are treated to the rather worn and ancient trick of reincarnated affinities.

The author has the gift of accomplishing sound and realistic descriptive work, and, from the way in which he has handled these unconvincing characters, could tell a good story if his heart were in his work. It is to be hoped that, if he ventures again into a publisher's fiction list, he will drop these threadbare trappings which mar his work, get down to realities, and give us a sound story. He has the capacity for this, though in this very unsubstantial "temple of dreams" he has done his best to subdue his capacity and dress up the oldest and greatest story of the Christian era in unfamiliar and belittling attire.

Mightier than the Sword. By ALPHONSE COURLANDER. (T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

FLEET STREET, that land of mystery to the ordinary man, has figured in many novels, and the endeavour to import a species of romance into the clanging of the insatiable machines and the hard routine of the offices has not always been successful. It succeeded in "The Street of Adventure" admirably; it succeeds to a less extent in the book before us. The story of young Humphrey Quain, of his apprenticeship to the business of reporting on a country newspaper, and of his progress under the mixed influences of The Day, the great London daily which absorbed his life and finally sent him to his death, is well told and rings true. His two love affairs form a less satisfactory feature of the book; we hardly feel convinced by the placid and rather nerveless Elizabeth Carr, and the little typist to whom Humphrey gave his devotion when he was scarcely emerging from the stage of calf-love, although more real to the reader, would surely have fallen short of the ideal long before any question of marriage had arisen. With these reservations, "Mightier than the Sword" is a capital novel; it conveys to perfection the charm and the dread of work in the heart of newspaper-land, and the company of reporters, as we well know, are quite representative and not overdrawn.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Mr. Frohman's Triple Bill

THE commissioning of Sir Arthur Pinero, Mr. Barrie, and Mr. Shaw to write a one-act play each for presentation in a triple bill is a well-calculated proceeding on the part of Mr. Frohman. In the light of the latter's short-lived Repertory Theatre it is of particular interest to the general public. There is humour, too, in this cautious reassumption of the rôle of pioneer after a well marked period of reflection.

Mr. Frohman's Repertory Theatre was an undeserved disappointment. The modern school betrayed their practical promoter by making no attempt to wean the public: they merely offered it food which it could not assimilate, as though contemptuously resolved on proving the impossibility of making the new drama a commercial success. It was the established favourites who had to come to the rescue—Sir Arthur Pinero with a revival of an old success, and Mr. Barrie with the only new piece that gained the public favour: "The Twelve Pound Look." Mr. Shaw, the Jessop of the drama, failed to score. Since then there have been several events tending to lead up to this last departure. A public taste for vaudeville seems suddenly to have been created. "The Twelve Pound Look" itself has had a remarkable triumph on the music halls, which have gained their right to make unrestricted theatrical productions. Notable actors have taken to appearing at variety houses in one-act pieces. The Palace has had "The Man Who Was," with Sir Herbert Tree in the title rôle, and Mr. Shaw's "How He Lied to Her Husband" running at the same time. In fact, the commercial value of the one-act play has been definitely established. Mr. Shaw, it should be noted, has not only had "How He Lied to Her Husband" produced successfully at a variety theatre, and written "The Showing Up of Blanco Posnet"—the censored one-act play which is, perhaps, his most truly dramatic composition; he has also had a successful revival of "Man and Superman"; while "Fanny's First Play," the most brilliantly popular of all his plays—acknowledged or unacknowledged—has exceeded its five hundredth performance in town, and is to be produced in America. Mr. Frohman will naturally have noted this recovery from purely propagandist dialogue: in "The Mind-the-Paint Girl" he will have rejoiced over Sir Arthur Pinero's abnegation of the vice of "unhappy endings" as exemplified in "Mid-Channel." He realises the necessity of competing with the variety theatres in the production of one-act plays, and "on present form" he feels reasonably certain that the Pinero-Barrie-Shaw trio is the best and safest at his command. He can await the completion of the plays with an easy mind, if he has extracted guarantees from Sir Arthur Pinero and Mr. Shaw: from the former, that he will present the lighter side of society; and from the latter that he will bear in mind that the play, and not the platform, is pre-eminently the thing. From Mr. Barrie no guarantees will be required.

Undoubtedly, then, these three dramatists were the best to choose for what is almost a new departure. They are at present the "names" which will draw the public. But what is the dramatic significance of their association? Chiefly it is that each of these men represents a popular taste, and that they stand for three styles of drama all of which are on a commercial footing at the same time.

It is the thing to say nowadays that Mr. Shaw is a back number: that, to use Ibsen's famous figure, he is no longer fighting at the outposts: the Granville Barkers and the Galsworthys have left him in the rear. Mr. Shaw may well smile; for it would seem that this stigma has been put upon him in consequence of his money-making proclivities. If you are not a commercial success, you dub yourself, in the dramatic world, a fighter at the outposts. Success is so unlooked for, that if it comes your fellow-fighters thrust you back. It does not occur to them that the fight may be won, without compromise, as Mr. Shaw has won it. He has abundantly proved that nowadays in our flagrantly inartistic metropolis the "intellectual" style of drama, as he provides it, can hold its own amid the fierce competition of all those other brands which the new school loathes. That is the great fact. Mr. Frohman is employing Mr. Shaw as he would employ Haines Bailey or Mr. Basil Hood. He may well be asking, What musical comedy, taking the comparative costs of production into account, can achieve a success like that of "Fanny's First Play"?

The selection of Sir Arthur Pinero is chiefly interesting as denoting the continued power of the established compromise. He has been the sheet-anchor of the commercial manager, when the latter has tried to justify himself to the moderns. Did they want problems of life discussed? Pinero could do it in a popular manner. Did they want the merely middle classes to have a place on the stage? Look, if you please, at Pinero's bourgeoisie. Did they, above all, demand a higher stage-craft, a stricter technique, a finer art? Pinero was the very man for all that sort of thing. And so indeed he seemed. There is a very plausible pitch of greatness about his later work, and in particular about his stage-craft and characterisation. For some time he was always a good and sufficient answer. But latterly he has been strongly attacked in his supposedly strongest qualities. "Machine-made" has been the cry against characterisation and stage-craft alike. He has the same series of moulds (one of them is formed in the likeness of Sir George Alexander) for the characters in almost all his plays; and he controls them with a sort of Chinese-puzzle cleverness. To furnish that necessary information which is the bane of a dramatist at the beginning of a play, he pitches on the ingenious idea of having family details furnished in a reporter's interview at the outset of "His House in Order." In "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" he casually removes a host from the dining-room, sending him to write some letters for the benefit of the audience and his guests, in order that his presence may not embarrass the latter in their conversation. Nevertheless, he remains, in the upward march of the drama from the depths of Victorianism, the solid vanguard which alone has made the advance possible. It is in this compromise of the vanguard position that he will serve Mr. Frohman.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Mr. Barrie's capacity is peculiar and enviable. He may be said to represent the large heterogeneous collection of dramatists who are mainly concerned in putting good stories into good plays, without greatly troubling what school they represent. Mr. Barrie only belongs to the great school of romance. In the midst of all the rage for dissection and classification, it is strange how he is left alone. He is such a tower of strength to the managers that it would seem inevitable that he must be attacked, like other leading figures. There was a certain amount of adverse professional criticism of "What Every Woman Knows"; but this seemed largely due to the fact that Mr. Barrie's popularity being on a steady rise the play was received by the public with a rapture out of all proportion to its deserts. It is the spirit of Mr. Barrie that protects him. He is an elf, he is his own Peter Pan, he is our national vendor of simple, whimsical sentiment. Who is to attack him? He has everybody on his side, as though by the most far-sighted policy. Who thinks of dissecting for criticism the stage-craft of "Peter Pan"? A critic recently complained in his notice of a play that the author had done something that no one but Mr. Barrie could be allowed to do, something that belonged to Mr. Barrie's province and to no one else's!

Such are the three types of dramatists that Mr. Frohman is wisely bringing into association. If they each bring their public with them, the triple bill should be assured of a long run, and may encourage other managers to exploit the possibilities of the one-act play. But whatever the result, the three promised plays will afford a most interesting comparison among themselves, and should be eagerly expected, if for this reason alone.

WILFRID BLAIR.

Music

AMONG the many Samaritans who offer their help to perplexed travellers along the paths of pleasure there are not a few whose beneficent mission it is to tell us how we may best enjoy the Beautiful. One points out what we should look for in a picture, and it way well be that when we have read his book, and are herded in front of M. Matine's last painting, our conscious pride in being able to connect such delightful new words as impacto, bravura, and desinvoltura with the masterpiece does enable us to feel that we can admire it properly. Another takes us to Queen's Hall, and teaches how to listen to orchestral pieces, and how to criticise the players. Here, again, the knowledge that we can at any rate tell a hautboy from a bass-tuba when we see them, even if we cannot certainly tell which is making what noise, will sustain us through a longer concert than those we could formerly endure. Just as our infant intelligence was developed by such a classic as "Reading without Tears," so may our maturer minds be guided by "The National Gallery without Tears" or "Classical Concerts with a Smile."

But in the case of Music, at all events, there are a vast number of collateral considerations to be taken into account when we probe the secrets of enjoyment. We have, unfortunately, never met with the primer we long for which shall adequately discuss the circumstances under which players should play and listeners listen; the frame of mind and the condition of body which they should seek to possess when about to kneel before the Muse of Melody, the dangers which may be incurred if we present ourselves at the wrong time or place to hear players who cannot be, or who ought not to be, at that special moment, in the vein for exercising their art. Such a handbook would, of course, be of an "advanced" kind, a fourth or fifth "part," like the section which dealt with words of six syllables, that was so difficult to master without tears. But it would be invaluable to serious persons like ourselves, who have passed the hautboy and bass-tuba stage and long to continue in the right way. Lately we have been obliged to listen to a good deal of orchestral music, and we shall have a good deal more to hear. It is a mournful fact that we are not enjoying it at all as we would wish to; and if a little booklet could be put into our hands to tell us the why and the wherefore, and the way to amendment, we should bless the author indeed. We are residing, for our body's sake, at a foreign watering-place—let us call it Magenbad. At half-past six, every morning, we proceed, in drenching rain, and under a temperature suitable for December, to spend an hour sipping the healing water, while a large band discourses the strangest variety of music. The violinists' fingers must certainly be frozen; we can see that the wind-players' lips are blue with cold. Can their hearts be warm? Can they be conscious of that vital spark, radiant in their bosoms, which we know must exist there if they are to communicate to us anything of the spirit of delight in music which animates them?

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Most of them play with tall silk hats on their heads. Must not such a covering act as an extinguisher to the flame of musical impulse? All of them have unshorn chins, and surely the consciousness that they have come into the presence of their God, not having performed the simple abstergent act without which they would not dare to appear before the cheapest of cheap earthly dignitaries—must not this consciousness humiliate them, indispose them for the free, unfettered manifesting of their homage? They always begin with one of the solemn old chorales, and that is the one moment when their music does transport us as it should, does lift us above the horrid scenes in which we and thousands of other drinkers are playing our hideous part. We see not the company, we feel not the cold, we regret not our warm bed, as the noble tune of "O Gotteslamb" or "Pange linqua" rises in the rain. But then they play a polka, and after that a march, and then—oh, how can we write it?—they attack a movement from a symphony of Brahms, finishing up with a "Potpourri" on Wagner or Chopin. Ought it to be expected of a band, at such an hour of a morning too, that it can be versatile enough in spirit to throw itself with the proper impetus into so tremendous a variety of moods? We are disappointed with this band, yet are we in that country of Europe which we have hitherto held to be unequalled in the excellence of its bands which play for purposes of pleasure. We recall the delicious music made by bands in some garden at Prague or Vienna—nay, in more stolid Berlin—and know that our Magenbad band is not giving us nearly so much enjoyment as they did.

We would fain criticise it fairly, appraise its merits justly, but in the absence of any guide-book to the Canons of Criticism we confess ourselves at a loss. Oh, grave, unshorn musicians, attenuated some of ye, morbidly obese others, who must tune your lyres and thrum them unceasingly for six hours every day in such weather as this, let us not be hard upon ye! Do your souls perhaps detest the task that the need of bread forces ye to undertake? Haply it is not your fault that ye cannot charm us except when the chorale is raised. Let us seek if the reason of our utter disinclination to listen to your music be not in us, in the circumstances under which we attend your daily concerts. Some instinct whispers that the judicious guide already spoken of would lay it down that music (though, no doubt, it should be as meat and drink—yea, as manna—to the hungry soul) had better not be listened to when one is damp, cold, barely risen from one's bed—and starving. Optimists might urge that breakfast is in prospect. Yes, but what kind of breakfast? No tea or coffee, one egg, and not more than two or three slender sticks of a rusk-like baking. Where is the balm in such an outlook? But there are the afternoon concerts, the evening concerts, when luncheon and dinner have been enjoyed; cannot the polkas and potpourris be listened to with lazy enjoyment at those later hours?

Misuse not that blessed word "enjoyment," good Optimist, we beg. There is no peace for the wicked, they say, and there is no enjoyment for those who are perpetually conscious of a gnawing pain inside them. The very impossibility of walking anywhere without hearing some band adds to the difficulty of enjoying any one of them. You stray into the pine forests, hoping to be soothed by the sweet music of the trees, the cheerful piping of the birds, but at every turn you are confronted by a café, and, if it has not got an orchestra, it is certain to have a gramophone. And the orchestra is sure to be playing a potpourri or a polka. May the day be far distant when British bands shall succumb to the seduction of the potpourri. As was the Saturday "Pie of Resurrection" to the wight at some Dotheboys Hall, so is the musical potpourri to the musical stomach of at least one sojourner at Magenbad. Perhaps a hundred snippets of melody may be heard in a single potpourri, one tacked on to the other without any rhyme or reason. Once we thought we were to hear the Trauermarsch from "Siegfried," but after a few bars it merged into the first four bars of the Prelude to "Lohengrin"; these dissolved into the Flower Maiden Song; then we had a few more bars of "Siegfried," the tail-piece of "O Star of Eve," the "Sword" motive, the beginning of "Gazing Around," and so the dreadful mincemeat was poured out by the horrible machine with its tall hats and its unshorn chins, in the cold and the rain, while our "Trinkglas" shivered in our hands.

Is there some clue to be found to the understanding of the beauty of these potpourris? We fear even the most persuasive, the most lucid guide to the appreciation of their intricacies would prove beyond us. But because we cannot hope to solve such higher mysteries, that is no reason why we might not, under a patient professor, learn, if not to enjoy, at any rate to listen without suffering to such music as our "cure" insists upon, under the conditions that we have described. Would that these lines of ours might happen to meet the eye of some musical author who is casting about for a new subject for his genius! Then might we hope that our suffering had not been in vain, but that future visitors to such watering-places as this might see in all the booksellers' shops an enticing tract in English, "Magenbad Music without Tears."

THERE was no falling off in the number or enthusiasm of the audience who attended the first of the Promenade Concerts at Queen's Hall on Saturday evening. Sir Henry Wood received his usual hearty meed of applause, and the season was opened by the singing of the National Anthem. Miss Carrie Tubb was at her best in "Ave Maria" from "Das Fleuerkreuz," while Mr. Frank Mullings in the "Flower Song" from "Carmen" left very little to be desired. Beethoven, Tchaikovsky, and Liszt were all represented and effectively rendered.

Following the procedure of other years certain evenings will be devoted to Wagner; on other nights the selection will be varied and cover the usual wide range of composers.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Lafcadio Hearn Appraised

By W. G. BLAIKIE MURDOCH.

IT is only a few years since Lafcadio Hearn died, but already a number of things have been written about him, notably books by Yone Noguchi and Dr. G. M. Gould, Miss Nina Kennard and Miss Elizabeth Bisland, the latter being his "official" biographer, and the editress of his correspondence. He has come to be regarded as an oracle on Buddhism, and kindred matters relating to the East; Mr. Richard le Gallienne, in "Attitudes and Avowals," has hailed him as an "inspired translator"; while several of the above-named, Miss Bisland in particular, have spoken of their hero as an author of the loftiest order, worthy to be compared to De Quincey and other masters of like eminence.

Doubtless Hearn's position as an authority on the Orient is merited, but the point is one for scholars of the subject, not for a pure critic of the arts; while with reference to his translations, these also perforce constitute a theme only for the specialist. They include renderings from Hebrew, Finnish, Hindustani, and Chinese; and, though it is true that Hearn had but slight first-hand knowledge of the works he dealt with, and relied largely on French sources of information, it is withal patent that only those intimate with the different things at issue are entitled to say whether in any case the interpreter really captured the spirit of his original, really transmuted it to his pages as Andrew Lang has done with Homer, for example. One may well pause for a moment to praise Hearn's translations of Anatole France and Gautier, the latter alone serving to justify Mr. le Gallienne's comment; yet, in the main, what is sought in this essay is the appraisal of the writer's creative or personal work.

Among the most memorable acts of Swinburne must be numbered his defence of Mary, Queen of Scots, against her defenders. He showed the absurdity of regarding her as the insipid, faultless creature who figures in the writings of Sir John Skelton and other Mariolaters, and herein he did a genuine service to the memory of the Queen. It is well to love one's friends keenly, to love them none the less because of their faults; yet to blind oneself to these last is a mistaken kindness where an artist is concerned, while to rate him beyond his worth is more likely to make him a laughing-stock than to bring honour to his name. And the truth in relation to Hearn would seem to be that, like Stevenson, his personality is charming and his life-story picturesque, and accordingly his readers are prone to lose their hearts to the man himself, and so to shed all critical sense while speaking of his labours.

Hearn's nondescript nationality alone makes him an interesting figure. Born in the Ionian Islands, his mother was a Greek, while from his father he inherited English, Irish, and Romany blood. The author spent his boyhood in Ireland, in England, and in France; as a young man he went to America, and there he sojourned, first in New York, and afterwards in the Southern States. He also lived for some years in the West Indies, while the second half of his life was spent in Japan, where, marrying a Japanese wife, he became a subject of the Mikado. And during these wanderings he wrote a series of letters which, infinitely more delightful than any of his books, vie with the correspondence of Byron himself in ease and spontaneity of style, are full of sparkling humour and shrewd observations on life, and are precious in many cases as revealing the writer's heart of hearts. Some of the early ones, too, are possibly supreme as regards handling that perennially bewitching topic, the budding and development of æstheticism in a boy—the thrill which comes when beauty is first perceived, first becomes a part of one's life—while all reflect a gay bravery and fortitude on the author's part, those qualities which are the quickest and most potent of all to win the admiration of mankind. For Hearn was partially blind, while the almost equally terrible curse of journalism shackled him till his youth was far spent; yet, faced as he was by these difficulties, he never ceased to dream of becoming a great author, and year after year he toiled with unflagging zeal, often denying himself the necessities of life to procure the means of study, and stealing from rest and sleep the time necessary for his beloved work.

There is something beautiful in the whole story, something very invigorating, and to read it is a good tonic in the hour of depression or lassitude; yet, on turning to the outcome of Hearn's ardour and self-denial, one is confronted by one of the most pathetic facts of life. One is reminded, in fine, that much noble art has been made with comparative ease, and that many of those who have striven for the mastery with the finest zeal have achieved little of moment. Their devotion may command praise, but, when the actor steps before the footlights, no one asks how long he took to don his finery, how much labour he gave to studying his part. Concern is only with the result of these preparations, and so too it is with every branch of æsthetics, a poem or piece of music standing or falling simply by what it is, and its merit being in no way enhanced because its maker is known to have employed heroism in creating it.

During his New York days Hearn attempted to make the American journalists connected with him punctuate their copy more adequately, and the practice earned for him the nickname of "Old Semicolon." It was given carelessly, given by people who did not realise the gifts of him they attacked, yet undoubtedly this sobriquet which he bore as a youth forms an apt critique of his subsequent productions. He aimed at what he called "poetic prose"—that is to say, one naturally assumes, prose of intrinsic beauty, beauty irrespective of the matter conveyed—and with a view to attaining this he indulged in the most intricate punctuation. His pages bristle with dashes, pause and exclamation marks, and the result is literally tantalising, reminding the reader constantly of the effort which the writer is making to compass the particular effect he desires. Here and there, as in his account of climbing Mount Fuji, he uses a less fastidious style—one resembling the rough elliptical jottings of a diary—yet on these occasions he is even less happy. Again he constrains one to think more of the means than of the end gained thereby, and herein he is at variance with every master, no good art serving to remind one of the mode of technique employed. Looking at a picture by Manet one thinks primarily of beauty, not of impressionism, while standing before a noble example of Millais' early work one does not ponder on the tenets of pre-Raphaelitism. Such thoughts may arise afterwards in either case, yet in neither does obtrusiveness pertain to the style at issue nor outshadow the result.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

A keen devotee of Gautier, Hearn used to quote that author's saying that a poet should study his dictionary eternally, and in that way make himself so well acquainted with the whole gamut of words that he will be able to find language for his every thought. Now some bits of Hearn's handwriting have been preserved, and they demonstrate him neurotic. Like most people of that kind his sensations and impressions were prone to be subtle and well nigh ineffable, and one finds him, for instance, essaying the impossible task of describing a faint shade of colour, or of defining the very timbre of an insect's note. With intent to achieve this he appears to have obsessed himself with Gautier's theory, and his pages abound in extraordinary words; yet does he fare the better because he has these at his command, and is his message anywhere sufficiently important to justify this ugly peculiarity, and to atone for those other technical limitations cited before?

Hearn is at his best in tiny sketches of West Indian or Japanese life, some of those in "Kokoro" being exquisite, and far transcending all his others. They are good because concerned with sentiments known to all men, not because they furnish information about the places in question; and it is the absence as a rule of the former quality, and the everlasting presence of the latter, which vitiates the bulk of the writer's books of travel. Ruskin says that an artist is only great if he can make one forget the creator himself while in touch with his creations, but, true as this is of much great art, à propos of writings on travel the reverse is generally the case. Among acknowledged classics in this department a few no doubt owe their longevity to vivid description of the lands the author visited, yet in general such things appeal because the writer's personality is dominant throughout; while further, no book of travel has passed into the realm of Literature on account of value in giving facts. Stevenson's "Travels with a Donkey" is chiefly engaging because he recorded his emotions en route, and this too it is which constitutes the charm of Kinglake's "Eothen" and John Davidson's "Random Itinerary"; but in Hearn one is told instead in which Mikado's reign this or that Japanese custom was instituted, while even more distressing are his particulars anent the trade of Barbadoes, and the thickness of the walls in the houses at St. Pierre. Reading things of this sort, one longs for the lyrical cry which renders many less erudite authors precious for all time, and this longing is felt equally keenly on turning to the writer's various philosophic speculations. All these are able in the sense that those of Huxley and Herbert Spencer are, but to be a clever philosopher is not to be a literary artist—unless the philosopher makes his speculations a medium for telling the story of his own heart. That is what Hearn largely omitted from his voluminous works, evidently failing to realise, or realising too late, that it was in his passionate communion with life itself that his chance lay of writing something immortal. At least, however, he expressed this communion in his letters, and so it is advisable to read these ere turning to his books. For the books are not likely to awaken a taste for his correspondence, might even stultify the idea of reading it; and not to have done so, it is not extravagant to say, is to have missed one of the supreme joys of life.

Art and Imitation—II

THE problem left unsolved in our first article is not a purely musical problem, for this power to affect us with a pleasant sadness is shared by all the Arts. It is seemingly a contradiction to speak of a pleasant sadness; joy is never unpleasant, how then can sadness be pleasant? Pleasure has been defined as the invariable accompaniment of a free and successful exercise of any faculty; pain, of its impeded and unsuccessful exercise. What, then, is this pleasurable pain which Art excites in us?—for the phrase seems to imply that some faculty is at the same moment both successful and unsuccessful, which is manifestly impossible.

Yet this contradiction does occur in the case of the faculty of pity or sympathy, for inasmuch as sympathy is a faculty, its free exercise cannot fail to be attended with pleasure, but inasmuch as it is sympathy, or suffering with, it is of necessity a mood of sadness. By the agency of sound, pity is first awakened; the first and most universal expression of pain is the cry, and it is through the sense of hearing that we first become aware of a fellow-being in distress. Moreover, the cry of pain is always a dissonant cry; this admits of a very simple explanation; any vibrative chord set in motion with undue violence gives out a dissonant note; that is to say, in addition to its prime tone it emits a number of inharmonic overtones which combine to give it the roughness characteristic of dissonance. Possibly this is a wise provision of nature; the purpose of the cry of pain is to summon aid, and especially to rouse the sleeping mother into instant wakefulness in defence of her distressed young. For this purpose a clear and agreeable note would be far less effective than a rough and piercing one; the infant's cry is a natural alarum, a winged rasp endowed with power to annihilate peace in every neighbouring bosom, till the needs of its owner are satisfied.

Dissonance, then, induces a mood of sadness, not because it is in itself disagreeable, but because it brings to mind the notion of a creature in pain. The power of music depends primarily on its power to excite the emotion of pity by means of dissonance. This view agrees well with common opinion. "Plaintive," "dolorous," and words of similar connotation are those which have been most often and most aptly applied to music. Keats has spoken of "music yearning like a god in pain." The oldest existing instruments of music are the flutes used by the ancient Egyptians in ceremonial mourning. Many people will have observed that the moment of keenest pleasure in listening to a melody is the moment when the harshest discord strikes upon the ear, for it is then that the flood-gates of pity spring open and inundate the breast. "Is it not strange," says Benedick, "that sheep's guts can hale souls out of men's bodies?" It appears less strange when we see that the viscera of sheep and other quadrupeds, stretched over a violin, are but a rude facsimile of the human vocal chords.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

It is now clear that the expressiveness of music proceeds not from what it is, but from what it indicates. Herein lies the essential difference between sound and taste or smell; for these latter are symbolic of nothing; if they are pleasant or unpleasant they are so in themselves alone. It is true that smells can become associated with places and events and so rouse deep emotion; as Kipling says:—

> Smells are surer than sounds or sights
> To make your heartstrings crack.
> They start those awful voices o' nights
> That whisper, "Old man, come back."

Such association, however, is accidental and personal; smells cannot become, what sound is by nature, a universal symbol of emotion.

This distinction is of the utmost importance if we are to form a correct view of the place of Art in human life; for if we allowed, what is often taken for granted, that the pleasure of Music is identical with the pleasure of harmony or consonance, that is to say, with a pleasant stimulation of the sense of hearing, we must class Music simply as a species of sensual gratification, and the musician would deserve no higher esteem than the cook or the perfumer; according to this theory, the function of dissonance in Music would be the same as that of piquant condiments in cooking. This view is inadequate for many reasons. All sensual pleasures lead to intemperance, but there is no such thing as intemperance in the pleasures of Art. Moreover, devotion to sensual pleasure has a coarsening effect upon the soul, but devotion to the pleasures of Art has the reverse effect. "Artibus mollescunt pectora asperitas que fugit." (By the Arts the bosom is softened and asperity flees away.) The reason of this is now apparent. Art exercises the sympathies, and sympathy is the root of all the gentler virtues; hence the pleasure of Art can never be a purely selfish pleasure; in this sense Ruskin is right in holding that no great artist could be a bad man; certainly no artist could be bad in the sense of being hard and unsympathetic.

Sympathy can only be moved by its proper object, the suffering will; hence the most moving form of Art is tragedy, and "the sweetest songs are those which tell of saddest thought." Of course we can "sympathise" with gladness, but this we do by virtue of some other faculty, such as love or friendship; we are not necessarily moved to joy by the sight of joy, as we are moved to compassion by the sight of sorrow; indeed, language affords no word corresponding to sympathy and compassion to indicate fellow-feeling in joy, showing that no such word is needed; this is natural; joy is sufficient to itself and requires no help from others. For this reason Music which is too cheerful is often tedious and annoying; much of Mozart's music has this fault; it fails to rouse our sympathy and therefore fatigues our attention; here we find the true antithesis to that agreeable sadness which Art awakens, namely, a disagreeable cheerfulness. Consider the oft-quoted lines of Browning:—

> The year's in the spring;
> The day's at the morn;
> Morning's at seven;
> The hill side's dew-pearled;
> The lark's on the wing;
> The snail's on the thorn;
> God's in his heaven—
> All's right with the world.

and beside it put this passage from Herodotus:—

"'Oh, King, how unlike to one another are your actions now and awhile since; for then you were accounting yourself fortunate, but now you are weeping.' And Xerxes answered, 'I was moved to pity in thinking how brief is human life, for of all this great multitude not one shall be alive in a hundred years.' And Artabanus answered, 'Yet other and more pitiful things than this we suffer by the way, for in this short life there is none born so fortunate, either of these or of any others, that he will not wish, not once, but many times, to be dead rather than alive.'"

The former passage leaves us unmoved and perhaps a trifle bored; the latter excites a thrill of compassion; nothing is more tedious than a too insistent optimism; hence a pessimist has been well defined as one who has lived in the same house with an optimist.

The fact that in Art we take pleasure in the contemplation of pain provided the Greek mind with a solution of the great enigma of the universe, the attitude of the Deity towards human suffering. The Greek gods were conceived as watching human affairs like spectators of a drama, keenly interested but not pained by the tragedy; such a view was natural to a nation so deeply artistic as the Greeks. This answer may be contrasted with that given by the Hebrew mind to the same question; this, the oldest solution, was arrived at by attributing to the Deity that other faculty which enables us to contemplate pain with satisfaction, namely, righteous indignation; this explanation, however, requires the unwarrantable assumption that misfortune is always subsequent and proportionate to guilt.

JOHN RIVERS.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Stratford Shakespeare Festival

IT is certainly satisfactory to find some place where vagaries of this summer have not marred a festive spirit; even as it is curious to discover a prosperity and good fellowship greater in the rain than in the shining glory of last year. For Stratford has been full as it seldom is full; and to judge from an all-powerful Box Office the Memorial Theatre has filled itself not less successfully than the town. All this is to the good. We have always insisted that, since the great cities are clearly an almost impossible base for the revival of great drama (as great cities and massed societies have always been), there is probably no apter place for such an attempt in England than Stratford. A more convenient theatre is needed; but it is the only place that does not truckle to merely journalistic drama, and that does seek to confine itself to drama that is great and intends greatly. It should, we think, be pioneer along these lines. Profitably, even, it might extend a welcome to enterprise in poetic drama, from new pens or from pens that have but lately dropped from notable hands. In fact, it is surely undeniable that this must come, if these Festivals are not to become lifeless revivals of a spirit that has passed away. And in the meantime, they help to emphasise the distinction that most needs emphasis now in all the Arts: the distinction between the great and the little, the permanent and the impermanent, between creative work and journalistic labour.

It is no Shakespearolatry, but simple sense, to say that in such an emphasis in drama Shakespeare must needs take the premier place. Yet among his own works there are some one looks for, which it is not easy always to get. One such play is "Othello," and this summer Mr. Benson has revived that play for the first time for a good many years. It is not difficult to see why it has been avoided for so long. In the first place, Mr. Benson is scarcely the most ideal representative for that character. It is astonishing how wide his range is—which is partly also a tribute to Shakespeare, since it attests the fundamental humanity of his characters. But no range of interpretation is without limitation; and so happy a Hamlet could scarcely be a perfect Othello.

To say that Othello failed of conviction is to say that Iago did not ring truly. For of all the ironic juxtapositions of character this pair is the most perfect. There was no man in all the range of possibility so inevitable a prey to Iago's cast of mind as Othello, even as there could have been no man more deadly to Othello at that moment of his life than Iago. Two such men put together had, sooner or later, to work to a mighty outbreak once the presence of a pure woman came near them. It only was a matter of how soon they should become fully charged by this new presence. We say, nowadays, that we no longer believe in a devil, but we all know him nevertheless. We meet men for whom there is no other adjective than diabolic. We know beauties and powers that are diabolic. Iago is such a man; he wields such a power; and in the extraordinary precision and perfect balance of the working of his intellect there is just such a beauty. He is abnormal; and though he may cast about for reasons to explain his hatred towards the normal and healthy, the simple fact is that he hates the normally pure on the permanent instinct of his being. It is so everywhere, but it is markedly so in the matter of sex. Healthy minds may be bawdy, and to other healthy minds that fact may be undesirable, but it will not be offensive. That is to say, it will not be perverted. But when the perverted mind becomes bawdy it becomes filthy. The natural inclination is to strike down such a man, since he is an outrage in himself, and that violent and right instinct is an important thing to remember with regard to the play.

One of the evidences is this: one is hot and the other is cold. The healthy man (healthy of mind that is) may be inflamed by an appeal to his sex, but his attitude will be one of respect and tenderness. The perverted mind has that horrible thing, cold desire. Or, in the terms of the play, Othello is one and Iago is the other. Othello has just entered into the most intimate relation with a pure woman, and it is little to be wondered at that his whole being is in a somewhat unsettled, temporarily unsettled, condition. The moment will pass, but for such a man of such large passions, any thought from a perverted mind will be as a match to powder. And there is such a mind close by in his Ancient.

The very first words that Iago has to speak in the play reveal him to us. Their abominable filthiness is just that they indicate no passion in him. It would have been impossible for Othello to have spoken so. There Iago displays his perverted mind, and one of the first instincts of this is that it must strike at and seek to ruin the clean thing. Therefore he must strike at Othello. Moreover, Othello is for the moment a particularly apt prey—which Iago's instinct will divine almost without his reason being aware of it. And thus in their close relations at that moment there is something that is tremendous in its possibility. Iago never once tries to prove Desdemona guilty. He is all the time seeking to inflame Othello. Directly Othello seeks to curb these unloosed furies in him. as his own instinct of honour prompts him to do, Iago visualises more abominations for him. For he is now fighting for his own life. It is Desdemona's life or his, now. That is the whole terrible meaning of the third scene of the third act.

But Mr. Benson does not give us this Othello; and whatever may have been his desires, neither could Mr. Herbert as Iago respond to this note. Moreover, every characteristic speech of Iago's, with, in the maturer business of the play, every characteristic response of Othello's, was cut out. In a certain deep sense we did not have Shakespeare's play at all. As played by Mr. Benson and Mr. Herbert, the relation between Othello and Iago was one of opposition, whereas the heart-breaking tragedy is that it is a terrible conjunction.

Of course the answer to this is obvious. It will be said that the play on such lines would be impossible to a modern audience. We venture to disagree. We would say, without a moment's hesitation, that if it were played on these lines, without the omission of a line, even the rawest schoolgirl would not be revolted by the words, but that they would be indicative to her of a terrible and tremendous conflict beyond. In other words, she would instinctively realise their proper value. That is to say, unless she had already been talked to by some unhealthily minded mother. At least, the experiment would be worth trying.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

On their own lines Mr. Benson and Mr. Herbert, nevertheless, gave an interpretation far more convincing than most of the versions it has been our lot lately to see acted. This was in spite of the fact that Mr. Benson's make-up left a good deal to be desired, and what seemed to us as unnecessary "business" in many parts. As Desdemona Miss Green was excellent; and Mr. Caithness as Roderigo was specially admirable. Mr. Murray Carrington as Cassio succeeded well with a part that is not easy to play; and Miss McDowall as Bianca showed fine restraint and dignity. Indeed the whole company maintained its usual high standard of acting.

Some Tolstoyan Exhibits

THERE is now being exhibited at the Old Bond Street Galleries the private collection of a great admirer of this Russian writer. The collection consists of numerous photos of Count Leo Tolstoy, taken at various periods of his career; some corrected proofs of his writings; autographs; pictures; and a facsimile of the room in the station-master's house where he died. The majority of the portraits are typical of the life of ceaseless energy and earnest zeal that is always associated with the great reformer's name. In many of them he is represented in the act of dictating to his secretary, his daughter; while others show that, previous to his final decision to renounce all family ties, he was apparently on very good terms with those by whom he was surrounded. He is generally seated in the midst of his many relations and friends, and in spite of his austere and simple life the pictures tell us that the Count sometimes allowed himself the luxury of men-servants. The room in which he died is so realistic as to give one a weird sensation, and in passing through it one feels compelled to hasten by the bed and to gain the door on the opposite side. The exhibition must appeal to a very large number of people; for there are very few who have not read or seen at least one of Tolstoy's books or plays, and it is always interesting to obtain glimpses of the inner life of those who have the power largely to influence others whether in the matter of religion, philosophy or politics.

Germans Abroad

IT is said that to understand a foreigner it is necessary to see him in his own country. Here is one of those plausible untruths which go long uncontradicted. We cannot, it is clear, study him fairly in our country where his want of familiarity with the language and common habits, and a stiffness in his efforts to be at his ease—all painfully apparent—put him at an obvious disadvantage. So much is beyond dispute. But on the other hand, we can make only a half-study of him in his own country. We may face the pleasanter side of him there, but we do not see him in his relations with foreigners. We may miss this, which is most important to us, just as, seeing a public man at his own fireside, we may get no idea of his public qualities. We must study the foreigner out of his own home; we must see him, then, in a country which is foreign to us both. To study the German the Englishman must go to France. France, indeed, is the place where all foreigners may most profitably be studied, for while the Frenchman keeps his own home closed to them he receives them in his public places with a good-humoured courtesy which puts them quickly at their ease, so that their several traits become soon apparent.

The traditional Englishman abroad, the type that Thackeray drew, for example, in his Major at Boulogne, who every morning said "O" in a very loud voice, meaning by this that he desired hot water, is not now frequently met with. But between this type and the modern German abroad there are obvious similarities and one subtle and important difference. The traditional Englishman's contempt for the foreigner, his language, his habits and his dress, like the insolence of the Pharisee in the Temple, had something magnificent about it. It was an active contempt founded on two beliefs, his belief in his own superiority and his belief in the foreigner's sense of inferiority. The modern German abroad shows somewhat the same feeling, but without its magnificence. He has it in a negative form. With him it is a sort of clumsiness and insensibility. It is not so much contempt as mere indifference. The German does not despise the opinion of the foreigner; he is merely ignorant of its existence. He does not rise superior to criticism, but he misses the fact that he is criticised. He is self-sufficient. The French have hit him off neatly. They speak of the German "sans-gêne." Indeed, the German abroad is difficult to abash.

Observe him (say) at a pension table, where there are several races represented. He enters and bows stiffly in turn to everyone present with punctilious but ungracious politeness. He is soon at his ease, and if the dinner is not to his liking will criticise it with freedom; neither the feeling of other people nor his own modesty ever suggests to him that he should speak other than in a loud tone. A certain diffidence in one sitting at a foreign table and conversing in a strange tongue is not unnatural. One may well prefer to whisper what one has to say to those on either side, and to consider even the vis-à-vis as out of conversational range. But the German abroad, if he thinks upon the matter at all, would consider such modesty as weakness, and if the spirit moves him will speak boldly from one end of the table to the other. For he is sublimely unconscious of any slips that he may make, and will stumble and blunder through a French sentence under the eyes of twenty other people with a cheerfulness which more sensitive men may well envy. Indeed, he will carry this insensibility of his own mistakes to the length of correcting the mistakes of his fellows, and in the presence of Frenchmen will take upon himself to instruct an American or Englishman in the uses of the French language. I have even seen a young German, with a smattering of French and a few words of English, bluntly contradict an Englishman at a French table on a point in the English language, and on his error being made plain to him, retire unabashed without even the trouble of an apology.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Observe, too, with what a humourless perseverance the German abroad pursues his study of a foreign language. At whatever pain to himself or to other people, he will persist in talking it even with his own countrymen. It is necessary to see two Germans in a French railway carriage who might converse comfortably in their own tongue laboriously exchange ideas in broken French, to understand why it is that the German can obtain so much more quickly than an Englishman a useful fluency in foreign speech. Indeed, a sense of the ridiculous is fatal to success. It is the real gift of the bad fairy. The German abroad does not possess it. And it is by this inability to see what is amusing in his own acts that the German succeeds, up to a certain point, more readily than others. By this insensibility to criticism, this bluntness, he can pursue his own course undisturbed—but only up to a certain point; after that point his indifference stands firmly in his way. He cannot profit by criticism or by the finer contact with other minds; he is too little susceptible to subtle influences, and so, in this one matter of language, while he comes quickly by fluency in speech, will rarely talk in a foreign language with complete accuracy, more rarely still with neatness and delicacy. It is a pity that La Bruyère did not live to see the modern German abroad. He would have hit off his foibles with much gusto. But there are certain traits in his character of Mopsé which seem prophetic.

C. V.

Notes and News

Mr. John Lane publishes this week at 5s. net, "Gates of the Dolomites," by L. Marion Davidson, with many charming illustrations. Miss Davidson has thoroughly traversed the little known region of the Dolomites, and gives the result of her experiences in a book designed both for the armchair and the knapsack. The book includes a chapter on the flora of the district, by Miss Spencer Thomson.

This week Mr. Murray publishes Chevalier Tullio Irace's volume "With the Italians in Tripoli." The author, who has himself been at the front with the Italian army, has endeavoured to give a true and accurate report of what occurred, in order to counteract certain inspired and misleading accounts of the operations that had already reached this country. Mr. Murray also publishes shortly Lady Napier's new novel, "Muddling Through."

Messrs. John Long have just published a new novel, entitled "My Escapes," by "A Bachelor." The story, told in autobiographical form, is an amusing record of what happens to a young bachelor, who, suddenly becoming wealthy, and finding himself compromised with several girls, in various social stations, struggles to escape from his old pledges of matrimony.

Messrs. John Long have also published a shilling edition of "Wilhelmina in London," by Barry Pain, and a new sixpenny novel by Nat Gould, entitled "The Stolen Racer."

The Duke of Norfolk has entrusted the production of a memoir of his late uncle, Lord Lyons, the distinguished diplomatist, to Lord Newton, who served for several years under him at the Paris Embassy, and the book will be published by Edward Arnold. Lord Newton would be grateful for an opportunity of inspecting any letters of interest that may be in the possession of the late Lord Lyons' correspondents or their families. If any such letters are sent to him at Lyme Park, Disley, Cheshire, they will be carefully preserved and returned as soon as possible to their owners.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

A FUTURE STORM CENTRE.

NO sooner have we been assured of an imminent termination of the Turco-Italian War than we find ourselves once more face to face with an upheaval in the Balkans that seems to threaten the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. But, as though the recurrence of this perennial nightmare were not a sufficient strain upon the disordered nerves of Europe, trouble, which promises to tax to the utmost the diplomatic resources of the Great Powers, is again looming in the distant East. In the case of Turkey and her internal disorganisation, there is no immediate cause for despair. On the contrary, without dismissing from our minds the gravity of the situation that may well evolve from the elements of unrest that exist throughout the country, there is reason for hope that Count Berchtold has indeed found a practical solution of the problem which has for so long baffled the ingenuity of statesmen.

To achieve his end, the Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister is seeking to reinstate, in an elastic form, the European Concert. Initial unanimity assured, there would seem to be no bar to a smooth course of negotiations which should ultimately bring tranquillity to the diverse races of the Turkish Empire. Briefly, Count Berchtold's plan is to provide for a certain measure of decentralisation without impairment of Turkish sovereignty. In what may be taken as an officially authorised statement which appeared in the Times of Saturday, we are told that:—

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

> There is no idea of calling a congress or a conference which might arouse Turkish susceptibilities. There is no question of autonomy for Albania and for Macedonia, and it is not desired to pave the way for a fresh dismemberment of the Ottoman Empire. Measures must be found for rendering possible the satisfaction of the lawful aspirations of the non-Turkish nationalities in the Ottoman Empire in order that the Balkan States may no longer contemplate the making of war on Turkey. In short, it is a question of the strengthening of Turkey by a "measured decentralisation" which would not involve the danger of the creation of new Balkan States.

Nothing, so far, in the nature of destructive criticism of the Austrian proposals has appeared in the Press of Europe; and in some of the highest circles, both in England and on the Continent, expectations are held that the near future will witness the co-operation, in the interests of the world at large, no less than of Turkey herself, of the Powers who belong respectively to the Triplice and the Entente.

At the present moment, however, it is not alone towards Constantinople that the attention of the European Chancelleries is turned. Within the last few days Peking has upheld its latter-day reputation for providing the world with surprises; and by the summary execution, in the dead of night, of two of its citizen soldiers the new Republic is on the verge of a crisis of which it is difficult to over-estimate the gravity. Ever since he returned to power, Yuan Shih-kai has been faced with well-nigh overwhelming odds. In the first place, his was the task of reconciling the Throne to its fate, and, at the same time, of satisfying the ambitious demands of the Southern Republicans. It was a tremendous and a thankless task, but he acquitted himself as a master, and became the custodian of the welfare of four hundred millions of people. In the months that have followed his election to the Presidency, the trials and difficulties of office have multiplied thick and fast. For not only have financial embarrassments beset his administration, but the Revolution itself has left behind such a residue of intrigue and heart-burning that Yuan Shih-kai is in constant danger of his life.

It would be idle at this stage to speculate upon the purely local developments which may arise from the conflict at present existing between Yuan Shih-kai and the Advisory Council. With an eagerness which betrays their unreliability, some writers have endeavoured to state a case for the enemies of the President. But the latest facts available certainly do not warrant confident prediction in this direction. It would seem that the two Generals who have gone to their doom, however worthy their motives, could not have been working to any practical end so far as China is concerned at present. On the contrary, they, and the school they represented, must be held responsible for much, if not all, of the anarchy which prevails in China to-day.

Yuan Shih-kai is a man whose patriotic motives cannot be called into question by anyone laying claim to political wisdom; and if the more ambitious among his compatriots would only consent to sink their rivalries and accord him whole-hearted support, an era of peace in China might easily dawn to-morrow. The real danger—not only to the Republic, but to every Power having interests in the Far East—lies in the fact that internecine strife is likely to provide the dangerous excuse for international intervention. It may be stated positively that Germany, Great Britain, the United States, and France are using their utmost endeavours to render unnecessary a policy calculated to make China the storm centre of the world. We must trust to the efficacy of those covenants which bind us so closely to Japan and Russia to prevent a catastrophe which, in the case of the Balkan problem, is almost inconceivable.

MOTORING

THE R. A. C. certificate relating to the test of the Cadillac self-starting system has been issued, and its essence is summarised in the following sentence:—"Three thousand starts (1,000 per car) were made without any hesitation, and on no occasion did the starter fail in operation." The conditions under which the trial was conducted were such as to preclude the possibility of any special preparation being made for the occasion, the three cars tested being selected by the R. A. C. officials out of fifteen which were placed at their disposal by the British representatives of the Cadillac, Messrs. F. S. Bennett, Limited. Two of those selected were at the wharf in London, packed in the cases in which they left the Detroit factory, while the third was taken from the Shaftesbury Avenue show-room. The certificate states that the interval between each start was approximately 10 seconds, and the average time taken for each engine to start was four-fifths of a second. It may be pointed out that a special feature of the Cadillac system of self-starting is that the engine automatically re-charges the the batteries, so that the voltage remains practically constant. Messrs. Bennett state that there are actually in use at the present time over 11,000 cars fitted with

"EVERY DROP LUBRICATES."
"Champion" Motor Oil
is the best for all types of Cars.
If not already using "Champion" send for trial tin to
S. BOWLEY & SON,
DISTILLERS OF BOWLEY'S MOTOR SPIRIT.
"Express" and "Bomo" Brands.
Wellington Works,
BATTERSEA, LONDON, S.W.
Established 1744.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

the system, and that all are giving complete satisfaction.

In reference to self-starting devices generally, it is worth while to quote the opinion of Mr. S. F. Edge, who has been carrying out personal trials of the various self types in the market, including those operated by compressed air, springs, electricity, and acetylene gas. The result of his experiments is the conviction that each of these has disadvantages which, up to the present, outweighs its advantages, and he cannot recommend any of them to the private motorist. None of them would, in his opinion, give satisfaction after a year's use, and the amount of care and intelligence required to keep them working efficiently would be greater than the average car-owner is disposed to give. Dealing with the various systems separately, Mr. Edge says the compressed air type is too heavy and expensive, and, moreover, requires a skilled person to keep the installation in order; the spring type, although the simplest and most reliable when in perfect order, is too complicated, and therefore very liable to go wrong; the acetylene type is dangerous and erratic in starting; and the electric type, while ideal in theory, requires an excessive amount of power and would involve the use of a very heavy and expensive battery installation to give satisfaction with a large engine. It may, however, prove satisfactory with small engines, provided no objection be made to the expense. In spite of this unfavourable opinion of existing self-starting devices, Mr. Edge is convinced that the time will come when the ideal system will be evolved and perfected, and, as he rightly says, all experimenters in this direction deserve the thanks of the motoring community. Personally, he is quite willing thoroughly to test any new form of self-starter on one of the Napier cars, and impartially record the result for the benefit of motorists generally.

In the course of a leading article dealing with the serious accident in Scotland last week, when a char-à-bancs broke a driving chain when mounting a steep incline and ran backwards with disastrous results to the passengers, the Motor points out that the accident might have been averted had the vehicle been fitted with a sprag, and contends that all heavy motor vehicles, such as char-à-bancs and motor 'buses should be compulsorily fitted with these invaluable, but despised, devices. This is a very sensible suggestion, and the authorities would be well advised if they adopted it at once. In the early days of motoring, when engines had less reserve of power and the car mechanism was much cruder and less reliable than at present, the sprag was an almost invariable accessory of every car. With improved brakes and more powerful engines it has gradually become obsolete, and the modern motorist would smile if invited to have one fitted to his car. Nevertheless, it remains true that, in the event of the brakes failing when mounting a hill, the humble sprag is the only known device which will hold the car and prevent a dangerous backward run; and many people who motor with a sense of perfect security would feel less easy if they knew the actual state of the brakes of the car in which they were riding, and realised how dependent they were upon the power and regular working of the engine. In the case of powerful chain-driven cars, more especially, is the sprag a valuable fitment, and certainly all heavy public motor vehicles would be safer if equipped with them.

Latest reports of the tyre test which is now proceeding are to the effect that all the tyres—Dunlop, Victor, Michelin, and Continental—are doing remarkably well. Over 2,000 miles have been covered, and none of the tyres has even lost a stud up to the present.

R. B. H.

Flying at Hendon

THE weather, upon whose caprice almost everyone and everything depends—especially during the holiday month of August—has been responsible for the comparatively small amount of flying that has taken place in various parts of the country. On Saturday, however, in spite of a very strong wind, there were several ascents at Hendon. M. Marcel Desoutter and Mr. James Valentine were each up in the teeth of a gale, and although at one time it appeared as if Mr. Valentine's monoplane would overturn, neither met with any accident. Mr. Lewis Turner and Mr. R. T. Gates reached a height of about 800 feet, and Mr. Valentine won the speed handicap in 9 min. 22 2-5 sec.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

JUST as we were all expecting a rush of business this unfortunate Chinese trouble has broken out again and people are nervous. I believe that everything will be settled peacefully, but, as I have often informed you, there is a latent danger that the Chinaman in the North will decline to be led by the Chinaman in the South. Yuan Shih-kai is a great autocrat, and his colleague who controls the army has immense power; neither of them, however, is willing to allow the Cantonese any position in the Government. Trouble has been brewing for a long time past, and the difficulty is to get accurate information on this side. The Europeans in China are prejudiced and they are not well informed with regard to the position The reason why I am hopeful that peace will be preserved is that the Chinese are eminently a business race. They are not fighters and they do not want trade disturbed by revolution; therefore both sections will attempt to compromise. Yuan Shih-kai has enormous influence and is a most capable man. He will probably think it wise to placate the Southerner. A serious revolution would be extremely dangerous to the London financiers; for the London banks have lent a great deal of money on Chinese stocks, being firmly convinced that peace was certain. A default followed by a revolution would, therefore, create a small panic.

There is no new issue of any importance except the debenture issue of the British-Australian Oil, which is offering £150,000 First Mortgage 6 per cent. Debentures. I see no future in the shale industry of Australia. In Scotland, where shale has been mined for many years, Pumpherston is really the only consistently successful concern. It owes its success to the remarkable genius of Mr. Fraser. The past history of most of the other companies is a record of struggles. Now that the Standard Oil have made an agreement with the Scotch companies some of them are doing better, but not well enough to encourage anybody to put money into Australian shale. The cost of production is much higher in the Colonies than it is in Scotland. Advertisements have been inserted in various papers comparing the shale with the oil industry. Such a comparison is most misleading. Shale is like coal and has to be mined in the same manner. The cost of production of a ton of shale (f.o.b.) is about 20s. a ton. The cost of pumping a ton of oil from a well 700 feet deep is about 5s. The cost of reducing the shale to its constituent parts is twice as much as that of refining oil.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

MONEY.—The market remains in an uninteresting condition. Crops are earlier than usual, but they have not yet begun to affect Lombard Street. The banks are buying bills freely, which looks as though they did not expect any advance in rates before October. Let us hope that none will occur.

FOREIGNERS.—There has been very little business in the Foreign market. The suspicious strength of Chinese Bonds makes one think of manipulation. This market is in the hands of one or two important banks and finance houses who do not intend to allow values to fall if they can help it. The newspapers, however, are doing their best to create a panic without probably quite understanding how serious such a crisis would be.

HOME RAILS.—The traffic returns are excellent and this has put heart into the market. Dealers are short, and if the public would only realise what splendid investments they could purchase we should see a sharp rise. It is somewhat sanguine to imagine that the loss on the past half-year will be recovered before Christmas. Nevertheless trade is booming all over the country, and it is possible that some of the railways may be able to increase their distribution. The policy of the directors in keeping dividends down is not easily explained. It is well known that the Government has a scheme for the nationalisation of the lines, and as they will buy on a dividend basis, the higher the distribution the more money will the shareholders get.

YANKEES.—The American market is good. Crops are magnificent, and all the bankers are advising their clients to buy Yankee Rails. Unions are talked up on a scheme for paying out the preference shareholders, but whether it will come to anything is very doubtful. These preference shareholders have no claim upon the assets after they have received their money back, the whole of such assets belonging to the ordinary shareholders. The simplest way to end the dispute would be to have a friendly law suit so that the question could be decided by the Supreme Court. Sooner or later this will be done. Copper shares are very strong, the Utah report for the quarter showed a surplus of nearly a million and a half dollars. The copper cost the company 8.12 cents per lb., and as the selling price is 17¾ cents, Utah is making enormous profit. It has enough ore in hand to pay dividends for fifty years, therefore no one need be afraid of buying the shares. Miami is to be put up, but I think the price quite high enough. Copper will go to £85 a ton, and all copper shares will probably boom in the autumn. Amalgamated are a good purchase, and so are Anacondas.

RUBBER.—There is very little movement in the price of rubber shares, though the public are picking up what they consider cheap ones. But what is the use of buying something that looks cheap and afterwards turns out to be no good? Chersonese and Merlimau are my favourites, but I notice a great many brokers are recommending Galang Besar. I cannot agree with these brokers; because the price was once high is no reason why it should go up again. There was no rhyme or reason in the quotations for rubber shares during the boom.

OIL.—Roumania appears to be coming to the front. The Roumanian Consolidated has struck a good well, and the Astra has also got a spouter. There is no doubt that this country will one day rival Russia as an oil producer. Galician oil properties are doing well also; the Galician Oil Trust seems to have got over its difficulties and the shares are talked higher. Mr. Hicks went out to Galicia and put the affairs of the company on a business basis, not before it was wanted. The production is increasing and the share is a fair gamble. The best of the Maikops is British Maikop. Spies are talked higher, and there is some story that Shells are to be put up. I think, however, that they are quite high enough to-day.

KAFFIRS.—The Robinson Deep report was excellent. The profit for the year ending March amounted to £441,180. The grade of the ore now being crushed is rising and profits are affected, not only by the richness of the ore, but also by the use of machinery in breaking down the ore in the stopes. It is said that the mine will acquire fifty claims on the dip that are now part of the Booysen estate. I think Robinson Deep and Knights the two best purchases in the Kaffir market, although we are promised much larger profits from Crown Mines during the year. Paris seems to hesitate over Kaffirs and the boom hangs fire, but I am sure that an effort will be made to put things better in the autumn.

RHODESIANS.—The market in Chartereds is weak. Whenever the shares are put to 30s. sellers come in. There is no doubt that very large blocks of shares are hanging over our heads. When they are absorbed Chartered should go to £2, but when will that happen? Edmund Davis seems more inclined to put up Northern Coppers than to help his Jungle market. Latilla will be back from his holidays in a few days and will take up Planet Arcturus and Amalgamated Properties. I think that all Rhodesians will go better in sympathy.

TIN.—The tin market has been quite cheerful, mainly because the price of tin keeps so firm. I am told that the Rayfield Cornwall Syndicate has obtained enormous heaps of tailings that go about 10 lbs. to the ton. With modern appliances the vast masses of tailings that can be found all over Cornwall can be made to pay with tin at its present price. The old Cornish miners were very careless and did not extract more than 70 per cent. of the tin, the rest lies in the millions of tons of sands that disfigure the mining portions of Cornwall.

MISCELLANEOUS.—There is a very interesting article in the current number of The Stockbroker on the Marconi profits. Apparently the writer does not look for more than £200,000 profit for the parent company for the year. As the Stock Exchange calculates £400,000 as the profit and buys the shares on this basis, it is probable that purchasers will be disappointed. A large number of people are being circularised with a view to placing North Coast Land shares and debentures. Those who receive these circulars should carefully read the last report of this company.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

TALENTED AND TALENTUEUX.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Comme on l'a dit, les langues sont de vastes territoires sillonnés de routes; à côté des chemins classés, il y a les chemins de traverse et les sentiers, souvent plus courts et surtout plus pittoresques que les grandes voies.—DOCTEUR CABANÈS (Petit Parisien.)

SIR,—I was once criticised, as a pupil, by my English teacher for using what he would call "the objectionable expression 'a talented man' for 'a man of talent.'" Almost at the same time, as far as I can remember, my French teacher was taking exception to the use of "Le talentueux professeur," instead of "Le professeur de talent." Having full confidence in my teachers' knowledge, I adopted their notions without examining whether these notions were just or not; afterwards I took the trouble to investigate the truth. From that time to the present moment, I confess that I have never been thoroughly satisfied with the reason given by English purists for rejecting the word talented from the English language.*

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

I was at this stage of my doubts as to the correctness of the word talented, when, recently, in one of THE ACADEMY supplements, Mr. J. W. Hales's following remarks on William Hodgson's work entitled "Errors in the Use of English," attracted my attention:—

"We confess to thinking that those who oppose the word talented have the worst of it in point of theory, and now also as respects usage. We hold with Dr. Fitzedward Hall that it is of thoroughly English formation. Many people, even of those who would set the world right about such matters, do not seem to know that '-ed' is an adjectival suffix as well as the participial. Those who object to it on the score that it must be formed from talent and not from talents forget that we speak of 'a man of talent,' using talent in a sort of collective sense; and that, exactly similarly, we speak of 'a high-principled man' and 'a man of high principle.' Surely the word ought to be allowed to take its seat in the house, so to say, without further opposition."

In French, qualifying adjectives are formed in the same way as nouns, that is to say, by composition or by derivation.†

Example (by composition)—aigre-doux (=sourish).

Example (by derivation)—courageux (=courageous), from courage (=courage).

This is another instance of the many points of resemblance that exist between the English and the French languages. That being the case, I fail to see any reason for my continuing to side with those who criticise the sensible remarks above quoted, as well as the following ones made (a) by Mr. West, in his Grammar (p. 202, Edition 1898), and (b) by the Authorities of the University of London.

Adjective suffixes—Possessing a quality:—

"(a) English: 'wretch-ed.' The ed in 'wretch' is the ending of the past participle, but it is attached to nouns as well as to verbs to form adjectives, as in 'horn-ed,' 'feather-ed,' 'kind-heart-ed.'

"A great outcry was raised some years ago against the words gifted, talented, moneyed, and a few similar adjectives, on the ground that they are formed like participles, but that there are no verbs from which they come.‡ If, however, we can talk of a 'rag*ged*' beggar, there seems no reason why we should not talk of a 'gift*ed*' poet. The further objection may be brought against talented and moneyed, that they are hybrids, since talent comes from the Greek and money from the Latin. But the same objection might be urged against the past participle of every weak verb of foreign origin in the language, from preached down to telegraphed."

(b) Extract from "Matriculation English" (1869-1880):

"Some maintain that ed is the native suffix used to convert verbs into adjectives, and not nouns. Still there are so many examples coming under this category that it must be allowable; e.g., talented, bigoted, daisied, sainted, skilled, storied, spirited. An objection has been raised against such derivatives, it is true, but there is now a decided tendency to accept the formation in practice."

In conclusion, Sir, I shall take the liberty to repeat Mr. Hales's words: "Surely the word talented ought to be allowed to take its seat in the house, so to say, without further opposition." I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

ADOLPHE BERNON.

61, Talbot Road, Bayswater, W.

"HAVE YOU READ BARUCH?"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—With reference to your "Note of the Week" on Browning's story of Fontenelle and Habakkuk, and the similar anecdote of La Fontaine and Baruch, I believe that Browning was, indeed, deceived by that "hallucinatory faculty" his memory. I never heard of the Fontenelle-Habakkuk story before, but that about La Fontaine and Baruch has been familiar to me ever since my college days in France, some four-and-forty years ago. This is not surprising, as the anecdote has long figured in the various lives of the fabulist, and in nearly all the French encyclopædias, biographical dictionaries, etc. I think, however, that none of them specifies the real authority for the story. Let me repair that omission. I happen to know that it originally appeared in Louis Racine's memoirs of his father, first published in 1747. Louis Racine was too young to have known La Fontaine personally, but he derived this anecdote, like others, from his elder sisters. I may add, perhaps, that the query "Avez-vous lu Baruch?" has acquired a kind of proverbial status in France, being frequently used when anybody has been greatly impressed by what he regards as a remarkable discovery. Various instances of the kind are quoted in Larousse's Encyclopædia (1st Edition). I notice also that the question is given, under "Bazuch," in a familiar English work of reference, Dr. Brewer's "Reader's Handbook." If Fontenelle ever asked anything similar about Habakkuk it must have been jestingly, by way of parodying La Fontaine; but I doubt if he did so, and fear that Browning's memory was at fault.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

ERNEST A. VIZETELLY.

CHILDREN'S COUNTRY HOLIDAYS FUND.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I again appeal through your columns for assistance for the Children's Country Holidays Fund.

The Executive Committee are still in need of a large sum of money, to enable them to carry out the arrangements which have been made, namely, to send away 50,000 children from the poorest classes in London for a fortnight's holiday in the country. The sum of £5,000 is urgently required to meet the disbursements necessary for carrying out the season's work.

The Executive Committee venture to believe that at such a time as this, when most of us who are more fortunately situated are in the enjoyment of our own holidays, this appeal will not be made in vain, and that the Fund will receive the assistance that is so urgently required. All contributions will be received here and gratefully acknowledged by me.

I have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient servant,

ARRAN, Hon. Treasurer.

18, Buckingham Street, Strand, W.C.,
August 17th, 1912.

"OF THAT ILK."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—It is not often that one finds a writer in THE ACADEMY committing himself to a spurious cliché. But I would like Mr. R. A. J. Walling to say exactly what he means by the words I have underlined in the following

---

* As for talentueux, it has now been accepted by Larousse, who calls it "une expression familière."

† Brachet's Public School French Grammar (accidence).

‡ Talented is about as bad as possible. What is it? It looks like a participle. From what verb? Fancy such a verb as "to talent"!—DEAN ALFORD'S "The Queen's English" (1864), p. 100.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

extract from his article on "By-ways of Brittany," in one of your issues of last month :—

> ". . . . and when on the road you encounter Raoul Trevithick, there is nothing but the riband hanging from his hat to distinguish him from Dick Trevithick of that ilk in our own western peninsula."

Of all the phrases which Englishmen have adopted from Scotland as their literary children, this one is the most hopelessly misunderstood. I am, yours, etc.,

THE ATRABILIOUS SCOT.

August, 1912.

BOOKS RECEIVED

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS.

Historical Sketches of Glamorgan: A Series of Papers Read Before the Glamorgan Society, London. Vol. II. By Rev. D. Bryant, M.A., Rev. J. Leoline Phillips, B.A., and Howell Prosser. Illustrated. ("Western Mail." 1s. 9d., post free.)

With the Italians in Tripoli: The Authentic History of the Turco-Italian War. By Chevalier Tullio Irace. With Maps and Illustrations. (John Murray. 10s. 6d. net.)

Catalogue of Parliamentary Papers, 1901-1910. (P. S. King and Son. 5s.)

A History of English Prose Rhythm. By George Saintsbury. (Macmillan and Co. 14s. net.)

The Golden Bough: A Study in Magic and Religion. Third Edition. Part V. Spirits of the Corn and of the Wild. By J. G. Frazer, D.C.L., LL.D., Litt.D. 2 vols. (Macmillan and Co. 20s. net.)

May I Tell You a Story? By Helen Mar. With Portrait. (J. and J. Bennett. 2s. 6d. net.)

MISCELLANEOUS.

Legislation for the Protection of Women. By Lord Charnwood. (P. S. King and Son. 2d.)

Bibliothèque de la Faculté des Lettres:—XXX. L'Isochronisme dans le Vers Français. By Paul Verrier. (Félix Alcan, Paris. 2 fr.)

Lo Rei Lear. Tragedia de Guillem Shakespeare. Translated into Spanish by Anfòs Par. (Associació Wagneriana, Barcelona. 7.50 ptes.)

Cruikshank Reflections: The Past and the Present in Merry Tales and Humorous Verses. With 70 Illustrations by George Cruikshank. (Holden and Hardingham. 1s. net.)

Plato's "Apology" and "Crito," or "The Defence of Socrates" and "The Drama of Loyalty." A New Translation, with the Greek Text Parallel, and Introduction and Notes by Charles L. Marson, M.A. (Andrew Melrose. 3s. 6d. net.)

The Strategy of Nature. By Marshall Bruce-Williams. Coloured Frontispiece. (Association of Standardised Knowledge. 2s. 6d.)

Axiom and Principles of the Science of Organisation. By Marshall Bruce-Williams. With Charts. Second Edition. (Association of Standarlised Knowledge. 7s. 6d.)

Surnames of the United Kingdom. By H. Harrison. Vol. II. Part 4. (The Eaton Press. 1s. net.)

The Cathedrals and Churches of Rome and Southern Italy. By T. Francis Bumpus. Illustrated. (T. Werner Laurie. 16s. net.)

The Book of Revelations of Jim Crow. With Prefaces by Horatio Bottomley and Peter Keary, and Portrait Frontispiece. (J. and J. Bennett. 2s.)

FICTION.

My Escapes. By a Bachelor. (John Long. 6s.)

The Stolen Racer. By Nat Gould. (John Long. 6d.)

Wilhelmina in London. By Barry Pain. New Edition. (John Long. 1s. net.)

The Child of His Adoption. By George Evans. (Herbert and Daniel. 6s.)

The Quest of the Golden Rose. By John Oxenham. With a Frontispiece in Colour by Harold Copping. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

Olivia Mary. By E. Maria Albanesi. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

The Man with the Red Beard: A Story of Moscow and London. By David Whitelaw. (Greening and Co. 6d.)

A Benedick in Arcady. By Halliwell Sutcliffe. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6d.)

Edelweiss. By Rita. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6d.)

EDUCATIONAL.

Black's Sentinel Reader. By E. E. Speight, B.A. Books IV and V. Illustrated. (A. and C. Black, 1s. 6d. each.)

VERSE.

Castle Building, and Other Poems. By Guy Kendall. (A. C. Fifield. 1s. net.)

THEOLOGY.

Getting Ready for the Mission: Suggestions to Clergy Who are Preparing for a Mission in Their Parishes. By the Ven. Archdeacon Donne, M.A. New Edition, with a Preface by the Rev. Canon Mason, D.D. (The S.P.C.K. 1s.)

PERIODICALS.

L'Action Nationale; Bookseller; Constitution Papers; University Correspondent; La Revue; Publishers' Circular; Revue Bleue; Peru To-Day; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly; Mercure de France; Literary Digest, N.Y.; Journal de Psychologie Normale et Pathologique; Friendly Greetings; Sunday at Home; Boy's Own Paper; Girl's Own Paper and Woman's Magazine. Museum of Fine Arts Bulletin, Boston, Mass.; The Atlantic Monthly.

HORLICK'S
MALTED MILK

MALTED BARLEY, WHEAT AND MILK, IN POWDER FORM.

THE COOLING SUMMER DRINK

MADE IN A MOMENT BY STIRRING BRISKLY IN COLD WATER.

Its cooling and thirst-quenching qualities, as well as its nourishing value, commend it to Athletes, Sportsmen, Golfers, Tennis Players, Cricketers, etc.

VERY REFRESHING WITH A DASH OF SODA.

SERVED IN REFRESHMENT ROOMS AND BARS, AT MANY SPORTS GROUNDS, AND IN RESTAURANTS AND CAFÉS.

Of all Chemists and Stores in Sterilised Glass Bottles, at 1s. 6d., 2s. 6d., and 11s.

Trial size free by post on application.

HORLICK'S MALTED MILK CO., SLOUGH, BUCKS., ENGLAND.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Twelve years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO . . AND THROUGH CANADA . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service via Vancouver.

For further particulars apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH AND EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Via the SUEZ CANAL:

Calling at GIBRALTAR, MARSEILLES and NAPLES

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE
PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

. . . Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports.

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, 102, Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours.

R.M.S.P. PLEASURE CRUISES.

To	Fare	Length of Tour	Sailing	From
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Isles, & Madeira.	From £22.	Days 23.	Every Thursday Fortnight.	London.
THE AZORES.	£17†	19.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£12.	8 upwards.	Weekly.	Southampton & Liverpool.
WEST INDIES.	From £40.	From 34.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.
NORWAY.	From £1 a day	13 upwards.	June to August.	Grimsby & Leith.
BALTIC & RUSSIA.	From £1 a day.	24.	August 24.	Grimsby.
MEDITERRANEAN, HOLY LAND & EGYPT.	From £1 a day.	10.	September to November.	Southampton & Marseilles.

† Including Hotel Accommodation.

For further particulars apply:—

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY, London: 18, Moorgate St., E.C., or 52, Cockspur St., S.W.

FEARLESS CRITICISM

In support of principle
In exposure of humbug
In scorn of cant

THE COMMENTATOR

A Weekly Review of Politics, Art, Music, Literature, and the Stage.

ONE PENNY WEEKLY of all Newsagents—or sent direct from the Publishers, for 6s. per annum (post free) or 3s. for six months.

COMMENTATOR, Ltd., 31, Essex St., London

Published for the Proprietor by WM. DAWSON and SONS, Limited, at Cannon House, Breams Buildings, London, E.C.
Branches in Canada: Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg; in South Africa: Capetown, Johannesburg, and Durban.
Printed by BONNER & Co., The Chancery Lane Press, Rolls Passage, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

CONTENTS

	PAGE
Notes of the Week ...	259
Becalmed	260
A Job—and Its Consequences	260
Richard Jeffries	261
Letters and Life	262
Reviews:
The Newer and Older Criticisms	264
Strange Indian Ideas ...	265
Madame de Boigne Again	266
The Revival of the Third Republic	267
In Forbidden China ...	268
The Source of St. Paul's Ethics	268
The Italian Stage ...	269
Two Early Psychologists	270
Shorter Reviews	270
Fiction	271
LITERARY RETROSPECT ...	273
Marc Lescarbot	281
English Apprenticeship and Child Labour	282
The Individual Reader ...	283
The Literary Traveller ...	285
The Stratford Shakespeare Festival	286
Animals at Fault	287
Foreign Reviews	288
Notes and News	289
Imperial and Foreign Affairs	290
Motoring	291
In the Temple of Mammon	292
Correspondence ...	293
Books Received	295

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C., where all communications to the Editor should be addressed.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Notes of the Week

WE are glad to notice that the health of the Kaiser is improving. Although it is usual to depict the German Emperor as "the War Lord," we believe that he is sincerely attached to peace, an attitude which we think does equal credit to his head and his heart. With the splendid Army and the formidable Navy which he has at his disposal, a man of unbalanced judgment would almost inevitably embark on adventures. The Kaiser has shown admirable restraint, and our own wish is that he may live long to control the destinies of Germany in the path of progress and peace.

Students of George Meredith's work will be interested in a valuable little article which appeared in last week's Athenæum, entitled "Meredith's First Published Poem," by Mr. Buxton Forman. The poem alluded to is, of course, "Chillianwallah," but not many people know that it first saw the light in a manuscript magazine called The Monthly Observer, in April 1849, three months before it achieved print in Chambers' Journal. It seems that the editor of this manuscript magazine was also the outspoken critic of the work submitted during his term of office, and he questioned the correctness of certain metaphors used by Meredith. After congratulations, he proceeds to cavil at the phrase "I would fain be deaf and dumb," remarking rather quaintly: "We see no sufficient reason for this wish (which, by the way, does not sound very poetical) unless it be the all powerful one of Rhyme"; and then pulls the poet up for writing of "memory's harp-strings"—"Poetry should be truth, and we submit that memory is not remarkable for harp-strings." This is drastic, if not particularly brilliant criticism; the interesting thing to note, however, is that Meredith adopted his editor's suggestions, and altered the poem considerably by its next appearance!

An irate correspondent of a daily paper proposes an "acting committee of London editors to 'sit upon' each new phrase propounded in trade interests by illiterates who do business in engineering, and to decide what—if any—shall obtain recognition and attain in time entrée to dictionaries of the English language." His wrath has been roused by the hybrid words that are gradually assuming a right to the dignity of the dictionary—such as "aviator," the ugly and clumsy "automobile," and other terms of a similar kind. We have seen many worse suggestions, although we hardly think that "aerobat" and "aerobatic"—despite the authority of the "Clouds" of Aristophanes—are happy words to denote an air journey; nor do "volation" for flying and "volitation" for hovering appeal to us. The fact is that journalists of late years seem to have a rooted objection to using the obvious English compound, such as "airman"—why we know not, since "steamboat," "boatman," "bargeman," "lock-keeper," "boat-house," "bell-rope," and hundreds of other doubled good English words are in constant use; therefore we find such monstrosities as "cinema-theatre," "cinema-de-luxe," and "kinemacolour" affronting our eyes—and worse, perverting the English of the crowd—in almost every town. "Picture-palace" is not bad; but the man who first used "cinema-theatre" ought to be thrown to the lions.

It was with something of a shock that we read, on Saturday last, in the correspondence columns of a paper whose prevailing hue is sea-green, a lengthy letter upon "London Street Grievances," the main portion of which was devoted to a complaint about "the dust nuisance." As every grain of dust has been promptly held down and pinioned by a bulky raindrop during many wet, weary weeks, and not the tiniest whirl or eddy of dust has been seen in the streets or lanes, this protest seems, to say the least, irrelevant. "One sees," says the writer, "regular drifts of it lying on the Whitehall pavement, left to remain there all day long, to be caught up every now and then by the wind, and whisked, with straws, dead leaves, and dirty pieces of paper, into the eyes, noses, and mouths of passengers." Can the letter be a relic from last summer? For the sake of a few warm weeks we would willingly take the risk of two straws, four dead leaves, and one dirty piece of paper affronting us daily during the next month. The whole paragraph is a puzzle; still, correspondence pages must be filled—and it is, after all, the "silly season."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Becalmed

BROOD not on present sadness, lest it grow
Too huge for future joy to overturn.
Th' event thou could'st not change. Then swiftly learn
The steadfast mind that is not prey to woe.
Whither it lists Love's freshening wind will blow;
Soon, soon perhaps, its laughing gusts will churn
The waters of indifference that discern
Naught save the cold moon bidding ebb and flow;
And like an eagle watching half afraid
The home-returning of its nursling fledged,
Thou shalt behold the ship, so long delayed,
With all its freight wherein thy hopes lie pledged,
Ride, when the sun turns to a ball of fire,
Into the Haven of thy Heart's Desire.

MAX PLOWMAN.

A Job—and its Consequences

LORD HALDANE, eminent in the Courts of Chancery, was rather a comic person at the War Office. After infinite labour—abhorrent to Mr. Lloyd George—he evolved a singularly inept system of military service, which has made us the laughing-stock of the world, and which has damaged our diplomatic influence almost beyond repair. As the author of the Gilbertian idea of a volunteer artillery, he should certainly be awarded a leather medal.

Notwithstanding his unbounded belief in himself as a man of war, Lord Haldane has always cast a famished eye on the Woolsack. When his friend Mr. Neil Primrose, in his favourite character of an incorrigible nincompoop, directed his polished pebbles against the man—Lord Loreburn—who had by long and mistaken service given this foolish person the opportunity of sitting on the Government benches, Lord Haldane is believed to have chuckled.

Mr. Asquith, whose speciality is strategic advance to the rear, at once saw his opportunity. Lord Loreburn with all his Radical faults had not the saving grace of dishonesty. The Radical party attach no importance to anything else; the corollary was obvious. Lord Loreburn had to go, and some one had to reign in his stead.

Mr. Lloyd George would have liked Sir Rufus Isaacs, whose oleaginous qualities might have been useful to explain away a recrudescence of Limehouse, to have been Lord Chancellor. Mr. Asquith was in a painful predicament. The War Office must be delivered from the control of a Chancery lawyer, whose idea of an Imperial army was perhaps conceived when he was a private in the "Devil's Own." At all events, the Kaiser would not care to attack a country where his one and only ministerial friend was in high office. Therefore, Lord Haldane must grace the Woolsack, and Sir Rufus Isaacs, to obviate the probability of Welsh bad language, must be admitted to the Cabinet.

The curtain rises, Lord Haldane discovered seated quite comfortably on the Woolsack. First effort: Appointment to the Derbyshire County Bench of Mr. Tom Parker, greengrocer and Unionist. Wrath of Mr. Neil Primrose, the Woolsack-maker. Mr. Asquith on the telephone; precipitate flight of the ex-Army expert. Unionist dealer in garden produce ousted, and a good, or partially good, Liberal appointed in his stead.

The partially good Liberal in an interview is reported to have said, "My name has been put forward three or four times for the Commission of the Peace, and Sir H. H. Raphael knows all about it." We never heard of this foreign gentleman before, but on reference to Debrett's House of Commons, we find that he is positively a first Baronet and member for the Southern Division of Derbyshire, where we are glad to see he was defeated in October, 1900, an experience which we hope will be shortly repeated.

This gentleman—some of these people like to be called noblemen—was a member of the House of Commons when the King issued a Commission to inquire into the method of the selection of Justices of the Peace, and he was a member of the House of Commons when the Report of the Commission was laid on the table of the House in 1910. If this gentleman wishes to be anything more than ornamental it would well become him as a county member to make himself acquainted with the Report of the Royal Commission as a whole, and not to select those portions of the recommendations which appeal to his temperament.

> Speaking generally we in the first place express the opinion that the evils now existing in the system of selecting Justices of the Peace can, to a great extent, be remedied by removing political opinions and political action from the influences affecting such selection.

And again in the report:—

> The selection should be controlled and guided by considerations which will secure that the office shall be filled by men of sufficient ability, of impartial judgment and of high character.

What says Mr. Parker of Woodville as reported in the Daily News?

> I base my claim for the distinction, not upon the amount I pay in rates, but on the service I have rendered to public life and the Liberal Party, though I would rather not introduce the political question.

Sir H. H. Raphael, Mr. Asquith and Lord Haldane "know all about it," and we hope the public will "know all about it," too.

CECIL COWPER.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Richard Jeffries

RICHARD JEFFRIES died at Brighton, twenty-five years ago this month, and some twelve years earlier his first nature essays were published in the Pall Mall Gazette. "No man is appreciated until after his death." This period, however, should be long enough to establish a reputation, and it is a convenient standpoint whence to look back.

The cult of nature has had a wonderful development since the time of Jeffries. The study of wild nature, the love of nature, the worship even of nature, has spread marvellously among the people. The number of books written on the subject during the last fifteen years, to say nothing of a fine and continuous crop of articles in the Press, is startling. Of course, Jeffries is not responsible for all this; some impulse must have come from Science and the Darwin school; still, his influence must have been great, especially on the literary side. We have, moreover, to bear in mind that the English are essentially a nature-loving people. Foreigners have doubted whether we care for music or pictures at all. That we have as a nation a greater love and appreciation of natural beauties than any other in Europe is beyond dispute; even fox-hunting has been adduced in proof of this! There is undoubtedly a very genuine interest in nature among all classes—an interest more active since the study has become a part of school curricula.

The influence of Jeffries is largely an underground influence; he can hardly be called a much-read author, although his books have had a steady sale. He appeals, in fact, to a limited and select audience. The early poets of the nineteenth century, particularly Wordsworth, and, later, Tennyson, did much to educate the popular mind to a more loving attitude towards nature. Jeffries was as true to earth as Wordsworth. Tennyson's landscapes are too intellectual; Shelley's too exotic. These were nature-poets; their attitude towards nature was secondary. Jeffries was a poet-naturalist; his attitude towards nature was primary and practical.

Like Wordsworth, he was a child of the woods and hills. Many an old-fashioned naturalist has been educated in this university. It was the school of Wilson, the botanist of the Dales; of Gilbert White of Selborne; of old Dr. Couch of Polperro. These naturalists were born of the gun or the plough. They were fishermen, sportsmen, or "amateur poachers"—not "undergrads." They loved the crack of the rifle; they studied their craft, observed times and seasons, haunts and habits of wild creatures, so that no shot might be in vain. But the day came, as Jeffries records it, when the hand cunning to kill paused on the trigger, and the keen eye watched. The love of life conquered the love of sport—the naturalist was made. The wilds wrapt him in a trance; nature gave up her secrets. The young Nimrod was transformed into a Hiawatha.

Jeffries was a subjective writer; his matter is drawn entirely from his own personal experience. He interprets this matter entirely through his own feelings. Directly he gets beyond himself he is lost; he cannot deal with information gained at second-hand. The fields, the woods, and the downs he knew, the country people who lived with or around him, and himself—these are what he weaves into books mystic and wonderful. Besant in his "Eulogy" has successfully disposed of Jeffries as a novelist. No doubt he is right in the main, although possibly a little hard on Jeffries. The criticism amounts to this: the earlier stories are too dreadful to talk about; the later—well! the plot is weak or absent, and the books have a nasty habit of leaving off in the midst of it. They are full of moralisings, and, besides, wander off into vague points of once-current politics. Obviously to the novel-reader they are unendurable.

But the point about Jeffries is this. We cannot get a right perspective by reading one book. We cannot know or understand Jeffries' land by taking one walk from Swindon. He reveals himself gradually, and, indeed, never finishes revealing himself. One book helps and interprets another as the books of no other writer do. We speedily forget that Jeffries' so-called stories are stories at all; he is merely introducing us to people he knew. If he had had bettter health and more time, he would have made us still better acquainted with them. Felix is Bevis grown up. Felise is but another and fuller Amaryllis, and each is a girl-Bevis. The other people in his books are the people of his "old village"; we find them in the "novels," in the agricultural sketches, and in the nature essays, drawn in all the lights and side-lights of country life. He did not write many books, but rather one in many parts.

Similarly with landscapes. Jeffries could not limn tropical islands that he had never seen; but Coate Reservoir, the "old village," Burderop Estate, Liddington Hill, and the grand moors he painted with such fidelity and minuteness of detail that he who wanders into Jeffries' land needs no guide. Everything, to the turn in the road, the high wall of the old farm, its orchard, the wayside trees, the willowed brook, the Swindon footpath, and the old stile where the women gossip are all fixed on the reader's mental retina almost as if he had seen them. And so a seemingly commonplace village landscape becomes of supreme interest; we have memories there—not our own, but Jeffries', which we have made our own. We look in summer along one of those common hedgerows; try to see in it something of what he saw—and lo! an hour has gone.

In Jeffries' writings, however, there is much more than mere fidelity. He is an artist and a mystic; he speaks of people we feel to be real, yet unreal. He reveals them to us as a medium might reveal the beings of another world. His mystic ideals and his own yearnings after them form the atmosphere in which these works of his were written. His people, too, are like the family of the Concord pines that Thoreau speaks of; the wind blows through them; the sunbeams shine through their homesteads. Felise and Bevis are children of summer and the sun. They move through a scenic panorama that is natural, yet at the same time subtly idealised. So faithful is it to the ordinary houses, hills, and hedge-rows of Wiltshire that they can be recognised at a glance, yet this historian of the hedgerow sees symbols of things unspeakable and a volume of things unutterable in the corner of a common meadow.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The reading of Jeffries is constructive. One must read him as a whole. His physical world must be built up in the reader's imagination; then the latter must raise over it as an atmosphere something of Jeffries' ideals and something of his feeling-states. It is only by some process of this sort that these glorious books become suffused with living beauty. And because this necessary mental effort is so often lacking, Jeffries will always appeal only to the limited class of real readers. From the earliest story to the latest essay, the books show the struggling of a great soul to utter the unutterable. Those long trances among the hills had filled him with thoughts too long and too deep for mortal pen ever to express. "The Story of My Heart" seems the effort of a dumb man who has learnt some great secret, and strives even in agony to say it, but in vain. The pity of it all, and the wonder of it all, is the pain, disease, and distress out of which these summer-songs were wrung. Ten short years of continued agony and anxiety left us the legacy of these books. We go to Jeffries' land for inspiration, but it is largely to learn the truth of his mystic philosophy. "The brook is dead, for when man goes nature ends. I dare say there is water there still, but it is not the brook; the brook is gone, like John Brown's soul."

W. A. R.

Letters and Life

THERE are two men whose example is responsible for a vast amount of wasted effort—Flaubert and Stevenson. Young writers are obsessed by the example of Stevenson and his notebooks—his playing of "the sedulous ape" to Hazlitt, Lamb, Wordsworth, and Sir Thomas Browne. They remember the agony of effort with which Flaubert's few books were wrung out of him. In their mutual admiration societies they exchange recipes for making short stories out of nothing, and, when a neophyte presents himself, having written one or two lively tales by the light of nature, they tell him to put himself to school with Maupassant. If his native impulse is sufficiently vigorous, this will do him no harm. But not unfrequently a talent that might have developed happily on its own lines becomes cramped and twisted, or the spontaneity is killed out of it, by too docile imitation of a literary model, or excessive conscientiousness as regards the minutiæ of the literary craft. While as for the crew who mistake aspiration for inspiration, they will go on all their lives without discovering that when the divine spark is absent all Maupassant's care in construction, all Flaubert's agonised search for le mot juste, will not bestow it. No doubt it is form that gives immortality to a work of art; but the form is not imposed arbitrarily on the matter; it is linked with it by a vital necessity. The only form that counts is inevitable form—form conditioned by the vital energy of the shaping thought.

There is no doubt that many literary aspirants are handicapped by a lack of that knowledge of the elementary principles of grammar and logic which ought to be given—but is not—to children at school. Grammar has been dropped from the curriculum of modern schools, but little boys are taught to write "compositions" in detestable journalese, and youths are urged to attend debating societies that they may acquire the pretentious fluency so necessary to impose on the crowd of the quarter-educated. They would be better employed in mastering the simple rules that govern the construction of sentences, and learning to express their thoughts logically and concisely. Beyond that, one is rather of the opinion that George Sand held in her correspondence with Flaubert. This woman, with whom, as Sainte-Beuve says, style was "a natural gift," who wrote limpidly and harmoniously without effort and without rest, scarcely understood the plaints which her "Benedictine," as she called him, addressed to her from his retreat at Croisset:—

> You do not know what it is to remain a whole day with your head in your hands, squeezing your unfortunate brain to find a word. Your ideas flow amply, incessantly, like a river; mine are a slender trickle of water. . . . Ah, je les aurai connues, les affres du style.

To this she replies:—

> As to style, I set less store by it than you. The wind plays in my old harp as it pleases; it has its high notes and its low notes, its full tones and its falterings. . . . I can find nothing in myself; it is "the other" who sings in his own way—ill or well. Let the wind play a little in your chords.

According to Stevenson, the art and mystery of writing consists in this—to say what one has to say "clearly, engagingly, and forcibly" and without a superfluous word. Has the magician given away his secret? He is only like Macbeth's witches, who

> Keep the word of promise to the ear,
> To break it to the sense.

In the days before aeroplanes it is said that a man who wished to acquire the art of flying was told to "Get a pair of wings and practise." It is much the same thing to tell a man who wishes to succeed as a writer that he has only to write "engagingly and forcibly." One cannot acquire power and charm; a writer has them or has them not, just as he is born with black or blue eyes. In the long run it is a matter of the quality of his life.

There is nothing that tells more with the public and less with the critics than the mass and momentum of a writer's personality. Read, for instance, contemporary criticisms on Balzac or on Dickens. How the critics reproached Balzac for his melodrama and his sham metaphysics. How they cast up against Dickens his lachrymose sentiment and his violent caricature, his pettiness and unfairness and want of culture. It was all true; the critics were perfectly right. But we see now—we who stand further off from these great men—

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

that, "with all their imperfections on their heads," they rise above the dead level of their times like mountains from the plain. The popular mind with its instinct for force hailed them while the critics were criticising. Now even the critics have come to recognise the fait accompli. Sainte-Beuve said of Balzac that "his personality, his whole organisation entered into his books and revealed itself in them; he wrote them not merely with his intellect, but with his blood and muscles." It is by this fierce vital energy that they appeal to readers today, when the works of more delicate and careful artists are gathering dust upon the shelves.

Sometimes the life-force impresses more by ardour than by volume. It is a thin keen flame, like the genius of Stevenson. "For fourteen years (he wrote) I have not had a day's real health; I have waked sick and gone to bed weary, and I have done my work unflinchingly. I have written in bed and out of it, written in hæmorrhages, written in sickness, written torn by coughing, written when my head swam for weakness, and for so long it seems to me that I have won my wager and recovered my glove." His life was a chivalrous adventure, and therefore it is that in his books we always seem to hear the solitary trumpet ringing down the lists, as the Disinherited Knight presents himself for the unequal combat, overcomes, and takes the prize.

The greatest men of letters have been men of action also, from Thucydides to Macaulay. An exception like Tennyson only proves the rule. It is part of the harmful specialisation of modern life that it causes this divorce between ideas and action. Shakespeare, the man of business; Milton, the diplomat; Fielding, the borough magistrate; Scott, the lawyer-laird, all illustrate the impulse that drives men of real genius to prove themselves by the world's work, and to apprehend by contact with their fellows the essence of drama, which is character in action.

> Es bildet ein Talent sich in die Stille
> Sich ein Character in der Strom der Welt.

Great literature is the outcome of what Goethe meant by "Character."

There is something touching in this craving of men of letters to be men of action. In the "Vicomte de Bragélonne," that rich and noble romance, nobly praised by Stevenson, but not above its deserts, there is a stirring passage in which d'Artagnan, the Captain of the Guards, sums up the glory of the life of action both for the great and the obscure:—

> Je suis de ceux, voyez-vous, qui pensent que les rôles des rois et des puissants valent mieux que les rôles de mendiants ou de laquais. Vous avez commandé, vous avez joui . . . . Moi, j'ai obéi, moi, j'ai pâti. Eh bien, si peu que je vaille auprès de vous, Monsiegneur, je vous le déclare, le souvenir de ce que j'ai fait me tient lieu d'un aiguillon qui m'empêche de courber trop tôt ma vieille tête. Je serai jusqu'au bout bon cheval d'escadron, et je tomberai tout roide, tout d'une pièce, tout vivant, après avoir bien choisi ma place.

So much for the substance of the writer's work, the power that is in him to say his say "forcibly." The charm depends on the colour of his diction and the rhythm of his cadences, i.e., on the exquisiteness of his sensory organisation. A beautiful style is much more the result of the unconscious training of a man's ear all through his life than of any definite effort. Out of all the sounds that accost his sense he gradually makes his own peculiar music. Listen to one of the sweetest prose passages in our literature, the story of how Christiania and her companions pass over the River. It is the cadence of the English Bible, but simpler and sweeter; the plain talk of the man who walks through the fields in the morning while the lark sings overhead, to speak to a few people in a cottage of the deep things of God.

Some writers begin with an imitative rhythm and only gradually develop a genuine music of their own. Others, like Macaulay, rattle out all their lives the same military march. When he began as a youth to write for the reviews, his editor wondered "where he picked up that style." It was the same style to the end, the hard, metallic sentences clanging on their way like a tramping squadron of Roman legionaries. Ruskin, on the other hand, begins by forming himself on Johnson and Hooker. There is the discipline of twenty years between the first and the last chapter of "Modern Painters."

In Scott's early ballads how one hears the tramp of his horse's feet, and how the old place-names that he loved chime like bells on the harness:—

> Where fair Tweed flows round holy Melrose,
> And Eildon slopes to the plain,
> Full three nights ago, by some secret foe,
> That gay gallant was slain.

It is instructive to compare these lines with the deep, subdued pathos of such a passage as that which tells how Frank Osbaldistone revisited in loneliness the wild heath where he had first met his lost love. "When I approached the place where I had first seen her I almost listened for the cry of the hounds and the note of the horn, and strained my eyes on vacant space, as if to discern the fair huntress again descend like an apparition from the hill."

Those who saw Scott in society wondered sometimes how this heavy squire, this good-natured teller of endless old yarns, could have anything of the divine fire in him. The casual visitor might come and go and never once see the great brow light up with "the splendour of a sudden thought." Yet there, for a witness, are Madge Wildfire's songs—"deep as first love and wild with all regret"—steeped in the memories of a strong, silently faithful heart.

What gives its value to any literary work is the quality, the energy, the mass, of the life behind it. A man's art is the expression of his whole personality, and so the best school for letters is life; the best way to learn to write is to deepen, enrich, and elevate one's experience. Perhaps we had better ponder more than we do the words of one who had a right to speak, both as a man of action and a man of letters. "He who would not be frustrate of his hope," says John Milton, "to write well in laudable things ought himself to be a true poem."

D M. J.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

REVIEWS

The Newer and Older Criticisms

Essentials of Poetry: Lowell Lectures, 1911. By WILLIAM ALLAN NEILSON. (Constable and Co. 5s. net.)

Introductions to the Poets. By W. F. RAWNSLEY, M.A. (G. Routledge and Sons. 2s. 6d.)

TO read a volume such as that by Professor Neilson is to receive a lesson in the intellectual tendencies of our times. The influence of the scientific spirit is in evidence on almost every page. The whole work is about as far removed from the old-fashioned type of criticism, with its rigid canons and arbitrary criteria, as one could well imagine. Psychology, that far-reaching and fundamental study, makes itself felt all through these lectures. The very title is an indication of the author's view-point; for where the earlier writer might have called a volume of this type "Canons of Poetry" we have here the deeper and more penetrating "Essentials of Poetry." Latter-day criticism tends to become more and more subjective. This may seem to some to introduce an element of confusion and uncertainty, yet criticism must inevitably work in this direction, since it is the personal impression, which does reverence to very few canons, that is finally our test.

Professor Neilson will have nothing to do with any rigid definitions of poetry: he is too well aware of the fate of all such things. He does, however, help us to know in what true poetry consists far more surely than by the application of a neatly-framed definition. Nor will he use those hard-worked words "classical," "romantic," and "realistic," without trying to understand what is included in each; in the course of this study he proves again the insufficiency of all these terms. However convenient they may be as labels we must guard against accepting them as anything more. Our author is on safe ground when he connects the quality of reason with classicism, that of imagination with romanticism, and the sense of fact with realism; he is thus able to recognise and appraise some of the extremer manifestations of each type, while pleading for that balance of qualities which is ever the mark of the true masterpiece. After an introductory chapter on this balance of qualities there follow chapters on each of the foregoing tendencies. In the course of these we get such an illuminating illustration as the following:—

> When we think of the difference between the Parthenon and the Cathedral of Chartres, we are at once aware of clearly opposed tendencies. In the one we find exquisite proportion and clearly-marked symmetry, a strict avoidance of everything unnecessary and irrelevant, resulting in a chaste simplicity, a fine adjustment of means to ends, a marked unity of conception due largely to a parsimony of detail. In the other, proportion and symmetry are less satisfying; much that is irrelevant, from a rational point of view, is piled on in the effort to obtain richness rather than simplicity; and unity is not so much realised as suggested by a multitude of details, that, in their combined effect, do succeed in rousing a powerful, if vague, emotion. . . . The one satisfies with a sense of repose; the other stirs an insatiable yearning. The one is classical; the other romantic.

The conclusion of the chapter on realism has some wise words:—

> In poetry at large, then, but especially in description and satire, we find the sense of fact an important and even essential element, lending steadiness to imagination and supplying material to reason; producing, when it is in predominance, poetry with the tendency known as realistic, and resulting, when it exists in isolation or in excess, in its own characteristic kind of failure. And lest the frequency and flatness of these failures should impress us unfairly, let us take leave of realism with the recollection that to this tendency belong the triumphs of the genius of Burns; and . . . . that Chaucer, in those parts of his writing that remain most vital, has exhibited in realistic fashion his delicious humour, and his large and free sympathy with all sorts and conditions of men.

One feels that one would like to read a criticism of, say, the latest productions of Mr. John Masefield, by Professor Neilson.

There is a fine chapter on intensity, which quality, however hard it may be to define, is, nevertheless, a leading characteristic in all great poetry. In the course of this we have some acute criticism of Matthew Arnold's essay on the "Study of Poetry." Professor Neilson shows how even that great critic allowed his touchstone of "high seriousness" to lead him to exclude from the front rank such undeniably great poets as Chaucer and Burns. The Professor writes: "One might suggest it as a more fit criterion for a great divine" —with which we are bound to agree. Some searching things are also to be found in the chapters on sentimentalism and humour in poetry. We commend the book as being one of the best examples of the modern school of criticism that, so far, we have seen.

To turn to Mr. Rawnsley's "Introductions to the Poets" is to enter a very different atmosphere. Mr. Rawnsley belongs to the generation for whom definitions and canons of criticism still have mighty power. Nevertheless, this volume has its value. It would be an eminently "safe" text-book for the young person or the beginner in the study of poetry. Most of its information and judgments are those with which all students have been more or less familiar for years. Its compact form is one of its chief recommendations, and those requiring a handy and not over-critical introduction to the greater poets might do worse than get it.

It is hardly fair to criticise too keenly so unpretentious a work, since these papers were originally written for a literary circle and not for publication, but we feel that certain matters need attention. For instance, it was unnecessary to make a slighting reference to Meredith in the essay on Milton—to speak of him as one of "the so-called poets of to-day." Has Mr. Rawnsley never read "Love in the Valley"? Again, it is possible to exalt simplicity overmuch, as our author seems prone to do. We would not detract from the power and genius of Wordsworth, but to apply his characteristics as tests for other poets is hardly fair. This Mr. Rawnsley appears to be doing in his quotations from Matthew Arnold and Christina Rossetti. And why is Dante Gabriel Rossetti treated with such chill brevity? His sister is, we are told, "a really important figure"; Dante Rossetti is a much more important one in English poetry, but we get no hint of this in Mr. Rawnsley's two and a half pages on him. And surely it was unnecessary to belabour Browning's peculiarities and obscurity once more. Mr. Rawnsley evidently does not love Browning, or he would know that the sonnet-like verse he prints on page 223 is not that poet's only exercise in sonnet-form. There is one on "Helen's Tower," which is now in the Browning Society's Papers, Part V; and another in answer to the question, "Why am I a Liberal?" in a publication of Messrs. Cassell and Co. And he should also know that "Hamlyn" is not the proper way to write the name of the famous town of the Pied Piper. But these are perhaps quibbles. The final paper on Tennyson has some good first-hand reminiscences of the poet. We have read the book with interest, and, except for minor blemishes, with appreciation.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Strange Indian Ideas

Omens and Superstitions of Southern India. By Edgar Thurston, C.I.E. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

Though this book is based on information regarding less than a sixth of the population of India, it may be taken as a fair sample of the ideas on the subjects of omens, animal superstition, and, speaking generally, of the whole occult world, which prevail throughout our Indian Dependency, with local and racial variations. It affords evidence of the Pantheism which permeates the East, and of the spirituality which perceives divine or diabolical influences in every manifestation of Nature and is guided by them. The division of the psychical life of the people into chapters of this book, with the index to help, will enable the reader to alight without difficulty on any branch of the study which he may desire to pursue. The author, in alluding to the ill-luck which Indian liquor-vendors consider to attach to their vessels being set upside down, rightly observes that the case illustrates how important a knowledge of the superstitions of the people is in the administration of their affairs. The question is not whether there is justification for the prevalent superstitions; the fact that they do obtain and that the people are influenced by them is the point for the administrator. When such superstitions lead to acts or crimes amenable to the Penal Law, they come, of course, before the police and the courts, and deserve suitable punishment. But where they do not conflict with principles of humanity or transgress the Criminal Law, there are many superstitions and popular ideas which are harmless enough in themselves, though they may appear foolish and unreasonable to the European mind. Some of them have their counterparts in other civilisations, though they may have originated in the East. Omens, for instance, are not unknown in the West.

Mr. Thurston quotes a comprehensive list of the good and bad omens in Malabar; among the Nayars of Travancore the good omens include the elephant, a pot full of water, sweetmeats, fruit, fish, and flesh, images of gods, kings, a cow with its calf, married women, tied bullocks, gold lamps, ghi, and milk. Among the bad are a donkey, broom, buffalo, untied bullock, barber, widow, patient, cat, washerman. The worst of all omens is to allow a cat to cross one's path; it is extremely unlucky, also, on getting out of bed, to catch sight of a cat; this will involve failure in all enterprises during the day. Dogs, also, augur good or bad luck according to circumstances. Indeed, to every animal some superstition belongs. The sight of a jackal is very lucky to anyone proceeding on an errand; a hare forebodes ill-success to a traveller; a cobra or rat-snake should cause postponement of a project; a lizard chirping on the right is good, and on the left bad; there are experts who can interpret the significance of the chirping which may foretell the approach of a case of snake-bite, and whether the patient will die or not. If an owl frequents a house, the building is deserted, the doors are closed, and the house remains empty for six months, when an expiatory sacrifice must be performed. A crow, cawing in its usual rapid raucous tones, means impending calamity; a prolonged guttural note signifies happiness ensuing; an albino crow is a very good omen. Pigeons are believed, on account of their habit of standing on one leg, to lead to poverty. A tortoise in a house, or in a field under the plough, is inauspicious. Other natural phenomena similarly have their interpretations. Sneezing once is a good sign, twice is a bad sign. Comets are regarded as omens of evil. The day of the capture of Seringapatam was inauspicious; the astrologer reported the unfavourable omen to Tipu Sultan, who was slain. The occurrence of twins is regarded as foreboding misfortune. It is believed that a third marriage is very unpromising, and that the bride will become a widow.

Superstitions regarding animals are equally common. When some hill people were measuring grain in a field, and had completed twelve measures, a tiger pounced and devoured them. Ever since the tribe have not dared to have a numeral above twelve, for fear of a tiger repeating the performance. Certain palanquin-bearers will not touch a horse. If a house is infested by mosquitoes, or the furniture or bedding by bugs, the names of a hundred villages or towns should be written on a piece of paper, which is fastened to the ceiling or bedpost, and relief from the pests will be instantaneous. The opponents of the introduction of a chrome-tanning industry in Madras successfully spread a rumour that the wearing of chrome-tanned boots or sandals caused leprosy, blood-poisoning, and failure of eyesight. The evil eye is much dreaded. Food seen by a low-caste man will, in consequence of the inferior substance believed to proceed from his low-caste eye, contaminate a Brahman. When a Governor, or high official on tour, takes particular notice of a person or place, ill-luck is believed to follow. The sudden illness of children is often attributed to the evil eye. Mortal offence is said to be caused to a Hindu lady by remarking on her child, "What a nice baby you have!" or "How baby has grown since I saw him last!" She invariably speaks depreciatingly of her child, representing it as the victim of imaginary ailments, so that your evil eye shall not affect it.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Vows and votive offerings are closely connected with the worship of snakes, to which vows are made and offerings dedicated. Sculptured granite stones representing cobras are consecrated as shrines, at which eggs, milk, and plantains are offered, after lamp-lighting, to invoke the serpent's aid on special occasions. Certain dacoits (gang-robbers) invoke the aid of their deity when they start on marauding expeditions, and, if they are successful therein, put part of their ill-gotten gains into the offertory-box kept at the shrine. Mantrams, or consecrated formulæ, are supposed to be very powerful, and by their aid, as charms, even gods can be brought under control. They are divided into classes, which include magic and cabalistic figures. The amulets and ornaments worn as charms against evil influences are often visible on the wearers. Similarly, human sacrifices have been, and still are surreptitiously, offered to propitiate the earth-goddess and ensure good crops and immunity from all diseases and accidents. The victim, or Meriah, was and is acceptable to the goddess only under certain conditions.

There are specialists among the dealers in magical spells, known as Odiyans, who are credited with supernatural powers, even to the commission of murder. The taking of human life by magic constantly raises the whole question of liability to the Criminal Law. Short of murder, sorcery may work much harm. A human bone from a burial-ground, over which powerful formulæ have been recited, if thrown into an enemy's house, will cause his ruin. Sometimes a sorcerer makes an evil spirit take a vow that it will not trouble anyone in the future, and, in return, offers to it the blood of fowls, goats, etc. Among professional diviners in Southern India, the Karisans of Malabar are pre-eminent, as guiding spirits in all social and domestic concerns, foretelling lucky days and hours, casting horoscopes, explaining the cause of calamities, prescribing remedies for untoward events and physicians—not physic—for sick persons. The whole book forms a collection which goes far to remove the imputation of indifference to native ideas, customs, and beliefs, a matter of great human interest and practical importance.

Madame de Boigne Again

Recollections of a Great Lady: Being More Memoirs of the Comtesse de Boigne. Edited from the Original MS. by M. CHARLES NICOULLAUD. (William Heinemann. 10s. net.)

WITH the publication of the present volume the Comtesse de Boigne has completed her great work, and has covered a period of eighty-one years, from 1781-1862. In the first three volumes her style was perhaps more vivacious, more fresh and buoyant, but in her final pages she has preserved the same deeply human touch, the same intimate way of writing about distinguished people and great historic events. Much of the old gaiety has disappeared, and Death looms largely in these closing lines. There are many regrets, for the Comtesse has left several generations behind, and she has survived those who were dear to her. If she now finds that life "bears but a sombre and monotonous aspect," few have had the good fortune to preserve such a rich harvest of memories, and still fewer have been permitted to give to posterity such a store of inimitable recollections.

The first character to be dealt with in the present volume (1830-1862) is the Duchesse de Berry, a remarkable woman who has not at present become the property of the historian or novelist. The Duchesse de Berry did not take life very seriously. She was chiefly concerned with deriving amusement and pleasure from her exalted position. She certainly gained both, and not a little scandal as well, though her present chronicler deals very leniently with her shortcomings. The Duchesse de Berry was essentially unrestrained and unconventional, and the question of morality was outside the pale of her existence. She had days of "puerile vivacity," days when she would wear male clothing, and in the exuberance of her spirits let off a pistol. She seems to have had an innate sense of irresponsible comedy. She was able to produce the comic at a time when a more moral type of woman would have felt nothing but shame and humiliation. While at Blaye, the Duchesse de Berry gave birth to a child, not the first to have been born out of wedlock. She turned the whole affair into a jest by nominating Lucchesi as the father of her child. "Inquiries were made, and soon the simultaneous laughter of Europe greeted the proclamation that the father was a man who had not left The Hague for two years."

The Comtesse de Boigne gives a vivid account of the death of M. de Talleyrand and of the struggle to restore that sceptic to the bosom of the Church. The description of the passing away of one who had stood face to face with the Revolution and the Directory, of one who had controlled the fate of Europe, makes dismal reading. But the greatness of the man shines through all his fearful suffering. Thus is the scene described:—

> Terrible fits of choking, which almost reached suffocation, prevented him from lying down, while the wound caused by the tumour would not allow him to be seated. He was leaning on his side over his bed with his legs dangling, supported by two valets, who relieved one another, holding his head upon their chests; and from this position he would get up to express his gratitude to his numerous visitors, enjoy their conversation, and find in it some distraction from the pain which he suffered with that patience which is born of courage.

We are given a most tender and intimate account of Princess Marie d'Orléans. She was a woman of rare purity and sweetness, whose only fault, if it may be called a fault, was that she was too good for this world. She possessed the artistic temperament combined with a craving for the infinite. "No one recognised it; it grew up with her, and she succumbed to it." Her match-making mother certainly did not understand her daughter's brilliant genius any more than she understood her daughter's love of mysticism and periods of helplessness. Princess Marie keenly felt the King of Naples' demand for the hand of the Archduchess Theresa. When this slighted Princess was advised to cover her humiliation by adopting the view that she had no wish to marry, but rather desired to remain in her family, she cried: "And when I appear before God with my sculptures in my arms, what shall I say when He asks me: 'Was it for that that I sent you upon the earth?'" Eventually Princess Marie married Duke Alexander of Wurtemberg. It was a happy marriage, but all too short in duration, for at the age of twenty-five Princess Marie passed away, strong in her religious faith and in her love of her devoted husband. Well may the Queen have exclaimed: "Lord, Thou hast an angel the more, but I have lost my daughter!"

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Comtesse de Boigne is of the opinion that the decay of religion in the eighteenth century was replaced by the idea of honour. "To-day," she writes, "there is neither society nor public opinion, and the terms honour and faith have become meaningless; enjoyment and profit have taken their place. Honour has fled for refuge to the army, and it is to be found only beneath its flag."

The Revival of the Third Republic

Nos Hommes d'Etat et l'Œuvre de Réforme. By FRANÇOIS MAURY. (Félix Alcan, Paris. 3 fr. 50.)

FLAUBERT once said that we have had three hundred years of politics—we are not sure of the exact figure, but we are within a century of it—and that we have had quite as much of them as we wanted. There are two principal reasons why the little book that the distinguished editor of the Revue Bleue has just published should appeal to English readers. The first is that it eloquently refutes Flaubert's paradox—a paradox we will call it, though talkers and writers of a certain cast of mind, best known as pessimism, have reduced almost to a platitude the proposition of the bankruptcy of political institutions. M. François Maury does not believe that politics are doomed: all that he sees is that the parliamentary system is beset for the moment by many and great dangers and that a new way of life is to be sought after.

The second reason why "Nos Hommes d'Etat" should be read in England is that it supplies us mutatis mutandis with a good mirror in which to view our own institutions and conditions. There is great virtue in this "mutatis mutandis," and we need not insist on the obvious truth that the contemplation of a kindred polity is more likely to stimulate our political intellects than a course of newspaper reading, or even a careful study of past history. The latter gives us the data in too unrecognisable a shape, and the former, be it never so impartially conducted, can only give us two half-truths, which will be far from amounting to a whole truth. "He is a wonderful man that can thread a needle when he is at cudgels in a crowd." We can discuss French politics without heat, and are therefore likely to get some good from them.

The problems of modern civilisation do not vary greatly as we go from one country to another. In England, as in France, Syndicalism is—we were going to say "the enemy," but taught by M. Maury we will compromise and say merely—the "difficulty." M. Maury, who is obsessed with this chief danger of the modern state, recently organised a debate in the Revue Bleue, of which the object was to elucidate the relations between Syndicalism and Parliamentary institutions. English politicians were among the disputants, and the conclusion most generally supported was that Syndicalism must be treated as Franklin treated the lightning: its powers for evil must be transmuted into powers for good; it must be harnessed for the service of man—that is, for the traditionally organised state. This appears to be the personal opinion of M. Maury, who in the present work sketches a plan by which organised labour may be made to come to the aid of our overworked institutions, and become in some degree a branch of the administration. We are not sure that we perfectly understand the scheme, but it at least suggests a possible clue to the political labyrinth of the future.

M. Maury accuses the Third Republic of consistently sacrificing its greatest men. From Gambetta downwards the leading statesmen have always succumbed to some obscure lobby-intrigue, and have seldom emerged again. Some even, like M. Paul Deschanel, have never succeeded in bestriding the Hippogriff of government. We do not know that this should be expanded into a general proposition—some great men are sacrificed in every age and under every régime—but Democracy when she is identified with "Egalité" is always hard to her best sons. M. Maury, in common with most of the political thinkers of modern France, believes that Proportional Representation would have a great effect for good, in checking the "politique du clocher," in discouraging mediocrity, and in restoring the prestige of the Republic. This reform, as a panacea for all human ills, does not strike the English observer very impressively, but actual conditions give it a very decisive appearance in France.

M. Maury's sketches of French statesmen are very good and convincing. He manages to associate each of his biographies with some measure or movement, and has an interesting habit of finding, consciously and unconsciously, parallels in English politics. He is bent on finding a bed-rock of principle in a statesman before he will consent to praise him. M. Briand, for instance, comes a little under his suspicion as an empiric, though there is no living French statesman whose reputation stands higher. The present ministry is hailed with the most fervent prayers and rejoicings, as incorporating the two qualities that have been longest absent from French politics—faith and the readiness to serve. For the former virtue M. Maury would otherwise have to look back to the only one of his heroes who is no longer living, and he is not a modern statesman, since, for Gambetta, "il n'y a pas une question sociale."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

In Forbidden China

In Forbidden China. The D'Ollone Mission, 1906-1909. China-Tibet-Mongolia. By VICOMTE D'OLLONE. Translated from the French by BERNARD MIALL. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 15s. net.)

IT is customary nowadays for distinguished travellers and explorers to write a popular account of their travels or expeditions, and to hand over their purely scientific observations to experts, who, in the far future and after innumerable hair-splitting debates, will deal with the material in many ponderous tomes. Vicomte D'Ollone has followed this excellent practice, with the result that he has excluded all dry-as-dust, and has, in consequence, written a book that is singularly fascinating from the first page to the last. We have always thought that a sense of humour, valuable in every calling, is most especially serviceable in a foreign country where difficulties are legion. Too often our great travellers take themselves and their missions too seriously. They discover a new river, or climb a mountain that has hitherto been inaccessible, without so much as a faint smile, and sometimes with all too little of the spirit of comradeship. Not so Vicomte D'Ollone. He has filled the double rôle of leader and comrade, and, though he was, for the most part, in the enemy's camp, his delightful sense of the comic never forsook him, and it is this quality, perhaps more than any other, that has given so much charm to this entertaining book.

The principal object of this mission in Central Asia was to study three extraordinary groups of peoples—the Lolos in Szechuan, the Miao-Tze in Kweichu, and the Si-Fan in Northern Tibet. Though at present Vicomte D'Ollone can tell us nothing definite in regard to their origin, he has given us valuable information as to their appearance, manners, and customs, etc. These peoples form an alien race in the Chinese Empire, and they guard their borders with a fierceness and a tenacity of purpose that should maintain their independence for some time to come.

The Lolos are capable of much hospitality, but in order to present wine to notable guests it was necessary "to send out men to beat up the country for a day's march around in order to obtain two or three pints, which as often as not did not arrive until the next day." When the wine was obtained, the Lolo Mr. David Devant subjected the beverage to legerdemain before handing it to the guests. Vicomte D'Ollone writes concerning the Lolo woman and marriage:—

> The young girl, who goes about freely, has perfect liberty of choice, on condition, of course, that she exercises it in her own caste and in the interests of her clan. After marriage she frequently returns to her parents, and each time her husband must exercise all his fascinations to induce her to return to the conjugal roof; if he does not succeed in pleasing her, the woman remains indefinitely with her own family, and no one can criticise her action.

Another custom is that Lolo children do not live with their parents, but "inhabit two large houses, one for the boys and one for the girls."

On one occasion Vicomte D'Ollone and his party were lodged in the most miserable of hovels, with the planks of the roof so far apart that rain came through during the night and soaked the occupants.

> Next morning the rain was still falling, particularly in our house with the breezy roof. One of the slaves to whom we showed in despair the cascades spurting through the openings gazed in astonishment at people who concerned themselves about such trivialities, then went out and returned armed with a lance. It was our turn to be surprised; but he, very naturally and simply, raised the planks of the roof with the point of the lance, made them slide one against the other, and thus contrived a small square of roof which was almost watertight—needless to say very much to the detriment of the rest of the room. A system our builders might take note of!

The Miao-Tze have the curious custom of relating stories concerning the Creation, Deluge, and other early traditions on the occasion of a marriage, funeral, or feast. "The most singular point about these traditions," writes Vicomte D'Ollone, "is the almost perfect identity, in spite of certain items of purely local colour, of their account of the Deluge with that of the Bible."

Not long ago a certain professor discoursed on the advantages of not washing. The Tibetan has for years put this theory into practice, and it would seem that his skin, impregnated with dirt, acts as a protection against the most severe weather. This custom, combined with copious draughts of "buttered tea," renders him immune from even the slightest feeling of chilliness.

The illustration facing p. 306, depicting Commandant D'Ollone offering the Scarf of Felicity to the Dalai-Lama, is a little incongruous, in spite of the explanatory note. The picture is obviously a composite one, but it is a pity that the Vicomte is shown wearing his imposing military hat in the presence of the living representative of the Lord Buddha.

The Source of St. Paul's Ethics

The Religious Experience of Saint Paul. By PERCY GARDNER, Litt.D. (Williams and Norgate. 5s. net.)

OF making books on St. Paul there seems no end, and Dr. Gardner's follows much the same lines as other kindred works, giving us chapters on St. Paul's conversion and calling his ethics eschatology and psychology, concluding with an essay on St. Paul and Modernity. In fact, "Modernity" is the real theme of this work, and St. Paul is now discovered to be remarkably "modern." According to Dr. Gardner, St. Paul knew nothing of the Virgin birth. This is a mere assumption, quite incapable of proof. It is highly improbable that a man who was the constant companion of St. Luke was ignorant of a doctrine which, as Harnack allows, was the common property of Christians at the end of the first century, or at least the beginning of the second century. Again, we are told that to Paul the Resurrection of Christ was not, as it was to the first disciples, a corporeal arising, but a spiritual manifestation. But the whole of St. Paul's dogmatic teaching on the Resurrection of Christ, and the inferred resurrection of Christians makes it difficult to doubt that he believed that the Empty Tomb was a fact of that Resurrection. Dr. Gardner is obviously impatient of creeds, doctrine, and dogma, but it is historically certain that the world was converted and reformed, not by the preaching of morals, nor even by the example of Christ's life, but by the dogmatic facts of His death and Resurrection. These facts, St. Paul plainly tells us in the Corinthians xv, are the Gospel which he preaches—vi 2—Death and Burial and Resurrection.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The value of St. Paul's ethics may not be overestimated, but it is a serious misunderstanding of this great teacher to imagine that his ethics were not entirely based on real solid facts, to which over and over again he makes appeal. "If we believe that Jesus died and rose again." "If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain; and your Faith is also vain." Yet Dr. Gardner actually goes so far as to say in a remarkable passage that "Christ is preached, not seldom, by those who deny Christ; and we can only adopt the Pauline language and say that in whatever spirit Christ is preached, we cannot but rejoice." But how does this view agree with the Pauline language in 1 Corinthians xii: "No man speaking by the Spirit of God calleth Jesus accursed." It is easy to talk of the myths of miracles, but it is difficult to understand the position of those who combine an attachment to Christianity with disbelief in miracles and the miraculous facts of the life of Christ. If the Deity of Christ be denied, as it is in effect, in these essays, then Christianity falls to the level of a system of ethics, evolved out of a hyper-sensitive consciousness. Such a system, however inspiring, leaves little hope for the common man. What Dr. Gardner calls St. Paul's "secret, his mystery of salvation by faith," is not faith in highly spiritualised conceptions, but faith in the historic Christ. This faith, so called "modernity"—which is, after all, nothing new, but as old as the second century—is little likely to destroy. Those who decline to accept, or who attempt to explain away, "the Christologic views based by Paul upon history and experience" may be found in every age. Yet historic faith has triumphed.

The Italian Stage

Plays and Players in Modern Italy. By ADDISON MCLEOD. Illustrated. (Smith, Elder and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

MR. MCLEOD has spent over twelve years in Italy, and during that period he has made copious notes in regard to the Italian theatre, plays and players, and those notes form the basis of the present volume. Mr. McLeod states, in his most excellent introduction, that he takes the stage seriously, but at the same time promises "a laugh and a tear, as occasion shall serve." Although the author makes this claim, he nevertheless frankly admits that he has "little taste for research and little respect for authority." Now research and the wisdom of authorities go a very long way toward making a book of value to the student. Mr. McLeod, however, is essentially original, and has been content to give us his first-hand impressions rather than the impressions of others. He does not claim to have written an exhaustive book on the subject, but he has included nearly all the principal players, and for those who do not appear he has written the neatest and most characteristic dedicatory note we have read for a long time. He has supplied numerous extracts from plays, and, above all, has presented his observations and descriptions with singular freshness and sincerity. "We are struck at the outset," he writes, "by the fact that Italian plays, with a very few exceptions, are occupied with the relations of husband and wife." Husbands and wives, however, are mixed up with mistresses and lovers in that perpetual scheme so dear to the hearts of the great Latin race.

The lengthy chapter entitled "Italian Plays and Playwrights" is extremely interesting, and contains an exquisite translation from one of D'Annunzio's prose plays. It is in these pages that Mr. McLeod's critical faculty is at its best. In the following chapter devoted to Italian players, and especially in regard to his opinion of certain actresses, many of his comments are lacking in a due sense of proportion. He strikes too familiar, too intimate, a note, and is obviously unduly biased by a pretty face and a charming figure. He writes:—

> Tina di Lorenzo! The name suggested to me a little, elusive, dark-eyed thing. The sort of creature on whom you might chance in some peaceful green hollows, feeding a goat; who, in response to your eager request, would give you to drink out of the cool, clear stream; look bewitchingly into your face and then vanish, leaving your heart uplifted with fruitless desire.

So much for the author's fond imaginings. When he actually saw Tina di Lorenzo he found some one essentially substantial—one who might possibly become fat in her old age. "Her arms and legs . . . while being shapely, looked really muscular. I tried my own forearm before the looking-glass, and was not altogether pleased with the result." This is a mild description when compared with his racy eulogy of Dina Galli; but his estimation of Eleonora Duse is sound criticism, as are also many of his remarks concerning famous Italian actors.

Mr. McLeod does not seem to have been very favourably impressed with Grasso, and admits that he was a failure in two acts from "Othello." His criticism, however, is only based on a snippet from Shakespeare and "Cavalleria Rusticana," material far two slight to judge, much less to condemn, so distinguished an actor. But, apart from one or two lapses, the author has done his work well, and has presented us with an excellent study of the Italian stage, the classical and dialectical schools, the types of plays and the personalities of the leading players.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Two Early Psychologists

The Value of a Maimed Life: Extracts from the Manuscript Notes of Thomas Wedgwood. Selected by MARGARET OLIVIA TREMAYNE; with an Introduction by MARY EVEREST BOOLE. (C. W. Daniel. 2s. 6d. net.)

Johann Friedrich Herbart: A Study in Pedagogics. By A. M. WILLIAMS, M.A. (Blackie and Son. 1s. net.)

ONE has to read of the work of two pioneers in psychology such as Wedgwood and Herbart in order to realise the great advances which have been made in that science. Yet, on the other hand, one is equally impressed with the indebtedness of later writers to these workers among the foundations. The name of Wedgwood will not call up many associations connected with psychology in the minds of most. We may as well explain at once, therefore, that he was a son of the famous potter, and that the period of his activity covers the closing years of the eighteenth century. The contents of this little volume seem to be the first evidence of a direct kind that we have as to his potential greatness. He was held in high esteem by Wordsworth and other equally important contemporaries, and some have been puzzled to account for this fact. This book supplies us with a few indications that help us to understand.

There is something almost romantic in the story of the discovery of a long-lost box of notebooks and loose scraps of paper in Wedgwood's handwriting. The work of deciphering and setting them in some kind of order is told by Mrs. Boole in a valuable introduction, and we are reminded of the story of the Teufelsdröckh papers in "Sartor Resartus." That Wedgwood had in mind some magnum opus seems likely. The chief contribution which he made to the thought of his times was probably a recognition of the value of introspection and of the study of subjective emotions. This work he carried to such lengths that it endangered his sanity, and no doubt aggravated his already weak state of health. His aim seems to have been to teach men how to enjoy life in the fullest fashion, and to get rid of the bogies of gloom and depression, whether springing from pain or religion or any other cause. The picture of him, a bachelor, conducting his observations in his brother's nursery on children almost from the hour of birth is at once humorous and impressive. He was the precursor of many such workers.

The detached thoughts here published are keen observations, if not always profound. Occasionally we get such a Shaw-like reflection as the following:—"If once Madmen should outnumber us in our senses we shall change places with them and become the Madmen of the day. For what is Madness but a difference of opinion from the majority?" Here, too, is a sharp thrust, which still has point:—"Ladies are educated for a month's elegant Courtship rather than for years of Mothership." When we are told by Mrs. Boole that "Charles Darwin's mother was the sister and his wife the niece of Thomas Wedgwood, whose ideas in reality constituted, we may say, the religion in which those ladies were brought up," we have, perhaps, the best indication of Wedgwood's influence on the world of thought. The educationalist, the parent and teacher, will find much matter for stimulating thought in these pages.

The name of Herbart is a much more familiar one to students of educational theories, for he stands in the front rank as an innovator in this realm. Although his lifetime covered the period from 1776 to 1841, his psychology, and still more his pedagogy, have a value beyond most of the thought of that time. The book now under review is a very good small compendium of his life and work. There is in it a brief yet sufficient biography, a few words concerning his logic and metaphysics, and as adequate a treatment of his activities as could be given within the limits of the volume. We heartily commend it to all students who want to know something clear and definite concerning Herbart without the trouble of consulting many larger works.

Shorter Reviews

Across Australia. By BALDWIN SPENCER, C.M.G., and F. J. GILLEN. 2 Vols. Illustrated. (Macmillan and Co. 21s. net.)

THIS work appears likely to prove of permanent value, not only on account of the subjects of its text, but also by reason of the exceptional interest of its illustrations. Indeed, it appears to us that the benefits of modern photography have seldom been more fully demonstrated. In the past it was a comparatively simple matter, the feat once achieved, to give an account of the aboriginal tribes met with in the course of wanderings into the unknown. At the same time—since in the absence of doubters and questioners of accuracy the world would probably cease to be—it was an even simpler matter for others to rise up and challenge these accounts, thus frequently loading the unfortunate traveller himself with no small amount of bitterness. Among its numerous other merits, it is in respect to its photographs that "Across Australia" proves itself such a notable document. The authors, in crossing Australia, undertook a somewhat similar journey to that of MacDonall Stuart fifty years ago. They found that in the course of half a century the changes in the interior of Australia had amounted to practically nothing at all. This was fortunate, if for no other reason than the fact that it enabled the authors to produce the present volumes, showing the black fellow at work, at play, and, most notably of all, in all the varied rites of his numerous ceremonies. It cannot be doubted that this book will make a profound impression upon the scientific world as well as upon the general reading public.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

A History of Divorce. By S. B. KITCHIN. (Chapman and Hall. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE subject of divorce has for some time past excited so much attention and provoked so much controversy that Mr. Kitchin's contribution is welcome. Without claiming to present anything in the nature of a complete history, the author epitomises the principles followed in Roman Law, in the Early Church, and in the Canon Law, shows the effect of such social upheavals as the Reformation and the French Revolution, and sums up briefly the tendencies of thought in relation to the problems of marriage and its dissolution in England and its colonies and in the United States of America. The author might well have sketched in outline the primitive notions as to the property of a husband in his wife, and their survival in modern practice, illustrated for example by the practice of condemning the guilty co-respondent to pay damages and the costs of a suit for the dissolution of marriage.

We recently had occasion to peruse Earl Russell's book upon the subject of divorce. Readers of that book who were moved by the arguments therein presented would do well to consult Mr. Kitchin's work: for by so doing they would be enabled to realise how the present position of the laws relating to matrimonial matters, against which Earl Russell inveighs so forcibly, came to be what it is. Those readers of the book now before us who desire to make further inquiries into the legal practice relating to divorce, as administered in various parts of the world at the present day, should refer to the journal of the Society of Comparative Legislation, where detailed accounts of the actual working of the various laws are furnished.

The Art of the Orator. By EDGAR R. JONES, M.P. (A. and C. Black. 3s. 6d. net.)

MR. LLOYD GEORGE, in the "Foreword" to this book, tells us that he once heard Mr. Gladstone say that in a conflict between the platform and the Press for the direction of public opinion in this country, an efficient platform would surely win. The author endeavours to achieve, in a modest way, towards the rendering of the platform more efficient. Most of us realise nowadays that men cannot be made good by act of Parliament; but just as they may be made a little better by legislation, so the orator, and the would-be orator, may be rendered more efficient by instruction in principle and method. The groundwork upon which the author bases his treatise is psychological, but he has made it such more or less as an experiment, and he candidly confesses that he has "blundered through the whole in a spirit of inquiry," and remained "a timorous student on the threshold of a great subject." Although it may be objected at the outset that what is alleged to be true of the poet, nascitur non fit, applies with equal force to the orator, one has but to recall the disastrous beginnings of such orators as Demosthenes and Disraeli to recognise the value of training. Again, scarcely one of us but has experienced the disappointment of listening to somebody who, having something of real importance to convey to his audience, failed of success by reason of an imperfect schooling in the act of oratory. To such a speaker the study of this small volume should prove of assistance.

The Retrospect. By ADA CAMBRIDGE. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

A PRETTY, naive, and essentially feminine enthusiasm characterises this "retrospect." Those who like the modern neurotic, or the "risky" type of novel will probably vote it very tame stuff, and hopelessly old-fashioned; but those who are fond of the tenderly reminiscent served up with a certain amount of literary skill will be very well satisfied. For it is not a novel at all, though it looks extremely like one at first sight. It is the story of a visit to England by a lady who had been absent in Australia for thirty years. There are some good bits of descriptive writing all through the book, the most interesting of which, to an English reader, are, perversely enough, in the first chapter, which details the events and scenes of the homeward voyage. The rest of the volume consists of a minute journal of days spent in various charming districts of our island, all touched with the glamour of home-sickness. Mrs. Cambridge has been out of England long enough to give us a picture of ourselves as others see us. The things most noticed are those that appeal more especially to the feminine mind, and this leads to occasional triviality. East Anglians will be interested in what Mrs. Cambridge has to say about their country; and they of Wessex need not feel aggrieved since they are also catered for. The pervading atmosphere is of the comfortable, "now-let-me-tell-you-all-about-it" type, which carries a long way with some readers. Such a volume should sell largely in Australia, but its reception in this country will be doubtful, we fear. We commend it to all who have a liking for tender and not too exalted sentiment.

Fiction

Daphne in the Fatherland. (Andrew Melrose. 6s.)

DAPHNE'S remark, "To me in England the great dividing line seems to be between those who dress for dinner every evening and those who don't," supplies the keynote to her character. She is to a certain extent a snob, and to a very large extent a flirt, who went on a visit to Germany, and described her experiences in woefully slipshod—not to say ungrammatical—fashion.

We are led to believe that the author or authoress of this book remained anonymous because the story concerns many great personages who are yet in the land of the living, but we can assure the aforesaid author or authoress that concealment of identity on this score was totally unnecessary. There is a chapter devoted to an encounter—tea and supper included—with Kaiser Wilhelm and his family, and a good amount of space is given to what society paragraphists would call the "intimate and personal life" of a certain Prince Bernhard and Princess Charlotte, his wife. But nothing is told here that the paragraphists have not already told, in effect if not in detail, and the book is innocent of thrills dependent on court revelations. The heroine found that her great personages were rather ordinary, and at times we find them rather dull.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Let Daphne be given credit, however, for her skill in the descriptions of such scenery as she encountered, for some piquant observations on the habits and character of the German people, and for skilful management of her own love affairs—which were many. The book is interesting—and no more—by reason of these things; Daphne was too young for sociology, also for scandal.

Neighbours of Mine. By R. ANDOM. Illustrated. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

MANY people who live in the suburbs complain that they are dull. It would be impossible for any of the inhabitants of Woodville to lay a similar charge against the town in which they live; for it is not likely that, within the radius of a few hundred yards, a more noisy, boisterous, or outrageous set of people than those living in Woodville could be found. There are the Zaalbec Twins, for instance, one of whom is humoured and forgiven his kleptomanic habits on account of his soft brain, until, on the return of the populace from a fête at an adjoining village, it is discovered that all the plate and valuables had been removed from each house, and that the "twins"—whom no one had ever seen together—consisted of a clever member of a gang of burglars, who ultimately had their deserts. A few doors away there is the innocent-looking but naughty child, whose pranks land his father in the police court; over the garden wall resides the gentleman who shot the rich relative's cat; in Mozart Avenue a gramophone plays Schubert all day and far into the night; and in a few of the otherwise eminently respectable villas, the head of the house is occasionally known to take too much of his favourite liquor with results that must be left for the readers of the book to discover for themselves. Each chapter is rollicking and bright, and the humour swings along right merrily until the last page is reached.

My Escapes. By a BACHELOR. (John Long. 6s.)

THE bachelor was a guileless young man of twenty-eight with ambitions and one hundred and fifty pounds a year. In order to eke out his modest income he tried by every means in his power to make himself pleasant to people who lived in nice houses and gave good dinners. The plan succeeded admirably after much labour and some fruitless efforts, but in obtaining the coveted position of being something to many people it had been necessary to be on very good terms with any and every lady who might lend a helping hand. Roughly, these ladies number about twelve, and when impecunious Richard comes into a fortune of about twelve thousand a year each lady calls, writes, or otherwise gives him to understand that she considers him to be her especial property, and the book is mainly concerned with his manœuvres to elude the fair charmers. The situation is comic—the bachelor regards it as pathetic—and it would be quite easy for an author to strain it too far. This is not done in the present instance, however, and a very enjoyable story is the result. The happy idea of a tea party where they shall all meet is quite brilliant, as is also the after-tea speech, and although delivered with much trepidation, it serves its purpose and leaves the poor bachelor without further molestation and free to give his whole attention to the one woman who did not pursue him.

What Diantha Did. By CHARLOTTE PERKINS GILMAN. (T. Fisher Unwin. 4s. 6d. net.)

IT is often pointed out that the American novelist is never so happy as when dealing with the growth of a business, the shattering of a trust, the bitter war of speculators, the homely, honest life of the decent commercial man, or some such topic. The ordinary English story-writer, feebly adventurous, feebly realistic, feebly psychological as usually he is, produces nothing but the commonplace, while his American rival, happier in the choice of a subject, attains by no greater skill a far greater interest. Miss (or Mrs.) Charlotte Perkins Gilman is a case in point. We know nothing of her standing in her own country, but we confess quite frankly that, had her book been concerned merely with a story, we should have found it dull. None of her characters is more than a common type commonly portrayed, but they are all subservient to the business and social enterprise which the book records, and the effect is happy. "What Diantha Did" was no less than to solve the servant problem for a Southern Californian town. She left her home and, herself a daughter of the servant-employing class, became a domestic servant. Needless to say, she was an ideal one. Needless to say that her wages were high and her rise rapid. Such successes belong of right to a heroine. But the authoress is not content with telling us that Diantha accomplished certain things, such as housekeeping with genius for a large establishment, founding a club which sent out servants by the day and hour, discovering the perfect sandwich, and, last and greatest of all, starting a system to supply cooked meals in wonderful aluminium containers which held everything necessary for a meal except a table. We are not only told of these events, but we learn their sordid financial details, we read their budgets, and we audit their accounts. He will be a dull fellow whose mouth does not water over the "Cafeteria," and she an unusually acquiescent housewife who does not long for one of those aluminium food-containers, so radiant, so piping-hot, so deliciously mysterious in their contents.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

LITERARY RETROSPECT

TO

THE ACADEMY

CONSISTING OF

NOTABLE ARTICLES, REVIEWS, Etc.,

WHICH HAVE APPEARED FROM TIME TO TIME IN "THE ACADEMY" AND "LITERATURE" SINCE THEIR INCEPTION.

An English Academy

(LITERATURE, November 27, 1897.)

AT certain recurring periods, as we have just been reminded by Mr. Swinburne's justly but amusingly wrathful letter to the Times, the public are invited to discuss the wholly unprofitable question why there is not, and whether there ought not to be, an English Academy of Letters. The revival of this discussion is not the result, at least nowadays, of any general conversion to Mr. Matthew Arnold's well-known theory as to the "literary influence of Academies." Rather it is an outcome of the almost universal instinct of modern man to summon his fellow-men engaged in the practice of any art, craft, or pastime to a competitive examination, with the view of placing them in order of merit, and allotting "marks" to them accordingly. In other words, the amateur Academy-makers of the present day are actuated, not so much by zeal for the preservation of the purity and dignity of the English language, as by a desire to express their own opinions on the comparative deserts of English authors. What the Forty Immortals are to do when they are once finally established in undisputed possession of their sacred armchairs is a matter with which the average elector does not apparently care to concern himself. The fun consists in getting some of them into their armchairs, and, still more, perhaps, in deftly and unexpectedly withdrawing the fauteuil from beneath others who may have confidently supposed themselves entitled to a seat. It is felt to be excellent sport to exclude a poet of supposed eminence from the illustrious conclave, or to give a highly popular novelist to understand that his many "fiftieth thousands" will not avail to secure him a place amongst the first forty men of letters of his day. This is a comparatively harmless, if slightly childish, amusement, and as such well calculated to entertain a "literary" community who are so much more keenly interested in "talk about literature" than in literature itself. But to any serious student—not to say any competent critic—of literature an observation of the general results of this little plebiscitary game must frequently form occasion for heartfelt rejoicing that we have not, nor are ever likely to have, an English Academy of Letters bestowed upon the country by a process of democratic acclamation.

It is needless to say, of course, that Mr. Arnold was not himself a victim to this passion for "placing" his literary contemporaries. Indeed, one can hardly conceive anything which would have given more pain to that most fastidious of critics than the mere suspicion of any such design. He would, no doubt, have been profoundly shocked at the suggestion that he should himself draft a list of Forty Immortals with Cardinal Newman at their head, and Mr. Palgrave and Mr. Kinglake excluded for having respectively written with "provincial" intemperance of the art of Baron Marochetti and the character of Napoleon III. His sole concern, in fact, was not with the personnel of his imaginary English Academy, but with what he assumed would be its work. Those who have not forgotten, or who have recently refreshed their memory of the famous essay, will recollect its main thesis, handled throughout in a manner which makes it at once one of the most delightful, and quite the most delightfully inconsequent, of his writings. He started from the assumption that the existence and the activities of the French Academy are actually operative to preserve the purity of the French language and to impose an authoritative standard of literary taste upon French writers; and from this he went on to assume that the practically uniform observance of such a standard—either lacking altogether or else rudely and anarchically defied in this country—was an effect of the existence of the French Academy and not its cause. Two more remarkable exploits in the athletic exercise of jumping to conclusions have never, perhaps, been performed by the most agile of intellects either before or since. The absolutely baseless character of the former assumption would probably have been brought home to Mr. Arnold if he had lived to witness the full development of the modern school of French Decadents; though, indeed, the recollections of his own boyhood, or, failing these, the recorded literary history of the Thirties and the complete overthrow of "authority" by the young Romantics of that date—when the Academy, who were presumably

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Classicists in about the proportion of thirty-four to five, proved as powerless to resist the movement as it would have been to proscribe the colour of Théophile Gautier's symbolical waistcoat—might surely have saved him from his original error. As to the second assumption, he may almost be said to have given it away himself in describing the French Academy as "an institution owing its existence to a national bent towards the things of the mind, towards culture, towards clearness, correctness, and propriety in thinking and speaking." Strange that so lucid an intellect should have failed to perceive that this "national bent" counts for almost everything in the result, and the Academy, which is only the organised expression, for next to nothing; that where this "bent" prevails in a nation Academies are superfluous, and that when it does not they are powerless.

The Frenchman's admiration of and solicitude for his language were no doubt a little exaggerated by the great English critic; but they are undoubtedly much more of a national characteristic, much less confined to a special professional class, than are the corresponding sentiments in England. No one can compare the conversation of the average educated Frenchman, say in a railway carriage, with that of the average Englishman in the same position—the one lovingly polishing his elegant periods, the other flinging out his remarks in a sort of colloquial shorthand—without being keenly sensible of this international difference. Its causes we need not inquire into, but the fact is beyond dispute that while ordinary French conversation aims more or less consciously at literary form, English dialogue, on the other hand, appears to be mainly modelled on the telegram form. No doubt we could improve a little upon this elliptical mode of expression, and some of us endeavour to do so; but temperamental differences between the two nations will always prevent the average Englishman from acquiring that sort of artistic interest in his own language as a means of expression which comes naturally to a Frenchman. That, Mr. Arnold might have said, is the very reason why the English specially require an Academy of Letters. Unfortunately it is only the reason why such an institution would be useless. And if that might have been perceived even in the Sixties, how much more evident has it become in these days of half-education and sham culture, when, relatively to the vast mass of people who concern themselves with what they suppose to be literature, the number of those whose taste is pure and who have that care for "clearness, correctness, and propriety in thinking and speaking," which Mr. Arnold spoke of, has shrunk to so infinitesimal a proportion of the whole. Never were they in a worse position for "imposing on us a high standard in matters of intellect and taste"; and never, perhaps, were they less inclined to try. For they have most of them arrived at the half-pessimist, half-optimist conclusion that while they can do nothing to help the cause for which Mr. Arnold so eloquently pleaded, it is just possible that the cause may not want their help. It has occurred to them that, after all, perhaps English literature may be able to take care of itself, and that the good in it is as sure to survive and to propagate itself as the evil, in all its thousand forms—and editions—is certain to disappear.

Andrew Lang on "She"

(January 15, 1887.)

She. By H. Rider Haggard. (Longmans.)

As Mr. Rider Haggard has dedicated his new romance, "She," to his present reviewer, he has made it impossible for his friend to notice the book in any journal where signed names do not put the reader on his guard against "the personal bias." I might review it as Coleridge's friend did the apple dumplings, "Them's the jockeys for me." For "She" is a book of which it is hard to give any but a personal or subjective estimate. There are stories which, like the murder applauded by Toad in the Hole, you can safely "recommend to a friend." One would need to know the friend very well before recommending to him "She." Nothing, says George Eliot, is more destructive to friendship than a difference of taste in jokes. But a difference of taste in novels is nearly as apt to poison affection. I have acquaintances to whom I dare not mention Thackeray, others with whom "Huckleberry Finn" is a tabooed subject, and one who does not like "Pickwick"! The peace cannot possibly be kept with some otherwise excellent men when these apples of literary discord are thrown on the table. One forebodes that "She" will set friend against friend and sister against sister. People are pretty sure either to admire "She" very hotly, or to condemn the fair enchantress with extraordinary vigour. Almost all works of fantasy provoke these differences, whether the fantasy be funny, like Mr. Anstey's, or supernatural, like "The Beleaguered City," or "beyond the bounds of explored Romanticism," like the poems of Baudelaire (according to Sainte-Beuve), and like "She." People will swear by these performances or will denounce them, and you cannot tell beforehand what line anyone will adopt. To myself "The Beleaguered City" seems a work of actual genius, moving in fresh fields of the imagination; to other readers it appeared like the mere maunderings of a chimaera bombinans in vacuo. But one should have some reason for the opinion that is in one; and I will briefly say why I like "She," without attempting to make proselytes, or predicting that readers of The Academy will like it.

The book is a legend, not a novel; and the action, which begins about 250 B.C., ends the day before yesterday. Amenartas, a lovely Egyptian lady, fled from the Egypt of the third century with her Greek husband, Kallikrates, the most beautiful of men. They came, off the East Coast of Africa, to a race who "put pots on the heads of strangers," and there met a lovely white woman, dowered with life and beauty that do not die. This woman, Ayesha, loved and, in jealousy, slew Kallikrates. Amenartas escaped, wrote out the history on a potsherd, and bequeathed it, with the duty of revenge, to her son. The potsherd was handed down from one to another, till it reached Leo Vincey, a young Cambridge man. The family of Confucius, by the way, is even older than Vincey's, so Gibbon declares. Vincey and his friend Holly, a learned don (with a style by no means donnish) achieve the adventure. They reach the ancient city of Kôr, and find Ayesha, lovely as ever, dwelling in the catacombs of a mighty civilised race that fell—as mysteriously as the central American peoples fell—before the rise of Egypt.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Of course, all this, as a sporting writer said about the reading of "Paradise Lost" from beginning to end, "is impossible and not to be done." But the more impossible it gets, the better (to my taste) Mr. Haggard does it. The conception of an undying character is older than Herodotus. Wandering Jews, Salathiels, and the like, populate the realms of fiction. But Ayesha—"She who is to be obeyed"—does not resemble them. The miracles she can work; as when she lays her hand on her rival's dark hair, and leaves the snow-white score of three fingers on her locks, or when the flames follow and fall with her lowered and lifted arms, are a new kind of miracles. Her despair as she watches by the life-like embalmed corpse of her lover, Kallikrates, dead for two thousand years—moves me like few scenes in fiction. The whole story is an allegory of the immortality of love, which death cannot destroy, nor the force of fire abolish it. Mr. Haggard's practical knowledge and experience of savage life and wild lands, his sense of the mystery and charm of ruined civilisations, his appreciation of sport (especially with big game), his astonishing imagination, and a certain vraisemblance, which makes the most impossible adventures appear true (to a reader of sympathetic fancy), these are the qualities a man admires in "She," if he chance to admire it at all. Were one to enumerate drawbacks to such a reader's enjoyment, it might be said that the humour may not be always to his mind, though it is a foil to the terrible passages. Again, some of the scenes of savagery (as when the pot is made red for the stranger, in a kind of Voudou feast, and as in the scene of the Black Goat) are too awful for many young and old students. Ayesha, moreover, discourses, perhaps, at too great length; but then she had not met educated companions for two thousand years, and was full of suppressed conversation. The style is that of Alan Quatermain rather than of a Cambridge don, though Holly is such an unusual kind of Don that this may be of slight importance. Against all this a reader in tune with his author (for all depends on that) will set the scenes in the sculptured catacombs, and the vision of moonlight in the city of Kôr, the dead satellite shining on a city long dead, and the pathos of Ayesha's last caress. But this, be it reiterated, is the sense of a reviewer attached to impossible romance, of one who confesses himself incredibilium cupitor, an amateur of savage life, fond of haunting, in fancy, the mysterious homes of ruined races, a believer, too, in the moral of the legend.

Here is a "grown-up" literary estimate of "She." How it will suit boys experiment must declare. Tried on a youth in the Middle Fifth, the experiment answered rarely, bringing peace through a whole day, when every form of sport was impossible, and life appeared to be "drawn blank." Any man who is enough of a boy will want to ask: "How did Ayesha get to Kôr?" and "What happened afterwards in Thibet?"

ANDREW LANG.

Madame Guilbert: By Henry Harland

(LITERATURE, June 4, 1898.)

HER name was properly Madame de Chaussonville; but there were several branches of the Chaussonville family in our part of the world; so, for convenience' sake, the neighbours spoke of her as Madame Guilbert, Guilbert having been the Christian name of her husband, dead these innumerable years.

When my grandmother asked, as she used every now and then to do, "Would you like to come with me this afternoon and call on Madame Guilbert?" I always answered eagerly with a Yes. She was a wonderfully good-natured, appreciative old lady, she was lavish of honey-cake, and she had the most interesting chocolate—chocolate with a faint flavour of cinnamon. The chocolate in our own establishment tasted of nothing but chocolate, and seemed to me the height of commonplaceness.

Then we would set forth side by side, my dainty little old grandmother and I, to walk to Château Yroulte, where Madame Guilbert lived, a distance of half a mile or so, through the pleasant weather. We would leave the hamlet of Saint-Graal, with its crumbling stone crucifix, its white-walled cottages, its peasants, and its lean black pigs, we would leave Saint-Graal behind us, and strike leisurely across the fields, skirting the Forest of Granjolaye, a forest of chestnut trees, luminous with a hundred greens and golds in the bright Gascon sunshine. Cattle browsed sleepily in the fields we crossed; the turf was starred with celandine; here and there you might surprise a colony of mushrooms—that sort of vegetable game; and wild roses blossomed in the hedges. Far way to the south the wry masses of the Pyrenees glowed in a purple haze, a dust of amethyst, and hid the mysterious colour-land, the Spain of castles and splendours, which, one knew by hearsay, lay beyond them. And at our feet purled and babbled the briskest of little brown brooks, hurrying impetuously on to dash itself into the Adour—such light-hearted self-destruction! In the end we would come to a place where the hedge was broken by a turnstile, and when we had passed this we were in one of the by-paths of Madame Guilbert's garden.

It was a big rambling old garden, a good deal neglected. The grass grew long between the trees, the trees themselves were untrimmed, uncared-for, and the box that bordered the flower-beds had shot up till it was higher than my head—though that, perhaps, in those days, was not so high as I could have wished. And the whole garden smelt of the box—you know the hard clean smell of box, when the sun is ardent. There weren't very many flowers in the flower-beds, and the few that were there had to contend with multitudinous weeds. But of the flowers that bloom without attention under the friendly Gascon sky the garden was opulent: lilac and jessamine; magnolias, camellias; anemones and jonquils; iris, narcissus, and wild hyacinth; roses, oleanders, cyclamens, azaleas: according to the season, embroidering their airier perfumes upon the strong smell of the box. There were birds and bees and butterflies, besides, and countless alert little lizards, that whisked out of sight the instant you thought of trying to catch them, the suspicious creatures.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The house that stood in the middle of this neglected old pleasaunce looked neglected too. Its long pale-grey façade, its high-pitched red-tiled roof, were stained with lichens, green, pink, or yellow, in fantastic streaks and patches. For the most part the Venetian blinds that shielded its many windows were close-drawn, and the window-panes were dingy with immemorial dust. It looked neglected, it somehow just escaped looking uninhabited, but it did not look in the least gloomy or desolate; it looked peaceful, tranquil, drowsy. Very nearly uninhabited, for that matter, it was. Only Madame Guilbert, her nephew Monsieur Raoul, her maid Léocadie, and perhaps one or two other servants lived here; and surely Château Yroulte was vast enough to have housed a regiment.

It was Léocadie who let us in, when we had rung the door-bell, a tall, gaunt, elderly serving-woman, brown-skinned, hawk-nosed, as the peasants of that corner of Gascony are apt to be, her hair drawn severely back, and tied up behind with a red silk kerchief, in the Basque fashion. She opened the door, and led us across the great stone-paved hall, cool and twilit, after the dazzling sun and the warmth of the outer air, and up a great stone staircase, to Madame Guilbert's salon, on the bel étage. As we proceeded, my grandmother would inform herself concerning Madame Guilbert's health. "Grâce à Diou, she keeps remarkably well, thank you, Madame," Léocadie invariably answered, with her Gascon accent. "Elle est extraordinaire, vu son âge." But she pronounced extraordinaire as if it were spelt estroudinarre.

The salon was a big, light, faded room, furnished in rosewood and canary-coloured brocade; its floor waxed and polished so that it shone like a wet surface; its high white walls divided into panels by mouldings dimly gilt. And it was filled to overflowing with curious and pretty things: with porcelains and ivories; with silver things, brass things, crystal things, boxes, vases, and candelabra; with old Spanish cabinets, elaborately inlaid, old screens, old tapestries; and with pictures, pictures, pictures. I could never have numbered the pictures that hung in Madame Guilbert's salon, the big pictures and little pictures, the landscapes and portraits, the paintings, pastels, aquarelles, the engravings, the photographs. It was a heterogeneous, very possibly an incongruous, collection; but to my uncritical taste it seemed delightful. The air of the salon was always delicately fragrant: a thin sweet fragrance, something like the smell of lilies of the valley, the source of which was a perpetual puzzle to me. And through the tall slender windows you could gaze off, over the tangled garden, over the fair green country beyond, miles away southward, to the ever-purple mountains.

Léocadie showed us into the saloon, and went to announce us; and a minute or two afterwards Madame Guilbert came in: a big old lady, very amiable-looking, very comfortable-looking, somehow very soft-looking, fluffy-looking: in a voluminous skirt of soft black satin, with quantities of soft white lace and soft violet ribbons about her bodice, and a soft white lace cap, violet beribboned, on her head. She had a big round soft face—even its wrinkles were soft-looking, comfortable-looking; and big soft benignant eyes; and a deep soft comfortable voice. And she had the softest, comfortablest manner, a soothing, caressing manner. She called my grandmother chère enfant and p'tite chèrie; and she called me mon bel amour, and patted my cheek with a hand that was like a warm velvet cushion, and exclaimed at the astonishing way in which I had grown since our last encounter, and generally made me feel that I was an important, and she a singularly agreeable, person. Presently Léocadie would bring in the golden-brown honey-cake, and the cinnamon-scented chocolate, in beautiful frail old cups, with snowy islands of whipped cream floating on it. And Madame Guilbert would set her musical-box a-tinkling, for my entertainment; and then she would sit down and gossip softly with my grandmother, leaving me free to wander about the room, and look at the pictures, and examine one by one the bibelots and curiosities, and to wonder what the origin could be of that pervading fragrance, while the musical-box tinkled, tinkled, flowery old tunes from forgotten operas. . . .

For a long time, through many visits, I waited, gazed, and listened passively. It was a long time before it occurred to me that, having a tongue in one's head, one was capable of asking questions. Then at last I began to ask Madame Guilbert questions.

"Madame Guilbert, you have seen Napoleon, haven't you?" I began.

"Yes, mon amour," she answered in her most caressing manner, "many times."

"Oh, do please tell me about him! What was he like?" I went on, with a hopeful heart.

"What was he like?" she repeated, lifting her eyebrows. Then she shook her head. "But he was just a man, like any man."

"Yes, but what was he like?" I pleaded. "Do please tell me about him."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

"But there's nothing to tell about him, mon bijou. He was just a man, like another."

And no matter how many questions I plied her with, no matter how hard I pressed them, she never limned me any portrait of Napoleon more vivid than the one you see. It was the same with the Duchess d'Angoulême. When I appealed for a description of her, Madame Guilbert would merely assure me that she was "very nice—très-gentille, très-douce." And of the "three days," she would say nothing more illuminating than that "the weather was extremely hot. Every one stayed indoors during the three days." Cross-examine her, pump her, as I might, she would yield none but these driblets of uninforming information. And I would retire from the engagement baffled and bewildered, to gaze at her bemusedly again, and wonder how it was possible that a person who had seen so much should tell so little.

Was it that the good lady had really never observed things, that things had never impressed her, that she had been blind to the salient point, the effective detail? Or was it that she didn't know how to communicate what she had observed, that she had never acquired the art of translating her impressions into speech? There are so many people (I have learned since) blind to the effective detail, so many who cannot communicate their observations. At any rate, though I returned to the charge a hundred times, and Madame Guilbert sustained my charges with unaltering patience, I never gained a single inch of ground. So I could only gaze at her bemusedly, and wonder; baffled, bewildered, immensely desirous, perfectly impotent. To think, to think, that there, shut up in that head of hers, was the recollection, the knowledge, the recorded vision, of Napoleon, of Marie Antoinette, the "three days," and all the rest; and yet there was no means in the wide world by which I could extract it! You will conceive the pain, the rebellion, of such a defeat.

"Oh, Madame Guilbert, do please tell me about the Duchesse d'Angoulême! Describe her to me."

"Ah, elle était très-gentille, la Duchesse d'Angoulême; très-gentille, très-douce." . . .

When I was thirteen, and Madame Guilbert ninety-four, I left Saint-Graal for ever. She died two years later. But to this day, when I think of her, I can't help regretting, with something of the old feeling of defeat, her incommunicable, irrecoverable visions.

A Ballade of August

(August 6, 1881.)

WHEN weary horses plod their way
  Up Ludgate Hill with glassy eyes;
When London trees are growing gray,
  And butchers' shops are thick with flies;
Then blithely Meliboeus hies,
  With Phyllis eke, and children three,
Where in some happy hollow lies
  The town of Arcady-on-Sea.

The hoarse-tongued engine's hollow bray
  Five miles afield unheeded dies.
A single carrier twice a day
  Along the bosky highway plies,
With royal mail and merchandise
  For Baker Brown and Gardener Gee:
New-fangled ways would scandalise
  The town of Arcady-on-Sea.

No stucco crescent fronts the bay,
  But by the beach, where linen dries,
Unvexed the brown-legged children play
  At moulding sand in crumbly pies.
Around, the circling uplands rise
  With sudden bluffs that bound the lea,
Fain would they screen from eager spies
  The town of Arcady-on-Sea.

ENVOY.

So let it bask in sunny skies,
  And long unborn, kind stars, be he
Whose marring hand would modernise
  The town of Arcady-on-Sea. G. A.

Two Poems

(January 15, 1887.)

SHE IS MY LADY, O SHE IS MY LOVE!
NO beauty born of pride my lady hath;
  Her voice is as the path
Of a sweet stream, and where it flows must be Peace and fertility.
Who loveth her no tumult hath or pain;
Her cloudy eyes are full of blessèd rain—
  A sky that cherisheth; her breast
    Is a soft nook for rest.
She has no varying pleasure
    For passion's fitful mood;
  Her firm, small kisses are my constant food,
As rowan-berries yield their needful treasure
To starving birds: her smile
Gives life so sweet a style,
To die beneath its beams would be
  To practise immortality.

AMONG THE TOMBS.

SOMETIMES I do despatch my heart
Among the graves to dwell apart:
On some the tablets are erased,
Some earthquake-tumbled, some defaced,
And some that have forgotten lain
A fall of tears makes green again.
And my brave heart can over-tread
Her brood of hopes, her infant dead,
And pass with quickened footstep by
The headstone of hoar memory,
  Till she hath found
  One swelling mound
With just her name writ and beloved;
From that she cannot be removed.

MICHAEL FIELD.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Carlyle: by Lionel Johnson

(September 10, 1892.)

Thomas Carlyle. By JOHN NICHOL. (Macmillans.)

THE most immediately obvious merit of Mr. Nichol's book is its narrative: a more straightforward, fair, and sufficient account of Carlyle's life does not exist. Mr. Nichol shirks nothing and he exaggerates nothing, though the biographer of such a man has every temptation to commit both crimes. From first to last, Carlyle's actual history is put before us, without any more prejudice than is inevitable. There is none of that wearying laudation, or of that shocked deprecation, which is so impertinent and so common. Carlyle's life was worth recording, and Mr. Nichol has recorded it: the scrutiny of domestic dissensions, the small malicious gossip, the love of infinitely little things, which go to the making of so many modern biographies, are absent from this biography. Mr. Froude has written the full biography, from the vantage ground of a friend and devotee: various studies, essays, and examinations of particular scenes or periods correct and supplement that work. Mr. Nichol's book gives us a judicial, brief account, based upon a consideration of all the various pleadings and evidences. A careful comparison of this book with those written by others, champions of Mrs. Carlyle or special pleaders of any sort, does but confirm the first impression left by its evident sincerity. It is a commonplace to say that origin and temperament are matters of singular importance in the consideration of genius, but in the case of Carlyle it would be nothing less than absurd to ignore them: they appear in all his works and ways, to an extent beyond exaggeration.

Mr. Nichol does well to insist, upon many occasions, that in Carlyle we have the Scotch peasant of genius, suffering from that pride which in Scotchmen of mere talent is insufferable. That sturdy self-respect and austerity of mind turn into self-conceit and irritability with great ease. Fitzgerald, speaking of his friend's acrid sneers and jeers, pleads for him, "This is all a little Scotch indelicacy to other people's feelings." Whether we look into Scotch history or into Scotch literature, we find this curious strain of rough pride and nervous unamiability asserting itself; and Scotch writers have been foremost in recognising it. Whether it be an Andrew Fairservice or a David Balfour, in whom the Scotch humourist plays with the characteristics of his countrymen, this note of a good self-conceit is very prominent. In Carlyle the native temperament, self-reliant and democratic, was joined to a special temperament less common. Mr. Hutton has well remarked that Carlyle had a physical delicacy of sense such as no finely nurtured aristocrat could surpass. His misery over noise, his sensitiveness to unpleasant surroundings of all kinds, gave him the tortures of a Heine, without the dignity of so terrible a prostration; and almost anything can be forgiven him when we consider his rugged pride of origin and his feminine delicacy of nerve. Enough has been said about "the dyspeptic man of genius." We want to hear no more of these bodily weaknesses, except in palliation of the spiritual weaknesses that followed them. Carlyle might say splenetic and mordant things about all the world, and about his fellow-men of genius, and about himself, under the exasperation of suffering; but his ill-temper rarely carried him beyond ill words.

Against the Carlyle who shrieked and wailed over intolerable trifles may be set the Carlyle whose first care, when Mill's carelessness had destroyed the manuscript of the "French Revolution," was for Mill himself: and against the Carlyle who said contemptuous things about others may be set the Carlyle who never grudged time or means to help them. Doubtless, the preacher of silence and of endurance loses some dignity through his outcries, but never through his deeds. Dante condescending to torture his enemies, Milton railing upon Salmasius, are not more pardonable than Carlyle rending friends or foes with irony and bitter words. He did not wholly mean what he said: so far as he did mean it, he was but scourging the general folly of the world, his own included. And he looked at the world in the concrete, with the eyes of a satirist and humourist. His first favourite books were "Hudibras" and "Tristram Shandy." But he looked beyond the world into a vast sphere of Powers, Immensities, Forces, Veracities, Eternities: turning back to this wretched earth, how solemn a prig looked Wordsworth, how sorry a drunkard was Lamb, how egregious a spectacle all the merry farce of human life! The stars, and the winds, and the seas: and then, absurd persons in red gowns, doing justice; absurd persons in black gowns, preaching righteousness! Full of these imaginative contrasts, he shot his rankling epigrams right and left, half in laughter, half in bitterness. Mazzini with his dreamy hopes, Mill with his dusty logic, must have seemed monstrous to him at such times of grim meditation. No doubt they were great and good and the like: but less than nothing beside the Eternities, mere comic actors amusing the Powers of Heaven for a time. Only when he found men in whom he saw force and vehemence, of some sort, could he reverence humanity. It might be a Quaker or a soldier, a poet or a prophet, a modern statesman or an ancient demi-god, who thus faced the invisible forces of the universe with something of their own untiring vehemence: Carlyle was equally willing to reverence him. Such a man's tears and agonies, his spiritual conflicts or physical violences, were sacred to him: a Cromwell struggling for speech, a Johnson fighting with madness, were awful and divine: not so the "lovely wail" of a Shelley, the "bleeding heart" of a Byron. While Emerson looked through history for "Representative Men," Carlyle looked for "Heroes": not the fine flower of mankind, but the few demigods who stand above the pitiable crowd, commanding them to obedience. Anything about such heroes was precious in his eyes: each personal detail of their ways and looks and lives. He contemplated history with the large contemplation of Gibbon, but with a troubled irony and a poignant misery unknown to that calm spectator of the pageant; and he fixed upon points of time, and upon certain figures, with the intensity of Tacitus. To Carlyle, the present could never be admirable: it was too close and too exacting. Cromwell, Knox, Luther, Dante, would not have satisfied him as his contemporaries: he was born with a craving for an ideal perfection, which his sense of humour forbade him to find in real life, or in practical politics, or in the hopes of men. Confronted with living men of "Work and Worth," he refused to see in them the signs of his ideal: a Scotch Faust, he was always dissatisfied, querulous, and proud. He was pleased with the peasant virtues of Derbyshire. Fitzgerald writes to him:—

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

> "Have some mercy, now and in future, on the 'Hebrew rags' which are grown offensive to you: considering it was those rags that did really bind together those virtues which have transmitted down to us all the good you noticed in Derbyshire."

That is to say, be consistent: useless advice to a man who cared nothing for logical consistency. Side by side with the humorous idealist was the literary critic in Carlyle. All Mr. Nichol's observations upon that side of his nature and of his work are excellent; especially as to his labour of love in making German literature known in England. For we are apt to think of Carlyle as a prophet merely, a satirist, or a dreamer; we forget the amount of actual work done for us by his hard toil. Emerson, so bright and winning, so ardent and eager, gave us volumes of quiet, subtile comments upon life; but he knew nothing of hard work, the dusty drudgery among records and chronicles, from which came Carlyle's best books. If we consider Voltaire or Hugo, or most writers of over thirty volumes, how great a mass of their writing seems to have a precarious dependence upon passing moods of the mind! But Carlyle has left us a mass of writings which are solid and substantial, which are independent of an opinion about his moral teaching and ideals. But his style, say some, will not that prove fatal to his fame? The same thing might have been said of Thucydides, Tacitus, Rabelais, and Sterne; of Richter, and of Heine in much of his writing. Without doubt, Plato and Cicero, Addison and Goethe, ran no such risks as must be run by the more audacious writers. Carlyle must lose and gain by his style. Lose, because it was, at times, what he called it, his "own poor affectation," a struggling storm of words, conveying nothing worthy of so great an effort. But the better part of it needs no worthier defence than is contained in Mr. Meredith's description of it. Rosamund Culling disapproved of Beauchamp's devotion to Carlyle.

> "His favourite author was one writing of heroes, in (so she esteemed it) a style resembling either early architecture or utter dilapidation, so loose and rough it seemed; a wind-in-the-orchard style, that tumbled down here and there an appreciable fruit with uncouth bluster. Sentences without commencements running to abrupt endings and smoke, like waves against a sea-wall; learned dictionary words giving a hand to street-slang, and accents falling on them haphazard, like slant rays from driving clouds; all the pages in a breeze, the whole book producing a kind of electric agitation in the mind and the joints."

It is a treacherous style in the hands of the imitator: a delicious style, as Dr. Holmes has shown, in those of the parodist; but its power and charm have appealed to the purest and simplest masters of style. Cardinal Newman, though he had "the brain of a medium-sized rabbit," wrote:—

> "I commend to your notice, if it comes in your way, Carlyle on the French Revolution. A queer, tiresome, obscure, profound, and original work." "A man of first-rate ability, I suppose, and quite fascinating as a writer."

Mr. Nichol's moderation and insight are worthy of all praise. He shows us the man, not as a strong hero, nor as a canting humbug, but just as he was: the Scotch peasant of genius, the laborious man of letters, the friend of practical kindness and a bitter tongue, the victim of tortured nerves, the sad humourist, and the fighter of a dark spirit battling towards some light.

A Colloquy on Criticism: By Augustine Birrell

(LITERATURE, February 12, 1898.)

IN an earlier number of this Review I remarked on the fact that acquaintance with authors dulls the edge of criticism. Since then I have noticed an apparent unwillingness on the part of critics to admit this; but surely to deny it is to fly in the face of human nature. You cannot impale a friend upon your hook as if you loved him; wriggle the silly fellow will until the mildest-mannered critic finds himself using the language of the fish-wife, famous in story, who was overheard cursing the eels she was skinning alive for not lying still. Lordly editors may declare themselves able to select from their huge roll-call of critics "kinless loons" who, like the Prince Regent, "have no predilections," but one critic is not always so good as another.

So important a thing is a free hand that young men, with all their rashness and crudity, are not infrequently the best critics of contemporary books, for, knowing hardly "anybody," and with their way in the world still to make, they are alike ruthless and unembarrassed, and consequently delightfully well able, with their whoops and cries, to flutter the dove-cotes where, drooping a little over their perches, sit sunning themselves the crop-full authors. But the sad years that bring the philosophic mind bring other things as well, and amongst them a hatred of strife and contention, of scowling faces and averted glances.

"Saint Praxed's ever was the church for peace." Why should I strike even the Hospitaller's shield? What need to revile my neighbour simply because he has written a novel that makes me creep all down my back? He will not leave off writing because of my back, but I (how easily) can leave off reading my neighbour, and thus in time may learn to love him. Yes, but what is to become of my critical faculties? Are they to find no expression?

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

To ignore the living altogether, and with the poet Southey (but was Southey a poet?) to spend your critical hours among the dead, is a way out of the difficulty, and a very pleasant way too, and one full of peace and safety. Pope cannot lampoon you, or Milton call you a dog with two g's. I have never cared to deny that I like authors best when they are dead.

> Philosopher and Poet you shall find
> Each ever after his own kind.
> 'Tis well to watch them; not too near, perhaps,
> One snarls at you, the other snaps.

Besides, to the critic Death is of great assistance. There is no more wonderful adjuster of reputations than he. No sooner has "the surly, sullen bell" given witness to the world that a distinguished author has departed from it than you begin to perceive with a nervous apprehensiveness how much you had either over or under estimated him. In the former case, greatly though you had prized him, much as you may owe to him, none the less he is to be seen creeping slowly down the sky; whilst in the latter case the under-estimated author proudly climbs it.

Living authors, though they may despise the critics, still clamour to be criticised, and no more approve of an exclusive devotion being paid to the dead than does an artist of to-day share your dilettante conviction that the only pictures worth buying are by the old masters; but from the critic's point of view it is hard to forget that the only English critics who have any reputation chiefly concerned themselves with authors who were no longer living when they (these critics) wrote. Dryden, Addison, Johnson, Coleridge, Hazlitt, Lamb, Bagehot, Arnold were great critics who did not worry overmuch about their contemporaries. Indeed, one wonders whether it would be possible to fill even a thin volume with criticisms of authors written by their coevals which would be worth reading. I doubt it.

Nor is it hard to find the reason. Authors who claim to be imaginative are divided into the good, the bad, and the hum-drum. Contemporary criticism finds it easy to dispose of the bad author and the hum-drum, the only risk it runs (no light one certainly) being the occasional mistake of one of the bad authors for a good one. Criticism of this kind quickly loses its interest.

But what about the good authors? Surely the critic might have something to say to them. So indeed he might, and so after a time he will, but at the start it is nervous work. It is well said by Carlyle, who said many things well, "Directly in the face of most intellectual tea-circles it may be asserted that no good book or good thing of any sort shows its best face at first; nay, that the commonest quality in a true work of art, if its excellence have any depth and compass, is that at first sight it occasions a certain disappointment—perhaps even mingled with its undeniable beauty a certain feeling of aversion."

This goes to the very root of the matter and accounts for the extraordinary reception given to works of genius by critics, undeniably well equipped for general purposes. These critics did but express "a certain feeling of aversion," occasioned by the first sight of an original. It is, I repeat, nervous work handling the genius which has not yet created its own atmosphere.

Perhaps the safest method of criticism is the comparative. It is also the most interesting. And yet people professed to grow weary of Matthew Arnold's pocket-scale of poetical weights and measures with which he was so fond of testing the value of men's wares. The meritorious Howard did the like with prison rations. "Is that a ration?" he would exclaim, and then, whipping out a scale, would demonstrate to the affrighted gaoler it was half a pound short of weight. But for all that Mr. Arnold's was an excellent way. Is it blank verse we are invited to consider? Surely it is no sin to murmur:—

> Standing on earth, not rapt above the pole,
> More safe I sing with mortal voice, unchanged
> To hoarse or mute, though fall'n on evil days,
> On evil days though fall'n and evil tongues,
> In darkness, and with dangers compassed round,
> And solitude; yet not alone, while thou
> Visit'st my slumbers nightly, or when morn
> Purples the East. Still govern thou my song
> Urania, and fit audience find, though few.

Is it an ode? Well, well!

> Who are these coming to the sacrifice?
> To what green altar and mysterious priest
> Lead'st thou that heifer, lowing at the skies,
> And all her silken flanks with garlands drest?
> What little town by river or sea-shore,
> Or mountain-built with peaceful citadel,
> Is emptied of its folk, this pious morn?

It is only by some such means as those employed by Mr. Arnold that the great tradition is kept alive, and with the passages he was so fond of quoting for ever sounding in our ears it ought not to be difficult to conquer one's first feelings of aversion to the next great poet who comes among us, even though he should not appear clothed in his might, but (as is generally the case) with all his faults lying thick upon the surface of his verse. It ought not perhaps—but it will be. Who need wish to be a critic in the twentieth century? When, what with American copyright, royalties on the drama, and heavy death duties, I may live to see Chatsworth inhabited by a really bad author, whilst all my satisfaction in the reflection that I at all events never opened my mouth without abusing him may be destroyed by the mournful knowledge that I allowed the really good author of my day to pass without a tribute by.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Marc Lescarbot

By BERNARD MUDDIMAN (Ottawa).

THE old world had its Herodotus, the new has Marc Lescarbot. Early in May, 1606, a young Parisian lawyer, having lost a case through the injustice of the Court, was induced by one of his clients, Jean de Biencourt, Seigneur de Poutrincourt, to sail away for Acadie, now known to the world at large as the province of Nova Scotia, in the Dominion of Canada. It was after considerable reflection, Lescarbot tells us, that he decided to go, urged on by "the desire to flee a corrupt world and to examine the new with his own eyes." Lescarbot, born at Vervins about 1570, was a Latin scholar, poet, barrister, and general intellectual curiosity. He seems also to have had a strong bias towards, for his age, very free religious speculation. Fame still reserves for him, as a charming personality who has prattled his way into literature, a niche beside his great contemporary Montaigne. Indeed, in his account of his voyage to Acadie he has left not only the most interesting record of Canada in its pioneer days, but an olla podrida of quaint sayings and thoughts similar to those which so fascinate the reader leafing the essays of Montaigne.

Let us then follow him during his year's sojourn in Acadie at Port Royal, the first permanent French settlement in North America. Remember he went away from Paris and its gay life a disappointed man; he writes: "Lawsuits are the bane of man's existence; for in the pursuit of them men waste their money and health. And often justice is not obtained after all, either through the Judges' ignorance, from whom the truth is kept back, or through malice, or from the wickedness of the Attorney-General who sells the case." Was there ever such an outspoken lawyer as this Lescarbot, embarking at La Rochelle in the Jonas of 150 tons on May 11th, 1606? Before setting out, however, being one of the Muses' sons, he wrote an adieu to la belle France "pour m'égayer l'esprit." Speed was not one of the perils of Atlantic crossings of those days; for Port Royal was not reached till July 27th. Like a Yankee globe trotter, Lescarbot was at once astir. "A tant, nous descendons à terre, visitons la maison, et passons la journée à rendre grâce à Dieu, voir les cabanes des sauvages, et nous aller promener par les prairies." The next day, however, a Friday, Poutrincourt set everyone to work, tilling the ground, cleaning "la maison," Lescarbot included. "My wish to discover what the soil of the country was worth made me more ready than the rest to dig and to live." Louis Hébert, a Parisian apothecary, who had also sailed with Lescarbot, seems to have taken charge of these latter labours. But when Poutrincourt left on August 28 for a voyage of discovery we find Lescarbot acting as his deputy. He at once directed the workmen to lay out a vegetable garden, and had a moat dug at the same time about the fort. Like our own Bacon and Cowley, he seems to have had a hankering for the soil: "Those men are indeed to be pitied who, having it in their power to live a quiet life in the country, cultivating the soil which yields such a good return, pass their lives in cities, bowing and scraping to each other, seeking excuses to go to law, worrying over this and that, endeavouring to get the better of their neighbours, racking their brains until the day of their death how to pay the rent, how to dress in silk, and how to buy rich furniture —in short, how to cut a figure and feast on a little vanity, in which there is never any satisfaction."

But, meantime, Poesy was not forgotten, though the carpenters and masons were busy all around him. Another explorer, Pontgravé, who had come to the Fort with Champlain, sailed for home on August 25. Lescarbot bade him God-speed in his best verse. The colonists laboured three hours a day, and then went their own ways, passing the rest of the time in hunting or fishing. Lescarbot was particularly delighted with hunting, but hardly from the sportsman's point of view; "the solitude and silence which accompany it bring beautiful thoughts to the mind." He gathered mussels at low tide, but never seems to have had a desire to venture into the pathless wilds or primeval forests. "For my part," he writes, "I can say that I never worked so hard in my life. I took pleasure in laying out and cultivating my gardens, in enclosing them to keep out the pigs, in making flower-beds, staking out alleys, building summer houses, sowing wheat, rye, barley, oats, beans, peas, and garden plants, and in watering them." What a gentle soul he was in the wilderness! As Charlevoix, the French Canadian historian, says, "he encouraged some, he touched the honour of others, he won the goodwill of all, and spared himself in naught. He daily invented something new for the public good." When he was not scribbling verse he was learning a trade-craft.

Pondering on the history of the New World, relating its legends, Lescarbot possesses something of the semi-humorous rationalism of Herodotus disbelieving the Phœnix, the man who swam eighty stades under the sea, and those who carried their eyes in their breasts. For instance, Lescarbot says: "Joseph Acosta relates that in Peru one of the lay brothers lost his way, and wandered about in the mountains without knowing whither or in what direction to go, till finally he found himself amid thickets so dense that for fifteen days he was compelled to walk along their tops, and did not set foot upon the ground. Everyone is free to believe as much of this tale as he wishes, but such knowledge is too wonderful for me."

Again, what makes Lescarbot's narrative so bewitching is that he loves to note things that appeal to the literary mind. Nicolas Denys, a later explorer, can write excellently from the commercial standpoint of the fisheries of Canada; but it is only Lescarbot, among the old chroniclers, who would have thought of telling us of the "Order of the Good Times." For when Poutrincourt returned in the middle of November, some of the men dressed as Neptune and his Tritons, recited verses written by Lescarbot, and preparations were made for the winter, which fortunately was extremely mild. For a time none wore a cloak over his doublet, and even in

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

January they ate out of doors. So warm was it in the middle of the month that for very joy they sang. To while away, however, those short days and long nights a reign of feasting was established—"the Order of the Good Times," concerning which I cannot do better than quote the original:—

> Mais je diray que pour nous tenir joieusement et nettement quant aux vivres, fut établi un Ordre en la Table dudit sieur de Poutrincourt, qui fut nommé L'Ordre de Bon-Temps, mis premierement en avant par le sieur Champlain, auquel ceux d'icelle table estoient maitres-d'Hotel chacun à son jour, qui estoit en quinze jours une fois. Or avoit-il le soin de faire que nous fussions bien et honorablement traités. Ce qui fut si bien observé, que (quoy que les gourmens de deçà nous disent souvent que nous n'avions point là la rue aux Ours de Paris) onus y avons fait ordinairement aussi bon chere que nous sçaurions faire en cette rue aux Ours et à moins de frais. Car il n'y avoit celui qui deux jours devant que son tour vinst ne fut soigneux d'aller à la chasse, ou à la pécherie, et n'apportast quelque chose de rare, outre ce qui estoit de notre ordinaire. Si bien que jamais au déjeuner nous n'avons manqué de saupiquets de chair ou de poissons, et au repas de midi et du soir encor moins; car c'estoit le grand festin, là où l'architriclin, ou maître-d'hotel (que les sauvages appellent Atoctegic), ayant fait preparer toutes choses au cuisinier, marchait la serviette sur l'épaule, le baton d'office en main, et le colier de l'Ordre au col, qui valoit plus de quatre escus et tous ceux d'icelui Ordre après lui, portons chacun son plat. Le méme estoit au dessert, non toutefois avec tant de suite et au soir, avant rendre graces à Dieu, il resinoit le colier de l'Ordre avec un verre de vin à son successeur en la charge, et buvaient l'un à l'autre.

When the merriment grew wild in the evening and the French made merry with the Micmac belles, Lescarbot would steal away, gentle soul, to his room with its few treasured volumes. Here, far from the feast, he read and wrote like a second Montaigne in his tower. Here he composed several of his poems printed in his "Muses de la Nouvelle France." At other times he gave religious instruction to the ruder sort of their company. "And these efforts," he writes complacently enough, "did not prove fruitless, for several admitted they had never heard the matters pertaining to the Deity so well set forth."

Then spring came. Snow and ice went as at a magic touch. Out in the fields the men again tilled and sowed. Fish spawned; birds came north; flowers bloomed. However, the colony was not to be. On May 24 a small vessel of six to seven tons hove in sight in charge of a young man from St. Malo, bringing letters from Poutrincourt's patron in France to the effect that their monopoly had been revoked and they would have to return home. "It was a grievous disappointment," says Lescarbot. So, saying adieu in verse, as one would naturally expect, on July 30, 1607, Lescarbot sailed back with the others on the Jonas just twelve months after his landing.

Good news awaited his arrival. The Court had reconsidered its decision; Lescarbot had won his client's case. Then he settled down to write his adventures in the whimsically charming prose of his age, finally publishing the work in 1609, with appropriate dedications to Henry IV, Marie de Médicis, the Dauphin, and Queen Marguerite of Valois. After that he was never further afield from France than Switzerland. He received a Government Commissionership, and, like all lawyers, married well. Acadie, with its vexed and turbulent history, was over for him. When he died is unknown. This is no great matter, for undoubtedly, as Grant, his translator, likes to think, somewhere in the Elysian fields this old traveller has met the Greek Herodotus, and for all time, as on our bookshelves, these two, "with well-chosen phrase and occasional ripple of laughter," talk of the marvels to be found at the source of the great River of Egypt and of the great River of Canada, happily oblivious of subsequent immigrant literature.

English Apprenticeship and Child Labour*

IN the making of England it would be difficult to over-estimate the value of the part played by the apprenticeship system which, beginning as a custom amongst the people, was adopted by the great Guilds of the City of London in the middle of the thirteenth century, and gradually grew until it became a national institution of high importance. The famous Statute of Artificers of Elizabeth's reign came comparatively late in its history, but it made articulate all that the nation had learnt upon the great subject of technical training. Had it not been for the demoralising influence of the Civil War of Charles's day, which drew away vast numbers of the young men of the time as soldiers, it is probable that the influence of the Statute would have lasted until the present time, and we should not now need to begin again the great work of technical instruction.

Apprenticeship never recovered, and its own defects, which had grown up in so many centuries, and the beginnings of the factory system, led to the repeal of the Statute of Artificers in 1814. Since that time, despite undoubted progress in many directions, the increase of unskilled labour, the imperfect training of workmen in many trades and consequent decline of thoroughness and the sense of responsibility which characterised the old English artificer, have led us to look longingly at apprenticeship. Undoubtedly the long period of service, the personal contact between master and man it involved and the mutual sense of responsibility were features that assured success and made of the worker not only a good craftsman, but also a good and useful citizen. It gave us the sense of order which is still our best characteristic as a nation. The apprentice lived in the master's house, and the master had to look to it that his apprentice was properly clothed, fed, and taught. In most cases the boy learnt during his seven years' service not only the manual work, but also how to conduct a business.

* English Apprenticeship and Child Labour: A History. By O. JOCELYN DUNLOP. With a Supplementary Section on the Modern Problem of Juvenile Labour by O. JOCELYN DUNLOP and RICHARD D. DENMAN, M.P. (T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Apprenticeship was controlled by the Guilds, who were supported by the corporations, of which the members were generally freemen, so that the connection between trade and local government was very intimate. This was one of the most important features of the system, for instead of the indifference of to-day in matters of local government we had then the vital interest, something of which is still seen within the City of London, where alone in all the Kingdom we can still find the old and essentially democratic machinery of local government as it existed in the Middle Ages. Its inception was essentially the work of the London craftsmen and traders who had been through the long discipline of apprenticeship.

In some respects the Guild was less tyrannical than the unions which have taken their place, for the system of apprenticeship did not prevent any trained craftsmen entering the Guilds provided that he was willing to show himself "sufficient" by going before the Guilds and giving them a specimen of his skill; so that a man trained in any manner might qualify himself at any age. To-day the country loses much of its best talent by barring the way into most skilled trades and professions to all adults who have not served some kind of apprenticeship in the modern sense. The Guilds put also a limit to the too early employment of children in their trades, and from fourteen to sixteen became the usual age at which boys were "bound." They also forbade night work. As the authoress of this valuable and profoundly interesting book points out, this was probably not done so much for the sake of the children as to prevent bad work, the lights used being then very poor. All the Guilds were rigorous in their efforts to ensure good workmanship, and for this we should be eternally grateful to them. The "searchers" they employed went the round of the workshops, sought out and condemned bad work, and saw that the apprentices were properly taught and cared for. In this connection Miss Dunlop quotes a record which quaintly states that the wardens of the Merchant Taylors Company "Comytted Thomas Palmer to pryson for that he hath broke Henry Bourfelde his apprentice hede without any juste cause."

After apprenticeship a young man was practically assured of employment, and it is pointed out that there was in consequence less wastage than at the present time, when so many young people are turned adrift and still younger workers are taken in their place. They possess neither special skill nor the discipline given by sound training, so they swell the ranks of the unemployed and unemployable.

Apprenticeship declined from about the year 1660, and the repeal of the Statute was followed by the horrors of the factory system, of which Robert Owen has given us so terrible a description. The position of juvenile workers under it, as Miss Dunlop says, "was vastly inferior to what it had been under the compulsory apprenticeship system when children were ensured both a fair return for their labour and protection from the misuse or abuse of their masters or parents." Owen states that thirty years before his time children had begun work at fourteen years of age—in trades of which he did not know it seems certain they began much earlier. Under the factory system all began earlier. For example, in Yorkshire, in 1806, children were employed in factories at from six years of age; in 1816 they were employed in the Stockport hat trade from five years of age, the hours of labour being fourteen per day. As late as 1842 children of four were employed in the calico trade and in lace making; in pin making at five, and in the hosiery trade at five. In Derby children of two were employed, and others of four, five, and six. In calico works the reports quoted by Miss Dunlop say: "Numbers of children under nine years old were employed; the machines seldom ran for less than ten and a half hours and night work was common." Similar hours and ages were usual in other trades, and the sanitary conditions, we are told, were disgraceful. Worst of all was the condition of the children employed in coal mines. They began work generally at eight or nine, but sometimes at four and six years of age. The hours were seldom less than twelve, and were sometimes as many as eighteen per day. The work of these mites was to draw the coal in small trucks from the various seams in which it was being cut to the large openings. Twenty years later, in 1863, we are told the conditions in all these industries were practically unchanged, into such a degraded condition had labour in England fallen after we had allowed the forces of industrial disorder to overthrow those of industrial law, which in the course of eight centuries had done so much for the manhood, the wealth and the comfort of the nation.

In addition to Miss Dunlop's own admirable and very thorough history of the whole subject of apprenticeship and child labour, the book contains a valuable supplement on the Modern Problem of Child Labour, in which she has had the assistance of Mr. Richard D. Denman, M.P., who was formerly Chairman of the London Juvenile Advisory Committee.

The Individual Reader

By Alex. J. Philip.

THE meeting of the Conference of the Library Association next week reminds us that it is just twenty years since public libraries were firmly established in this country under the Consolidating Act of 1892, although for more than forty years before that they had been opened in varying numbers, year by year. Is twenty years long enough as a test of the effect of these institutions on the standard of reading of the individual? There is reading and writing; reading for an exam., or as a journalist engaged on running to earth an elusive piece of information, does not exactly satisfy the wider definition. I know one town where a record has been kept showing that, without exception, every student who has sat for matriculation or any higher examination has made use, not only of the ordinary facilities of the municipal library, but of those special favours granted to students, such as a larger field of selection, or in increased number of books at any one time. Splendid as such a record may be, it is not evidence of the existence of a reading class or of individual readers. I think it may be that libraries all over the country are useful, even if it is put no higher, to those who are compelled to read for business.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Reading is an æsthetic enjoyment, while the assimilation of information may be described as a useful industry. And here we find the difference. All our great readers, like great authors, have been creators or critics of pure literature and not of the literature of the sciences or arts. There was a modicum of truth in the dictum of the "washing lady" described by one of our leading humorists, who referred to her budding olive leaf—immersed in the pages of the "Blood-bound Boer, or the stirring adventures of an outpost rider"—"'E's a great reader, 'aint 'e," in so far as he was a student of the literature of the imagination, however much more the assimilation of facts might have benefited him in the future. That, however, is the reader I am considering; the student of the literature of the imagination—whether he has gone up or down in the scale. Collectively one might generalise over the gamut of change that has taken place during these fifty years, crediting or debiting the literary account of the public library according to the individual taste without any regard to the many other educational developments that have contributed to this series of accelerated changes. The result would be favourable or otherwise to the reader, to the books, and to the library, according to the individual standard of the critic. This, in fact, is what usually takes place when the decline in one or other of those grand old literary institutes, literary and philosophical societies, magnificent debating clubs, that sprang up chiefly in the northern counties during the last century, is deplored. These institutions have done their work, and have succeeded admirably; whether or not they can be brought into line with modern demands I do not know; but it is a very simple business consideration that drives by economic force the reader of to-day to the great subscription circulating libraries or the public library.

The individual reader who "finds" himself is like the horse strayed into a clover field, surprised that he ever enjoyed the dry, withered grass on the common, and filled with wonderment that such delicious food should exist. This appreciation of the literary delicacy of each fresh author, of each new book and of each rereading of an old favourite, makes a reader. And a reader is a connoisseur of literature; one with an æsthetic taste in the art of grouping words.

How has the reader been affected by the public library? Have the pastures thrown open to him proved green with succulent herbs; or were they covered with bitter weeds, rank with a poison in the aftermath?

This reader, this connoisseur in literature, this dilettante of the æsthetic taste, is a fiction reader; a student of the literature of the imagination. I feel a little dubious here, because public libraries have been inveighed against as purveyors of fiction by so many of those who are able to buy their own literary intoxicants for home consumption, or find it provided for them by the literary editor of their paper. But it is quite true—the literary man is essentially a fiction reader; a reader of romances, of dramatic creations, of poetry, and of essays, which, after all, are more or less brilliant efforts in the art of saying something about nothing in a beautiful manner.

It is this individual reader in embryo that the public library is training, more or less insidiously perhaps, as a person of taste. And the creation of taste in literature must be inevitably followed by the growth of taste in other things, because the appreciation of literature—as distinct from books estimated by weight—can only follow a knowledge of what is beautiful. It is said that there is no literature at the present time—only books. But this is little more than the plaint of those unable to find a publisher. True, we do not find Shakespeares in every village—if we did, to use another paradox, they would no longer be Shakespeares—but even if there are no great creations of literature to-day, there were some yesterday and there will be more to-morrow. Why worry about empty platitudes of this kind? In fact, it is only because the public library as an institution has made it possible for the unread to become a reader of taste that he is able to know that there was real literature yesterday, even if it is only the faith that is in him that enables him to say there will be more to-morrow. The public library is creating in the individual—even of every class—the love of the beautiful, the knowledge of taste, the appreciation of art in every form on which the eternal reputation of Greece rests. One authority says this is the influence of Greek genius. I say it is the effect of the same causes that made Greece, now making us; and by the greater greatness of our genius—it could not be less, as it embraces all that has survived of the Greek spirit—so shall our literature and art be more brilliant and more enduring.

Whether the future reader comes within the magic sphere of the public library as a humble learner, clinging with fragile fingers to the lowest rung of the ladder, or as a stalwart climber, the result is the same: new vistas unfold themselves as he reaches higher and yet higher altitudes, rising by the expansion of his field of mental vision. The most assiduous pursuer of a perverted quest, the most inveterate debauchee of a debased taste, is eventually brought to a halt by a danger mark on the indicator, "red is out"; and is compelled to satiate himself with some new and hitherto untried dish.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Literary Traveller

By W. H. KOEBEL.

THERE was a time, scarcely more than half a century ago, when those who travelled for other reasons than those of duty and the quest of money were as rare as the four-leaved clover in a dense field. Moreover, the fortunate few who were enabled to indulge in such restricted and antiquated forms of "globe-trotting" as were then known, were wont to take the business very seriously. No such things as sudden decisions, light-hearted packings of bags, the hailing of a taxi-cab, and a swooping flight to the nearest railway station, were known or dreamed of in the earlier ages of the crinoline. A young man on the eve of the Grand Tour was the subject of as much preparation, care, and forethought as is expended on an entire military campaign to-day. When the momentous day of the actual start arrived he set out armed with every conceivable precaution, moral and material, against disaster. Paternal advice, the tears of a mother, carefully engineered letters of introduction to those resident in foreign climes, and the presence of a tutor—these constituted nothing beyond a certain proportion of the paraphernalia of the early Victorian voyager who was about to sail across the Channel. And when, having made his tour of the towns in France, Germany, Switzerland, and Italy, he returned to place his knees again beneath his native mahogany, it was with the satisfied sense of a duty completed for good and all. The Grand Tour resembled the life-membership of a club. Once effected it held good for a lifetime, and freed its subject from the necessity of ever again undergoing the process.

. . . . . .

There is no doubt that travelling was, from the educational point of view, conducted then in a fashion far more conscientious than now. I do not imagine that its participants could lay claim to any special merit to themselves on this head. The result was achieved by an enforced slow progress, and by equally unavoidable lengthy halts in a limited area. There was no opportunity then for the career of those who travel in order to add the names of countries, provinces, and towns to their stock with the same avidity with which a philatelist sits at home to collect his various specimens of postage stamps. An American whom I met some while ago in that very balmy island of Madeira would, for one, never have found in the days of the Grand Tour a profession which was clearly very dear to him. It had been his lifelong desire to travel; he had spent his early days accumulating sufficient means to this end, and his desire had now been gratified for twenty years. During all that time the now elderly sprite had passed unceasingly over the earth's surface from place to place, and from ocean to ocean. Since I myself have been a wanderer in no small way, his experiences interested me not a little. There seemed not a place on the accepted tourist routes throughout the world that he had not visited. His memory, moreover, was in one sense marvellous, since out of all these hundreds of spots there was not one at which he could not recall the length of his stay. Nothing else mattered. Cathedrals, ruins, aboriginals, cataracts, and landscapes—not one had left an impression on the curious mirror of his mind. He had stayed a few hours in one place, a day or two in another—his pride lay in nothing beyond. He was not of the days of the Grand Tour.

. . . . . .

It is possible that such a man may rank almost as a criminal in sheer waste of the opportunities of appreciation. If so, the depth of his crime is of use in itself in revealing the remarkable facilities which are now offered for such absent-minded scourings of the globe. The mere consideration of the scope of the tourist field of to-day is an astonishing process in itself. The scene of a battlefield in what was a savage country twenty years ago, waterfalls the report of which was considered more or less legendary at a very little earlier date, corners in the East where until comparatively recently it was a daring feat for a European to show his face, South American beauty spots which in earlier and insanitary times were spoken of with dread as the haunts of yellow fever—it is to such places as these that the traveller now comes in search of recreation, and grumbles, moreover, if the quality of his whisky and the design of his bed are not exactly to his liking. There was a time when men still retained some awe for the Pyramids, and when an excursion by steamer to Khartum was spoken of as an adventurous and enterprising excursion. Now both Sphinx and Pyramids produce about the same amount of astonishment as a pond on Hampstead Heath—in the mind of the hardened globe-trotter, that is to say—and, as to Khartum, it has become a popular halting-place in the course of steamer journeys very much further to the South. All of which points to the rather lamentable fact that the profession of the pioneer is all but extinct in the world.

. . . . . .

Perhaps one of the most interesting features in the present phase of world-travel is the study of the fashions in countries and localities; fashions which are almost as kaleidoscopic as those of women's clothes. There was a time when Switzerland was the most popular haunt of the summer months, and when to the average Englishman France was represented by very little beyond Paris and the Riviera. Then the curtain was withdrawn from the peaks of Norway and the Austrian Alps, while crowds flocked to the watering-places of Brittany and Normandy, and the more up-to-date began to forsake Switzerland in summer for the joys of its ice- and snow-sports of the winter months. The Black Forest, too, discovered new attractions to add to the old in the shape of trout-fishing. Italy, it is true, has had to content herself with what may be termed her stock-features, wonderful as they are; but her sister-countries of Spain and Portugal, awaking to the situation, cast about them for the most favoured inducement to the traveller, and succeeded in no small measure. As entirely new items in her programme Spain found haunts in her northern mountains and hitherto neglected local treasures in the neighbourhood of Vigo Bay, while Portugal pointed to a string of charming white towns which nestled round Mont' Estoril near the mouth of the Tagus. The Far North and the midnight sun, not to be left out of any cold not of their own making, blinked a welcome to thousands, and now even some of the Balkan countries are preparing themselves to receive the casual traveller. And this is in Europe alone, and even the whole of Europe has not yet been taken into account!

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Stratford Shakespeare Festival

CERTAINLY it was a mistake to think of presenting so crude a piece of melodrama as "If I were King" at Stratford-on-Avon. That is the very mildest phrase that one may choose for it. Yet had it been played as pure melodrama, had, in popular phrase, the colour been laid on with a trowel, the pomp made pompous, the villainy villainous, and the love-scenes of full voice, the result might not have seemed so disastrous. But with a commendable earnestness it was played as high drama; and as act succeeded to act, and the stream of interest became thinner, one began to wonder if there would be enough water to carry the ship to sea. The play was only kept alive by Mr. Frank Cochrane's fine rendering of the part of Louis XI. In the last two acts it was he who bore the burden of the play, and he bore it admirably. It was an exceedingly clever piece of work. Similarly, too, Miss Ethel Macdowall, as Huguette du Hamel, played well and with great earnestness. For the rest, Mr. Benson, as François Villon, and Miss Dorothy Green, as Katherine de Vaucelles, scarcely seemed to know whether to take themselves seriously or not.

Sometimes it is wise to overlook an error of judgment; but, believing as we do in the possibility of Stratford being made the centre for a new movement in drama, it seems to us a singularly unfortunate thing that, when a decision is taken to introduce other plays than those of Shakespeare, the choice should be just the very kind of play from which we are attempting to get away, and for which there is an ample opening in the ordinary commercial theatre. There is an audience that visits Stratford regularly for these festivals—and an audience that increases in size steadily, one is glad to find—and, by the very fact of its presence, denotes a serious attention in poetic drama; and it would be a pity if its presence were not turned to advantage. Indeed, on a well-known and inviolable law, it will be dissipated if it is not turned to advantage.

However, such a development is slowly taking place. For example, plays of Shakespeare are being revived that it has not been possible to see for some time at Stratford. One such play, this summer, was "The Merry Wives of Windsor"; and that fine, thoughtful actor Mr. Henry Herbert as Falstaff filled the play with an artistic skill that was a joy, while subtracting in no degree from all its abandon and revelry. It is possibly no part of a critic's business to make suggestions to a management; but one would surely like to see the two parts of Henry the Fourth played as a continuous performance. To see Falstaff tricked and outwitted at every turn is one thing: but it far better accords with the real Falstaff to see him tricking and outwitting everybody else at every turn. One may not wish to believe every apocryphal story with regard to Shakespeare; but after seeing the Falstaff of Henry the Fourth one is certainly ready to believe that the Falstaff of "The Merry Wives" is a command performance, done to please a queen who seemed to have no disinclination for amorous exploits of the more doubtful order. And it would be a considerable extra whet to the appetite, if one could hope for it, to see Mrs. Benson in her old part as Doll Tearsheet.

Moreover, we are glad to note that on the afternoon of the 27th the Pilgrim Players, under Mr. John Drinkwater, are to give "The League of Youth." Unfortunately the performance is too late for us to notice: but the Pilgrim Players, under Mr. Drinkwater's wise organisation and direction, have won a name for dramatic enterprise that makes their appearance at Stratford particularly gratifying. Especially is this the case when one remembers that they hold considerable ideals with regard to the renewal of poetic drama.

In the more regular programme Sheridan's "The Rivals" was also given. There was, wisely in our judgment, a relaxation from the attempt to reproduce the strict eighteenth-century atmosphere, technically known as "powder," usually associated with such performances. To us it has always seemed that such "powder," too faithfully adhered to, unnecessarily harasses the perpetual spirit of comedy—even as we are vandal enough to think that the Comédie Française tradition has bound and swathed the humanity of Molière out of all recognition. There was an elaboration between Sir Luciss O'Trigger—the ordinary stage fire-eating Irishman of the eighteenth century—and Bob Acres, by Mr. Wilfrid Caithness and Mr. Harry Caine, for example, that seemed to us to carry the spirit of the dialogue beyond the strict tradition of the eighteenth century, so far as we know it, but not beyond its own just limits. In such matters the text is before us: and so long as we are faithful to it, and the spirit it conveys, it is wise to neglect the gloss that tradition has placed upon it. Otherwise, we fall back again on revivals, which are opposed to the spirit of life, that constantly and for ever perpetuates itself in fresh outlines.

At any rate, it was so acted in the main at Stratford, and the result was that it was never remote at any moment from the audience. In other words, it was always drama, and never an ordered pageant. And that is the main thing that one is concerned with in a theatre. It was evident that each actor enjoyed playing his part intensely. Mr. Henry Herbert was always on the verge of a "frenzy," and when he actually slipped over the margin, in the momentous interview with his son, his anger towered up and filled the whole theatre. Mr. Benson was the essence of expostulating reserve and perplexity; and the scene swept the play into strong drama, always alive with the comic spirit. Apart from these, Mr. Hannam-Clark as David and Mr. Frank Cochrane as Fag were two outstanding performances. David has not much part to play, but Mr. Hannam-Clark filled it with humour; whereas, especially in his scenes with Captain Absolute, Fag was a joy to watch. Mr. Murray Carrington as the dandiacal Falkland was not less good. Falkland is chiefly a decoration; and Mr. Carrington showed a fine artistic restraint in making him no more. It is when one comes to eighteenth-century maidens and dowagers that it is a little difficult to maintain the humanity of comedy. But Miss Green and Miss McDowall, as Lydia and Julia, solved the difficulty by filling their parts with merriment. We had not previously seen Miss Rosa Burgess in Mr. Benson's company, but as Mrs. Malaprop, with her "select words so ingeniously misapplied, without being mispronounced," carried in herself the spirit of the play time and time again. Indeed, she was excellently mal à propos.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

DARRELL FIGGIS.

Animals at Fault

WHEN Dumby says that life would be very dull without mistakes, he points a moral not at first sight obvious from his words. It is from failure that we learn, and, as Phelps remarked on one occasion, the man who makes no mistakes makes nothing at all. This evolutionary value of error is the text of a popular writer on natural history who has just, in the columns of an evening paper, adventured the popular, but quite erroneous, thesis that man is the only animal that makes mistakes, owing his victory in life's race to his immunity from the mechanical precision of instinct-guided beasts, birds, and fishes. It is an attractive view of the case, a perversion of the universal adage that to err is human, but it is unfortunately not borne out by the facts, and the fallacy of arguing a human monopoly of error may easily be demonstrated in the course of ten minutes' conversation with any gamekeeper of average intelligence and ordinary opportunities of observation or by half an hour spent in the company of the back files of the Field.

It is, indeed, this occasional proneness on the part of animals, both wild and tame, to make foolish mistakes which so hopelessly complicates the study of that imaginary frontier between the domain of reason and that of instinct. If, as the writer above referred to insists, the "lower" animals never made a mistake, but always acted with foregone correctness in every emergency, the dividing line between them and ourselves would be as clearly traced as it was by the Early Fathers. But the very fact of these creatures being at fault, less often perhaps than ourselves, yet often enough to exercise the student of animal psychology, brings them immeasurably nearer to ourselves. Further than this we cannot at present pursue the analogy, else we might be tempted to bring their mentality within the region in which Kant distinguishes between Vernunft and Verstand, or reason and understanding.

In estimating, however, not only the degree of error in four-footed or feathered animals, but also its causes and results, we must guard against imputing it on insufficient evidence. As a case in point, Professor Lloyd Morgan, one of the most eminent of living authorities on the mind of animals, recently cautioned the present writer against condemning the tactics of young pheasants crouching on a dusty road in full view of a sparrowhawk, which promptly pounced on one of the brood. This, he insists, was not really a mistake, according to their lights, since the little birds had been taught—whether by their mother or by instinct is immaterial—to crouch motionless at a danger signal. In the grass, their normal environment, such behaviour would protect them. No doubt, they could have saved themselves by at once running for shelter into long grass, but their instinct, or education, took no account of open roads, and their failure to adopt that plan was absence of reasoning such as might be looked for in the young of any animal, human or otherwise.

It is also undeniable that the majority of actual mistakes which animals from time to time make to their own undoing are associated with conditions, more or less artificial, introduced by man, though this is not always the case. The fact of elephants falling into pits dug to trap them, or of fishes in rivers far from civilisation being taken in by the coarsest tackle and crudest imitations, might be discounted on the plea that such snares were no part of the natural scheme of existence. Yet, in the first case at least, these pitfalls have been dug for so many centuries that an intelligent and long-lived creature like the Indian elephant might have been expected to avoid them. What, too, can be said of a dog that, on hearing its master's whistle, walked right out of a first-floor window in a house in which it had lived for years? Or of another dog that, having been badly bitten by a crocodile in a tank in Ceylon, rescued only by the skin of its teeth, made frantic efforts to swim in the same tank a few days later? Where is this infallible instinct of which we hear so much? Even a half-witted man would know enough to give that dangerous water a wide berth, yet here is a dog, admittedly one of the most intelligent of all animals, forgetting the risks, with its wounds scarcely healed. The tiger is reputedly a wary and suspicious creature, and those, in particular, who endeavour to shoot it from the machan, a platform erected for the purpose in a tree, are constantly baulked of their prey by the cunning of the big cat, which contrives to keep in the shadow—such shooting being possible at night only—and never to show itself in the light of the moon. Yet on one occasion, at any rate, a tiger that had been patiently stalking a feeding sambur stag, in full view of the man in the machan, suddenly, and for no apparent reason, bounded into the moonlight. Even had there been no danger overhead, this would have been a stupid mistake to make, for the deer instantly sped to safety. As it was, the tiger, an easy target in such illumination, was shot through the heart. Still more foolish is the mistake which leads monkeys to sleep in isolated trees, where they fall an easy prey to prowling leopards that would have no chance of catching them if they could escape from one tree to another.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The fury with which rival stags and bucks fight for the does is so absorbing that they allow themselves to be stalked and shot at close quarters. The marvellous judgment with which swifts and swallows dash through gateways and under bridges, without once coming in contact with the sides or roof, is a constant object of admiration to anyone with an eye for such miracle of flight and eyesight. On one occasion, however, the instinct of these birds failed to take artificial conditions into account. For many years they had dashed each summer through an open doorway in an old Sussex garden. One winter, while they were drinking sunshine in Spain or Africa, the owner of the garden replaced the door and, as ill-luck would have it, painted it sky-blue. No sooner had the first of the swallows returned to their old haunts than one of them, doubtless mistaking the blue wood for a background of blue sky, dashed headlong at the door, thinking to pass between the posts as of old, and was killed on the spot.

There is, perhaps, no direction in which instinct is normally a surer guide than in discrimination in food, yet dogs have been known to seize toads when they should have known better, and both lions and tigers prey on porcupines, though the quills cruelly lacerate their vitals.

It would be easy, but unprofitable, to extend this list of animal errors, but a few examples go as far as many. The whole point of recognising them is that they bring the "lower" animals so much nearer to the Lord of Creation that the relations between the two, mental and moral as well as merely morphological, can be worked out only on the basis of evolutionary doctrine. Any attempt to separate the one animal that makes mistakes from the many that make none is doomed to fail.

F. G. AFLALO.

Foreign Reviews

DIE DEUTSCHE RUNDSCHAU.

THE August number contains an appreciation, by Herr Ernst Meumann, of Professor Wilhelm Wundt, to celebrate the philosopher's eightieth birthday. Herr K. A. von Müller sketches the political development of Friedrich Theodor Vischer, a development which has found parallels in the case of many patriotic Germans of the nineteenth century: democracy, Austria, Bismarck were the stages of the process. The letters of Metternich and Gentz before 1813 are very interesting; the latter's protest against the recognition of Napoleon as Emperor, and his judgment that the death of Pitt was a good thing for England, are notable features of the correspondence. Charlotte, Lady Blennerhassett, expounds Mr. Darrell Figgis's Study of Shakespeare. She concludes with a rather unexpected attack on Mr. Bernard Shaw: "Verfasser von äusserst schwach dramatisierten, nicht immer geistreichen und zum Teil recht zynischen Dialogen." Herr M. G. Zimmermann gives the first instalment of an admirable account of the journey to Rome and the sojourn of painters there during the Middle Ages. At first they came to teach, but by the end of the 15th century they came chiefly to learn. The Dutch "Bent," or painter's club, supplies some interesting pages.

REPERTORIUM FÜR KUNSTWISSENSCHAFT. XXXV BAND. 2. HEFT.

Herr K. Escher treats the subject of angels in French monumental sculpture of the Middle Ages. Numerous examples illustrate the various beneficent functions of the heavenly host, and the part played by St. Michael is specially considered. Herr K. Simon studies in detail several pictures, from various galleries, belonging to the old Frankfort school. Herr Otto develops his theory about Chinese art, and various books are reviewed, including M. Marius Vachon's work on French Renascence architecture.

LE MERCURE DE FRANCE.

In the first August number M. Robert Launay has a long and extremely interesting article on Heine's "Nationalism." The conclusion is that if Heine had a Nationalism at all, it was the Jewish Nationalism; all other manifestations of the principle he despised or dreaded, and "il est depaysé dans notre civilisation." Mr. Havelock Ellis deals with Rousseau as an abiding influence; he shows that he recreated several sentiments for us—love, religion and the love of nature. M. A. Labitte begins a series of articles on "l'Intelligence chez les Insectes," and deals particularly with their capacity for deliberate murder. "Bottom" gives the amusing aphorisms of "Jéroboam"—an imaginary Jewish financier who has missed success.

LA REVUE.

In the first August number M. Louis or M. Emile Hinzelin—not to decide between two conflicting texts—draws a gloomy picture of juvenile illiteracy and predisposition for crime in modern France. The Baron de Méneval contributes an interesting manuscript of his grandfather, secretary of Napoleon, on the de la Valettes, husband and wife, narrating the condemnation of the former for treason under the Restoration and his escape from prison, and the subsequent troubles of the latter. M. Albert Cim concludes his list of literary mistakes and solecisms. M. Faguet castigates "Les Géorgiques Chrétiennes"; he considers that M. Francis Jammes has played too long and too carelessly with the fire of simplicity, and certainly such lines as the following seem to justify the critic's severity—

> Le bois du châtaignier n'est point propre au chauffage,
> Mais son charbon sera d'un excellent usage.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

We find ourselves thinking of Coppée, another Francis, who wrote—

> Elle avait une robe blanche,
> Et la permission de sortir le dimanche.

The Comte de Pouvourville is excellent on the Chinese Revolution. It is perhaps a little difficult to see how the Chinese managed to go on considering the Mandchous a foreign dynasty through three centuries, but they achieved this feat of imagination, and they are evidently loth to reinstal the "foreign devil" in the shape of a European loan. We can understand the growing discredit of Sun Yat-sen as a mere intellectual, and the strong position of Yuan Shih-kai. The distinction between North and South is a valuable and important one.

LA REVUE BLEUE.

July 20.—M. Théodore Reinach republishes an address delivered to the "Académie des Inscriptions" on the Ἰχνευταί, the satiric drama of Sophocles, discovered in Egypt by Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt. He gives, among other things, a short analysis of the plot. M. Paul Louis discusses "le Parti ouvrier belge." M. Jules de Glouvet completes his amusing account of the polygamous Duc de Guise under Louis XIV. M. Paul Maistre recapitulates recent Cuban history, and in a subsequent number discusses the national and colour problems of the island.

July 27.—The first instalment is given of the Souvenirs of Amédée de Pastoret, intendant of Witebsk under Napoleon in 1812. He saw much of the fighting, and was an unsympathetic critic of the Poles. M. Esch mourns the fate of Luxemburg under Germanising influences; his second article in the next number contains some sound reflections on bi-lingual civilisations. M. Chaigne writes clearly on the working of the suffrage in ancient Rome. M. Paul Gaultier discusses the drink problem.

August 3.—M. M. Wolff gives the first of two articles on "Les Romans de l'Aviation," and M. P. Bassac the first of two on Paul Arène. M. André Duboscq analyses severely the political mentality of the Young Turks. M. L. Maury discusses a novel of Mrs. Wharton, and M. Jacques Lux contributes a very full paraphrase of a recent article of THE ACADEMY, à propos of Miss Hargrave's book, on German salons.

August 10.—The Pastoret Souvenirs throw some curious lights on the demoralisation of certain contingents of the Grande Armée. Bavarian soldiers are heard asking, in rather unusual German, "Wo ist die Hause wo sterbt man." M. Etienne Fournol discusses with considerable humour the projected transfer of the Luxembourg collections to the seminary of Saint-Sulpice. M. Léopold de Schlözer deals with the problem of the "Nuraghi"—the "round towers" of Sardinia. The misprint season supplies us with a gem, of the disconcerting kind, by citing the "trilithes de Skoneheuge."

LA REVUE CRITIQUE D'HISTOIRE ET DE LITTÉRATURE.

July 20.—Two books recently reviewed in THE ACADEMY are noticed—M. Bastide's "Anglais et Français du XVIIe Siècle"—very favourably—and M. de Lécussan's "Notre Droit historique au Maroc"—this latter with the conclusion that the author "au fond n'a pas si grand tort. M. Chuquet reviews Herr Holzhausen's book on the share of the German contingents in 1812; and M. Labaude criticises Abbé Mollat's work on the Popes at Avignon and Abbé Sanson's collection of documents (Vols. I-III) on the Revolution in the Seine-Inférieure.

July 27.—M. Bastide reproaches the eighth volume of the "Cambridge History of English Literature" for the lack of "la moindre tentative de synthèse." The lectures, by Mr. Rose and others, comprised under the title "Germany in the Nineteenth Century" are noticed. M. Chuquet deals with a translation of Col. Basil Jackson's "Waterloo and St. Helena." M. Biovès criticises Houssaye's "Jéna," and M. Madelin's continuation. M. Labaude gives an appreciation of M. Funck-Brentano's great work on the ancient monarchy.

August 3.—M. de Souza's brochure on French rhythm, lately noticed in THE ACADEMY, is treated with unexpected sympathy. M. Loisy criticises at length Herr Deissman's "Paulus," and finds that the author has failed to explain St. Paul's faith and influence. M. Loisy also discusses Herr Wendland's "Urchristlichen Literaturformen," where St. Paul's psychology is again much in question. Several American studies in English literature are noticed by M. Biovès, as also is M. Vignaud's great work on Columbus, reviewed last year in THE ACADEMY.

August 10.—M. Croiset's brochure on the legend of Ulysses, and German editions of Cicero's Philippics, the Æneid and Quintilian are reviewed. Two reprints of works by Emile Gebhart are noticed. High praise is bestowed on M. Diehl's "Manuel d'Art byzantin," which covers a neglected field in the history of art. Another important work reviewed is M. Rochette's minute investigation of Victor Hugo's Alexandrines.

Notes and News

Messrs. Macmillan and Co. announce that Lord Cranworth's new work on East Africa, entitled "A Colony in the Making," is published this week. The author is well acquainted with the country, and he has endeavoured to provide information that will be especially serviceable to intending settlers.

Lieut.-Col. Andrew C. P. Haggard, D.S.O., has entitled his new story "The Romance of Bayard." The story opens on the "Field of the Cloth of Gold," and ends with Bayard's death during the fatal expedition into Italy in 1524. Messrs. Stanley Paul and Co. are the publishers.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

In addition to the twenty-four volumes of "The People's Books" already issued, Messrs. Jack announce no fewer than sixty-seven additional volumes. The next dozen of the series will appear on September 4, and will include "Aristotle," by Prof. A. E. Taylor; "Evolution," by E. S. Goodrich, F.R.S.; "Theosophy," by Mrs. Annie Besant; "Syndicalism," by J. H. Harley, M.A.; "Dietetics," by Alex. Bryce, M.D.; "Eucken," by A. J. Jones, Ph.D., and others. A further dozen will follow in November.

The September number of the Round Table is published this week by Messrs. Macmillan and Co. The three main articles are devoted to "India and the Empire," "Canada and the Navy," and "The Labour Movement in Australia." In connection with the United Kingdom "The Difficulties of the Coalition" and "An Alternative Government" are discussed; the Canadian articles deal with "The Naval Conference," "The Royal Governor," and "Provincial General Elections"; and those on Australian affairs include "A Plea for a National Policy" and "An Australian Note on Anglo-German Relations." South Africa, also, is not forgotten.

"The History of Gravesend," by Alex. J. Philip, published by Messrs. Stanley Paul and Co., will be issued only to subscribers. The number of copies will be limited to 365 of each volume. Each will be numbered and signed, and no other édition de luxe will be published; nor will any other edition be published within four years of the date of issue of the first volume.

The first volume will appear about November next, and will cover Prehistoric Times, The Roman Period, and The Anglo-Saxons in Gravesend. It is anticipated that there will be three other volumes published at intervals of about a year. The book will be printed on rag-wove paper with new type, with full page illustrations (about 32 in each volume) in line and fine half-tone work on art paper. The price of each volume will be 12s. 6d. net., and a remittance for the first volume must accompany the order. Payment for future volumes will become due on delivery. Orders should be sent at once, as under no circumstances will the number of copies be exceeded.

Mr. Murray will publish early in September a new novel by Mr. Paul Neuman, whose "Roddles" was one of the most successful books of the spring season; also, early in the autumn, a work entitled "The White Knights," by Dr. T. G. Wakeling. Although a novel, this book gives first-hand information as to a military order of young men belonging to the Bedouins of the Libyan desert between Egypt and Tripoli, who enrolled themselves as White Knights—in order to protect their tribe from the vengeance of the Senussi. Dr. Wakeling spent a considerable time wandering with the Senussi, so that he is able to blend with his romance a measure of fact of exceptional interest.

Mr. Murray will also publish shortly a translation of M. Achille Luchaire's work, "Social France in the time of Philip Agustus." M. Luchaire makes a close study of the material and spiritual condition of the people in the 12th century, and his work is likely to prove attractive to the general reader as well as to scholars and students.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

GREAT BRITAIN AND CHINA.

IN any consideration of British policy in China it cannot be too clearly emphasised that the gravity of the European situation which compelled the withdrawal of our battleship squadron from the waters of Eastern Asia has had the effect of materially weakening our position in that country. Thus, when the doctrine of the Open Door was flagrantly violated by our ally, Japan, and to a lesser extent by Russia, we were unable to make effective protest for the simple reason that, in face of developments nearer home, the friendships of these Powers had become necessary to us. When the time arrives, as soon it must, for the permanent settlement of the Manchurian and Mongolian questions, it is to be feared that we shall find no other course open to us save that of acquiescence in their requirements. But although with us to-day the European situation is of vital importance, we should not allow it to absorb our attention to the exclusion of the stupendous developments now taking place in China.

What the West is to-day, with all its culture and industry, the East is destined to be to-morrow. Until recently, among Oriental races, the Japanese were believed to be exceptional. Few western observers suspected that the Chinese could so quickly abandon the traditions and customs of ages and pull down, as it were in a single night, ancient institutions dating back to periods long before the dawn of Christendom. And none imagined that, in place of these institutions, they would set up the most democratic form of government known to modern times. The Chinese have already surprised the world by their achievements during the revolution; but it will yet be found that these achievements, amazing though they were, represented only the beginning of a tremendous transition which will ultimately make itself felt in the four quarters of the globe.

At the present moment China is fully occupied in endeavouring to establish a government worthy of recognition by the Powers. The principal difficulty that besets her path is the impoverished state of her treasury. It is not denied that the undeveloped wealth in the country is enormous, or that, were the financial system to be reformed, more than sufficient revenue would be forthcoming to meet the maximum expenditure. Sir Robert Hart estimated that, on a scale of equitable taxation, the land alone is capable of supplying the utmost needs of the State. At present, however, funds are urgently required to carry on the administration and institute the necessary reforms. The deadlock which has been reached in the loan negotiations with the representatives of the six Powers has not been without its significance, for it has given us proof of the patriotism that is to be found to-day throughout the Chinese Republic. At a moment when the Central Government was sorely embarrassed for want of funds, and when no satisfactory agreement was possible with the foreign bankers, the provinces generously rallied to the aid of the Administration and remitted large sums of money to replenish the treasury.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Relief afforded by the means of provincial remittances, however, cannot be regarded as otherwise than a temporary expedient, and the time must surely come when China will either seek for loans in the open market, or, being baulked in this direction, be forced to come to terms with the six-Power group. In the latter event it is unlikely that the stipulation regarding the question of supervision would be entirely waived. The group is in a strong position in that it enjoys the diplomatic support of the various Powers concerned. Only recently Sir Edward Grey declared that, unless an international loan were adequately secured, Chinese credit would be impaired, and consequently British interests, which are largely dependent upon the continued welfare of the country, would suffer. Obviously, such a view is sensible; but it should be the duty of British diplomacy to see that whatever terms may be demanded they shall not be of a nature calculated to offend the amour propre of China.

For many decades to come China will be fully occupied in developing her own great territories, and her policy must long remain influenced by the peace-loving character of her people. If we are to believe the utterances of her greatest men, the mission of China is to be a mission of peace and progress. In other words, the nation that until yesterday had perpetuated the barbarism of the dark ages is now earnestly striving to take a place of honour in the van of civilisation. But before she can attain her ideal she must set herself the task of establishing the forces of law and order within her borders, and to that end her statesmen are at present devoting their efforts. In the accomplishment of their purpose they require the assistance, not the interference, of the stronger nations, who, each and all, let it be said, are never weary of proclaiming themselves the pioneers of civilisation.

"China does not ask Europe for mercy," stated a high official to the representative of a London journal recently, "she asks for justice and a little patience. We are not African savages crouching in gloomy forests, dreaming of murder, hating the whole world, and awaiting some fearful retribution; we are an ancient nation of cultivators, traders, philosophers. We are in some disarray, it is true, because the principle of authority, which we love as dearly as the Anglo-Saxons, is being restated in a new and strange language. We only ask what Europe cannot gainsay, namely, time to set our house in order. Remember, we have many mansions, and there is much to do. If we fail to erect a stable Government within a reasonable period, come and partition us, but until then leave us in peace."

It is to be feared that the ambitious designs of certain Powers will not allow of China being left altogether in peace. But, as far as Great Britain is concerned, the path of duty is clearly defined. During that period, inevitable in the very nature of things, when "the principle of authority is being restated in a new and strange language," we must throw the whole weight of our authority on the side of justice and benevolence. Our diplomacy must be so directed as to ensure that in the days of trial that lie before her China shall be accorded the sympathy and support of the British Government and the British people.

MOTORING

MOST motorists must at times have experienced difficulty in finding their way through towns and cities they have visited, the main roads to different destinations being often imperfectly indicated. To remedy this, the Automobile Association and Motor Union has begun the preparation of a complete series of "guide cards," which, judging from specimens before us, seem admirably adapted to fulfil their purpose. Each card consists of a map or plan, based upon the Ordnance Survey, of a town or centre, and shows clearly the best routes through it to various places, and the position of officially-appointed hotels and repairers. The towns in respect of which the guide cards have already been prepared are:—Brighton, Burton-on-Trent, Canterbury, Carlisle, Chelmsford, Chester, Colchester, Coventry, Doncaster, Harrogate, Lancaster, Leamington, Newcastle, Preston, Reading, Stamford, Warwick, and York. The remaining towns and centres of importance are being dealt with by a special department of the Association as rapidly as possible, and it is hoped that at an early date these useful little guide cards will practically cover the whole of Great Britain. Members may obtain them free on request, either from the head and branch offices of the Association, or from the patrols on duty outside the respective towns.

It is curious that those immediately interested in the petrol question should have been so slow in appreciating the real facts of the position—facts which are simple and obvious to any intelligent outsider. The first indisputable point is that the supply of the spirit is entirely in the hands of a few monopolist companies or trusts; the second is that these companies or trusts are bent upon making as much money as they can from their monopoly, and are not at all likely to be in the

"EVERY DROP LUBRICATES."
"Champion" Motor Oil
is the best for all types of Cars.
If not already using "Champion" send for trial tin to
S. BOWLEY & SON,
DISTILLERS OF BOWLEY'S MOTOR SPIRIT,
"Express" and "Bomo" Brands.
Wellington Works,
BATTERSEA, LONDON, S.W.
Established 1744.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

least degree influenced by any sentimental consideration for the motorist; and the third is that attempts to obtain petrol at a reduced price by any form of co-operation among motorists would be altogether futile. This last point was made quite clear at one of the sittings of the Petrol Committee of the R.A.C., when a representative of the British Petroleum Company frankly stated that even an order for five million gallons of the spirit from any associated body of consumers would not be executed at a farthing under the ordinary retail price. The position, therefore, is simply this: the motorist must continue to pay any price the petrol monopolists may think fit to demand, until such time as the satisfactory alternative fuel be found, or go without it and leave his motor in the garage. The only hope of obtaining motor fuel at a reasonable price seems to lie in the substitution of a fuel such as alcohol, which, if its manufacture were unrestricted, could easily be produced in unlimited quantities in this country, and could never be trust-controlled.

Mr. Edge's expression of opinion with regard to self-starting devices has already, as was to be expected, evoked numerous protests. Mr. Adams, of the Adams Manufacturing Company, points out that the Adams car has for over two years been fitted with the compressed-air type of self-starter as a standard equipment, and asserts that it has given such satisfaction that there is not the slightest intention of abandoning it. Mr. Colin Defries writes in praise of the Chalmer self-starter, which is also of the compressed-air type; and the Acetylene Illuminating Co., while refraining from any expression of opinion as to the merits or demerits of acetylene self-starters, points out that the Home Office officials recognise "dissolved" acetylene as absolutely safe. There is no doubt that Mr. Edge's letter has initiated a long and heated discussion on a very interesting and important question.

The Belsize people seem to have a very happy knack of anticipating a popular demand and successfully "filling the bill" well in advance of most of their competitors. First there was the "14-16," the car of moderate power for the man of moderate means, which was the pioneer of its type and still retains its popularity; then came the 18-22 six-cylinder, designed for the motorist who appreciates the luxury of the multi-cylindered car, but is unwilling or unable to pay the high price usually demanded for it; while about a year ago the north-country firm caused another sensation with their now well-known "10-12," the four-cylindered 200-guinea car, which has admittedly been one of the greatest successes of 1912. The latest Belsize production is the 5-cwt. delivery van, designed expressly for the rapid and economical transport of light loads. This is really the 10-12 chassis fitted with a light van body, and we hear that it is being ordered extensively by newspaper firms for delivery purposes, both in London and the provinces.

Thanks to the gradual disappearance of the prejudice against motor cars, the practice, once so common in rural districts, of strewing the road with nails, broken glass, etc., for tyre-puncturing purposes has become practically obsolete. But that it is not quite extinct was shown by a recent case at Guildford, where two youths were charged with placing sharp substances on the highway at Chiddingfold, Surrey. The case was proved by one of the A.A. and M.U. patrols, the offenders being bound over in the sum of five pounds each and ordered to report themselves monthly for two years to the probation officer. Several complaints of a similar character have been received recently by the Association, and in view of the difficulty ordinarily experienced in tracing the offenders it is hoped that the action taken in this instance will have a good effect in suppressing the nuisance.

R. B. H.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

BUSINESS is growing every week. The public has now made up its mind that everything looks like going up, and as a result, stockbrokers are busy. There is no sign of any mad boom, and no one seems to know from which direction the boom will come. But past experience shows that the public always takes one particular market, and rushes prices up wildly. The Kaffir magnates hope that the fashion will turn their way. Rubber people are confident that the statistical position of rubber is so strong that buyers will come in. Egypt is now prosperous, and the dealers who handle Egyptian shares are very busy. Iron and steel things are good, and shipping shares are bought by those who understand them. Therefore, we may expect a busy autumn.

I am assured that I take a too pessimistic view of China. Those who know the most declare that a revolution is impossible. At the present time we get all our information from one source, and it is therefore difficult to form an accurate opinion on Chinese matters. Russia and Japan both hope for trouble, and talk peace. France and Great Britain are determined not to allow the other Powers to make trouble.

The Canadian Middle West Trust ask the public to supply £200,000 in order that the Trust may plunge into real estate at the top of the boom. The public will be very foolish if it supplies a single halfpenny. Canadian land is very good, but the prices are simply foolish. The Vacuum Electric and Gas Heating Appliances has also asked us for money, for the purpose of working a patent heater. Such things are best left alone. Not one patent in a thousand is any good.

MONEY will certainly become dearer, and a higher Bank Rate may be expected. Egypt will want her usual autumn supplies at least six weeks earlier. It is said that Canada has arranged all her crop finance. But the United States is still sending bills for discount.

FOREIGNERS are in an uninteresting position. The Japanese are keeping their market steady, probably because they wish to make another loan. They are hard up. Perus have been bought on the tale that the Corporation is to be included in the big Farquhar South American schemes. I think this a pure canard. Nevertheless, if someone big would take the Peruvian Corporation and run it upon sound lines, it would be a godsend for the shareholders. There are few companies worse managed than this. Tintos have been good, and will go to 85. Anacondas are also much better. They are now quoted 9½, as against 6⅞ a year ago. All copper things will go up. Why some of the copper shares should be dealt in in the Foreign market, I cannot understand.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

HOME RAILS have been a little dull. The wet weather has had something to do with the fall, and the fear of dear money has also frightened the speculator. The contangoes are so high in this market that speculation is almost out of the question. The rates of interest charged by the moneylenders are simply exorbitant. They compare very badly with the rates charged in the Yankee market, where every effort is made to encourage gambling. From the investor's point of view the lower Home Rails fall the better, for they are magnificent investments.

YANKEE RAILS.—Everybody in the United States is "bullish." J. J. Hill, one of the shrewdest of the railway magnates, declares that the business outlook in the States is better than it has been for the past five years. He is a man to follow. I think it a very wise thing to buy Missouri, Kansas and Texas, Unions and Southerns. The cotton crop will be good, and the wheat crop excellent. These lines make their money out of the crops. Northern Pacific seem quite high enough, but they may rise a few dollars. This stock, like Pennsylvania and New York Central, is an investment stock, and not a gambling counter. The public, of course, go for the cheap shares, such as Eries and Rocks. They will naturally rise with the rest of the market.

CANADIAN PACIFICS look high, but I am assured that the directors are still buyers of the stock, and that they laugh at the notion of any serious opposition to their proposal to increase the capital of the company. It must not be forgotten that Canadian Pacific run Canada. Neither the Canadian Northern, nor the Grand Trunk, is yet in a position to compete seriously. The Canadian Pacific Land Department is the most beautifully organised land selling agency in the world, and does a huge trade. In every town in Canada, the C.P.R. fosters progress, and does everything it can to help trade. It is most popular, and the agitation will die down.

RUBBER.—There has been a little boom in Rubber. The dealers having purchased all their supplies of fine, hard, cured Para, are now anxious to put up the price. Therefore the market in raw rubber is hard. As a result, Mincing Lane began to buy Rubber shares, and the Stock Exchange was only too glad to follow suit. The public has come in, and prices have risen considerably. I think that even to-day some shares, such as Pataling, Cicely, Anglo-Malay, Consolidated Malay, Seremban, Batu Caves, and Bukit Rajah are undervalued. These are all first-class concerns, and well managed. Whatever happens to the price of rubber, they will be dividend-payers. Linggi is also one of the best. But I am not keen on the cheap shares. There are some people who will not buy high-priced things; therefore, such people should purchase Chersonese or Merlimau. I believe the boom will last for some weeks longer. In any case, there is not likely to be any fall from present quotations for some time.

OIL.—Oil shares have been harder, but there is not much business. Chelekens continue firm. They are one of the features of the market. A well-known firm of stockbrokers sends out a circular telling us that the company should pay from 20 per cent. to 30 per cent. per annum. The production for the past three weeks has been over £9,000, which it is selling at 23 kopecks, and making about 30s. a ton. Last Sunday a gusher was struck.

KAFFIRS.—Kaffirs have done well, and the dealers look for higher prices. But everything depends upon Paris, for London is full of shares waiting to be sold when the market moves up. If the shops have the courage to put down the money, and buy everything that is offered, they may bring on a boom. But it is doubtful whether they have either courage or money. They lack a leader.

RHODESIANS.—The story that Giants have found their long-lost lode is hardly believed, although the shares are being purchased by somebody. The directors decline to open their mouths. Is this going to be another Rhodesian scandal? Chartered seem quite unable to get beyond 30s.

TIN.—The Tin market is fairly good, and there has been some big buying of Rayfield (Cornwall). It is said that this company has some huge masses of tin-sand which it can treat at a very handsome profit, and make even more money than Cornwall Tailings. The Nigerian Tin Corporation report was liked. The company has made over 50 per cent. on its capital, and will pay 5s. a share dividend. It made this money by getting out of Anglos at the right moment.

COPPER.—Copper is hard, and all Copper shares have been purchased. I am afraid to recommend Mount Elliot, Hampden Cloncurry, and the rest of the Australian group. Our Australian cousins are too clever for me. But Amalgamated and all the American shares will see higher prices.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The buying of P. and O. and Royal Mail still continues. The Egyptian market has been very busy, and Beheras, which I have again and again recommended, have risen to 15½. This company is to be quoted officially on the London Stock Exchange. It is one of the best land companies in Egypt. National Banks have improved. I think Investment and Agency the cheapest gamble, for now that Lord St. Davids has taken an interest in the company the price must go to par. Brewery shares are now in fashion again, and the debentures and preference shares of the soundest issues can be bought with confidence. Liebig propose to offer their shareholders 100,000 5 per cent. Prefs. of £5 each. The offer is not likely to be declined, for this is one of the soundest industrial companies in the world.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

NEED.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I have often wondered why Mr. Moon, at the time, criticised Dean Alford, when the latter, speaking of a past time, said: "I need not have troubled myself to write about it."

The following is Mr. Moon's criticism: "Now, 'I need not' is present, not past; and it is of the past you are speaking; you should therefore have said: 'I needed not' or 'I should not have needed.' And the verb 'troubled,' which you have put in the past, should have been in the present, just as the verb 'need,' which you have put in the present, should have been in the past. For you were not speaking of what you would not have needed to have done, but of what you would not have needed to do. The sentence, then, should have been, 'If I had believed so-and so, I should not have needed to trouble myself.'"

My humble opinion is that Dean Alford was perfectly correct.* To my mind, in the expression "I need not have

* Even the Perfect Infinitive, used by Dean Alford, instead of the Present Infinitive suggested by Mr. Moon, might be defensible here, on the following ground:—"When the associated idea of the thing not having been done is not sufficiently conveyed by the antecedent, the use of the Perfect Infinitive is justified.—Dr. HALL.

Example:—I wished to have observed a country, the monument of freedom and industry; but my days were numbered, and a longer stay would have been ungraceful.—GIBBON, Autobiog., p. 50.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

troubled myself, the verb need is incorrectly said by Mr. Moon to be in the present tense of the Indicative; it is in reality in the present Infinitive, in which mood all verbs which follow certain auxiliaries are put. Here, for instance, there is an ellipsis of the verb did (=I (did) not need (to) have troubled myself), which auxiliary is sometimes used by good authors before the verb need.

Example: ". . . and yet they will tell you and proclaim to the four winds, for repetition here, that they don't need their ignorant and brutal papers, as if the papers could exist if they didn't need them."—(Dickens's letter written to Mr. Macready on January 3, 1844.)

Now, let us parse the two most important words in question in a sentence quoted from Macaulay's letter, p. 341:—

"I did not need your letter to satisfy me of your kindness."

did—auxiliary verb to do, did, done; indicative mood, imperfect tense, 1st person singular, agreeing in n. and p. with its n. case I.

need—regular-transitive verb to need, needed, needed; put in the Infinitive mood by the auxiliary did, and having the preposition to understood before it.

The foregoing has led me to the conclusion that the elliptical form need not, and the expressions needed not and did not need are three of the legitimate forms of the Imperfect tense of the Present Indicative of the verb need, used negatively.*

One last example in point:—

"By making such cordial amends to an author whom in old days he had unjustly disparaged, Professor Wilson did credit to his own sincerity; but the public approbation needed no prompter either then or thereafter."—Macaulay's letter, p. 426.

I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

ADOLPHE BERNON.

61, Talbot Road, Bayswater, W.

AN UNSATIATED PUBLIC.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—No doubt there is a "Satiated Public" such as you portray, with "the figure of Irony, his lips a little awry," in the background. But this pitiful sight should not hide from us the fact that there is also an unsatiated public, not nearly as large as the other, but in substantial numbers, with unspoiled youthful appetite for "the things that matter." It has not, Sir, your ripe and leisurely mind, or the habit of handling "tall folios" in beautifully furnished libraries, because it has never had the opportunity of these things. It consists mostly of poor men, largely of poor young men and women of solitary and thoughtful character, labouring all day at horrible tasks, and having only a few hours in the evening and at the week-end to feed the soul that is hungry in them. I can see them quite plainly in kitchens and "second-floor backs," gentle, but not very popular creatures, because they are not satisfied with the trivial, and are not "incapable of concentration."

Do you doubt it? Let me cite only one of the "series" to which you refer—the "Home University Library." These shilling volumes evidently do not depend upon the decorative value of flashing bindings. Every one of them contains 256 pages of solid scholarship; many, such as Dr. Whitehead's "Introduction to Mathematics," Mr. Russell's "Problems of Philosophy," Mrs. Rhys Davids' "Buddhism," Mr. McDougall's "Psychology," Mr. Hobson's "Science of Wealth," are really stiff reading. Any printer and binder will tell you that at such a price very large editions of such books must be sold if the publishers are not mere philanthropists. It is inconceivable that they should be bought by any but serious readers. How many such readers are there? It is impossible to say; but, knowing something of the matter, I will venture upon the guess that there are in the British Islands a hundred thousand. Now this is the question: In the fine old days when the public did not show a "bewildered passivity," because it was not even bewildered, when it had not "lost the power of individual selection," because it never had such a power to lose, was there ever a time when it could be plausibly held that there were a hundred thousand readers of serious books in the British Isles?

Faithfully yours,

P.

GERMANS ABROAD.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In your issue of the 24th inst., C. V. contributes an interestingly shrewd article, entitled, "Germans Abroad." There is more than a half-truth in the observation that "France, indeed, is the place where all foreigners may most profitably be studied, for while the Frenchman keeps his own home closed to them he receives them in his public places with a good-humoured courtesy which puts them quickly at their ease, so that their several traits become soon apparent." The article is admittedly a kind of vignetted snap-shot, and has not the comprehensive intention of a panorama; and one may so far agree that, seen, as it were, against the background of innate French courtesies, certain traits of Teutonic character may appear boorish and insolent. A kind of phlegmatic clumsiness and inability to accept the French point of view, however, do not necessarily imply want of sensibility, and it would be highly unfair, of course, to interpret a cultivated and deeply thoughtful people in such a way. Moreover, out of every nation one may meet les enfants terribles, the obnoxious parvenu, the incurable solecist: these prejudices, rather than being representative of a nation, are self-constituted ambassadors of discord.

However, I agree that there are to be found modern Germans who, fostered possibly by racial difference, display contemptuous clumsiness and insensibility when abroad. They have, as C. V. remarks, the traditional Englishman's contempt for the foreigner, but in its negative form. The positive side, the active contempt, is shown to-day, not, as a rule, by the Englishman, but by the American: or rather, by a certain type of American, who, I trust, does not wholly represent the Western Continent. He is the traditional type, and a living fact: one meets him often enough in England, and at French towns and watering-places. He is cute, arrogant, and cocksure. He arrives with the imperiousness of a king, and the breeding of a flunkey, and one is expected simply to "stand around" while he corrects, subdues, and absorbs into his own magnificent mental cosmos the outworn curiosity called Europe. His is a strange form of imbecility; it pleases the American; it amuses the French hotel proprietor and enriches his purse; it bores the Englishman; and it deceives nobody. It has, however, an unpleasant side: it does not add to general enjoyment and social good sense. I saw, for instance, recently in Dieppe, a dining-room full of visitors, principally French, become quite ill-at-ease, solely through the bad manners of a party of Americans.

The sans-gêne German and the cock-sure American represent, I think, the negative and positive sides of social impudence. Seated unrestrained vis-à-vis in a French café, appropriately supported by politely-smiling garçons and a bland propriétaire, the worthy pair surely provide

* The following is one of the numerous examples that I have borrowed from contemporary writers:—"She was there to do her duty and she did it, and sometimes more than she need (=than she needed to, or than she did need to) have done."—NOVEL.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

an addition to the unconscious comedies of the world. I am, Sir, yours faithfully, FREDERICK CLAUSEN.

44, Southfields Road, Wandsworth, S.W.
August 26, 1912.

A BEETHOVEN RELIC.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I think it might be of considerable interest to some of your readers to know that Mr. Paul Hiller, of Cologne, the well-known writer on music, and the only son of the famous composer, Ferdinand Hiller, is in possession of a very precious relic, namely, a lock of Beethoven's hair. Mr. Hiller informs me that he became possessed of it in the following manner. His father, when a boy of sixteen, was staying in Vienna with his celebrated teacher, Johann Nepomuk Hummel, at the time of Beethoven's fatal illness, and on the day following his death, March 27, 1827, young Ferdinand Hiller was permitted to cut off a lock of hair from the magnificent head of the immortal composer. Many years afterwards Ferdinand Hiller presented this relic to his son on the occasion of the latter's thirtieth birthday, and although at the Beethoven Museum in Bonn two smaller locks of Beethoven's hair may be seen, there are no others of their kind in the world, and the lock in question is the only one in private possession. Yours very obediently,

ALGERNON ASHTON.

10, Holmdale Road, W. Hampstead.
August, 1912.

BOOKS RECEIVED

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS.

Godoy: The Queen's Favourite. By Edmund B. d'Auvergne. Illustrated. (Stanley Paul and Co. 16s. net.)

The Union of South Africa, with Chapters on Rhodesia and the Native Territories of the High Commission. By W. Basil Worsfold. Illustrated. (Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons. 7s. 6d. net.)

British Battles: Tourcoing. By Hilaire Belloc. With Plans. (Stephen Swift and Co. 1s. net.)

China's Revolution, 1911-1912. A Historical and Political Record of the Civil War. By Edwin J. Dingle. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 15s. net.)

FICTION.

The Marble Aphrodite. By Anthony Kirby Gill. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

The Happy Family. By Frank Swinnerton. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

Sally. By Dorothea Conyers. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

The Girl from the East. By David Whitelaw. (Greening and Co. 6s.)

Lamorna. By Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

A Durbar Bride. By Charlotte Cameron. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

The Three Anarchists. By Maud Stepney Rawson. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

Maggie of Margate: A Seaside Sensation. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

THEOLOGY.

Echoes: Some Words Pertaining to the Kingdom of God Spoken from the Pulpit from Time to Time During Past Years. By the Rev. J. M. Gatrill. With a Preface by the Rev. S. Baring-Gould. (Skeffington and Son. 3s. 6d. net.)

The Christian Scheme and Human Needs. By the Rev. C. A. Houghton, M.A. (Skeffington and Son. 2s. net.)

The Christian Battle: Notes of Confirmation Addresses Delivered in Devonshire and in London. By the Most Reverend Frederick Temple, D.D. (The S.P.C.K. 6d.)

MISCELLANEOUS.

Life Understood from a Scientific and Religious Point of View; and the Practical Method of Destroying Sin, Disease, and Death. By F. L. Rawson. (The Crystal Press. 7s. 6d. net.)

How to Make Money. By John Stafford. (Stephen Swift and Co. 1s. net.)

Main Currents of Modern Thought: A Study of the Spiritual and Intellectual Movements of the Present Day. By Rudolf Eucken. Translated by Meyrick Booth, B.Sc. (T. Fisher Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

The Industrial Crisis. By W. J. Sanderson. (Siegle, Hill and Co. 6d. net.)

VERSE.

Flowers, Dust and Sun. By Mary Chadwick. (John Long.)

Waters from Deep Springs. By A. D. H. Allan. (G. Routledge and Sons. 3s. 6d. net.)

PERIODICALS.

Bookseller; Publishers' Circular; Literary Digest, N.Y.; The Collegian, Calcutta; Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; Revue Bleue; Cornhill Magazine; M.A.B.; Fortnightly Review; Oxford and Cambridge Review.

The "MIGNON" Typewriter

Price £6 15s. Complete.

No elaborate key-board. only two keys, one for printing, and one for spacing, and consequently the working parts are very much reduced, only 250 as against 2,500 in standard machines. A great saving in repairs and in cleaning.

The machine is very compact and easily carried about, weighing only about 10 lbs., and yet it is capable of doing all the work of any other and most expensive typewriter. Its construction is solid and of the best material only, all working parts being of tool steel and case-hardened, and so practically unbreakable, a year's guarantee being given with every machine.

The ribbon movement is automatic, but unlike any other machine, the ribbon never moves when spacing. but only when printing, thus ensuring an even wear, and consequently increasing its length of service.

This movement prevents the uneven appearance of the type which has puzzled many experts. Marginal stops, easy of adjustment, are fitted. Paper of any size, up to 9 inches, can be used.

The most wonderful part is displayed in the ingenuity of the cylinder, which in itself is a masterpiece of engineering skill. Should any of the letters get blunt the whole of the cylinder can be replaced at a cost of only 4/-; this includes the whole of the 84 characters of the typewriter.

A special feature is the ease and swiftness of converting any of these machines from one language to another at only a nominal cost. The key arrangement can also be instantly changed into more than twenty different languages, at the very small sum of 8/- each set. Thus you have a machine capable of doing the work of several at very little cost. Perfect alignment and absolutely self-centring. The letters can be gone over without any deviation whatever; this is ensured through a double lock action.

Being a direct thrust the power is very strong; 17 copies have been taken at one printing with carbon sheets without cutting the original copy.

Printing in colours without a double ribbon is unique.

THE ELECTRICAL COMPANY,
122, CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Twelve years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC
OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO . . AND THROUGH CANADA . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service via Vancouver.

For further particulars apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE
TO
SOUTH AND EAST AFRICA.
WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.
Via the SUEZ CANAL:
Calling at GIBRALTAR, MARSEILLES and NAPLES

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.
(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.
Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE
PLEASURE CRUISES
LIVERPOOL
to the
MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC
by the
"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"
. . . Ports of Call . . .
CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

P & O Passenger Services.
EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports.
(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)
Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises
Throughout the Year, according to Season.
AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.
Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,
102, Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours.

R.M.S.P. PLEASURE CRUISES.

To	Fare	Length of Tour	Sailing	From
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Is., & Madeira.	From £22.	Days 23.	Every Alternate Thursday.	London.
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£12.	8 upwards.	Weekly.	Southampton & Liverpool.
WEST INDIES.	From £40.	From 34.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.

"Arcadian" Cruises.

MEDITERRANEAN, HOLY LAND & EGYPT.	From £1 a day.	10.	September to November.	Southampton & Marseilles.
Lisbon, Madeira, WEST INDIES.	From £1 a day.	62.	December 3.	Southampton.

For further particulars apply:—

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY,
London: 18, Moorgate St., E.C., or 52, Cockspur St., S.W.

FEARLESS CRITICISM

In support of principle
In exposure of humbug
In scorn of cant

THE COMMENTATOR

A Weekly Review of Politics, Art, Music, Literature, and the Stage.

ONE PENNY WEEKLY of all Newsagents—or sent direct from the Publishers, for 6s. per annum (post free) or 3s. for six months.

COMMENTATOR, Ltd., 31, Essex St., London

Published for the Proprietor by WM. DAWSON and SONS, Limited, at Cannon House, Breams Buildings, London, E.C.
Branches in Canada: Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg; in South Africa: Capetown, Johannesburg, and Durban.
Printed by BONNER & Co., The Chancery Lane Press, Rolls Passage, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

CONTENTS

	PAGE
Notes of the Week	299
To Poseidon	300
Style and the People ...	300
On Translation	301
Reviews:
The Manchester Pecksniffs	302
Essays in Life	303
The Quintessence of Christian Art	304
The Tower of London and Old Japan	306
Plays Good and Indifferent	307
An Artist's Diary ...	307
Criticism and Vivacity ...	308
European South America	309
One of the "Gardens of History"	309
Shorter Reviews	310
Fiction	311
The Deserted Village ...	312
A Reader's Complaint ...	313
Samuel Coleridge-Taylor ...	315
The Literary Traveller ...	316
Napoleon the Third—I. ...	317
The Theatre:
"Drake" at His Majesty's Theatre ...	318
"Little Miss Llewelyn" at the Vaudeville Theatre	319
"Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm" at the Globe Theatre	320
The Magazines	320
Notes and News	321
Imperial and Foreign Affairs	322
Motoring	323
In the Temple of Mammon	324
Correspondence	326
Books Received	327

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C., where all communications to the Editor should be addressed.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Notes of the Week

THE authoritative article in the Times by Mr. Geoffrey Drage on Sea Training for Boys is excellent reading. Mr. Drage knows his subject ab ovo usque ad malum, and the obstacles and difficulties which have hitherto stood in the way of State aid, and of aid by the local authorities for encouraging training for the sea, are admirably sketched by him. The gift by the Daily Mirror to the Sea Scouts of a 50-ton ketch, and the purchase and fitting out of the large sea-going tender to the Exmouth, the "Steadfast," by a committee of enthusiastic inhabitants of Kingston-on-Thames and district—to be stationed at Kingston—are very encouraging signs of the times. Mr. Drage writes:—

> What is required is a series of large, stationary training ships with sea-going tenders.

That is the ultimate aim of the "Steadfast" Committee of Kingston-on-Thames. Although Windsor and Reading have training vessels, the Kingston Brig is the best adapted boat on the Upper Thames, and the Committee hope that a chain of such vessels will be established by all the important riverside groups, and that they may be able to establish a sea-going tender to serve the combined training vessels. Kingston has worked on a voluntary basis and in the face of many discouragements, but the handsome Brig "Steadfast" will be at her moorings in less than a month, and as a voluntary effort must excite much interest, affording a stimulus both to the State and to local authorities to render easier elsewhere that which Kingston has accomplished unaided.

Why do people want to read a newspaper when they are on a voyage? Only a short time ago, a sea-voyage was regarded as a period of rest and recreation for which one should be grateful; a pleasant interlude, during which kingdoms might fall, stocks fluctuate, Governments be overthrown, and the traveller should yet remain in peaceful, leisured ignorance. Now, however, papers are printed on board ship, with magazine page, theatrical notes, leading article, city letter, all complete—it is surely a pity not to be at least a little more original—and the traveller knows no rest from anxiety; all he gets beyond his ordinary existence in the town is a more or less gentle tossing and plenty of the open air. Probably the average Englishman, cast on a desert island, would in time start a newspaper of his own, with himself as editor, contributor, printer, and purchaser, just to make it a little more home-like. The one thing the reader of the ship-newspaper escapes is the plague of posters, which becomes more harassing every week.

It was with something of a shock that we noticed this sentence in a morning contemporary this week, opening an article entitled "Love at First Sight": "A defence of real love matches and of love at first sight was made by Sir James Crichton-Browne in his presidential address at the conference of the Sanitary Inspectors' Association yesterday." There is no mistake about it, and it is no use worrying over the alarming discrepancy between the conference and its theme. The only thing to do is calmly to await the inevitable; soon we shall expect to see that Mr. William Le Queux, taking the chair at the annual meeting of the Railway Porters' League, has addressed its members on Confucius and his Message; or that Mr. Taft, presiding over a gathering of telephone operators, is giving his views on Astronomy and the Use of the Globes. Why not, when sanitary inspectors meet to be lectured on "Love at First Sight"?

An enthusiastic writer says, with reference to the recent War Office trials of air-craft, that "the day of the aeroplane for private use is clearly foreshadowed." We have long passed the stage when the newspapers chronicled short flights; a flight must be notable for some reason or another for it to reach the distinction of print; and accidents are very infrequent, considering the incessant pursuit of the study which is fast attaining the dignity of a science. But certain advances will have to take place before the flying machine can be safely reckoned as a popular mode of conveyance, and the most urgent of these is that it must be able to hover, stationary, over one spot, for as long as its pilot likes. Many minds are considering this problem, and when it is solved—as ultimately, we suppose, it must be—the possibilities of flight will be tremendously extended.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

To Poseidon

IN fire upon the altar of the west
Dies the long, golden day—
Athené's temple hides its columns grey,
And, far beneath, in their divine unrest
The waters throb and sway.

The sail droops lean upon its crimson mast,
The oars hang idle still—
There is a sound of singing on the hill;
They sing to him who on this chalice vast Breathes tempest at his will.

Oh, sire of Cyclops swart and Naiad pale,
Hearest thou these poor cries?
Even now thy kindred of the curdling skies
Pluck at our ropes and shake our narrow sail,
Contending deities.

Odysseus to Ithaca returns
Not yet, denied by thee.
Let not our gilded prows the playthings be
Of some grim crag! Our votive brazier burns
Red by the darkening sea.

DOROTHY MARGARET STUART.

Style and the People

THAT a language, to live and to remain living, must from time to time, after having achieved an accepted form and vocabulary, yield to pressure from without and absorb words which owe their origin to other thoughts and other lands, is an axiom taken as incontestable by most persons who have given the matter any consideration. A glance at the dictionary will serve to show how many of our words in current use are "lifted" almost bodily from other tongues, and an hour spent with a newspaper will prove that many who write the language—write it even for a living—understand but very slightly the true meaning of their material. We commented last week upon the distressing frequency of such hybrids as "cinema-de-luxe" and "kinemacolor"; this week, in a journal of repute, we noticed a statement to the effect that "the sun shone through the astonished atmosphere, gilding the houses with gold and quickening the Seine into a vernal luminosity." In another sheet whose lucubrations cheer our morning meal we saw that something was "immaculately spotless"; also that somebody "partnered" somebody else in a match; further, there occurred a reference to a "bottomless" abyss.

The last thing we should advocate is the application of the stilted, professorial forms of speech to daily use. The oracular, Johnsonian periods are out of date; the man who spoke of a cup of tea as "an infusion of the fragrant herb of the Orient" would be laughed at as surely as we smile at the provincial editors who allow their staff to allude to "Old Sol" or the "effulgent orb of day." People who observe minutely every rule of grammar and syntax and every canon of composition in their casual conversation are rarely racy or pleasant companions. It is a pity, however, that the reporters who write, considering all their difficult surroundings of noise and hurry, surprisingly well, should not learn, for example, that "immaculate" means "spotless," that the word "abyss" contains in itself the idea of "bottomless," and that the noun twisted into unlawful use as a verb can occasionally be a dreadful and detestable thing. It has often occurred to us that the daily papers, with their various peculiar ways of handling the language which pass for more or less correct English, are responsible for a great deal of the loose speaking and writing on which we are sometimes moved to remark. How tirelessly has it been dinned into the ears of the beginner that it is possible to write in a clear and pleasing style without hunting up polysyllables or reverting to the hackneyed phrase; without, in short, mentioning such terrible things as "vernal luminosity" or the "devouring element" or "fair Luna"? Yet, we suppose, the newspaper-reading public—especially that large portion of it which spends its Sunday mornings gloating over the tragedies, conflagrations, and police-court proceedings of the previous week—is impressed by such ornate ready-made stuff, and demands it. But who created the demand?

We dream sometimes of a new daily or bi-weekly paper, not written "by gentlemen for gentlemen," nor by the people for the people, but by expert essayists for a certain public which might be proved to exist. Its editors should be no grim and grizzled specialists with axes to grind, nor should they be vegetarians or nut-food faddists; they should be merely genial, healthy, well-read literary fellows; men who, while knowing Stevenson and Meredith and Hardy, had not forgotten that there once lived a notable person named Horace. In a not too solemn conclave they should select certain items of news as themes, from a literary, not a spectacular, point of view; they should then adjourn for dinner. After dinner, but not before the port had gone twice round, they and their staff should enlarge weightily or wittily as each particular case needed. No foreign telegrams should be suffered to interrupt their exalted deliberations; no vapours from a clamorous composing-room should dull the polish of their epigrams; no extraneous split infinitives should set their delicately adjusted nerves on edge. The ghosts of Swift and Charles Lamb should meet in their wondrous columns; raillery should never degenerate to the ironic sneer; dignity—bearing in mind the fate of Æsop's frog—should never puff itself out to platitudinous pomposity. And if the result, on any given evening, did not satisfy them utterly, the presses should be silent and the paper should not appear.

That paper has not yet appeared, save in our dreams; it never will, for naturally it would not pay expenses; but it would make history until its graceful death. And never, no, never, would it refer to a "vernal luminosity."

W. L. R.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

On Translation

BY H. BELLOC.

THE art of translation is not adventitious to letters to-day. It is a fundamental part of culture. The culture of Christendom is not national but European, and how true this is you may discover by noting the sterile work of any society long cut off from Europe.

By an accident to which I cannot remember any parallel in history this modern culture of ours is split up, as to its expression, into quite half a dozen separate vehicles, any two of which are completely disassociate. We talk of the Teutonic, the Slavonic, and the Italian languages which are indeed the main idiomatic groups of Christendom, but literary German cannot be read by an Englishman who has not learnt the language, nor Greek by a Russian, nor French by an Italian, still less Castilian by a Frenchman. Each of the great national groups into which society fell during the Middle Ages has chosen some one dialect for its typical literary expression, and you have now what we call "German," "English," "Russian," "French," "Italian," "Spanish," etc., which, without having discarded many living dialects form perfectly distinct vehicles for thought and are yet charged with the expression of a common culture. For Europe is not built up out of a number of such elements coming together. Europe is a unity within which these provinces happen to have appeared. Indeed, Europe needs and should have once again a common tongue; undoubtedly Europe will sooner or later recover one. For many centuries our common culture had such a common tongue in Latin, and whatever counted in Europe was bi-lingual. Such a mixture of the universal and the particular is normal to the European story.

Since this is certainly the case, since we cannot express our culture save through these curiously separate vehicles of "modern languages," it is essential that matter which has been put forward in say German or Italian should be available to the Frenchman and to the Englishman, and that matter which has been put forward in, say, Castilian should be available to Paris. The men who can command many languages are extremely rare, nor can their number be greatly increased; for to possess a real acquaintance with many idioms is a most abnormal and a purely personal gift.

There remains—in the lack of the common tongue—nothing but the mechanism of translation, and here we are met by a problem of the greatest difficulty.

To translate effectively is the hardest of all literary arts. That in itself would give one to think when one considered the necessities of modern European culture. But, unfortunately, this first difficulty is very greatly increased by another; which is, that to translate really badly, to give any one of a thousand thoroughly false conceptions of the original, is not the hardest but the easiest of all literary arts.

What a good translation should be, and why it is so difficult to attain, I will discuss in a moment, but the psychology of bad translation merits a curious, if mournful, examination.

There is no one who cannot make a bad translation. All it requires is a dictionary, an elementary grammar, and some knowledge of the alphabets used. Thus a Frenchman is paid 6d. to translate the line:—

He never lifted up a single stone, and sooner or later he can render it thus:—

Il ne leva jamais une seule pierre.

Or an Englishman is given 6d. to translate the line:—

Demain, Oh! Conquérant, c'est Moscou qui s'allume!

and he can render it:—

To-morrow, Oh Conqueror, it is Moscow which catches fire!

Neither of these gentlemen would have achieved an efficient translation. Both should be drowned.

It is among the mysteries of the human language that the Word is at once the most subtle in its soul and the most obvious in its body of all human modes of action.

"Pferd" "horse": Is that not so? And your plain man, and your practical man and your plumb fool are not only satisfied by that—a humble saint can be satisfied with simplicities—but they are quite certain you need go no further. Very well, go and translate word for word into German:—

There was a little man and he had a little horse (pferd),
And he bridled it and saddled it and put his leg across, and see what happens to the spirit of that delightful couplet.

Translation malignantly tempts the least competent by presenting them with prose ready-made. A man who has not so much literary art as is sufficient to write a letter of protest to the Times will think himself competent to translate a paragraph of Renan's. For why? There are all the words beautifully set out. Surely he has been given his matter ready made? One may express the whole thing by a metaphor and say that translation only too fatally presents itself as a form of tracing whereas of its nature it is rather an attempt at re-creation.

For what is necessary to an efficient translation? You must render the rhythms of the original into quite other rhythms proper to your own tongue; and yet the spiritual effect of the first must be paralleled in the second.

You must have such a sense of idiom that the poignant air of a terse phrase in the foreign language strikes the senses as shortly when it re-arises in your own language. More than this, you must appreciate that one word has twenty aspects in the foreign language: a corresponding word twenty aspects in your own, and it is the aspect from which it was approached by the foreign writer that you must approach, or the nearest thing to it in the native word you select.

Again, the emphasis of order differs utterly from tongue to tongue. Again, the nature of decoration differs.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Among the noblest writers of prose was Napoleon Bonaparte. Take any passage of his manly rhetoric—the inspiration upon which so many men have died—put it with no matter what care and scholarship rhetorically into English, and you will have something so theatrical as to be comic.

There are English decorations of lilt, of alliteration, of ellipse, which are respectively absent, barbaric, or hopelessly obscure if you attempt to render them directly into the French language.

There are Latin effects of terseness, Greek effects of particle to which nothing remotely corresponding can be discovered in a modern tongue, save at the expense of its impoverishment or warping, and all this the efficient translator must take into account.

Finally—a clean mechanical point and one that all can grasp in its magnitude—most words do several services in every tongue. Not only have words their aspects, but they are used in human speech as similar symbols for different things.

Louis the XIV's "J'ai failli attendre," if its regal irony is translated at all, must be lamely translated: "I came near to waiting," or, more grossly, "I nearly had to wait." At any rate, you will fail altogether if you use the word failed. The word failed is ten thousand miles away from the word "failli" in that phrase, but "He failed in business" is exactly rendered by "Il a fait faillite." How would you render the last words of the English lines, "He tried to do his duty—and how damnably he failed"? What French word would you use for "failed" there? I think that "déception" would come nearest to it, and that you would have to turn the phrase so as to use that substantive instead of a verb; but no dictionary equivalent to "failed" would suit you—least of all "faillir."

I might sum up the whole thing thus: It is the translator's business to know his original in its very soul. Then, standing apart from it, to set his own power to work at creating in another world and for another company another living thing which shall be just as much alive and shall be the twin in vigour, stature, and character of what he sets out to render. It is not an easy matter, is it?

So intense is the power required that often the translator produces some new thing greater than the original upon which he set forth. I can quote an instance. There is a piece of doubtful Latin verse upon which a good Italian sonnet was based. This sonnet Joachim Du Bellay translated into a far better French sonnet, and Du Bellay's sonnet in its turn has been translated by a modern Englishman into something better than the French. I have all four examples of this ascending series to my hand as I write.

Meanwhile you can get really intolerable translation at about 2s. 6d. a thousand words and therefore that curious thing which an idiot would call "economic law" condemns us to the decline of culture. . . . Does it?

It is a poor look-out.

REVIEWS

The Manchester Pecksniffs

The Manchester Politician, 1750-1912. By G. B. HERTZ. With a Preface by Sir Alfred Hopkinson, K.C. (Sherratt and Hughes. 2s. 6d. net.)

MR. HERTZ has set down nothing in malice in his interesting account of the Manchester School, but it must be owned that he has extenuated nothing, and if the defunct worthies with whom he deals could see themselves in his depiction they would probably—indignant in their good conceit of themselves—refuse to recognise the portrait.

"Until 1750," says Mr. Hertz, "Manchester possessed no distinctive views on trade or Empire. After 1750 it adopted with peculiar zeal the non-partisan Imperialism of the age of Chatham." The reason of its zeal was characteristic:—

> Commercialism was paramount, the cotton trade became rapidly the all in all of Manchester's public interest, and popular beliefs were wholly governed by the way in which the prosperity of that trade was affected by British, foreign, and colonial policy. . . . Manchester became devoted to the cause of empire-building in the early years of the industrial revolution, because the English Government applied its usual colonial principles to the encouragement of cotton-growing within the borders of our own dominions, and its usual economic principles towards the enhancement of the colonial demand for Lancashire goods.

Accordingly the Manchester working people > believed that conquests paid. That State help was of service. They were staunch followers of the Protectionist and militant creeds of the day, accepting them because they appeared to embody their own material interests, not, as in the case of the political faiths of the Stuart period, because they made any special appeal to intellect or sentiment.

The reason of the great change in Manchester opinion was equally characteristic:

> Within ten years after Waterloo the political beliefs of Manchester were entirely remodelled. Individualism, insistence on the necessity of peace, distrust of Imperialism, irritation with the Constitutional defects of the time, were deeply impressed on men's minds. The best customers of Lancashire were foreign nations; the great bulk of its supplies of raw material came from a country which had ceased to be subject to the British Crown. There seemed to be no longer any connection between trade and nationality. . . . The majority of the people of Manchester took the side of the individual in his conflict with the State with an enthusiasm that made its mark on local character. The master class was, above all others, responsible for the doctrines thus associated with the Manchester School. Employers believed that > the one way by which their supremacy in the world's markets could be maintained was to keep down the cost of production. For this purpose the price of food and raw materials, the volume of taxation, and the cost of living required to be beaten down to the lowest possible limits.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Cobden, as Mr. Hertz reminds us, imagined that within two months of the abolition of the Corn Laws three loaves would be bought with the same money that previously could buy but two, and that the price of flour would simultaneously fall 70 per cent; thus the ascendancy of the Lancashire cotton industry would be safeguarded for ever on the bedrock of cheap production.

These people, whose altar was in the shop, were always full of cant. An acceptable person named Shrewsbury, prominent in the Radical world of Bacup, wrote in "Christian Thoughts on Free Trade" (1843) that "Free Trade is implied in the primeval benediction God pronounced on man," and with special reference to the Old Testament that "free trade is only bringing out a new development of the wonderful series of truths that are recorded in this portion of the word of God." Heyworth in the same year declared that "as a nation of Bible Christians we ought to realise that trade should be free as the winds of Heaven." Cobden, less nauseating in form rather than in spirit, said, "I see in the free trade principle that which shall act as the principle of gravitation in the universe. . . . I believe that the desire and motive for large and mighty empires, for gigantic armies and great navies will die away."

It need hardly be said that Manchester cant was in vivid contrast with Manchester conduct.

> There was an amazing callousness in the toleration that Lancashire opinion granted to the horrors of child slavery during the long years before Lord Shaftesbury won his battle. They dated from the first years of the factory system. . . . At the beginning of the nineteenth century, while Manchester Whigs were agitating for slave emancipation abroad, and the right to be represented in Parliament at home, droves of boys and girls, aged six or seven, used to be sent to the Manchester mills from the poorhouses and orphanages of the unenlightened South.

The Manchester politicians resisted factory legislation, the Truck Acts, the repression of adulteration, and the regulation of usury. They were not ashamed of relentless "sweating" in industry. "The average weekly earnings of the Lancashire hand-loom weaver, which had risen in the early days of the industrial revolution, sank, according to Professor Smart, from 13s. 3d. in 1800 and 13s. 10d. in 1802 to 10s. 6d. in 1806, 6s. 7d. in 1808, 6s. 4d. in 1812, 5s. 2d. in 1816, and 4s. 3½d. in January, 1817, while the cost of living rose during several years of this appalling period." In Bright's mill at Rochdale the wages of a card-room worker rose from 8s. a week, which was the standard between 1820 and 1833 to 8s. 6d. in 1844 and 9s. 6d. in 1846. In 1838 the Manchester Statistical Society reported that some 14,960 persons lived in cellars in the town, and that "in most houses there were more than three persons to each bed."

"To Bright, the cause he advocated represented an essential element in human duty. His work in the world was, in his eyes, nothing less than warfare against men who would 'designedly' arrest the bounty of heaven and doom the children of our common Father, by hundreds of thousands, to intolerable suffering." Bright, as we have seen, had raised the wages of the card-room workers in his own mill from 8s. a week to 9s. 6d. "Marshall, in a celebrated tract of 1842, in which he claimed to explain the free trade position as tested by the experiences of Jesus Christ, wrote of protection that 'the light of Christianity will dissolve it, as the rising sun the morning cloud and the early dew.' Dunckley, with entire sincerity, fancied that his economic creed was 'the embodiment of the Christian thought that men are brothers.'"

We have it on the highest authority that men cannot serve God and Mammon. The Manchester Pecksniffs solved the difficulty by calling Mammon God, and, that change effected, the effusiveness of their piety caused them no inconvenience whatever.

Essays in Life

Also and Perhaps. By SIR FRANK SWETTENHAM. (John Lane. 6s.)
Life's Great Adventure. By FRANCIS STOPFORD. (Duckworth and Co. 5s. net.)

THESE two books contain some of the opinions, fancies, and experiences of men who have gone about in the world, east and west. Sir Frank Swettenham's are put in the form of essays, sketches, and stories; Mr. Stopford's in the form of conversations with a friend named Epicurus. Both writers handle matters universally regarded as important—the critical faculty, belief in the unseen, dreams, education, food: they do so at some length and often in a manner, however far from finality, which leads on a sympathetic reader to fruitful agreement and difference.

Sir Frank Swettenham has the advantages and disadvantages of a turn for fiction. Some of his chapters are definitely stories. Thus he makes a Malay kris relate how it was first made out of an old ship's file that had killed a man, and how it killed many others and passed from hand to hand, until at length it reached a pretty white woman, but not necessarily a state of rest; and never has it lost the original crimson stain which resisted the Malay artificer's efforts "and remained incarnadine." Knowledge of Malay life gives the story a substance which will sometimes please stay-at-home English people, but it has no great illusion of reality and no finish of art. The same must be said of the other stories. The dream which fills "In Dreamland" is interesting to students if it is an actual transcript from memory. The other story of how a sick man dreamed that death, like a skeleton, came to his bedside and read out his good and bad record from a book strikes us as an imperfect invention with only the makings of a good short story in it: like many of the other chapters, it does little more than reveal the writer's taste for the unusual. We prefer the papers straightforwardly designed to meet that taste, like "Disbelief in the Unseen"—which tells of toads smoking cigarettes, and gives other material for a modern companion to Sir Thomas Browne's "Vulgar Errors."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Sir Frank Swettenham, in fact, finds it hard to get beyond revealing his tastes and aims. He is never a master, either of thought or illusion. Again and again, for example, he attempts landscape, but achieves only combinations of untransmuted words. The dialogue of a sundial and an hour-glass is only facetious. The essay on the critical faculty is mostly spent in saying, as so many have said before, that the British public has no critical faculty; but ends on a patriotic, apologetic note, attacking the other "depreciators of things British," patting the old country on the back with the assertions that our Navy is the best in the world, that our Army learned a great deal in South Africa, that no other country possesses such a reserve of "healthy, courageous and intelligent boys, the sons, for the most part, of not-very-well-off gentry all over Great Britain and Ireland." With all his experience and confidence in expressing opinion, he suffers from some obtuseness. Thus, he has an essay on "Some Proverbs," where he exposes what he thinks the perversion of wisdom in some proverbial sayings, and attacks among others "Pride goes before a fall." He assumes that the words mean that we lose our pride before we fall. He does not consider the possibility that it means that in order to produce a fall pride is often necessary. So in "First Love" he disputes the opinion that "the lovers themselves have no choice; they are merely the subjects of an influence," without seriously putting before us, or apparently even himself, what the philosophers or what he means by first love: he launches himself into balmy rhetorical generalities.

Mr. Stopford is a better writer. His ordinary level of narrative and discussion is fluent and forcible beyond the common, including much lively brevity, like the phrase, "the screaming maelstrom of those grey, shattered waters," and rising at times to a brilliant height of description, as in the picture of an equatorial sea which taught him—or his Epicurus—the meaning of "the peace of God which passeth all understanding." This friend Epicurus represents a somewhat unusual combination of worldliness, sensuousness, and delicacy, all elements in a thoroughly conscious attitude towards life, a belief in a conscious "art of life." It is characteristic of him to suggest "a series of joy-books, with receipts for happy half-hours," and to ask "Where do we find the home regarded as a profession for women, requiring as much education as any other career; or paternity and the training of children treated as quite as important a part in a man's life as politics or sport?" He was himself, he believes, made partly by long years of illness as a child, and would have pain regarded as not a punishment but "an integral part of that struggle from which shall presently emerge clean and vigorous life": he would make Time also an ally, instead of an enemy. He speaks of training "body, mind, and soul" so that each can help the others in time of stress. More than once he suggests that "the success of happiness, like every other success in the world, is dependent on restraint and discipline." But, on the other hand, he instinctively quarrels with some already accepted forms of interference with the rude course of life, with our manufacture of flabby children at school, for example, almost at the same moment as he is accusing war of being a horribly wasteful method of improvement for men, asking why we cannot gain as much "by cultivating in times of peace the same spirit of discipline, self-sacrifice, and service to others which was called forth under the dripping whips of carnage." We suspect that his power of expression runs ahead of his experience and ripe thinking, as Sir Frank Swettenham's lags behind him. We are especially suspicious when a peroration moves him to optimistic eloquence about mankind forging ahead: "Never in his long career has he been more active and virile." But however inconsistent, or exaggerated, or airy Mr. Stopford or Epicurus may be here and there in deliberately expressing himself, the undesigned effect of the whole is good. The faith of Epicurus half-Christian, half-Pagan, is the fine flower of life in the English middle class when it preserves a balance between curiosity and tradition. Whether it is a solitary flower, whether it blossoms once in fifty years, it were long and difficult to inquire, but it has certainly not often blossomed into a book like Mr. Stopford's. The fact that he stretches a friendly hand to sentimentality should ensure his admission where curiosity, colour and the spirit of criticism are not much loved.

The Quintessence of Christian Art

Les Maîtres de l'Art: Les Sculpteurs Français du XIIIe Siècle. By LOUISE PILLION. Illustrated. Fra Angelico. By ALFRED PICHON. Illustrated. (Plon-Nourrit and Co., Paris. 3 f. 50 c. each.)

MANY readers of THE ACADEMY are already familiar with that excellent series of "Les Maîtres de l'Art" which is issuing with some regularity and rapidity from the press of MM. Plon-Nourrit and Co. Two of the volumes have been noticed in these columns within the last few months—those dealing with Sodoma and Bernini, the latter especially remarkable for its perfect illustrations. The present volumes are thoroughly worthy of their traditions. If we were driven to express a preference, it would doubtless be given to the sculptors; the subject is fresher and more pregnant, and the illustrations are extraordinarily adequate. Those in the "Fra Angelico," we will add, are only less successful because they lack perforce the colouring of the Florentine master.

The two volumes under consideration are brought very close together by the dominance of one great common characteristic—they are both dedicated to

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Christian art. It is not merely by their subjects that they are so dedicated, but by the whole mental outlook of their authors. Both Mlle. Pillion and M. Pichon hold the admirable conviction that there is no knowledge without sympathy, and no progress without imagination; the history of an age of faith cannot be written with the pen of unbelief. M. Pichon, in particular, assigns a very high place to the imaginative factor in history. In narrating, for instance, the period of Fra Angelico's religious vocation, he remarks, "De la sainte crise de cette âme charmante, nous ne savons rien. Mais l'histoire serait en vérité une étrange mort, si nous ne devions suppléer par notre sympathie passionée au silence des documents et des témoignages." Then he proceeds to reconstitute the scene of the spiritual drama, with a description of the church of Santa Maria Novella, and quotations from the sermons of Fra Giovanni Dominici. The method is a sure one where we are in presence of a mind as simple and consistent as that of Fra Angelico; if we were to try to apply it in the case of, say, Shakespeare, we should lay ourselves open to the plausible ire of the Baconians. But, though the path that led the steps of the Dominican painter through the wilderness of this life has been in so many places obliterated by the luxuriant weeds of Time, what remains of it all runs in the same straight line, and it is permissible to assume that the lost portions followed the same law of straightness.

We are on more difficult ground when we have to apportion the life of Fra Angelico between the saint and the artist. M. Pichon summarily answers the questions arising out of this problem by the pronouncement, just so far as it goes, that the saint and the artist were one and inseparable. But there are difficulties. The saint was a craftsman, who had to learn, and loved to learn, his art. It is just this period of apprenticeship that is most completely lost for us. One of the chief problems is to reconcile the evidences of his training as a miniaturist with those of his mastership of fresco. Another problem is to decide who was his master and what were the chief influences. Probably none of these questions will ever be finally answered; the time of apprenticeship overlapped that of religious renouncement, and the phenomena of technical progress cannot be completely explained by those of a soul on fire. M. Pichon, having established from irreproachable data the Florentine milieu of the early Fifteenth Century, and having sketched, with the aid of conjecture, a life of the artist, freely uses the same ally, reinforced by architectural and other decisive details, to write his artistic biography. Gentile da Fabriano was the most generous testator of his creative capital. The conquest of space marked the first great advance on Giotto. Then Fra Angelico himself achieved the revolution of the century—the liberation of colour from material shackles. Finally Masaccio came to suggest the way to perfection, by pointing out the perspectives of the air, and the paths where the light might circulate, leaving body and soul alive upon the stone or canvas.

One great fact insisted upon by M. Pichon is of extreme importance for estimating the place of Fra Angelico in the History of Art. He was not as isolated a figure as has been sometimes believed. He did not hold himself aloof from the new age. He scented the breath of the Renascence, and exulted in it. There was no fear, "perfect love casteth out fear"; Art was so much the Kingdom of God that no evil thing could come out of it. He was there, a pleased spectator, when the envoys of the Eastern Church came to Florence to propose a means of ending the Greater Schism; and what he saw, the gorgeous raiment, the exotic faces and animals, became part of his later pictures.

From Giotto to Fra Angelico is the same distance to travel, from the point of view of technique, as from the French cathedral sculptors of the Twelfth Century to those of the Thirteenth. In both cases it is the triumph of the light and the air, which have broken up the surface, and discovered the spaces behind. But the French sculpture of the Thirteenth Century is in some ways a greater and more significant phenomenon than even the divine art of the saintly Dominican. The latter was a Christian artist, such as has never been seen again, before or since, but historically he was the representative of a departing order of things. He was a member of an old City-State, racked by meaningless quarrels of Guelf and Ghibelline, and incapable of holding its head high in the new Europe that was being fashioned. French sculpture and architecture expressed many things, and among them the maturity of the political principle that was to govern the new world. They were the expression of the principle of nationality, in all its youthful pride and strength. Like the French nation, they left their cradle in the Ile de France to possess the whole land. Their victory was the first and perhaps the greatest triumph of the French ideal. "Nous sommes ici devant ce qu'il y a de plus français en France."

The French spirit, the Aristotelian φύσις of the French spirit—what this spirit was to be in the "Grand Siècle"—is admirably manifested in French architectural sculpture. The figure was an integral part of the building. The statue was the column; the niche was a late, decadent development. "L'Union de la sculpture avec l'architecture était déjà complète en France dès l'époque romane." In this French art differed notably from that of Italy, and gained enormously in force thereby. The limitation imposed upon the sculptor is "une discipline qui devient un élément de rythme et de beauté."

Another wonderful feature of this art is its impersonality. Mlle. Pillion has emphasised this in many places, and particularly in her chapter on the "chantier" where the decoration of the cathedral was planned and carried out. Names are scarce, and great reputations, but art was in scores of brains and in hundreds of fingers; a uniformity full of infinite variety is the result. Saint Denis, Chartres, Senlis, Notre Dame is the early cycle; then come the more finished parts of some of these same edifices, and Reims, Amiens, Bourges, and Sens. But on them all is visible the magic stamp of kinship. Wonderful as they are now, they must have been more wonderful still in their youth and prime, for the colours of the stonework and the glass conspired to throw a blaze of glory over all.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Above all the cathedral statuary of the Thirteenth Century was a Christian art. Every nook of the walls helped to tell the divine story; the symbolism never varied, and the general scheme was always the same. The work was done in a spirit of sublime self-negation "par tous, pour tous." Mlle. Pillion objects, very properly as regards this century, to the anti-Christian interpretations of certain features that were once popular; fancy rioted, but scoffing incredulity was dumb. Moreover, there is an implied answer to some French historians, who have laid down that mediæval religion consisted almost entirely in the fear of hell; we find an "absence, au treizième siècle, sur les tombeaux de toute évocation réaliste ou terrifiante." The "dantesque enfer" over the portals of Notre Dame and of other places cannot destroy this argument. We will conclude with some words taken from the writer's own conclusion to this inspiring work:—"C'est le privilège de certaines œuvres d'art d'atteindre, chez ceux qui les goûtent, quelque chose de plus personnel que l'intelligence, de plus secret que le sens de la beauté; la sculpture du treizième siècle français est de cet ordre. . . . pour qui demeure profondément attaché à l'idéal même qu'elle sut revêtir de tant de beauté, une nuance spéciale de gratitude se mêle à l'émotion qu'elle inspire."

The Tower of London and Old Japan

A Tragedy in Stone, and Other Papers By LORD REDESDALE. (John Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)

THOSE who have "Tales of Old Japan" upon their shelves, and especially those who take down the volume—or volumes if they happen to be so fortunate as to possess the first edition—with affection and gratitude, will be a little disappointed with Lord Redesdale's "A Tragedy in Stone, and other Papers." Réchauffé is the word that comes most readily to our mind in connection with this book, a literary dish-up, for the most part, of lectures delivered before the Japan Society, Authors' Club, Royal Photographic Society, and the Art School at Chipping Campden. Now the lecturer is allowed—nay, expected—to indulge in certain mild banalities, and he may, with impunity, enlarge on the intelligence of his distinguished audience, and politely point out his own imaginary shortcomings. All these things are part of the courteous and fashionable lecturer's paraphernalia, but they become wearisome and redundant when repeated in a book. The lectures themselves, excluding their superfluous trappings of mutual congratulation, make excellent reading, but, good as they are, they cannot be compared with the opening essay dealing with the fascinating history of the Tower of London, or with the delightful chapter reprinted from the author's "Bamboo Garden."

Many will regard "A Tragedy in Stone" as the best contribution to this volume. It grips the imagination, and recalls the spell Harrison Ainsworth cast upon us in the days of our youth. But Ainsworth, though effective in his striking situations and powerful descriptions, was lacking in the art of portraying character. Lord Redesdale, in a style that is wonderfully subtle and vivid, has supplied this defect in the hero of our schooldays, for history and character-drawing have been combined in this enchanting study. The author describes the article as "perhaps rather dry-as-dust." Personally, we have not found it so. Monk Gundulf, who could not only weep with those who mourned, but with those who made merry, must have, in his capacity of principal surveyor, laid all the dust in the building of the Tower of London!

Lord Redesdale writes of Leonardo da Vinci:—

> Had he lived to gather together, as he was minded to, all his discoveries, all his philosophy, and all his prophecies into one encyclopædic volume, the world would have been compelled to hail him as the most universal genius of any age, and science would have been advanced by some decades—I had almost written centuries!

Perhaps it is just as well that Leonardo da Vinci did not stagger the world with a blaze of genius in every conceivable direction, or we should have been in danger of another society somewhat similar to the Baconians, and, worse still, we might have been without that homely and salutary saying: "Jack of all trades and master of none." But in all seriousness we must admit that Leonardo da Vinci has certainly disproved Schopenhauer's saying that "genius and the head for mathematics are contradictions which cannot coexist in the same brain."

We must confess to be particularly attracted by Lord Redesdale's refreshing article on gardens, though on some points we cannot agree with him. There is something very cosmopolitan in the author's conception of a garden. His own, we imagine, is the result of his travels. It appears that we may be Little Englanders in our gardens if, through prejudice, we exclude trees that do not happen to be natives. We may still believe that our men have "hearts of oak," and at the same time find room in our gardens for the bamboo which, to the author, "brings back something like a subtle fragrance of the dim far-away." Lord Redesdale is sarcastic on carpet gardens, grottos, and those feminine bores who fling "painfully acquired sesquipedalian names at their victims' heads with an air of conscious superiority." He adds, with dry humour, concerning these dreadful appellations: "It is strange that one never hears of those plants a second time. I believe that if they ever existed they die of despair, killed by their names!"

We were surprised to come across the following, written by one who is a devout admirer of Old Japan:—

> He who would lay out for himself a paradise . . . cannot do better, having the needful leisure, than set out to drink in wisdom in Japan. Not in the Japanese > gardens, for . . . nowhere is the gardener's work more out of tune with Nature than in that country of paradoxes; but on the mountain-side, in the dim recesses of the forest, by the banks of many a torrent, there the great silent Teacher has mapped out for our instruction plans and devices which are the living refutation of the heresies of stonemasonry.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Are not the Japanese supreme masters in reproducing, in miniature, favourite scenes from Nature? Surely they have sat at the feet of "the great silent Teacher" and learnt much. If they add a beautiful stone lantern to the scene, it is hardly a heresy—no more a heresy than a moss-covered sun-dial in our English gardens.

Lord Redesdale deals with Japan in the Middle Ages, narrates the romantic story of Will Adams, gives us the fascinating history of paper, and concludes with a description of a holiday spent in the Land of the Gods nearly fifty years ago. There is something of Leonardo da Vinci's versatility in this miscellaneous volume, for the Tower of London and Old Japan are about as different as it is possible to imagine. Lord Redesdale has recently republished his famous "Tales of Old Japan," and we conclude this review with the hope that he will reissue his "Bamboo Garden." If we may judge from the chapter included in the volume before us, it will not lead us into a maze, or a grotto, or a tart-like horror of carpet bedding, but into a veritable garden of delight.

Plays Good and Indifferent

Five Little Plays. By ALFRED SUTRO. (Duckworth and Co. 1s. 6d. net.)
A Book of Short Plays, and a Memory. By Mrs. DE COURCY LAFFAN. (Stanley Paul and Co. 2s. net.)

EVEN in these days of cheap literature it is remarkable to be able to read five plays by so distinguished a playwright as Mr. Alfred Sutro for the modest sum of eighteenpence, and no admirer of his fine work should fail to peruse them. They are strong, tense, clever, the work of a practised hand that never fails to extract the uttermost from a dramatic situation, the work of one who knows the light and shade of human character. Humour, satire, farce, and pathos are all contained within these pages. The theme of "The Man in the Stalls" is not exactly pleasant, but if Mr. Sutro is rather too fond of dealing with unsuccessful marriages, and making either the husband or wife fall in love with some one else, he does so with such power, such subtle wit, that even this well-worn theme ceases to be commonplace. "The Man in the Stalls," "A Marriage Has Been Arranged," and "The Man on the Kerb," are familiar to many playgoers; but it is a matter of surprise to us that "The Open Door" and "The Bracelet" should not, apparently, have attracted the discerning eye of a theatrical manager. "The Open Door" is as good in its way as "The Walls of Jericho," and is the best one-act play we have read for a long time. "The Bracelet" is not quite such perfect work. Mrs. Western is a little too haughty in her manner, too wildly rude even for an upper middle-class lady addicted to Blue-books; but the delightfully droll surprise at the end of the play more than compensates for the over-emphasis of one of the characters.

Mr. Alfred Sutro's "The Bracelet" left us in a genial mood, and we were prepared to forgive Mrs. De Courcy Laffan and her publisher for choosing a very atrocious binding, reminding us of a wedding-card pasted on mottled tin. Unfortunately, however, the difference between Mr. Sutro's work and that of Mrs. Laffan was a little more marked than we were prepared for. "A Shakespearian Interlude" is not without real poetry, but it is entirely lacking in anything approaching genuine characterisation. Queen Elizabeth, in Mrs. Laffan's hands, is a dreamy sentimentalist, and that is one thing that Good Queen Bess, with all her faults, was not. She was a sprightly soul, with a temper as ready as her wit; but unless history belies her, she had no lack of lovers, even if she boxed one of them on the ears! She is reported to have said to the Speaker in the House of Commons: "I have long since made my choice of a husband, the Kingdom of England." She would never have uttered the maudlin words of unrequited love Mrs. Laffan puts into her mouth. To describe "Their Experiment," a play based on the popular fallacy of Platonic friendship, as amateurish, is to express ourselves very mildly. It will be a bad day for the Diplomatic Service when it includes such a man as Algernon Leyburn. Algie played duets with Lady Mabel, and was so afraid of getting a headache from stephanotis that he had the flower placed outside the window. We were glad to see at the end of this tiresome play, "Quick Curtain."

An Artist's Diary

Through Greece and Dalmatia. By Mrs. RUSSELL BARRINGTON. (A. and C. Black. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE authoress did no more than keep a diary of six weeks' itinerary, a rather thoughtful, reflective diary, betraying a temperament easily impressed by the artistic beauty of things, albeit somewhat liable to put art and artists before that nature from which art derives its inspiration. Illustrative of this is the remark that "Watts was constantly seeing a picture by Titian in Nature." With all due deference to the late G. F. Watts and to the author, this smacks too much of Mark Twain's complaint in Italy, that "the Creator made the universe from designs by Michelangelo." For Nature is greater, and produces finer work, than even Titian or G. F. Watts, and the average temperament is content to recognise the world's great natural pictures without reducing them to the phase or view-point which is all an artist can convey.

This diary form of writing leads to strange English at times. "But it is not the perceptible theatre we see from the road which is the one which first existed, but an unnoticeable arrangement of stones behind the visible ampitheatre, where the tragedies of Æschylus are said to have been performed during his lifetime," is a difficult sentence to swallow at one gulp. We do not ask that the traveller desirous of recording his or her impressions should be a stylist, but we do ask, in all books that bear the imprint of such a publishing house as this, for clear, readable language, that we may grasp the author's meaning with regard to things seen, and may be saved the trouble of elucidating such twisted phraseology as above.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

A query as to "wherein lies the power of this great Greek art—its sublime serenity, calm force, and supreme inevitableness," may be answered—not so flippantly as at first appears—by the Japanese suggestion that the Greeks had no antiques from which to copy. For therein lies the power of their art—they founded a school, developed the conception of beauty in the human figure, and, as this author says, they wrought with the "unquestioned reality of the spiritual life within them."

A word must be said concerning the illustrations, which—excepting always the exquisite frontispiece to the book—do not adequately illustrate the subject matter, and are not placed with any sense of fitness. Facing the matter which likens the impressions produced by viewing the acropolis to the effect of hearing the "Moonlight" sonata, and traces the relations between great art and great music, is set a view of "the porch of the Byzantine church of the Kapnicarea," an incongruous, discordant interruption to a piece of fine writing. For, in spite of the defects noted above, this book contains some excellent harmonies of writing, and evinces on the authoress's part a fine sense of beauty. It is no untrained globe-trotter who writes, but rather one who, knowing little of the writer's craft, sets out to record impressions of great things viewed in the light of archæological, architectural, and artistic knowledge—one who can distinguish between the real and the sham, and feel indignant at the sight of Greek beauty ruined by renaissance "restoration." So much for Greece, and space will not permit us to deal with the Dalmatian portion. It is a book of many defects, for it was not "written" in the sense that an ordinary volume is compiled; it is, nevertheless, a book of things that, lacking newness, never grow old, a record of personal observation and unstudied thoughts, and a work of more than common interest.

Criticism and Vivacity

From Theatre to Music-hall. By W. R. TITTERTON. (Stephen Swift and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

TO review adequately Mr. Titterton's latest book would require a volume as large as that before us. And then the result of our labours would be the production of a paraphrase of Mr. Titterton's volume; a paraphrase perhaps more orderly, more explanatory, and less discursive, but still a paraphrase. There are so many good things, there is such a wide survey, the method is so different from the restricted and particularised type of dissection which is the modus operandi of the ordinary dramatic critic, that the book must be acquired, by legitimate or other means, and read. Mr. Titterton describes and analyses the work of many of the dramatists and actors and music-hall performers of the day in a manner which is at once entertaining and enlightening; and though at times our idols receive rough handling, yet behind the occasional extravagances and exaggerations, we feel that there is the solid foundation of sound criticism. The book does not contain a dull page; its extraordinary vivacity is both a tonic and an inspiration in these days of the matter-of-fact.

Whither has the drama moved since the days of Shakespeare? It is exceedingly difficult to pigeon-hole the differences between the main characteristics of the Elizabethan drama and that of the moderns. In the first place, we seem to believe no longer in free-will. The dramatist and actor of to-day perform their respective duties with a mathematical precision which is awesome in its thoroughness. We might go further and say that each actor-manager has his particular set of mathematical formulæ; the subordinate members of the company take their cues from the "head"; they imitate the managerial strut and voice; they sacrifice individuality and original interpretation. "Drama is born of the clash of temperament against its temperamental environment; yet the fidgets of a nervous man in an unbleached shirt are not necessarily dramatic." We wander round the theatres looking for life—and we find it not. Life can be reflected in the farce and in the comedy equally as in the so-called "serious play." But we usually come away empty—we see soulless marionettes, puppets exercising themselves with machine-like accuracy. Mr. Titterton blames the drama; but we blame the spirit of the age. This age will probably be known to the historian of the future as "the soulless age"; our duties have become so specialised, our spheres of action are so rigidly defined—these are the characteristics of modern civilisation. It is the eye that is now entranced: there are so few minds crying out for nourishment: inspiration is dead. The dramatist of to-day chooses the world of "The Importance of Being Earnest" and endeavours to construct real drama. Wilde used it to produce the the greatest farce of the language. It is the world of burlesque, not of reality: it is the foundation of what may be called the "stiff-shirted drama" of to-day, of that drama of puppet dukes and golliwog marchionesses who perform their ludicrous antics under the direction of the dramatist-showman.

Mr. Titterton succinctly crystallises another distinguishing factor when he remarks, "There is sex-emotion in all of Shakespeare's plays, but he wrote not one drama of sex!" And again "the public does not get what it wants, but what it will put up with." To quote—very approximately—Margaret in "Fanny's First Play," "There is nothing left for the rising generation to do—except to shock its parents." We don't believe it; the parents thoroughly love the process—from the stage; they presume that it is a part of the smartness of the epigrammatic dialogue.

From Wilde until now drama has suffered under this incubus of smartness. Every now and then, in every comedy, the actor pauses in his ticking like an alarum clock about to go off, turns to the audience, and delivers his immortal word. Usually the immortal word is a very poor thing, and the effect of these paste diamonds, glittering along the fringe of ill-fitting, shoddy dialogue, is poorer.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The second portion of the book deals with the music-halls in a vein which is more descriptive and less critical than that of the first part. But here every line holds us—whether writing of the Russian Ballet, Vesta Tilley, or the Follies—every page forms part of an inspiring picture of its side of London life. We might sometimes wish that the writer had concentrated and elaborated the earlier and more creative section of the book; but we fear that much of the refreshing quality would have vanished in the refining process. We are not always in complete agreement with Mr. Titterton, but we like him the better for that. "From Theatre to Music-hall" should find its way into every holiday parcel.

European South America

Guiana: British, Dutch, and French. By JAMES RODWAY. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

HIS previous work, dealing with the history and with the forests of these countries, has given us convincing proof that no one is better qualified to deal with the subject of the Guianas than the author of this present work. A long residence, indeed, in these last remaining lands of the Southern Continent which are still subject to European authority has endowed Mr. Rodway with a knowledge of these such as is the lot of few. It is high time that the Guianas were represented in the notable outflow of South American literature which is now occurring. For some reason or other it would seem the fate of these particular countries to suffer neglect in this respect as well as in other directions. Now that this book, in addition to some others dealing with the same subject, has appeared, the reader cannot refrain from a certain wonder as to why the modern description of the Guianas has been so long delayed. Mr. Rodway himself voices this view admirably in his introduction:—

> Nowadays, even though one of its governors called British Guiana a "magnificent province," it is practically ignored. It gained a few weeks' notoriety when the Venezuela Boundary trouble raised fears of a war with the United States, but soon again fell into the background when the cloud passed over. Demerara sugar is well known, but few recognise that Demerara practically means British Guiana. Its gold, diamonds, balata, and greenheart timber are only familiar to experts. . . . The newspaper man knew the country in connection with the Dreyfus case, and no doubt looked upon it as unfit for a dog, much less a Christian.

Mr. Rodway deals exhaustively with the history of these countries, for the possession of which so much blood was shed in the past, and in the early days of colonisation were valued so highly that the site of the present city of New York was less considered than a similar spot in British Guiana! The various groupings and re-arrangements of the three Powers which followed each other with such rapidity in the triangular wars of the English, French, and Dutch are of extreme interest. Coming to modern times, that which claims the chief attention here—as elsewhere—is the question of labour. The prosperity of Guiana has always depended on the amount of labour it was possible to import. In this respect it may surprise many to learn that the negro fails as a plantation labourer—mainly because he expects higher pay than the estates can afford! The Chinese, too, although they have become very useful colonists, have proved little better as agricultural labourers. The East Indian, on the other hand, has, according to Mr. Rodway, justified to the full the experiment of his introduction, and it seems likely that it is upon his efforts that the country will have to depend for its future prosperity; for the climate of Guiana, like that of many other places in South America, is not of the kind which permits white labour. These various problems, as well as an intimate general description, are fully dealt with in this very able work, which is adequately illustrated with photographs.

One of the "Gardens of History"

The Life and Times of Rodrigo Borgia, Pope Alexander VI. By the Most Rev. ARNOLD H. MATHEW, D.D. Illustrated. (Stanley Paul and Co. 16s. net.)

THERE is little doubt that mankind as a whole is rather attracted by criminology. The baser sort gratifies its curiosity in the perusal of journals of a special kind; the respectable citizen takes his crime in his stride, as an ingredient in his respectable newspaper; and even the more cultivated are by no means sorry when the course of their serious studies leads them from time to time across one of those "Gardens of History"—to quote a pretty title employed, almost ad hoc, by M. Gebhart—that have been watered with the blood and the tears of ancient wrong-doing.

One of these oases is the story of the Borgias. The criminal reputation of this extraordinary family is too well established for the fashionable arts of the rehabilitator to have more than a passing effect. Their collective guilt remains a constant quality, though the distribution of responsibility among the individuals of the family varies as the biographer. In Dr. Mathew's book, for instance, there is only one really first-class villain—Cæsar, Duke of Valentinois. Pope Alexander, after the most promising beginnings, seems to have suffered shipwreck on the sands of sentimentalism, after a too early apprenticeship in the "good old gentlemanly," but unromantic, vice of Avarice. The sinister Lucrezia, we are invited to believe, was, like most of the bad women of History, very much more sinned against than sinning, and lived the greater part of her life as a pattern wife and mother. The Pope and his daughter were, in fact, reluctant tools in the hands of Machiavelli's model "Principe."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Dr. Mathew has compiled a stirring and crowded narrative. A large dose of French History in its more complicated moments gives us some sort of repose from the even more involved politics of Borgian Italy, but seems to us rather too conscientious a discharge of an undoubted duty. The history of the period is indeed such a tangle that it would be impossible, in moderate compass, to give it clearness and unity. Charles VIII entering Italy is often regarded as the herald of modern Europe; the Borgias, in certain aspects, represent a vanishing civilisation, based on conceptions that we cannot nowadays even understand—perhaps the Futurists will revive their explanation. Luther had not yet come to narrow down the debate. Dr. Mathew is generally master of his puppet-show, but the figures sometimes profit by the odds in their favour. It is at such moments that we feel the need for a fuller index, and for a more rigorous control of the relations between relative or demonstrative pronouns and their antecedents. We like the descents of Avernus to be "bien ratissées"; we come there in holiday mood.

It is curious that the Borgias have not been more exploited in literature. The work on which Dr. Mathew bases most of his conclusions, the Diary of John Burchard, Pontifical Master of the Ceremonies under Alexander VI and other Popes, is now appearing in an English translation. But it is safe to say that to the average English reader nothing of the period is known except some of its legends. The present work should serve as a useful corrective. Alexander and Cæsar are both made comprehensible, though we doubt if the extenuating circumstances urged in their favour, that the one was a Liberal Mæcenas and had crises of remorse, and that the other was an efficient administrator, really ought to have much weight. Perhaps the most eloquent excuse for two of the grimmest personages in history is contained in the answer to the Pope of a Tiber boatman, who had seen the corpse of the Duke of Gandia (murdered by his brother, Cæsar) thrown into the river: "on being asked why he had not informed the authorities of the occurrence, Schiavoni answered that he had, during his lifetime, seen over a hundred corpses thrown into the Tiber, and had never heard any inquiry about them."

Shorter Reviews

Archives d'Etudes Orientales. Edited by J. A. LUNDELL. Vol. I.—Etudes phonologiques sur le Dialecte arabe vulgaire de Beyrouth. By EMANUEL MATTSSON. Vol. II.—Etudes sur le Culte d'Ichtar. By NILS NILSSON. Vol. III.—Sur la Formation du Génitif pluriel en Serbe. By ANTON KARLGREN. Vol.IV.—Les Débuts de la Cartographie du Japon. By E. U. Dahlgren. (Ernest Leroux, Paris. 5 fr. 25 c.; 1 fr.; 2 fr. 75 c.; and 2 fr. 75 c. respectively; and Appelberg, Upsala.)

IT is rather difficult to understand on what common base these four brochures are supposed to stand. They are all the work of Swedish students, and they are all concerned with that comprehensive geographical conception—"the East." But when we find that one of the subjects is an incident of Servian grammar, we think that "the East" has become a little too vague to be the germ of a true "Corpus Scientiae." Another feature of the series that flouts uniformity is the varying character of the methods. That is, of course, the fault of the subjects; many people have an inkling as to the nature of Ishtar-worship, few are genuinely alive to the gravity of the problem of the Genitive Plural in Servian. But it is curious to find, cheek by jowl in the same series, a literary, almost eloquent apology, for the licentious rites of ancient Babylon, and a meticulous analysis of one grammatical or phonological process in a language that is little known to any but the native and the philological expert. M. Karlgren does his work very thoroughly; he gives the previous explanations of the baffling a of the Servian Genitive Plural, and dismisses most of them as not covering equally the two similar cases of Servian and Slovene. He then gives his own theory. M. Mattsson's work on the dialect of Beyrouth forms a more or less complete manual of the subject, especially as regards phonology. It is a far cry from Servia and Asia Minor to Japan, but, in spite of the specialisation that marks M. Dahlgren's "Débuts de la Cartographie du Japon," we suspect that this author has produced the most generally interesting work of the series. It is curious to learn that the first maps of Japan based on native diagrams can be assigned with some degree of probability to the first year of Elizabeth. The illustrative maps, some from rare sources, are excellently reproduced.

Pierre Rosegger: L'Homme et l'Œuvre. By A. VULLIOD. (Félix Alcan, Paris. 10 fr.)

M. VULLIOD has achieved a monument of industry. In 500 massive pages he has told the story, and analysed the work, of a living foreign author. We doubt if it could be done more completely, and certainly we should consider that a fuller treatment would, in this case, be excessive. A critic and an author can never be in full community so long as they are separated by one of the outlying buttresses of the Tower of Babel. But this, after all, is only true of purely literary criticism, and there is a great deal in M. Vulliod's work that is valuable and permanent. Few writers have had so varied and interesting a career as Herr Rosegger. It is one of the few careers that are interesting through their successes rather than their failures. From the early adversities of his peasant home in Styria to the days of his universal recognition as one of the great masters of German literature, there has hardly been a single reverse. M. Vulliod's sketch of the writer's mother gives us a glimpse of a noble woman, full of a wisdom that is best called heavenly. The friends who appeared at each corner of the road to help him on were among the best men in the whole of Austria. As to his work, it always bore the impress of his origins; though he occupied himself with politics and current affairs, including anti-Semitism and the "Los von Rom" movement, he will be known in literature as one of the best and most genuine exponents of the "régionalisme" that is becoming an article of faith with the critics. In Rosegger's case it has taken a variety of forms, and Styrian gaiety, even in its less decorous moods, is represented, as well as Styrian piety and passion.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Religion of Sciences: The Faith of Coming Man. By JAMES W. LEE. (Fleming H. Revell Co., New York. 5s. net.)

THE writer of this treatise wishes us to understand that, whereas the science of religion is the result of the study of comparative religions, Christianity is the Religion of Science, "because it is found to be the perfect expression and complete realisation of the idea which students, who have formulated our science of religion, tell us is at the bottom of all religions."

There is not much that is new in this book, although the method and illustration are often original and arrest attention. It requires some assurance to assert that Christianity is the source of all natural and heathen religions. So the postulate is assumed that "Christianity is as old as God." While religion has a real value for the needs of every-day life, one thing must always remain impossible—that is, any attempt to abolish its mystery, or to translate it into a language that we fully understand. But the author's fine purpose may be inferred from one delightful sentence: "Out of vast piles of theological straw the spiritual leaders of our race have found enough wheat to make the bread of life without which the teeming millions of God's hungry children would have starved."

Biographies of Scientific Men. By A. B. GRIFFITHS, Ph.D. Illustrated. (Robert Sutton. 7s. 6d. net.)

IN this volume the author has compiled in a handy form short biographies of fifteen of the world's most famous scientists. He has condensed into a small compass practically all the available information concerning each one, and his book should prove especially useful to young students who have not the opportunity of consulting more ambitious works. The volume opens with an account of Lavoisier, the illustrious father of modern chemistry, who was barbarously guillotined during the Reign of Terror, and closes with the biography of Lord Kelvin, one of the grandest figures in the history of science. The portraits and other illustrations add to the interest of the book; but the one bearing the title, "Copy of the Death Warrant of Lavoisier" is really the official report of his execution; indeed, it bears on the margin the words "Procès-verbal d'exécution de mort."

Fiction

The Thorn-bush Near the Door. By SOPHIE COLE. (Mills and Boon. 6s.)

IT seems as though every second novel we take up in these days had an artist for its hero. We used to think that the artistic temperament was a difficult one to handle in fiction, but this opinion does not appear to be shared by the young authors of the day. They embark upon the task gaily; their materials are very simple and their results quite easily attained. Take a good-looking young man, divide his morals by three, put a paint-brush in his hand and set him in an untidy studio under the roof of a dusty house, induce him to voice some of the more usual unconventionalities and to talk a good deal of very commonplace studio talk, and the thing is done. If he marries and keeps his wife in the corner of the studio, so much the better; it is the sort of thing an artist would do. If he becomes involved with a former model and is tried for murdering her, better still. This is what Miss Sophie Cole has done in the usual way and with the usual amount of success. Her heroine, a suburban girl with a vulgar father—as a matter of fact he was not really her father—and tastes above her surroundings, interested us until she began to develop strength of character. It is extraordinary how dull people with strong characters are in fiction. We cannot say that the artist hero ever interested us much, although he was quite free from strength of character. We knew too well everything that he was going to say and nearly everything that he was going to do.

A Superman in Being. By LITCHFIELD WOODS. (Stephen Swift and Co. 6s.)

THE superman, Professor Snaggs, is no more convincing than Nietzsche himself. By means of an unusual amount of personal attractiveness—unusual, at least, in a blind professor of history—he succeeded in persuading his secretary to become his mistress. When, later on, the right man comes into her life, the superman confesses her lapse for her, and persuades the right man to marry her in spite of everything.

There is the plot, sordid and little enough in all conscience. It speaks well for the author's subtlety that he has made this a witty, clever book—but we are not convinced by the story. The superman is amusing enough, the cleverness of his paradoxical reasoning is amusing, and the way in which he jerks the other puppets of the story about is exceedingly amusing. The book is worth reading for its cleverness, but we are left with the sense that the author has accomplished a very fine intellectual exercise, manipulated a number of dolls with great skill, rather than that he has dealt with real people and real situations. We do not claim that melodramatic and emotional scenes are essential to the novel of to-day, but we do claim that it is hardly possible to settle a big problem, such as is presented in the plot of this book, with the casuistries of Professor Snaggs—the result of such a settlement is an impression of unreality which we cannot escape. Let the author try his hand at lighter matter, for his manner is excellently suited to light comedy, not to such drama as he has attempted here.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Knightly Years. By W. M. ARDAGH. (John Lane. 6s.)

"THE MAGADA," by W. M. Ardagh, was very well spoken of, and this, a second book, with the same local setting—the Canary Islands—is a picturesque novel, dealing with the same historical period, just before the beginning of the Inquisition. The old story of a man's love for a maid was as true in those days as now, and this tale, in its antique setting, is none the less a jewel. The passions were fiercer, it is true, but the results were the same. One takes a little time to become accustomed to the Spanish words used, but, when these are mastered, the reader becomes quite engrossed with the characters and their ultimate fate. We know that Spain and its dependencies are the home of proverbs, but it is somewhat strange to find that the saying, "More people know Tom fool than Tom fool knows," has so mediæval an origin. Doramillo, the hero, is a pattern for modern lovers, for, no matter what happens, he keeps his temper and is finally rewarded. The book provides a new country, new habits and customs, all fresh for the reader jaded with Mayfair and its modern ways.

Impertinent Reflections. By COSMO HAMILTON. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

ALTHOUGH the usual acknowledgment for reproduced matter does not precede this collection of sketches, we feel certain that a number of them have appeared, and that the rest ought to have appeared, in the columns of some periodical or other. They are witty in the extreme, especially those which treat of the regeneration of our effete aristocracy by means of an infusion of chorus-girl blood. But, except as a volume from which to pick three or four pages of very light reading when in the mood for it, sketches like these have no business to appear in book form. We can imagine the joy with which a newspaper reader would turn to the column containing one of them, how he would appreciate the writer's high spirits and enjoy the point of each delicate yet stinging allusion to the class of highly placed, utterly brainless individuals who never existed as a class—though certain exceptions give cause for the allusions. But, if that same newspaper reader were presented with this book, and tried to read it in three or four sittings, he would be weary and surfeited with overmuch light cleverness, and would wish that he had taken the champagne in smaller doses. And that is exactly what has happened to us.

The Deserted Village

IT was for no village in England that the Irishman Goldsmith coined that title, but his own village in the middle-west of Ireland. There are lines in his poem, looking out through the disguising sleekness of eighteenth-century sentiment, that have the print on them of the place of which they speak. Such lines as:—

Good Heaven! what sorrows gloom'd that parting day,
That call'd them from their native walks away;
When the poor exiles, every pleasure pass'd,
Hung round the bowers, and fondly look'd their last,
And took a long farewell, and wish'd in vain
For seats like these beyond the western main;
And shuddering still to face the distant deep,
Return'd and wept, and still return'd to weep.

Yet the rustic convention of his day caused him to disguise the true lineaments beyond recognition. Spring had perforce to smile; and the hawthorn bush to have its seats beneath the shade; so that it is not easy to discover where the true figure ends and the adornments begin.

At least the deserted village I have in my mind has no resemblance, facial or spiritual, to that which Goldsmith depicts. It hangs on the side of a mountain, on one of two muscle-lines that twist diagonally across its side, as though it were a giant stretching itself after long slumbers and about to pitch the village into the valley in the act. Across the valley rises a hill that dips into a bay, on the other side of which rise the Menawn Cliffs sheer from the water's edge. On these cliffs, in old days, was a Druid sacrificial site, and on the summit of the hill was another, so that these stately hierarchs could view each other as they passed through their fierce rituals. Above the old village the mountain rises precipitously to its summit, about which, save on the finest of days, the clouds always cling, rough rock and sedgy bog making the ascent.

Standing on the hill that can recollect the Druid tramp and chant mixing with the wind that tore its sides, the sight is full of awe. To the west, above the swelling and falling of hills strewn with heather and heavy with bog, the great Croghaun arises, to within two hundred feet or so of Slieve More, the mountain opposite. Clare Island, like the land of heart's desire in beautiful suggestion of curve and colour poised on the face of the waters, and the further islands of Clew Bay, float away to the south. The infinite array of the mountains of the mainland stands wisely clustered to the east; and the strong, stately mass opposite blots out the ocean to the north. Of the grandeur of isolation it is impossible to convey an idea. On the edge of the ocean beneath the hill to the south two villages cluster, with white walls and thatched roofs showing dimly to the eye; but among the hills the desolation is almost undisturbed. The voice of the wind whistling through the heather, or falling with deeper note on the sheer wall of Slieve More, or, somewhat to the north, crying in a sad minor through the branches of three solitary old twisted thorns near the base of the mountain, is almost the only sound to break the silence—save for the cry of the curlew, plover, and bittern when it is their day. It is a scene fit to breed such august spirituality as one finds among the people. It would be stern, except that there is a haunting spirit of tenderness, a mystical whimsey, mixed somehow into the scene. It is as though the face of the god were stern, but that in his eyes a soft light leaned.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

On one of the evenings when I stood on this hill, tranced almost to forgetfulness of the moment and its circumstance, there were two voices that echoed across the valley in the falling dusk. They were a man and a woman driving home their cattle, for I could hear the tone of their voices calling high and low to each other, and I could, by looking intently in the direction from which their voices came, see the deep crimson of the woman's petticoat, and now and then the movement of her naked legs as she stepped down sure-footedly from the uplands upon the hillocks of the bog. I could not hear what they said; but that she was speaking in bitter complaint of something, and that he was replying in immovable resignation was apparent, for there is as much meaning in the pitch of a phrase as in the words that compose it. The effect was strange in the quietness and the dusk. The voices circled about the valley, speaking no words, but carrying on an infinite conversation in the pitch and tone that they chose to convey their precise shade of meaning.

For the village, though deserted, is not always altogether uninhabited. Owing to reasons, over which, in a sketch of this kind, it is wise to draw a veil, but of which Goldsmith was not ignorant, some time ago the inhabitants combined to withdraw and join one of the villages at the edge of the sea. Therefore the whole place fell into perpetual disrepair. Now no one can hinder weatherbound, or nightbound, folk from contenting themselves with the scanty shelter of shambly walls and a leaky roof. Consequently some of those families that had pastured their flocks on the hills continued to do so during the summer months; and it was small blame to them if they chose to deny themselves the additional two miles walk to the bay, and preferred instead to shelter at the foot of the hills. The turf smoke no longer curls up the side of the god-like mountain brooding above, like a grateful incense; certainly it very seldom does, and then only in a single wisp: but voices still mingle with the silence, and are subdued by the stillness to something of its own suggestion.

The village, indeed, is sadder for its few and vagrant inhabitants. They are like the solitary figures that so mysteriously stand up and accentuate a loneliness. In the lanes between the houses there are no marks of footsteps, but only stones and rough grass. Some of the cottages are quite dismantled; some still rear their walls, with more or less of spare roof to them: others are more nearly intact. Some were built in the old manner of shepherd cots: walls of loose stones built as nearly as possible together, but through which the wind could find its entrance, and low roofs of unthatched turf; others with well-compounded walls, and roofs to which the thatch still clings and twists in the wind. But the walls are no longer white; and there are few doors to them. It is like walking through some city of the dead, silent, dismantled, and reminiscent of the presences of the past. Then the sound of a boot is heard, and a man emerges from one of the huts; or the soft pad of a naked foot, and a woman's crimson petticoat swings round a corner; and it is almost like one of the spirits of the past appearing to resent the prohibited intrusion on their soil. The mountain is desolate; the Druid-hill is desolate; the distance is desolate; the village of desertion is terribly desolate; but there is nothing so desolate as the one man standing at the top of the lane and looking down in wonder at the intruder. One says to him, to relieve the oppression, "It's a decent day"; and the reply comes back, "It's a grand day, indeed." But it makes no difference.

DARRELL FIGGIS.

A Reader's Complaint

I CANNOT help feeling a sudden antipathy to the books—certainly you are mistaken if you take it for my professional jealousy as a writer—at a bookseller's shop—the books in a row, by hundreds, thousands, ten thousands, let me say, the somehow inhuman sad display; even when it was my thought to buy some copies, I always left there with nothing in my pocket, but leaving behind a sort of unnatural smile sometimes born from dissatisfaction or uneasiness of mind. And suppose I happen to buy some book by a writer whose world-famous name would even scare my Oriental timidity, and take the copy home, I will only place it, with my Japanese sentimental bows, upon a well-dusted table by the southern window where the scented breezes ever call, or on the tokonoma, the matted little alcove, where the shadows or ghosts graceful and wise always gather themselves; I do not try to open the pages and read them, as the mere fact of my possessing a copy has already half-filled my spiritual hunger, and at once ceased to excite my sense of curiosity. Have I no desire for reading? Why haven't I? I have a great appetite or curiosity for reading; and that is the chief reason for my not opening the books so often carelessly; I hate the disappointment of reading, let me declare, more than death—indeed, more than death. I will tell you what a delightful moment I always have when I turn a page or two of some nondescript book that I find upon the table in my friend's sitting-room—I verily seldom call upon the people whose formal drawing-room alone opens for me—while waiting for his presence, as doubtless he might be washing his face or breakfasting—let me say that all my friends are late risers—or, better still, when I make my lazy eyes run at random over the lines, while my ear, left or right, is listening to his talk on this and that.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The "Essays of Elia" often tire my mind; their too many dashes and parentheses worked certainly a mischief to alienate me from Lamb. Oh, if Hazlitt were not so talkative! I always dislike to read Emerson, because I silently object to grow wiser and saner, in another word, to grow old; it was the work of Carlyle more than anybody else that I lost my innocent appetite, and cannot eat breakfast or dinner, even the simplest diet of raw fishes and rice, uncritically. I think that I became a pessimist from the occasional reading of love lyrics of Herrick, who was so hopelessly childish to disturb the rectory silence with his laughter and eternal Maying, but how envious I am of Keats, who died young. It was Hazlitt—he quite frequently confessed truly from his heart of hearts while talking too tiresomely—who remarked that the reading of Keats' "Eve of St. Agnes" made him regret that he was not young again; let us curse, of course, old age, even middle age. If I am afraid to read Keats, once my most beloved poet, to-day, it is indeed from the reason that hundreds and thousands of ghosts or shadows of my youthful days make at once their innocent, therefore frightful, presence to shout and laugh over my tired, though not particularly sad, certainly prosaic, aspect of the present time; I often ask myself if I did fully live and spend my days of youth. Oh, young men, let me declare, who are after, as Hamlet says, "Words, words, words," and books, come out into the air, amid trees, where birds sing and nameless flowers bloom, and learn what Life means, that is to say, how to revel, revolt, excite, and cry; if you do not laugh and cry when you can laugh and cry, I should say that you never shall be able to laugh and cry again.

The other day when a cup of green tea made me slowly enter the reminiscent mood already at early morning, I called for my pencil and paper to jot down my own story of younger days; but before I reached the third page, always that interesting page for the sudden turn of my thought, I gave up the writing, and exclaimed: "What use to write on the past and younger days. How silly! What a waste of ink and paper! Why don't I write up about my own future? Am I growing already so old as to write on the past and draw a few stupid tears—perhaps a few points of pride, too—out of the younger experience?" I often thought if my dear friend Yoshio Markino would publish, if he must publish, "A Japanese Artist in London," ten or twenty years later, or even thirty years later, his artistic fame would never suffer if he didn't publish it at all. To write such a delightful book like Markino's—I am happy to count him as my friend—one should have a good deal of honesty which disarms your criticism; but to leave the book unwritten altogether, why, he must have a great personality. When anybody begins to talk on himself, even when he talks on the experience innocent and simple, it is vulgarity in the strict literary sense; if not vulgarity, certainly it is mediocrity, however excusable. I know that the people in England as well as in America in general take the books of reminiscences kindly; in that fact I see that they are the people of enough mediocrity, if not stupidity. (Am I too sarcastic?) To speak of the Anglo-Saxon mediocrity, I should say that even the egoism we see in Wilde, Shaw, and two or three others is mediocrity slightly upside down; what does the emphasis of these writers really count? It would matter very little likely. And what about their opinions, characters and achievements? What they regard as the supremacy of the intellect I think frequently proves the opposite and the reverse; the fact is, is it not? that they cannot change the real course of humanity and love through the intellectual. What interests me about the intellectual poets, dramatists, essayists, and what not is rather their failure.

I love, even admire, the egoism in man, therefore in book, because the man or book called egoistic is often the most natural man or book. You enter first into the forest and shut up yourself against the outside interruption like a snail, then you can tell truly how the grasses grow, the birds fly and the moon rises; you should keep quite a distance to get the real perspective of humanity and life; how kind and tender the solitude and silence would be for you. While I know so little about Walt Whitman, I think I can vindicate him from the charge of "egoism"; even in the places where he appears as if acting a low comedian or circus rider, he is sincere in his heart. I recall to my mind how Joaquin Miller, the California bard singing by the seas where the sun goes down, the old friend of mine—the dear old days I spent with him at his mountain ranch—used to raise a hue and cry saying that was an Indian song, when I came across, for example, the following lines in Whitman's poem:—

> "Okonee, Koosa, Ottawa, Monongahela, Sauk,
> Natchez, Chattahoochee, Kaqueta, Oronoco,
> Wabash, Miami, Saginaw, Chippewa, Oshkosh,
> Walla-Walla."

Although I do not know that a boy would become a man, I do know that the boy has certainly the possibility to become the man; my best beloved poet would be one who has the possibility to become a great poet; and my best beloved book is not the book with thoughts and wisdoms packed in, but the book which reveals the process of how the thoughts and wisdoms worked and struggled. What I love in the book, to say shortly, is its incompleteness; when I think that the half-truth will often turn to the whole truth by magic or virtue, that incompleteness, too, would become completeness.

The readers might ask me what is my book, whose book I love best. I will declare for once and all: "None that exists in the world." Am I a hater of the book? Oh, no; but if I hate it, that is because I love the book too much. The greatest love, not only in the book, but almost any other phase of life and humanity, lives together with the greatest hatred under the same roof. Let me hate the book. And again let me love the book.

YONE NOGUCHI.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Samuel Coleridge-Taylor

TO the modern musician who can see no progress in anything that does not contravene all scholastic rules and ancient conventions, Coleridge-Taylor, who died so suddenly this week, was a disappointment. Some of his earliest works quite shocked the conservatives of the day in which they were written, though in view of what has been done by many of the composers of his own age, or a few years younger, even they are to be classed now as belonging to the less progressive schools. He was, nevertheless, really a progressive composer, and his idiom was as original as that of almost any composer of the twentieth century. How much of this was owing to his mixed parentage it is impossible to say, but that some of it was so is certain. As is easily gathered from his family name, his recent ancestry was not unconnected with romantic poetry, and this fact, and perhaps even more his knowledge of the fact, doubtless gave his work a tendency to a romantic nature.

The characteristics of his work which made for popularity were those which were most important from the highest artistic aspects. He had a remarkable control of the possibilities of rhythm, a similar control and knowledge of the possibilities of tone-colour, especially with the orchestra, and an unfailing fount of melody. Few have the ability to compose an obvious tune that appeals to the musician as strongly as it appeals to the popular imagination, yet Coleridge-Taylor possessed this to a very high degree.

Despite his regard for some of the older rules and conventions with regard to matters of structure, in the matter of years he was younger than some who have hardly yet sown their artistic wild oats. He was only just thirty-seven years of age, having been born on August 15, 1875, and the work which first made his reputation general, and deservedly so, was completed fourteen years ago, and produced very shortly afterwards. This was "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast," to which he added "The Death of Minnehaha" and "Hiawatha's Departure." The same subject formed the inspiration of a still later work, an overture to the "Song of Hiawatha," which, however, has not yet attained the popularity of the choral work.

Subsequent compositions varied considerably, both in merit and in popularity, though all had the same workmanlike structure, the same control of his forces, and the same practical performing qualities. It is this last that has contributed largely to his popularity with amateur choral and orchestral bodies. Such difficulties as his works contain for the executant are of a nature which allows of their being overcome with such practice as the earnest amateur can give, while the material is such that the necessary practice is always interesting and usually highly pleasurable.

After the Hiawatha trilogy he appears to have been more successful with the shorter forms than with longer ones. "The Blind Girl of Castel-Cuillé" was probably his greatest failure, and again in this case, as with his successes, both critics and public were agreed. More successful was "Meg Blane," a rhapsody of the sea, which he wrote for the Sheffield Festival of 1902 to words by Robert Buchanan, and still more so was his setting of Alfred Noyes' "A Tale of Old Japan," written nine years later. Both deal with matters of poignant grief, the former being tempered with the clash of the elements and the struggle of overcoming them, while the latter is on a subject of intimate personal sorrow.

Considering the marked ability which Coleridge-Taylor showed in writing for the orchestra, both in the accompaniments to his choral works and in such short orchestral works as are extant, it seems as though he had lost an opportunity in not devoting more time to this class of composition. In the comparative early "Ballade in A Minor," composed for the Gloucester Festival of 1898, there is a perfect tonal and rhythmic equipoise that promised greatly for the future had he continued this class of writing. The same thing may be said of his still earlier "Ballade in D Minor" for violin and orchestra, and, in fact, of all his instrumental works. His neglect of instrumental music, though not entire, is very remarkable when it is remembered that he was a capable violinist and had in late years developed by constant practice considerable ability as a conductor. It is true he appeared to be one of that class of composers who require a direct objective to exercise their talents in any particular direction; but with the opportunities which he had of hearing his own orchestral works there needs some further explanation of this abstention. Possibly there may be works for the orchestra or other instrumental combinations which have not yet seen the light; this is hardly likely, however, considering his large output. It is more probable that he looked at the matter from a practical point of view, and, finding the public demand was for choral works, set himself to meet this demand. In this matter he has not seriously exploited the many methods of vocal tone-colour which some of our English composers have done, but he has provided a number of works which lend themselves to modern expressive methods, and which also are infused with musical genius. As a composer of songs it was only occasionally that he did anything very remarkable, but his songs, just as his choral and instrumental works, are all essentially practical, and generally very beautiful.

What his ultimate position may be it is difficult to forecast, his very popularity during his own lifetime only increasing the difficulty. The least that can be said is that he has worked well for his own day; the most that can be hoped is that a goodly proportion of his works will live on, while the rest will sink into an oblivion that is never less than merciful.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Literary Traveller

By W. H. KOEBEL.

JUST now we are at a season which particularly emphasises the distinctions between the habits of the workers and of the leisured. So far as London is concerned, it is now that the former return and the latter do not. There are a few other distinctions besides, but this is the one which obtrudes itself chiefly at this time of the year. There is no need for complaint in the matter. That everyone should even obtain a temporary change of scene is an advantage of purely modern birth. For nowadays everyone is a traveller. Some travel when they will, others when they may; that is all. In its own way a trip to Southend is as great an achievement as a voyage to the West Indies. Being of an indolent disposition, I would infinitely prefer the latter adventure to the former so far as strenuous hard work is concerned. Indeed, once on board a modern floating palace, all sense of active travel necessarily becomes lost, except when the waves take the trouble to exert themselves to an altogether exceptional extent. There is no doubt that each year diminishes the difference between a liner and a shore hotel, and the old salt romance of the sea is pushed further and further into the background by the crowded procession of creature comforts. The result is evident not only in lifts, bands, and self-contained suites of apartments; it has worked a revolution in the crew itself. Properly speaking, there is a sufficiency of sailors left. But, in point of actual numbers, the captain, his officers, the quartermaster, and seamen form a mere group that is lost in the crowd. The great majority of the modern ship's complement is made up of stewards and sea-labourers.

* * *

There are some lines, of course, which carry their ornamental ambitions further than others. It is largely a question of space. The leviathans which ply across the North Atlantic are naturally the most fortunate in this respect. They can blossom out with an enviable freedom into private restaurants, winter-gardens of an imposing size, and other attributes of the kind which a score of years ago were undreamed of in marine affairs. There is no doubt that the majority of steamship company directors and passengers work together in at least one respect, and that is in a whole-hearted attempt to defeat the monotony of the sea. A book might be written on the traditions and the changing customs of each line. One of the most pleasant of these latter, however trivial, is an institution which now prevails on the latest boats of the R.M.S.P., where the separate tables of the dining-saloon are arranged to accommodate the numbers of the various private parties on board. Thus it is possible to ask one's fellow-travellers and acquaintances to dine. No cheaper or more satisfactory form of entertaining can be imagined. For, in any case, the meals themselves are included in the passage money, and the sole cost of the function lies in the charges for its liquid side. Therefore the gratitude of the guests may seem a little out of proportion. So far as the host is concerned, this need not matter. Even now there is continually something fresh to be learned on the ocean.

* * *

To return from the smaller topics of the greater seas, I have just concluded a flying visit to North Wales—to Criccieth, to be exact, the home of Mr. Lloyd George and the haunt of a ruined castle. I have often thought that it was his up-bringing in a land of so many grey and shattered monuments that inspired the Chancellor with his eagerness to see so many modern structures in a similar condition. If so, a rather touching motive is revealed for the childish sentimentality of his actions. But this is not what I wished to say about Criccieth. At the present moment there would seem to be two Criccieths. The one is represented by the summer visitors, mostly from the Midlands, who with the aid of motor-cars and motor chars-à-bancs tour with vast enjoyment the really beautiful surrounding country. The other is made up of the rightful natives and owners of the soil. It is not to be denied that these look somewhat sardonically upon the vagaries of their flightier guests. Since the occupation is profitable, they will consent to set up the tents even for such a purpose as that of Sabbath bathing. But there their responsibility ends. Their attitude is clearly non-committal. If the cool water portends a hot hereafter it will be the affair of the bathers alone. Nevertheless, it must not be judged from this that there is a lack of enterprise at Criccieth. Of the place itself there is no necessity for a description here. That has already been effected in a really admirable fashion by the L. and N.W. Railway, from less interested motives than mine.

* * *

There is, nevertheless, one feature of Criccieth which must not be passed by in silence. That is the advent of the Rob Roy canoe. It is, I believe, only some four years since these small craft were introduced, and now they teem as thickly as the occasional wild duck on the waters of the bay. They are wonderful little ships, these, even to those accustomed to all the types of larger vessels. In order to enjoy one of them most thoroughly, carry out the following very simple programme. Take a canoe and paddle it to one of the neighbouring, rocky, frowning walls of coast. Then you may rise and fall on the oily swell—providing, of course, that such happens to be in existence at the time—while the waters, as they heave upwards, gurgle and roar in the crevices of the rock. Probably never in the course of your existence have you felt so completely frail and flimsy! The experience is one which can be gained in no other type of craft. There are caves to be entered, moreover, and curious explorations in the half-lights. But such adventures are only for the more daring. Forced upwards by the heave of the swell, to hit the roof of one of these caves might well mean an end of canoeing at Criccieth.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Napoleon the Third*—I

BY E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT.

"When it comes to fixing the fathers of her children, Hortense is always confused about her dates."—Cardinal Fesch.

THIS bon mot of Cardinal Fesch is the key to the mystery surrounding the parentage of Napoleon III. No one knows for certain to this day who his father was. Hortense Beauharnais, the only daughter of the Empress Josephine by her first husband, the Vicomte de Beauharnais, who perished on the scaffold during the Reign of Terror, was married to Louis, third brother of Napoleon Bonaparte, in the year 1802, at the age of nineteen. The gentle, amiable, pretty, frivolous Hortense, the daughter of a mother of fairly easy virtue, carried with her to the throne of Holland a husband whom she disliked and despised, and a warm Creole nature. The result of such an ill-starred union was not difficult to foresee. She became between 1802 and 1826 the mother of five sons, and of these the father of only one, the bastard De Morny, born in Paris in 1811, is known for certain.

Her first son, Napoleon Charles, who died in 1807, to the great regret of the Emperor, who seems to have fixed upon him as his heir, was either the son of Louis, or else, as many are inclined to believe, the son of Napoleon himself. There is little or no evidence to support this grave allegation, but the Baron D'Ambès, the author of these memoirs, tries to make out a case, evidently in the interests of the Napoleonic legend. It was vehemently denied both by Hortense and by the Emperor at St. Helena, and is contrary to all the known instincts of Napoleon's character. The existence of this intrigue is also vehemently denied by all those who were intimate friends and confidants of the First Consul throughout this period, and it is therefore more than likely that little Napoleon Charles was the legitimate child of Louis and Hortense.

The father of her second son, who was born about 1805, and who died or was assassinated in Italy, as some believe in 1831, is also equally uncertain, but the ex-King of Holland, in his famous letter to the Pope, on the occasion of his attempt against the Vatican which led to his death, claims the parentage.

Hortense's third son, Louis Napoleon, the subject of these memoirs, who afterwards became Napoleon III, was born in Paris towards the end of April, 1808. The ardent Bonapartists and upholders of the Second Empire, including the Baron D'Ambès, would have it believed that in July, 1807, Napoleon, after signing the Treaty of Tilsit, which left him undisputed master of Europe, revived an old passion for Hortense, and that Louis Napoleon was the issue of this liaison. But the evidence in support of this assertion is of the flimsiest, and there is some testimony to the effect that about this period Hortense was living with her legitimate spouse during an effort at reconciliation. On the other hand, King Louis never regarded the child born in 1808 as his son, and repudiated him in his letter to the Pope already mentioned. He accepted the responsibilities of bringing him up, and eventually, having no other heir living, left him the bulk of his property.

Of all the misfortunes he has had to bear, surely the cruellest is to saddle Napoleon the Great with the parentage of Napoleon the Little. Not a point of resemblance can be traced between Napoleon I and Napoleon III. In appearance they were absolutely different. Napoleon III was not even a French type, and possessed strong Dutch characteristics. His build was entirely different, and his character weak, vacillating, easily led, incapable of accepting responsibility, and entirely devoid of any civil or military genius; was lacking, in fact, in every quality which made his reputed father the foremost figure of his or perhaps any other age. A propos of this, there is a good story told of a repartee of Prince Louis after he had ascended the Imperial throne. King Jerome, Napoleon's youngest brother, and uncle of Prince Louis Napoleon, was one of the first of the Bonapartists to rally round the latest upholder of the Legend and to seek rewards and emoluments. These constant claims of his insatiable relatives were a great source of worry to the new Emperor and led to many violent scenes. One day, after a very stormy interview, King Jerome lost his temper, and exclaimed, in the presence of the whole assembled family and Court officials, "You have nothing of the great Napoleon about you." "No," retorted Napoleon the Third, "nothing except his miserable relatives."

The amorous Hortense's fourth son, Auguste, who afterwards became famous under the Second Empire as the Duke de Morny, was born in Paris in 1811, and was the son of a dashing General and A.D.C. of Napoleon I, the Count de Flahaut. The Duc de Morny, who played such a prominent rôle in the Coup d'Etat, and Napoleon III were therefore half-brothers.

The life story of Napoleon III is one of the most dramatic in all history. He started life with little or no prospects, his sole asset of any value being the great name he bore. For many years he wandered around Europe, in Italy, Switzerland, and England, laughed at by most, believed in by few, at one time a "Carbonaro" in Italy, at another a peaceful country gentleman, composing essays, political and military, at a third a leader of London society and intimate with Lady Blessington and Comte D'Orsay. Throughout the vicissitudes of his early life he was buoyed up by one ray of hope—the strength of the Napoleonic Tradition. From earliest childhood he seems to have grasped with great foresight the fact that sooner or later the Napoleonic Legend would assert itself once more in France and bear the legitimate heir of the tradition to the head of the State, and perhaps to the Imperial throne. Without the Napoleonic Legend

---

* Intimate Memoirs of Napoleon III. By the late BARON D'AMBES. Edited and Translated by A. R. ALLINSON, M.A. Illustrated. (Stanley Paul and Co. 24s. net.)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

behind him, Louis Napoleon would have passed from the cradle to the grave comparatively unknown. His own unassisted talents would never have carried him to any great heights. On the other hand, his dreamy mind, his love of adventure, and his undoubted courage were admirably calculated to take full advantage of the "Legend" the moment a Napoleonic wave swept over the imaginative Gaulish mind. But he had long to wait. His abortive attempts to bring about a repetition of the "Return from Elba" at Strasburg and Boulogne, which only excited ridicule at the time, show how clearly he was anticipating the Revolution of 1848 and the plebiscite of the same year. The calm fortitude with which he bore his six years of imprisonment at Ham show that hope never left him.

The dramatic steps by which he was called to the Presidency of the Republic in 1848, the coup d'état by which he established the Dictatorship in 1851, and the plebiscite by which he re-established the Empire in 1852 are too well known to require repetition here. They all show that as a man he possessed at this period considerable political foresight and courage and energy with which to carry his designs into effect. But how far his success was due to his own unassisted talent, and how far to the efforts of the small and able group who were the instruments of his designs—namely, Morny, Saint Arnaud, Maupas, Magnan, Persigny, and Fleury—it is difficult to approximate. Probably the coup owed its success to the fact that the mass of the French nation, although not in the secret, were agreeable to any change which seemed likely to offer them a stable and firm government.

As a ruler, Louis Napoleon showed that he possessed many admirable qualities, and throughout the Second Empire France enjoyed great material prosperity. He was undoubtedly a good Liberal, and had the interests of the working classes genuinely at heart. The amount of material works and benefits conferred on France during his reign surpasses anything in the history of any other country. The rebuilding of Paris, which owed its conception to the Emperor, who chose that able instrument of his will, Baron Houssmann, should alone command for him a certain place in municipal history. Almost up to the disaster of Sedan he seems to have enjoyed an immense popularity with the mass of the French people, as is shown by the plebiscite of 1870.

The intimate memoirs of his lifelong friend and companion, the Baron D'Ambès, show clearly the faults and virtues of this Prince of Adventurers. The Napoleonic Tradition to which he owed his throne was also largely responsible for his downfall, and the difficulties which clouded the latter years of his reign. Napoleon III failed because he was not a strong enough character to control the vast structure of which he was the titular head, or the instruments which created that structure. With increasing years a great feebleness of character is evident in all the Emperor's actions. He possessed all the Napoleonic ideals and was the heir to all the Napoleonic traditions, but he was lacking in that energy and force of character necessary to carry them into effect. He fell between two stools. He was not on the one hand a Constitutional Monarch; on the other he was quite unfitted to play the rôle of a Dictator. Consequently he was continually being driven from one policy to another by the influence of various groups of unscrupulous adventurers who happened to gain his ear. The Mornys, Maupases, Saint Arnauds, the Persignys, and Fleurys were the real governors of France throughout his reign, with the result that the graft and corruption under the Second Empire have become notorious in history. Yet for nearly twenty years he stood out as the most powerful monarch in Europe, and no one outside of France seems to have suspected the inner rottenness of the splendid edifice until Bismarck and Moltke carefully analysed facts from fancies and decided that the hour to avenge Jena had at length arrived.

The Theatre

"Drake" at His Majesty's Theatre

FACED with the task of recording his impressions of this latest of Sir Herbert Tree's productions within a few hours of a visit, the critic feels bewildered; unhappy, he thinks, must be the lot of those who are compelled to scribble the moment the curtain is down. His eyes are aching with a surfeit of colour and pageantry; his ears are echoing still with the roll of drums, the clash of swords, and the crackling of fire-arms; the smell of the powder is yet in his nostrils, and his brain is dazzled with the brilliant bluster of it all. His ballast, if we may use a nautical metaphor after an essentially nautical play, is also slightly shifted; he is perhaps a trifle inclined to bang the big drum himself, to wave the Union Jack, hum the National Anthem, and gaze superciliously on persons unfortunate enough not to have been born in England—all of which things, of course, are good in their way, within reason. Having regained, by an interval, a calmer outlook, he is able to evolve a few distinct impressions from the chaos; to see, for instance, that "Drake" is superb in more ways than one. It is superb melodrama, with villain, hero, and languishing lady all complete. It is also—need one say?—superb in its dress and scenery and stage effects; we have never watched so wonderful a changing picture as the triumphant assembly before old St. Paul's, when the victorious sea-king of Devon, his voice vibrating with emotion, gives good speech and brave to the people. England is saved from the fear of Spain; "this little spot ye stand on has become the centre of the earth; from this day forward the English merchant can rove whither he will, and no man shall say him nay. . . . Men of England! Hitherto we have been too much afraid. Henceforth we will fear only God!"

The patriotic interest is supreme in "Drake," as is only right; but the love-story of Mistress Elizabeth

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Sydenham is woven very prettily into the sterner texture of war and treachery and alarms. There was a capital moment or two when the hero, a sailor who had yet to win fame, encountered the Queen's namesake at Hampton Court, in the opening scene. "You from the West Country, too?" he says, in pleased surprise. It is a case of love at first sight on both sides, and, if the sentiment is occasionally laid on with rather too lavish a hand, the general effect is not spoiled. We tremble to think of what disasters would have happened, however, if Mr. Louis Parker lacked the saving grace of humour. More than once this saves the play at critical situations, just when the love-making is on the point of becoming too honeyed for an audience which might, were it strained too far, feel inclined to smile cynically; the impending cynical smile, however, is ousted thoroughly by the hearty laugh—which proves once more how well Mr. Louis Parker knows his art. We cannot complain seriously of the liberties he has taken with history, since his entertainment is set at so high a level.

Recovering from the shock of seeing Mr. Lyn Harding in heroic disguise, swaggering in doublet and hose, after the remembrance of him as Bill Sikes, with the manner of anything but a hero, we were free to remark what a fine interpretation of Drake he gave. He is the man for the part; gallant, swashbuckling, grave and judicial when necessary—as in the scene on board the "Golden Hind," when Thomas Doughty is tried for treachery; an ideal lover, carrying all before him. Mr. Philip Merivale, in the thankless part of the plotter, acted with dignity, and conveyed the villain's heart by his manner instead of by the usual heavy make-up of the stage schemer—for which excellent innovation we were duly grateful. As Queen Elizabeth, Miss Phyllis Neilson-Terry has added to her laurels; majesty we had not regarded as one of her possibilities, but she wore the sceptre as easily and naturally as she played the tripping comedy in the first act of "Trilby," and we may note as an exceptionally neat episode the moment when, with dignity struggling against amusement, she breaks into laughter at Drake's confession of his hurried marriage with Elizabeth Sydenham. Miss Amy Brandon-Thomas played with vivacity as Drake's sweetheart and wife; but we cannot even mention the names of all who assisted to make the piece a success. The old favourites of Sir Herbert Tree's theatre are nearly all in evidence.

Ten scenes, comprised in three acts, fill the evening; and we are not at all sure whether to describe "Drake" as a patriotic pageant or as a play. Sir Herbert Tree, in a speech at the close, hoped that it would "do good" in these days of war-talk and scares; and even those who object to the magnificent staging inseparable from His Majesty's Theatre must be convinced that "Drake" is a heartening spectacle to witness. It brings the ancient traditions of "England, home, and beauty" straight back; it reminds us of the fine part the Devon sea-dogs of old played in building up the greatness of England; and it reminds us, also, that in recent years moments of emergency have found the sailor not a whit behind his prototype in coolness and in courage. Congratulations are due to Mr. Louis Parker for his fine handling of the inspiring theme; to Sir Herbert Tree for his selection of Mr. Lyn Harding as hero; and to the whole company for individual labours which resulted in so coherent and pleasing a presentation.

W. L. R.

"Little Miss Llewelyn" at the Vaudeville Theatre

THE new management of Miss Hilda Trevelyan and Mr. Edmund Gwenn has begun most happily. No one expected the Carmarthenshire edition of "Le Mariage de Mlle. Beulemans" to be quite so charming or the long list of Welsh actors to convince so fully, or to fill the stage after just such an admirable fashion. The nameless adapters appear to have drunk deeply of the wisdom of the moment, determined to rival even "Bunty" in the matter of domestic interest and to approach as nearly as possible to the delicate sentiment and fine feeling of "Milestones" as circumstances would permit. It is now quite evident in the theatre that the new order, of which Ibsen was the far-off herald, giveth place to the old, and that a kind of Charles Dickens-Robertson manner is the only wear. There is artificiality and to spare in "Little Miss Llewelyn," but it is the sort the public wants. There are exaggerations, fond sentiment, forced humours, small beer—such as the things "the station-master told my wife"—but they go to make up a play that will pay both artistically and commercially.

The cast is so excellent in every detail, the play so admirably produced by Mr. McKinnel, that, in a way, one forgets the actors in the ensemble. But Mr. Edmund Gwenn, as the father of Miss Llewelyn, is every inch the man, even in his most wildly funny moments, and Mr. Ronald Squire, as Walter Barrington, the pleasant young London man of the world, who is thrown into the Carmarthenshire family, is complete and admirable from his first line in the wine merchant's office, where he works with Miss Llewelyn, until his last, in which he makes the heroine his "own wee hen," as Mr. Lauder would say. Miss Trevelyan has been greatly praised, and, of course, she plays throughout the three brisk acts with perfect mastery of herself and of the various situations which are provided for her. But—it is the fault of the play—she scores too easily. She is a little too nice to her parents; a little too sympathetic to her first lover, "Owen Griffiths" (Mr. Tom Owen—like all the others, he gets every ounce of character and truth out of his part), who really loves and has seduced another girl; a little too anxious to show that "cheearrm" which Mr. Barrie made her say she knew she did not possess in "What Every Woman Knows." The play and the picture of Welsh life is interesting, amusing, entertaining from start to finish; it will draw the town and gather in the harvest of the provinces. But I do not believe that anybody, such as Miss Llewelyn is shown to be, would have gained such complete influence over her surroundings. And I doubt if Mr.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Ronald Squire's attractive, sympathetic, light, yet sincere, "James Barrington" would have fallen to such a lady. One feels this, but it does not matter. The story, rich in amusing incident, the acting, perfect of its kind, of the fourteen people in the cast—one cannot help especially mentioning the middle-aged servant "Lizzie" of Miss Lilian Mason, whose queer pathos cuts to the quick of the audience—the perfect staging, the delightful humour of the whole thing, would together make a success of even a less engaging picture of life as it might be than is this latest example of bright and gay domestic play, "Little Miss Llewelyn."

"Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm" at the Globe Theatre

THE famous impresario, Mr. Charles Frohman, presents the production of Mr. Klaw and Mr. Erlanger under the direction of Mr. Joseph Brooks and the management of Mr. Frank Young, Mr. Harry Buchanan, Mr. W. Lestocq, and Mr. Oscar Barrett, with the assistance of a good many other gentlemen whose names escape me. The result is an admirable entertainment for those who happen to be children in these matters. Everybody knows, and some people thoroughly enjoy, Mrs. Wiggin's New England sketches of unreal life; it is these sentimental and pleasant literary amusements which she and Miss Thompson have gathered into four acts, and which the gentlemen above mentioned, and some others, spread for our delectation. It must be owned that the charm of Mrs. Wiggin's work will hardly bear the strong light of the stage. The story of the clever, wild, brilliant, and beautiful little girl, Rebecca, coming from a happy home to the severe training of her oldish Aunt Miranda and winning her way to the hearts of everyone she meets is somehow made to seem theatrical without being drama. But there are a hundred tender touches, some delicately treated situations, some dear little children, who have been taught to over-accentuate everything, and two admirable players. These are, of course, Miss Edith Taliaferro, who makes one almost believe in "Rebecca," and Miss Marie L. Day, who develops the character of "Aunt Miranda" with great surety and skill. If the play can hold an English audience, it will be owing to these two admirable artists. As for the rest, all conscientious and correct—they are excellent leather and prunella.

Mr. Archie Boyd, the village stage-driver, one of those jolly, kind people after the manner of Charles Dickens, over-acts every moment he is on the stage, and drives his lightest point home with a Nasmyth hammer. Of course, English audiences are stupid, but are we as bad as he would suggest? Mr. Hayward Ginn, as the good prince who loves Rebecca from the beginning of the play, acts in a straightforward, strong, wooden way, greatly appreciated in the States. The night I had the pleasure of meeting Miss Taliaferro as "Rebecca," the American flag was wildly applauded, I presume, on account of its æsthetic value.

EGAN MEW.

The Magazines

DESPITE a stiffness and dryness of style on so warm a matter, Mr. Henry Newbolt has much to say of interest in the English Review in his article on "Poetry and Politics." It brings one up with something of a halt to find Huxley quoted in order to discover what is the attitude of Science with regard to the nature of man. Moreover, this is indicative of Mr. Newbolt's attitude rather more than appears at first sight; for he is too apt to approach poetry from without, whereas, like all the great mysteries of Life, it can only be understood from within. Yet he has much to say that is apt nowadays to be neglected, although he himself is a little nervous of pushing his argument to its just conclusion, as Shelley does in his superb essay, "A Defence of Poetry." Over and over again we were waiting for Mr. Newbolt to quote the closing words of that essay, that "Poets are the unacknowledged legislators of the world." Mr. Norman Douglas, in the same magazine, has a strong story, entitled "The Forge." With regard to our comments last month on Lord Sheffield's article on Popular Education it is interesting to read "Custos" this month substantiating them, though in more particular reference to "Our Gentlemen's Schools."

In the Fortnightly Mr. Hilaire Belloc writes in exposition of "The Classical Spirit"—and in incidental depreciation of what is known as the "Romantic Spirit." We confess we do not like these distinctions, feeling, as we do, that they are largely artificial. For instance, when it is remembered that the Greek statues were probably vividly painted—as the earlier Egyptian statues were—and that the dramatic trilogies were undoubtedly acted in sequence, what becomes of the boasted sense of repose in cool outline and unity of time respectively? Moreover, when Mr. Belloc proceeds to speak of Ibsen as a romantic, one begins to lose sight of his argument altogether. However, there is one admirable phrase in his article, which may serve for a good deal more. He says that "proportion is the expression of ultimate reality." Then one may say that Classicism is the sense of mundane proportion, whereas Romanticism is the sense of celestial proportion: and so good a churchman as Mr. Belloc should not be in much doubt as to which proportion he is in pledge to admire. Mr. E. Hallam Moorhouse writes upon "Some Aspects of William Morris" in an article that is precisely described in its title. It is curious to see the way in which writers shrink from complete and adequate studies into the work of the men who have just gone from us. The line of development from the "Defence of Guenevere" through the "Earthly Paradise" and the splendid "Sigurd the Volsung" to the "Poems by the Way," is a fascinating study. But Mr. Moorhouse quotes "Two Red Roses Across the Moon" and "The Message of the March Wind" almost as though they were not at the opposite ends of Morris' life, with the "News from Nowhere" between them to expound the transition. Mr. Beresford Chancellor writes with interest on "Changing London," and Mr. Beaumont contributes an informative and illuminating appreciation of the late M. Massenet.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Mr. J. B. Williams, in the Nineteenth Century, contributes an article entitled "Fresh Light on Cromwell at Drogheda." He unfortunately mars his article by being not less provocative than he says Carlyle is. To us it has always been apparent that Carlyle, through an injudicious use of documents, but far more through an attempt to throw off the unjust calumny of two centuries of Cromwell, was guilty of whitewashing his hero. A people do not execrate a man as Cromwell is execrated throughout the length and breadth of Ireland for nothing. That Cromwell let himself, and let his soldiers, loose to an ungoverned and vindictive fury, is as clear as clear can be: and Mr. Williams is no more than just in making that fact plain. He could also point out that Cromwell's subsequent inaccuracies in his letters and reports are probably due to a feeling of shame at that fact. But no good is done by disguising the fact that Carlyle, as an historian, was never averse from setting down facts that were to the detriment of his heroes, when he found them—as his work on Cromwell is itself sufficient to prove. Mr. Fabian Ware writes wisely and authoritatively on "Labour and Internationalism," and his essay should be read by many. In dealing with "The Passing of the English Jew," Mr. Lewis Melville, if we may say so, writes with a great deal more interest and authority than when he wanders round his perennial theme of Thackeray. The subject is one of profound interest; and it is a tribute to his pen when we say that he does it justice. Professor James Lindsay deals with "The Case for and against Eugenics," and says well that we "might purchase a biological benefit too dearly at the cost of a spiritual wound."

In the Oxford and Cambridge Review the best article is that by Mr. Francis Grierson on "The Soul's New Refuge." It is concerned with the growing significance of the power of music in all Art. It is marked by all the writer's chastity of expression and rightness of thought. Mr. Alfred Austin writes some recollections of the occasions when he met Meredith. In the same magazine Mr. J. B. Williams writes further upon the topic of Cromwell in an article entitled "Cromwell and the Literature of the Protectorate." It is very clear that Mr. Williams is no lover either of Cromwell or his period; only now it is Masson and not Carlyle who earns his attack. We venture to think, however, that his readers will find him somewhat more prejudiced than he assumes his antagonists to be. Mr. F. E. Smith deals with modern "Parliamentary Oratory," and gives his judgments on the "oratory" of the chief figures in the House of Commons.

In the Cornhill there is an interesting problem, for those who are interested in problems, called "A Question of Ethics." That it should relate an incident in the life of a late eminent physician makes the problem all the more intense. We have often wondered why the Cornhill did not open its pages more to literary criticism. Its antecedents, not to say its appearance and general format, all seem to argue for it, and cause one to expect it. Nevertheless one very seldom finds such an essay in its pages. And when, as this month, a change is made, it is more than disappointing to read some very "Prosaic Views on Poetry." In Blackwood's, when one desires to discover literary criticism or recollection, one has invariably to turn to the "Musings without Method"; though in this case the pleasure of anticipation is somewhat dimmed by the fact that one knows fairly closely what attitude one is to meet. The two chief matters dealt with this month are the letters of Robert Southey, and Professor Saintsbury's "History of English Prose Rhythm." There are doubtless many who will purchase and keep this number of Blackwood's, moreover, because of Mr. Hunt's translation of the newly discovered "Satyric Drama of Sophocles."

The Quest is always interesting. Its editor, Mr. G. R. S. Mead, writes upon "Some Features of Buddhist Psychology," with all his fulness of knowledge. Professor Karl Joel writes upon the "Romanticism of the First Thinkers of Hellas"; and, indeed, there is scarcely an article that does not repay careful reading.

In addition to many short stories by popular writers in the Windsor Magazine for September there are two very interesting and instructive articles—"Music in Picture," by Austin Chester and "Woman's Work in Social Settlements," by Miss Alice Stronach. The one dealing with the efforts of educated women to help their less favoured sisters in a real and yet unostentatious manner is peculiarly appropriate at the present time, when the militant female is so much to the fore with her "rights" and demands, to say nothing, in some cases, of her criminal means of endeavouring to obtain them. Here we have accounts of the indefatigable energy and noble self-sacrifice of hundreds of women who seek for nothing better than to make the life of some child or some poor sufferer a little less hard to bear, and who wish for no notoriety on platforms, in prisons or amid the waving of banners. Miss Stronach gives succinct and impartial accounts of a large number of the settlements that have sprung up in the poorer parts of London from the time when Arnold Toynbee left Oxford to become one of the pioneers of the movement. Although originating with men, there are now so many women associates that at the present time many of the settlement homes are managed entirely by women, prominent among whom is Mrs. Humphry Ward.

Notes and News

Messrs. John Long publish shortly "Sensations of Paris," by Rowland Strong; "Lords and Ladies of the Italian Lakes," by Edgcumbe Staley; "The Viceroys of Ireland," by Charles O'Mahony: and "Through Dante's Land," by Mrs. Colquhoun Grant.

Messrs. Stephen Swift and Co. announce for immediate publication "The Consumer in Revolt," by Teresa Billington-Greig; "The Conservative and the Future," by Pierse Loftus: "Bohemia in London," by Arthur Ransome; and "Revelations," by Robert Bryant.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Mr. H. G. Wells' new novel, "Marriage," is published this week by Messrs. Macmillan and Co. The same firm announce for September 17 "Mrs. Lancelot—a Comedy of Assumptions," by Mr. Maurice Hewlett. The novel deals with love, high life, and politics in the days of the Great Reform Bill.

One of the first autumn books to appear with Messrs. Mills and Boon is one by Miss M. P. Willcocks, called from the name of an old country dance, "The Wind among the Barley." The book deals entirely with the sharp-tongued, humorous Devon country folk whom Miss Willcocks knows so well.

It is ten years since Dr. Talmage, one of the most famous of American preachers, died, but the interest in him, in England, where he was widely known and his gifts were greatly admired, has not diminished. His life story seems to have been an extraordinarily interesting one, and, therefore, the autobiography which Mr. Murray is to publish next week should be sure of wide appeal.

One of the publications announced for the early days of September is a book written, printed, and published by women. We understand that into the Happy Publishing Company (133, Salisbury Square, Fleet Street, E.C.), which is responsible for the venture, no male is eligible for admission, and that "Love's Victories" is this company's maiden venture. The author, also, Mrs. M. M. Lee, makes her debut with this book.

A new book is announced by Messrs. S. W. Partridge and Co. from the pen of Mr. F. G. Aflalo, the well-known traveller, naturalist, and sportsman. Exciting stories of adventure with lions, tigers, leopards, and other dangerous beasts have been specially contributed to its pages by hunters all over the world. The numerous illustrations in both black-and-white and colour are by Mr. E. Caldwell, an artist unrivalled in this kind of work. The work, bearing the title of "A Book of the Wilderness and Jungle," will be published at 6s. net.

The early days of October are to see a Second Post-Impressionist Exhibition at the Grafton Galleries. This time we are to be afforded an opportunity of studying the movement as exemplified by the exponents of the Modern School, in which, it is understood, France and Russia take the lead. As before, the Exhibition is under the organisation of Mr. Roger Fry; the names of the Earl of Plymouth, Lord Ribblesdale, Sir Edgar Vincent, the Rt. Hon. Lewis Harcourt, M. Theodore Duret, Mr. Clive Bell, and Mr. Robert Dell figure on the Committee.

Mr. W. N. Willis (ex-M.P., Australia) has written a new book entitled "What Germany Wants." This book is a forceful exposition of what the author regards as the German menace in Europe; it touches a new key in Imperial affairs, and includes a chapter which unfolds a workable plan for bringing the Empire and its great Dependencies into union for the defence of the trade arteries of the Mediterranean. The author deals from inside knowledge with Russia's action in Chinese Mongolia, Baron Marschall's missions to the Court of St. James, etc., etc. Messrs. Stanley Paul and Co. are the publishers.

Of the forty new volumes which Mr. J. M. Dent will add to "Everyman's Library" immediately, perhaps one of the most important is Roget's "Thesaurus," which Mr. Andrew Boyle has revised and brought up to date. Mr. Dent has also in the press a volume of essays by Mr. Darrell Figgis. In "Studies and Appreciations," the title of the new volume, he discusses several matters of present-day importance. The same firm will issue shortly a new novel by Mr. Joseph Conrad, "'Twixt Land and Sea," and a work by Roy Devereux entitled "Aspects of Algeria," illustrated with photographs and drawings.

The Annual Exhibition of the Royal Photographic Society is being held this year at the Galleries of the Royal Society of British Artists in Suffolk Street, Pall Mall, from September 2 till September 21. The premier Photographic Society has hung between six and seven hundred exhibits by home, foreign, and colonial workers, and among them are many calling for careful study. The Exhibition, as usual, is divided into two main sections, the pictorial and the scientific, and while the former is and always will be the more popular, it is in the latter that improvements are most frequently made and shown, to be afterwards adapted to the use of the more popular side of the art. Among the exhibits calling for special attention is a series of photographic surveys made from aerial heights by members of the Royal Flying Corps.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

THE FUTURE OF TIBET.

AT a moment when, faced with stupendous difficulties, China is striving to set her house in order, a complicating element has been introduced into the general situation by the reopening of the Tibetan question. To the superficial observer, the policy that is being pursued by Great Britain in relation to the Dependency may at first sight appear inconsistent with the attitude of our diplomacy at Peking throughout the stormy period of the Revolution. In those days it was "hands off" to the international vandal that characterised our influence in the Chinese capital; and it is no longer denied that this policy of seeing that China received fair-play frustrated the designs of certain Powers who were only too anxious to take advantage of the state of turmoil which existed throughout the country. It is true that those Powers have since taken steps to secure the end in view, and that, on China's behalf, we have not attempted to baulk them; but, had they been given a free hand during the Revolution, their ambitions would have been boundless and the consequences of their actions disastrous to the peace of the world.

By insisting, however, that the Tibetans be allowed to manage their own affairs, Great Britain is not in any way following the example of Russia and Japan in regard to the Manchurian and Mongolian territories. Unlike these two Powers, it is no part of our policy to extend our frontiers at the expense either of Chinese sovereignty or Chinese suzerainty. Inconsistency lies rather with the critics of Sir Edward Grey, who, in their desire to champion the cause of the weak, which in this instance means for them the Chinese Republic, have entirely overlooked the years of cruel oppression under which the Tibetan peoples have suffered at the hands of their overlords. At the same time, however, if we are to consider the question impartially, we must not visit the sins of Manchu tyranny upon the embarrassed Administration that is now endeavouring to consolidate the fortunes of the young Republic.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The circumstances of the present crisis call for statesmanship of the highest order, not only in England, but also in China. It is unfortunate for all parties concerned that the interpretation placed on Great Britain's action by Radical newspapers in this country is shared by the Press of China. The interpretation is summed up in the supposition—I quote from a London journal—that "we appear to be acting hand in glove with Russia and Japan in the policy of seizing bits of China. Our share of the spoil is to be Tibet, and the 'forward policy' is to be revived to secure it." Nothing could be further removed from the truth. Tibet, a country over which Peking possesses neither the moral nor the legal right to exercise sovereignty, forms the natural buffer between the integral Republic and the integral Empire, and wisdom dictates, both in the interests of China and of India, that she should be permitted to remain a buffer State. As such, she should be allowed a proper measure of autonomy under the ægis of one or other of her neighbours. Hitherto the suzerain has been China; and it depends entirely upon the attitude of that nation during the negotiations now in progress as to whether she shall retain that position. Provided a reasonable spirit animates the conduct of the Peking Government, we have no purpose to serve in adding to China's humiliations by insisting upon her relinquishing the dignity of what can only prove to be an empty title. But in no circumstances do we intend to submit tamely to the enforced incorporation of an unwilling Tibet as a State in the Chinese Republic.

China will do well to weigh her words and consider her actions at the present juncture, for our policy will be strictly determined by the attitude she elects to adopt. If, as there is reason to hope, she pays heed to the counsels of wisdom, then, in the words of Sir Francis Younghusband, we shall say to the Chinese people that "we do now, we always have, and we always will recognise their suzerainty over Tibet, but that we never have and never will recognise their sovereignty; for attempts to exercise sovereignty unnecessarily irritate the Tibetans and cause disturbance on our frontier. And to the Tibetans we would say that we will give no support or countenance whatever to any attempts to throw off Chinese suzerainty, but that we mean to maintain the status existent when we made our treaty with them, and to hold both them and the Chinese to that treaty." *

Whatever view may be taken in regard to the inevitable future of Tibet, nothing could be more absurd in this connection than to waste compassion upon China as a nation. Her integrity is not threatened, and she stands to gain rather than to lose by the settlement, on the lines proposed by Great Britain, of a long-standing and much vexed question.

To the Peking Government, however, we cannot but extend our sympathy. They are embarrassed, as Peking Governments have been embarrassed in the past, by the clamour of the Press and of that militant section of the population who choose to regard British policy with the same suspicion and hostility with which they are accustomed to view, and not without reason, the actions of Japan and Russia. It is this headstrong element that accounts in a large measure for what foreigners are pleased to term the evasiveness of the Central Administration. And herein lies the complication of the present situation. For it is inconceivable that, were he able to choose his own course, without regard to the susceptibilities of strong but untutored factions, a man gifted with the vision of Yuan Shih-kai would blind himself to two very cogent considerations. The first of these is that Great Britain, having made up her mind, is able to enforce her will; the second, that China, who is to lose neither territory nor prestige in the settlement of the Tibetan question, can well afford to wait before embarking upon a policy by which she elects to sacrifice her integral isolation.

* Letter to the Times, September 3.

MOTORING

AT this time of the year, when the annual Motor Show at Olympia is within measurable distance, there is always a certain amount of speculation on two points of interest to motorists and prospective motorists, namely, the likelihood of striking innovations in design for the next season, and the possibility of material reductions in prices. So far as the first point is concerned, it may be said that up to the present there are no indications of any drastic departures from what may now be termed standard lines of construction—at any rate, so far as the recognised leading makers are concerned. Last year's exhibition was noteworthy for the predominance of the four-cylindered engine, and there is little doubt that at the forthcoming show the partiality for this type will be still more in evidence. And, as a matter of fact, the well-balanced four-cylinder gives as silent, flexible, and even running as can be expected or desired, consistent with freedom from complications. There will always, of course, be a limited number of motorists who, having tasted the luxury afforded by the perfect torque of the high-class six-cylinder, will be content with nothing less; but it is not everybody who can afford this, and for the motorist of moderate means the four-cylinder is the ideal car.

With regard to the second item of speculation—that of prices for the models of 1913—it is to be feared that those optimists who are anticipating extensive reductions will be disappointed. In fact, there are obvious reasons for supposing that the reverse will be the case, at any rate so far as British cars are concerned. In the ordinary course of things the evolution of the motor industry brings about, year by year, improved methods of production, greater standardisation, etc., and, other things being equal, this tendency should result in lower cost of manufacture and lower prices to the ultimate purchaser; but, as the Motor points out, there have been many internal labour troubles in this country during the past year, the result of which, combined with the new taxation, has been to increase wages in many of the motor-manufacturing concerns, and this factor counterbalances whatever advantages would have accrued to the buyer from the improvements in manufacturing methods.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Another interesting matter for speculation is the future of American cars in this country. The outstanding feature of the past season has undoubtedly been the materialisation of the American "invasion" which was threatened so long that most people concluded that it never would materialise. There can no longer be any doubt as to its actuality, and of its seriousness from the British maker's point of view. During the last twelve months at least twenty different makes of American cars have made their appearance on our market, and most of them seem to have come to stay. They are now to be seen on our roads in such numbers that one is constrained to conclude that the old-standing prejudice against cars of American origin has practically disappeared. What has conduced to this has been the demonstrated ability of our Transatlantic friends to produce a presentable, fast, and powerful car at a price far below that demanded by the British maker for a car of similar specification. This ability is due primarily to the American capacity to manufacture on an enormous scale, with resulting standardisation of parts and all-round economy of production. One hears of American factories equipped for turning out 100,000 complete cars in a year, whereas it is doubtful if there is one in this country capable of making one-twentieth of this number annually. On the other hand, it is notorious that the typical American car is comparatively a slip-shod article. It is really a question of supply and demand, and not of inability to turn out first-class work. The average American—and Canadian—appears to be quite content with a car which will give him good service for a year or two. After that, he simply discards it and buys another. Whether the British buyer will be content with a similar policy remains to be seen. In the meantime it may be pointed out that there is already a remarkable number of cheap American cars which have "only done a few hundred miles" being advertised for sale.

In a recent issue we referred to the utility of the sprag as a safeguard against accident in the event of a car failing in the course of a hill climb. Another illustration of the danger involved in running a heavy chain-driven motor vehicle without this almost obsolete fitment was afforded the other day, when the driving chain of a motor lorry snapped in the course of an ascent of a steep incline near Dewsbury, and the vehicle began to run backwards. Fortunately, the driver, who, by the way, has received the Continental Tyre Company's medal for his display of nerve and skill, succeeded in steering the motor into a side turning, and thus averted an otherwise inevitable calamity. Not all drivers, however, could be relied upon to keep their heads in such circumstances, and there are not always convenient side turnings available. The moral of the incident is that the sprag should be a compulsory fitment of every chain-driven motor, more especially in the case of motor vehicles used for the public service.

R. B. H.

For That Tired Feeling!

Induced by trying to sell a second-hand car privately

CONSULT

McCURD MOTOR DEALER

McCurds, Ltd., Store Street, Tottenham Court Road, London.

UNDER THE SOLE CONTROL

W. A. McCURD

Telegrams: McCURDS, LONDON. Telephone: 2916 City.

"EVERY DROP LUBRICATES."

"Champion" Motor Oil

is the best for all types of Cars.

If not already using "Champion" send for trial tin to

S. BOWLEY & SON,

DISTILLERS OF BOWLEY'S MOTOR SPIRIT,

"Express" and "Bomo" Brands.

Wellington Works,

BATTERSEA, LONDON, S.W.

Established 1744.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE whole movement in the world appears to-day to be towards higher values—optimism is the one creed. No one will listen to the warning voice. Indeed, the cautious man is regarded as the enemy of the human race. Therefore the Bank of England was wise to put up its Rate. There is plenty of money in London, but with trade booming, the Stock Exchange humming, and dozens of big loans being on the verge of coming out, the wise bankers thought that they might as well get four per cent. for their money as three. The money is not wanted to-day, but it will be wanted to-morrow. The last harvest will have a serious effect upon trade returns—we shall have to buy more foodstuffs and pay a higher price for them. Therefore the rise in the Rate, though it came early, was not unwise or indeed unexpected. It seems to me that we shall have a very busy autumn. The Stock Exchange expects a boom. In which department it hardly knows, but hopes in all markets are high. There is a great deal of money waiting investment, and what is better everybody is in ample credit. The banks lend freely. They can see no cloud anywhere. This makes for a big speculation in which all hope to achieve fortune, but in which most will lose heavily.

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

FOREIGNERS are steady as a rock. Perus have been bought. It is now said that some big group is attempting to get control. The Grace management is not liked either here or in Peru—a change would be welcome. The Prefs. are very much too high unless some new management comes in, and candidly I have no news that can be relied upon. Tintos look very good because we all see now that the Yankees will not be so foolish as to let copper down. They are now reaping the reward of their two years' abstinence. Paris is getting ready for some big Russian loans. Hundreds of thousands of miles of new railways are needed, and the French will find the money with pleasure. There are curious rumours that Austria-Hungary, being in sore need of cash, has opened up negotiations with Paris, but that the French Government declines to let the big banks lend the money. "Why lend money to your enemies?" says Poincaré. But Hungary is sound, and if she will pay the price I think we can rely upon France lending a few millions.

HOME RAILS don't please the Stock Exchange. But the public goes on buying, and in a few weeks the dealers will find themselves short of stock; then they will try to mark down prices. That will not succeed, and they will buy back in despair; thus a rise here seems one of the autumn certainties. The tale that the Government will not help the passing of the Railway Bill need not be credited. No Government dare break its pledges. I think that those who buy the leading shares will have no cause to regret it. The dealers talk up Little Chats, but this is pure gambling.

YANKEES.—The Wall Street crowd still say that we shall see a boom in rails. But no one knows which stock to buy—Unions, Atchisons, Southern Pacific—all look good. Milwaukees are being cried down on the tale that the Puget Sound is not doing well, and that the dividend this line pays is exhausting its resources. One day Puget Sound will "make good," but Milwaukee needs new blood. Eries are a tip—so are Rocks. These two gambling counters are for ever popular. They are cheap, they are good markets, and they both have possibilities. But we should not forget that they are only counters, and that neither is safe from assessment.

RUBBER is at last once again a good market. The East when prices were low bought all the leading shares, and as the market was short prices rose, and then the public came in. Now the East has sold and is buying the cheap shares like Merlimau and Chersonese. But I think that no one can go wrong in Pataling or Cicely. The capitalisation of these companies is so low that whatever happens to either the shares will always pay a dividend. Linggi is good. So are Batu Caves, Anglo-Malay, and Lanadron. Brieh is a cheap share that is marked down for a rise. How long the boom will last no one knows. Prices have not yet reached any dangerous level. I expect it will last through to the end of the year. The dealers will keep up the price of raw rubber and the Amazon will unload some of its stocks. Then the price will weaken, and the stock markets will feel the effect at once. I would not touch any of the so-called cheap shares. There are many options out, and the market expects to unload on the poor public. Once the share is unloaded the market goes home happy, and the price drops. We saw this game played before—we shall see it played again.

The OIL MARKET is dull. Yet this does not daunt Rosenburg, who have put West Ural on the market; it is said that the 50 plots have cost £150,000—a quite fantastic figure for plots on the wrong side of the Ural River. However, Nobels are in the deal, and the public may buy. They will be sorry afterwards. Why purchase shares like Emba or West Ural when you can buy Urals whose ground is already proved at much lower figures? Dalziels will have the Central Cheleken out in a week or two. I think they would be well advised to delete the paragraph which says that Cheleken oil is valuable because it carries a big percentage of paraffin wax. It was this wax which caused Mr. Drury to moan and explain why Cheleken sold its oil so much below the market price. Chelekens have been boomed and will be kept up, for Dalziels have still the Gadjinsky wells to float.

KAFFIRS are steady, but not strong—the public is not in the market. A few long-sighted people are averaging their good shares. Village Deep now look like going up, a big block has been taken off the market. Knights are cheap, though I do not think that the dividend will be increased for at least another year. But the life is long and the price of the share low. The "Johnnies" report was good, and the board say that the position is sound. This I can well believe, because the Barnato crowd have plenty of money and know how to finance. They will lead the Kaffir market now that Wernher Beit are out of it.

RHODESIANS are promised a land boom. Sir Abe Bailey has purchased a big block of London and Rhodesian from Weils, and is said to have moved up Giants. The Wheater Cornwallis West people have taken the Cam and Motor share market in hand and will put up the price. Sir Abe has incited a syndicate to buy £48,000 worth of land from the Amalgamated Props., and a big advertising scheme is now arranged.

If Rhodesia is boomed then Chartered will go up to 40s., and the cute people are buying. There is a move on in the whole of this market, and I expect prices will jump. Wise people will then get out and leave the game to be played by the too-clever people who run the show.

EGYPT looks like becoming popular once more. The cotton crop is to be a record—8,000,000 cantars. Lord St. Davids has taken over "Abdys" and must make it good. The Zervodachi failure cleared the air, and the stocks held by the family have nearly all been bought, and go into strong hands. Therefore the rise in prices is justified. But such shares as Sidi-Salem, Gharbieh, United Lands are only lock-ups. Good shares like Salt and Soda Agricultural Banks, National Banks, Delta Light Prefs are the sound stocks to buy, with perhaps a few Khedivial Mail Prefs. Clearly the fact that Lord Kitchener has taken the country in hand has made both London and Paris confident.

INDUSTRIALS are very steady. Even Marconis have had a rise, possibly due to the "bears" having been caught. There is now talk of the Poulsen people having signed an agreement with Canada for a Pacific wireless scheme with New Zealand and Australia. Galletti is also competing with Marconi. Lawsuits are promised, and we shall see lively times in this market. A cheap shipping share is the Preference in the West Hartlepool, which has been gradually increasing its profits, and as the dividend is five years in arrear the shares are a good gamble at 50s. for the £10 share. The P. and O. gamble still goes on. Electric Lights should all go better on the amalgamation scheme now being discussed. The Brazil Railway report was good, and the option dealers have been busy. The common stock is talked £200—a fabulous price! But a rise seems certain.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

CORRESPONDENCE

NEED.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—One is almost tempted to look on M. Bernon's letter in your issue of August 31 as a joke intended to enliven this dismal season. The idea of the word "need" in "I need not" being a "present infinitive in which mood," etc., etc., certainly reads like an intentional caricature of the harebrained theories so often found in grammatical and philological works. So in "I can not" "can" is, of course, a present infinitive, and the meaning is "I did not can." "The auxiliary 'did' is sometimes used by good authors before the word 'need.'" Why these limitations? Do bad authors, or people who are not authors at all, never say to their wives, "You did not need a new hat"? Assuming that M. Bernon is serious, the situation seems to be this: Dean Alford said, as many lesser people have said before and since, "I need not have troubled myself." Mr. Moon, whoever he may have been, criticised the phrase. For all I know, there may never have been such a person; if there was, he cannot have known much about English, and in any case he need not have proclaimed his ignorance to a mocking world. Similarly, M. Bernon may not have meant his letter seriously; in that case, he cannot have made sufficient allowance for the defective sense of humour of some of your readers; he should have remembered how deficient some people are in this respect; in any case, he need not have framed his letter in such a way as to leave me in doubt whether it is a joke or not. Assuming that it is not, M. Bernon and Mr. Moon will no doubt be grateful to me for pointing out that there are in English sundry verbs—do, need, dare, etc.—which are used sometimes as auxiliaries, sometimes as ordinary verbs. When they are used as auxiliaries they naturally imitate auxiliaries as closely as possible: he can't go—he daren't go—he needn't go—it don't matter. These four similar phrases are all strictly correct, in spite of the fact that English people, with their usual lack of principle, accept the first three and reject the last. "Need" and "dare" can be used in either way with the same effect. "He does not dare to go" means exactly as "He dare not go." "He dares not go," like "He does not dare go," is as illogical a mixture as our pet phrase "It does not matter." Since true auxiliaries have (in English) not more than two tenses, the only way of expressing a perfect tense is to keep the auxiliary in the present and put the following infinitive into the perfect: "I may have seen him—I need not have troubled myself." There is no other way of using "may" in the former sentence; and "need," used as an auxiliary, naturally follows the usage of true auxiliaries. The phrases quoted by M. Bernon—"They didn't need them," "Needed no prompter"—are, of course, like "I have done my duty," "I do not need (or dare) to write any more," ordinary examples of the non-auxiliary use of these verbs. Some of your readers will probably think that I need not have dilated at such length on elementary truths which most people may, must, should, or ought to have long since found out for themselves. "Ought," perhaps, hardly deserves a place in this category; it still has so little of the true auxiliary nature as to require "to" after it. I am, Sir, yours, etc.,

T. G. MARTIN.

Bradford, September 1, 1912.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Is M. Bernon's defence of Dean Alford's use of the phrase, "I need not have," really necessary? As a point of grammar, I suppose the problem occasionally troubles the minds of all conscientious writers; but is the familiar expression incorrect as it stands? It is a question of "connecting up" two points of time, past and present.

This may be done, I take it, by (so to speak) extending the tense-action of either of the verbs, forwards or backwards respectively. Thus one may say, strictly speaking:—

(1) "I needed not" (at that point in past time)—i.e., I was under no obligation to "do" (then) "such or such an act"; or,

(2) "I need not" (now)—i.e., I am under no obligation (of morality, consistency, or the like)—to "have done"—(i.e., to have standing to my credit or discredit in the Recording Angel's ledger) such or such an act.

Very possibly "I need not" may, as M. Bernon suggests, be an abridged form of "I did not need," which is rather long, or of "I needed not," which is cacophonious, and recalls the kitchen-dresser. Curious in this connection is the want of a past tense to the important verb "must"—for which "I had to" is too familiar ("Possum can't climb tree! This un had ter, dogs was a crowdin' on 'im so") and "I found myself under the obligation of," etc., a trifle too elaborate. Here the German "müsste" avoids all difficulty. If not "I needed," might we not say "I musted"? Yours.

G. H. POWELL.

Savile Club. Sept. 2, 1912.

"THE RIKS."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I am thankful to your reviewer for the account he gives in THE ACADEMY of June 29 of my discoveries in the field of ancient mythology and religion. His uncomplimentary characterisations of my humble effort lose most of their sting when he concludes by saying "real scientists and scholars could, we believe, expose his extraordinary conceptions of fact and fancy."

I suppose he will acknowledge Mr. Barth and Prof. Ignazio Guidi to be scholars entitled to judge of a work like "The Riks." They are Honorary Fellows of the Royal Asiatic Society, in which Honorary Fellowships are limited to thirty of the most eminent scholars. Mr. Barth writes as follows:—"I have read your book at a stretch as a most fascinating poem of its own. Your identifications are skilful and ingenious; they are not mere guess and fancy; I would even say they are too good to be true; for one is not wont to find such logical sequence in the rather incoherent intricacy of genuine myth." Mr. Barth subscribes himself the author's "most fervent but utterly sceptical admirer." Prof. Guidi is equally enthusiastic, and, what is more, partially accepts my conclusions. Dr. Fleet, honorary secretary, Royal Asiatic Society, says my work opens out quite a new vista hitherto unexplored, that he read it with great interest and hopes to study it in detail. Dr. Pinches, the great Babylonian scholar, thinks my book excellent and full of illuminating information, and is working out, step by step, my identification of the Babylonian God Nirig or Ninip with a great volcano like Indra or Jupiter. Not one scholar has hitherto attempted to assail a single one of my identifications with reference to the original Riks, and I have sent my book to most Vedic scholars and great geologists as well. Mount Sinai is a basaltic volcano, and, if Western scholars have been unable to see in the description of the appearance of the Lord on the top of Mount Sinai an eruption of lava, with its attendant earthquakes, flames, stone-throws, thick clouds, lightnings and thunders, I will not imitate your reviewer and say "I despair of Western intelligence," but state the true explanation of their apparent obtuseness in the language of the first and greatest of Upanishads: "The preconceptions of the learned constitute an opacity more impenetrable to the light of new truth than the darkness of blind ignorance." In the case of ancient mythology and religion the preconceptions have been transmitted through many generations of scholars, ancient, mediæval, and modern, and are therefore all the more difficult to remove.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

My case is that modern Western scholars are correctly interpreting the language of the Riks, but, owing to the overpowering weight of preconceived notions, do not realise the significance of their own interpretation. A cursory perusal of the description of Vritra-Ahi and the Maruts (glaciers and snows respectively) contained in Prof. Macdonell's "Vedic Mythology" will afford most convincing proof of this assertion. We imagined our forebears were primitive originative children, who described the common sky, cloud, sun, moon, and stars in silly, whimsical, and perplexing fashion. We have now to master the latest of modern sciences to understand their descriptions of the war of lava and ice in the glacial period which ended only five thousand years ago, if not even later.

T. PARAMASMA IYER,
Author of "The Riks,"
District and Sessions Judge, Bangalore.

Bangalore City, South India.
August 13, 1912.

REPLACE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I beg to submit to you and to the readers of THE ACADEMY the following:—

An important misprint has crept into Hodgson's excellent book ("Errors in the Use of English," p. 52) in connection with the true meaning of the word replace. That author is made to say that the meaning of this word is "remplacer" (to substitute, to supersede, etc.), when it is the very thing to which he objects. In fact, Hodgson criticises about a score of good writers, because the latter use the word replace in the objectionable sense.

In French, there is a very great difference between the words replacer and remplacer. "Replacer (to replace, to put back), from Re . . . ou Ré (lat. re . . .), préfixe latin qui entre dans la composition d'un grand nombre de mots français, et que marque la réitération, la réciprocité, la résistance, le retour à un ancien état: 1. Replacer une statue. 2. Replacez ce livre." (Larousse, Littré and Beaujean.)

"Remplacer (to substitute, to supersede, etc.), from re . . . en and place = 1. Tenir la place de. 2. Succéder à quelqu'un dans une place, une fonction, un service." (Larousse, Littré and Beaujean.)

In public libraries in England, I am happy to say, the word to replace is used in accordance with its Latin origin: "Readers are requested to replace (replacer, remettre à leurs places) the periodicals on the stand when done with."

So far, so good; but the time has come, I think, when it is necessary for English authorities to decide whether the word replace should continue to be used instead of substitute, supersede, etc., in the sense of remplacer. In my humble opinion, this word should be confined a close prisoner in the limited space assigned to it by its Latin origin, as Hodgson very properly suggests, and should no longer be allowed, in the sense of "remplacer," to usurp the different places that the legitimate words "substitute," "supersede," "succeed," etc., should occupy.* I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

ADOLPHE BERNON.

61, Talbot Road, Bayswater, W.

---

* (a) Substitute (Fr. substituer, Lat. substituo). To put in the place of another.
(b) Supersede (L. supersedeo). To be placed in the room of . . . .
(c) Succeed (Fr. succéder, Lat. succedo). To take the place which another has left.—Ogilvie's Dictionary.

BOOKS RECEIVED

MISCELLANEOUS.

Gates of the Dolomites. By L. Marion Davidson. With an Introduction by Sir Melvill Beachcroft, and a Chapter on the Flora of the Dolomites by F. M. Spencer Thomson. Illustrated with a Map and Photographs. (John Lane. 5s. net.)

Printing Papers: A Handbook for the Use of Publishers and Printers. (Spalding and Hodge.)

Love's Victories. By M. M. Lee. (The Happy Publishing Co. 1s. net.)

The Brain Side of Games, Sports, and Pastimes. By H. C. Donovan. (Jarrold and Sons. 1s. net.)

VERSE.

Fires: Book II. The Ovens, and Other Tales. Book III. The Hare, and Other Tales. By Wilfrid Wilson Gibson. (Elkin Mathews. 1s. net each.)

FICTION.

The Thread of Proof. By Headon Hill. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

The Romance of Bayard. By Lieut.-Col. Andrew C. P. Haggard, D.S.O. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

The Heather Moon. By C. N. and A. M. Williamson. Coloured Frontispiece. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

Devoted Sparks. By W. Pett Ridge. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

Cheadle and Son. By A. Hamilton Gibbs. (Chatto and Windus. 6s.)

THEOLOGY.

Credo: Instructions on the Creed. By the Rev. J. R. Pridie, M.A. (Skeffington and Son. 3s. 6d. net.)

Village Sermons to Simple Souls. By the Rev. S. Baring-Gould, M.A. (Skeffington and Son. 2s. 6d. net.)

Addresses to Boys and Boy Scouts. By the Rev. G. F. Cecil de Carterest, M.A. (Skeffington and Son. 2s. net.)

EDUCATIONAL.

Cæsar's "De Bello Gallico," IV, V. By A. H. Allcroft, M.A. With an Introduction by Lt. M. Penn, M.A. (W. B. Clive. 2s. 6d.)

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS.

The Last Legitimate King of France, Louis XVII. By Phœbe Allen. Illustrated. (J. M. Dent and Sons. 12s. 6d. net.)

Maurius, Saturninus und Glaucia: Beiträge zur Geschichte der Jahre 106-100 v. Chr. By Dr. Frederick Walter Robinson, M.A. (A. Marcus and E. Webers, Bonn.)

PERIODICALS.

English Review; Antiquary; Everyone's Story Magazine; Blackwood's Magazine; The Nineteenth Century and After; Bookseller; The Vineyard; The Malthusian; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; Revue Bleue; La Revue; Publishers' Circular; Educational Times; Literary Digest, N.Y.; Book Monthly; Deutsche Rundschau; Revue des Etudes Napoléoniennes; School World; University Correspondent; Empire Review; Mercure de France; Century Magazine; The Bibelot; The Poetry Review.

THE BRAIN SIDE OF GAMES, SPORTS AND PASTIMES. By H. C. DONOVAN, Author of "The Brain Book and How to Read It."

This work demonstrates phrenologically that in the execution of most games and sports the mental exercises involved are far more important to the development of the brain and to general education than the study of classical literature—to which so much time is devoted in youth and adolescence.

PRICE ONE SHILLING, Net.

Publishers: JARROLD & SONS, LONDON & NORWICH.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Twelve years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC
OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO . . AND THROUGH CANADA . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service via Vancouver.

For further particulars apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE
TO
SOUTH AND EAST AFRICA.
WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.
Vià the SUEZ CANAL.
Calling at GIBRALTAR, MARSEILLES and NAPLES

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.
(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.
Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE
PLEASURE CRUISES
LIVERPOOL
to the
MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC
by the
"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"
. . . Ports of Call . . .
CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

For full particulars apply—
THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

P & O Passenger Services.
EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports.
(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)
Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises
Throughout the Year, according to Season.
AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.
Programme on Application.
For Passage, Freight and all information apply—
PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,
102, Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours.

R.M.S.P. PLEASURE CRUISES.

To	Fare	Length of Tour	Sailing	From
Gibraltar, MOROCCO, Canary Is., & Madeira.	From £22.	Days 23.	Every Alternate Thursday.	London.
SPAIN & PORTUGAL.	£12.	8 upwards.	Weekly.	Southampton & Liverpool.
WEST INDIES.	From £40.	From 34.	Fortnightly Wednesdays.	Southampton & Cherbourg.

"Arcadian" Cruises.

MEDITERRANEAN, HOLY LAND & EGYPT.	From £1 a day.	10.	September to November.	Southampton & Marseilles.
Lisbon, Madeira, WEST INDIES.	From £1 a day.	62.	December 3.	Southampton.

For further particulars apply:—
THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY,
London: 18, Moorgate St., E.C., or 32, Cockspur St., S.W.

FEARLESS CRITICISM

In support of principle
In exposure of humbug
In scorn of cant

THE COMMENTATOR

A Weekly Review of Politics, Art, Music, Literature, and the Stage.

ONE PENNY WEEKLY of all Newsagents—or sent direct from the Publishers, for 6s. per annum (post free) or 3s. for six months.

COMMENTATOR, Ltd., 31, Essex St., London

Published for the Proprietor by WM. DAWSON and SONS, Limited, at Cannon House, Breams Buildings, London, E.C.
Branches in Canada: Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg; in South Africa: Capetown, Johannesburg, and Durban.
Printed by BONNER & Co., The Chancery Lane Press, Rolls Passage, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

CONTENTS

	PAGE
Notes of the Week	331
A Man's Bargain	332
The Vote of Mid-Lothian ...	332
Reviews:
The Early Civilisations of America	333
The Soul of Philosophy ...	333
Divini Gloria Ruris ...	334
Interesting Folk-lore ...	335
Wills and Testaments ...	336
The Progress of Social Reform	337
The Italians at Home ...	337
Shorter Reviews	438
Fiction	341
Musical Anarchy	342
Developments in Photography—I.	343
Our Public Schools and their Critics	344
Napoleon the Third—II. ...	346
Literary Values	347
The Literary Traveller ...	349
"Levrak Beyuk"	350
John Payne and His Work	351
The Theatre:
"The Girl in the Taxi" at the Lyric Theatre ...	352
"A Scrape o' the Pen" at the Comedy Theatre .	353
"The Grass Widows" at the Apollo Theatre ...	353
"The Voysey Inheritance" at the Kingsway Theatre	354
Notes and News	354
Imperial and Foreign Affairs	355
Motoring	356
In the Temple of Mammon	358
Correspondence	359

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C., where all communications to the Editor should be addressed.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Notes of the Week

WE welcome two Canadian opinions with extreme satisfaction. Mr. Borden speaking on Tuesday at Ottawa said:—

> Anyone who thinks the Motherland dead or dying is vastly mistaken. We found in Great Britain the same sturdy, steady men who developed in those islands the greatest people the world has ever seen.

And Colonel Hughes, the Canadian Minister of Militia, is reported to have said as a result of his visit to this country:—

> I have no hesitation in saying I have just returned from watching the manœuvres of the finest army in the world, barring none.

In these days of discouragement brought about by the tricks of paid politicians, it is distinctly heartening to know that our manhood claims and receives high appreciation. No one can go on to a Cricket or Football field without seeing types of young men who call to mind the finest types of Ancient Greece, and whose minds one feels sure are as clean as their physical attributes are perfect. For an imperial nation manhood is everything. Sir Thomas Browne says somewhere that the only hope for a nation is in its manhood; and we think everything which tends to the maintenance of the highest standard amongst a nation's men is of far more importance than discussions whether a chemically produced man of no importance is possible. We are quite satisfied with the material which we have, and it is eminently satisfactory to know that those who visit us, especially of our own stock, see no deterioration and no decline corroding it.

Not many people, we suppose, will read straight through the monumental 40,000th number of the Times which was issued last Tuesday, since apparently two or three weeks of leisure would be needed to take it all in; but many, like ourselves, will scan the pages here and there and enjoy the information given on every conceivable subject relating to printing and paper. Very wisely, the letterpress has been broken into paragraphs, and a few old illustrations have been reproduced; this makes for pleasure in the reading. Among the illustrations we notice "the earliest known picture of an editor at work," in which a benignant angel is handing the editor a new quill pen, the great man himself being seated comfortably at a table set in the open air, presumably in a climate less damp than ours, with books artistically arranged round him. If the angel brought angelic ideas as well as quill pens, the editor's lot in those days might border upon happiness. The management of the Times is to be congratulated upon its enterprise in publishing a supplement which, if it were in book form, would be regarded as a valuable work of reference.

The question of the "Origin of Life" seems to lie rather heavily on the minds of the members of the British Association, now in conclave assembled at Dundee, and their deliberations have supplied pleasant "copy" for many eager journalists. The speeches have all been extremely interesting, and we note that while one professor holds that the organism which first came into existence was "in size one two-hundredth part of a micron (which is the millionth part of a metre)," the President has hopes of some day creating a living cell in his laboratory. Whether we shall be any nearer the solution of world-old problems if he succeeds is debatable; but we feel quite sure that some papers we could name will then come out with a special edition. In any case, what will he do with his microscopic home-made organism when he gets it? How many years must lapse before it becomes old enough to answer questions or to slam the door? We speak in the language of irreverent metaphor; but, having made a living cell, will he be in a position to explain the appearance on this mysterious planet of the first living cell, with all its tremendous possibilities?

One can hardly imagine a more formidable task than that of the judges at the Bakers' and Confectioners' Exhibition held this week at the Agricultural Hall. Thousands of wedding cakes, currant, sponge, and fancy cakes, had to be tasted by these self-sacrificing gentlemen; after each mouthful, we understand, a drink of soda-water was necessary to clear the palate for the flavour of the next exhibit. On Tuesday 4,000 "pastries, buns, and shortbreads" had to be sampled. Beside this, the heroism of siege and battle pales.

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Remembrance

MY ships of memory sailed away
  Into the boundless West,
And some were lost ere close of day,
  By hostile winds oppressed;
Yet, braving storm, unswerving, bold
  One battled safely through;
I wonder—did it pass and speak
  A ship from you? R.

The Vote of Mid-Lothian

WITH the declaration of the poll in Mid-Lothian the seal is set on the career of the present Ministry for further mischief. It is well, therefore, to take stock of their career.

Probably their lamentable failure in achievement can be traced to lack of character. Mr. Asquith assumed office as Prime Minister, in the face of his solemn protestations that he would never lead a Liberal Government which depended for its existence on the votes of Irish Nationalists. Like Mr. Gladstone, who won Mid-Lothian by means of a torrent of verbiage compressed into 47 columns of the Times, Mr. Asquith swore prior to the election of 1906 that he never—no never—would be responsible for the guidance of the Liberal party in such a humiliating condition of dependence.

The exact situation which Mr. Asquith declaimed against, arose after the harmless necessary Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman had dissipated—as any other leader would have been bound to dissipate—the greatest non-homogeneous majority of recent years, and Mr. Asquith assumed the office of Prime Minister with perhaps just decent alacrity. Therefore it is fair to say that Mr. Asquith's Government was born in an atmosphere of spurious honesty, and it has lived up to the incident of its initiation.

It is desirable first to consider—as its epitaph—the successes which the Government have achieved. Lord Loreburn as Lord Chancellor, Mr. Lloyd George at the Board of Trade, Sir Edward Grey at the Foreign Office, Mr. Churchill at the Admiralty, and Mr. Burns at the Local Government Board have all done yeoman service, and are entitled to the gratitude of the nation in the various spheres mentioned. Unfortunately the cards have been shuffled. Lord Loreburn has been politely removed because of his honesty, Mr. Lloyd George has been transferred—because of his importunity—to an office which he is notoriously and even ludicrously unfitted to fill. Mr. Churchill after two previous rather bad failures is doing good work with the limelight shaded. Sir Edward Grey and Mr. Burns —unloved by the Byles-Outhwaite-Hemmerde group—are at present left undisturbed in the good work which they are achieving.

It will be observed that every one of the men whom we have mentioned has been engaged in the work of administration, which is in fact the primary duty of every Minister. The sops of Cerberus, and the angling for votes, are only defensible if they are employed by men who are first-rate administrators—and who know it—and who therefore believe that the interests of the Empire would suffer if their places were filled by men of less administrative ability. If that belief be in honesty held by Ministers an effective excuse is offered for much which would otherwise be contemptible and even sordid.

Therefore so far as Mr. Asquith has been able to select the best men for administrative offices, it would be dishonest to deliver an attack on him. We know of course that he was not responsible for the usurpation of his present office by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; that was merely an instance of:—

"Vaulting ambition, which o'er leaps itself," and Mr. Asquith is to be congratulated on the voluntary discomfiture of an obnoxious Mayor of the Palace.

So much for any successes which it may be alleged the Government have achieved. Their failures, which will spell their ruin, are due as we said at first to non-existence of character. They cannot claim confidence because they believe that they are great administrators. That it is impossible to credit, knowing as they do that they have created a sham Army, that the Navy has been starved and in a recent crisis was not equal to its functions; and that their promises of retrenchment have been shamelessly cast aside and profusion with the taxpayers' money has been employed wholesale to secure votes. All they can honestly lay claim to is a fraudulent inheritance, dating from the time when they sold themselves body and soul to the Irish Nationalists. Even a synthetic body and soul could achieve no deeper depth of degradation.

Mid-Lothian and every other by-election has shown that the people will not tolerate legislation which masquerades as legislation by the people and for the people, but which in effect places a load of taxation on the people and produces no perceptible result, but the sacrifice of independence by so-called representatives in return for personal pecuniary advantage.

The payment of members of Parliament is an intolerable scandal, and unhappily it is an evil which will live after the present Government have been consigned:—

"Into a Limbo large and broad."

CECIL COWPER.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

REVIEWS

The Early Civilisations of America

The Secret of the Pacific. By C. REGINALD ENOCH. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

THE secret is one which, in spite of the author's optimistic views, we fear will never be revealed, for it is no less than the origin of the early civilisations of America. It is, of course, impossible to predict what scientific research may yet accomplish in the field, but at the same time it seems unlikely, to say the least, that this much-discussed question will ever be settled. We find ourselves rather at variance with the author when he asserts that the passing of time may lead to increase of evidence, for surely time, rendering necessary more links in the chain connecting the present with the past, and effacing the handiwork by which alone light can be thrown on the question, renders the search for evidence more rather than less difficult. The fascinating and excellently illustrated book before us, bulky though it is, aims at no more than a broad general view of the subject, a statement of the main points to be gathered from existing evidence, and a putting forward in concise form of the various theories adduced in explanation of the existence of civilised communities, developing on lines so familiar to and yet different from Caucasian civilisations, and owing their inception to races between whom and the peoples of the old world no definite connecting link can be found. It is easy to dismiss the question by the broad statement that man, owing a common origin in the remote beginning of things, developed in different parts of the world on nearly parellel lines. But your true student of the world's history is not content with such a generalisation: he goes further in his search, and, finding a clue here and a clue there, links up race with race and forms three great families of mankind. Were there, then, three sources of origin for mankind, and if so, from which source did the peoples of the Americas spring—or were there four sources?

We gather from this author's work that he rejects the idea of a fourth source of origin, and would place Toltecs, Mayas, Aztecs, and Incas together in one of the three great families that people the old world. Yet, when legend and sculpture would lead him to group ancient America with ancient Egypt and Assyria, other characteristics crop up and bid him associate his unplaced races with the Malayan stock, and ease of access in prehistoric times bids him place them with the negroid family, and then racial traits and physical conformation cause him to reject the last-mentioned theory. The evidence is of such a conflicting nature that nearly every author on the subject, from Lord Kingsborough with his ten lost tribes, by way of patient Prescott and imaginative Stephens and Catherwood, to Sir Clements Markham, has a different theory on the common birthplace of these races.

A comparatively neglected answer to the vexed question, and one to which we could wish the author had devoted more space, consists in transferring the cradle of the human race from Asia to the Americas, and making the "New World" mother to the so-called "Old." Compared with Egyptian, Assyrian, and Hittite antiquities, the archæological treasures of America are almost untouched, and since the work of the few has yielded Peruvian pottery adjudged to be seven thousand years old, might not such investigation and excavation as is being carried on in the East yield evidences of still more remote civilisation?

It is doubtful, however, whether such queries will assist in solving the mystery, and in the meantime this book is sufficiently suggestive and interesting to provide us with adequate matter for more solid thought—if the phrase may be permitted. The author has collected evidence, descriptive and pictorial, from both north and south; he has presented his facts in simple, clear, and often fascinating style, and, gleaning from a large number of previous works on the subject in order to supplement and support his own observations, has given us the first complete and handy text-book on this exceptionally engrossing subject. More than this, he has made a plain, simple, and highly interesting story of what might easily have been a dull record of archæological research.

The Soul of Philosophy

The Beyond that is Within, and other Addresses. By EMILE BOUTROUX. Translated by JONATHAN NIELD. (Duckworth and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

TRANSCENDENTALISM is the order of the day in philosophy. A beyond is postulated by the least mystical of philosophers. Explanation is seen to be often no explanation at all, for the residue, which is what matters most, is not merely the unexplained, but generally also the inexplicable. Faith, hope, and love have a very definite and significant existence in the realms of philosophical thought.

The present volume gives us in an English form three extremely suggestive and masterful lectures of M. Emile Boutroux. The first of them gives its title to the book, the second deals with the relations existing between Morality and Religion, and the third is concerned with the position of Modern Philosophy in regard to Modern Science. The title chosen by the eminent Professor of the Sorbonne for his first lecture and for the whole volume is significant. We have only to turn over a few pages to find the inevitable Christian text that is the starting-point of all inquiry conducted in the spirit of these lectures: "The kingdom of God is within you." And in the preface we find the author citing as the principle which has served for his guidance the words of St. Paul: "I planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase. . . . For we are God's fellow-workers."

In this preface the subject of the last lecture is to some extent anticipated—the potential antagonism, often regarded as actual, between philosophy and science. This stumbling-block has to be provisionally removed in order to establish some sort of a method for the whole inquiry. Method and doctrine must be regarded as one. "Philosophy finds her way as she advances; and she determines that way by her actual advance. The human mind thinks under the solicitation of facts; and it understands facts in proportion as its thought progresses."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The first lecture begins by showing why it is the Inner Beyond that is to be explored. There is no doubt an Outer Beyond, in whose sphere some small conquests seem to have been achieved. But, asks M. Boutroux, are the things that have been discovered here part of the Beyond that we are really seeking? Do not our researches end not infrequently in a bathos? "We look for a Beyond which veritably outstrips nature, which surpasses it qualitatively, and not merely quantitatively." M. Boutroux dismisses somewhat lightly the phenomena of the subliminal self; they offer us no help in our search for the veritable Beyond. Science, unsupported, can explain nothing of the inwardness of life, for science is merely explanation, or identification. She excludes mystery, and therefore all Beyonds. But there is a common trait in humanity that involves the further step implied in the inquiry—"the pursuit of something, not only different, but superior—the endeavour to outstrip itself." Every intellectual process starts with a perception, and this perception contains three elements —an intuition, a concept, and an adjustment of the two to each other. This third element "implies a veritable creation." M. Boutroux here deals with the great problem of objectivity—a problem whose solution accounts for the expansion of the human mind in religion, art, and metaphysics.

Of the other two lectures we will not speak at length. The longer, because its subject has been the more fiercely debated, is that that deals with the relations of Morality and Religion. M. Boutroux regards with great distrust the consecrated phrase, "Ceci tuera cela." He is always reverting to it and insisting on its unsoundness. It is a product of ontology or the love for symmetrical notions. "Men deceive themselves as to the extent of their disagreements." Even Racine and Victor Hugo are compatible. The fallacies of the conceptual and historical methods are neatly exposed. Reason, or right perception, that is to say "the unity of thought and action," is the only judge. The ideal can be judged as well as the real. And if they be examined under their ideal forms, religion and morality are not only compatible, but interdependent. The one is as necessary as the other, and they mutually complete each other.

In the last lecture M. Boutroux gives in outline the history of the relation of philosophy to the sciences, and examines more particularly the epoch-making attempt of Comte at making philosophy into the synthesis of the sciences. The arrogant claim of the sciences to dispense entirely with philosophy is met, first, with the soft answer that philosophy without science is dead, and then with the counter that there are two organs of knowledge—reason completing science. "Reason is not science. The latter is a totality of notions; the former is a living faculty." Moreover, there is not one science; there are many; "and each of these sciences implies postulates, which are furnished by intuitions." In this science resembles action, which always postulates an aim beyond the mere satisfaction of energy. Philosophy is abundantly justified in its existence, with the function of "looking for the connection between science and action." A final word is devoted to the sequence of philosophical systems; it is not the systems that matter, it is the sequence and the men; it is "philosophy as life."

We hope we have not misinterpreted some of the ideas of M. Boutroux. In any case we can refer the reader to the book for a corrective; no one can read it without feeling the influence of a kindly and inspiring teacher.

Divini Gloria Ruris

The Love of Nature Among the Romans During the Later Decades of the Republic and the First Century of the Empire. By SIR ARCHIBALD GEIKIE, K.C.B. (John Murray. 9s. net.)

WE have here an attempt to show "that during the last decades of the Roman Republic and the first century of the Empire there lived many men in whom the love of Nature was strongly developed, and who found in her presence, watching and wondering, some of their purest pleasure and joy." But Sir Archibald Geikie must be understood to refer chiefly, if not entirely, to the literary men of the period; for he has gone for his evidence to literature, and especially to poetry, hardly at all to religion. Of the common people, therefore, he says little more than that traces of their primitive agrestic faith were never wholly lost. With these limitations the book is good. Under such headings as "Country and Town," "Flowers in Roman Life," "The Underworld," Sir Archibald Geikie brings together very much of what is significant in the work of poets like Lucretius, Virgil, Horace, and Statius, prose-writers like Cicero, Cato, Varro, and Pliny. We only wish that he had not troubled to translate into verse.

The bounds suggested by the title are frequently exceeded by including the attitude of the Romans towards Nature when they were far from loving it, towards the Sea, the Mountains, the Underworld, and Winter. The author does not give quite all the causes of their "little or no appreciation of what we now regard as some of the characteristic charms of that season." It is attributed mainly to the fact that "as a whole, winter at Rome and in the surrounding Campagna, then as now, was seldom long enough or severe enough to give the people an opportunity of becoming familiar with the varied characteristics which are so well known to us." But it was long before these characteristics were liked in this country as well as they were known. Until the admirer is free from fear, and in every way practically safe from them, æsthetic admiration for sea, mountains, and winter is unlikely to be much developed. It is of this admiration and moods of trustful satisfaction that Sir Archibald is writing. His authorities are all comfortable men, free to live in town or country, and therefore making a habit of variety, according to public fashion or private taste. Many of them had been born in the country and had there spent their most impressionable years, so that the favourable eyes of retrospection would be turned upon country and childhood together. In later years they went into the country from choice, not necessity. The sea and the mountains they only visited of necessity, and disliked them.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

They chose the country for the sake of fresh air and hot springs, for freedom from noise and enforced society, for sport, recreation, and change. The growth of the city, whereby it became something definitely opposed to the country, and sharply divided from it, would alone have sufficed to force them out, quite apart from economic causes. In the small towns where there was and still is no such opposition and division, there was and still is no need of deliberate change. But the city, where it was possible to be physically quite inactive, would have had to invent the country as an antidote if it had not lain ready a little beyond the gates.

As civilisation advances, safety in travel increases, and the arts and sciences of peace are multiplied; this region of recreation expands, and the attractions become more various, of scenery, sport, natural history, and travel or vagabondage pure and simple. When the under classes obtain leisure and relief from the direct struggle for livelihood they also are free to admire and enjoy what had formerly seemed only part of the vast and powerful inhumanity of the universe. Sir Archibald gives us no reason to believe that this stage had been attained at Rome, but he does say that, "looking at the matter from our modern point of view, we may be inclined to regard the increase in the cultivation of the ornamental as not so much an indication of growing luxury, as a distinct advance in taste, and a further stage in the development of the love of Nature."

The cultivated Romans at least reached the point of envying their peasants, as they have told us eloquently. Martial makes them envy the bailiffs and porters of their country estates:—

> How many days does each year see
> Spent free from care at Formilæ?
> How than their masters luckier far
> Our bailiffs and our porters are.
> Tied fast to city life's annoy,
> We pay for pleasures they enjoy.
> —(Translated by W. T. Webb.)

Apparently they had all our variety of country pleasures, from the extreme of luxury to the liberty of solitude. They had exhausted their religion but not the effects of it, and they felt that in the holy grove there was an unknown god. Probably the country calmed them as it calms us with its space and patience, relating them to eternity. We go to it as poets, solitaries, or vagabonds, as lovers or as invalids, to escape foul air, noise, multitude, confusion, incompleteness, elaborate means without clear ends; and we do more than escape them. Riding or afoot, for sport, play, social talk, solitude, we go out spreading far and wide as when children emerge from the narrow door of the school. We call it play because it seems a relief from "the serious business of life," and because it is so short. In fact, we dare not take more of it: we must go back again to involve ourselves in the grim trifles, lest we should discover that they are trifles, and never return, and so break up this fabric of a few thousand years and enter that of eternity, of the unknown god.

Interesting Folk-lore

Anthropological Papers, Mostly on Parsee Subjects. By JIVANJI JAMSHEDJI MODI, B.A. (The British India Press, Bombay.)

SUCH associations as the Anthropological Society of Bombay justify their existence and perform a public service when their members add to the stock of common knowledge by such papers as are to be found collected in this volume. They supply a deficiency which undoubtedly exists. In these days of pressure, few officials have time or strength for more than the disposal of current work; their knowledge, therefore, of the native among whom they live and work is of a very superficial character; native customs, their origins and effects, the motives which sway them, in a word, their lives are a sealed book, and the ignorance may lead to administrative failures in such matters as famine, plague, sanitation, medical relief, education, etc., where the beliefs and sentiments of the masses cannot be altogether disregarded. In such papers, experts and specialists can write freely and fully. Mr. Modi, an educated Parsee gentleman and a prolific writer, has recorded in his essays much that would not otherwise be published of his countrymen, whose ancestors emigrated from Persia, fleeing from the Arab conquest in the eighth century, and settled in the Bombay Presidency. The last census showed their number for all India to be only 100,096, of whom 91,500 are resident in Bombay and the neighbourhood. But of all the Indian peoples the Parsees are nearest to Europeans in many ways, and their influence is much greater than their number warrants. They are often eminently successful and make large fortunes in trade and commerce, as millowners, and they constantly spend enormous sums on useful and charitable objects.

Of the thirty essays in this volume more than two-thirds deal with Parsee subjects, the remainder with miscellaneous Indian topics. The omens among the Parsees, it is evident, are not unlike those prevalent elsewhere in Southern India, some superstitions are common to Europe and India. Other papers tell of the Persian book for taking omens from snakes, of the horse and cock in ancient Irán (Persia), of charms and amulets for diseases of the eye, of auspicious horses, and the art of horse-shoeing which was known in ancient Persia long before it was known in Europe. The papers on the hill tribes of Mahableshwar and Matheran (the Bombay hill-stations), and on the Todas of the Nilgiri hills in Madras are specially interesting. The origin of the Todas is obscure, and the author, though disposed to claim them as an off-shoot of the Iranian Parthians, refrains from dogmatising on the point. In many Parsee rites and ceremonies furrows or boundary lines have to be drawn, chiefly for purifications, so that within them the impurities, contagion, or infection may be confined, while purity, safety, and health are secured to others outside the lines or circles. In other ceremonies boundaries, technically known as pavis are drawn, to confine and preserve the purity within and exclude impurities. These ceremonies are compared with the Roman lustratio, where the boundary lines indicate the area within which evil influence cannot work.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The belief that a magician or an evildoer tries his magic or his evil machinations through the instrumentality of a person's hair or nail-parings is said to be common among many others besides the Semitic nations; and the belief, among other reasons, seems to be the origin of the custom of burying hairs and nail-parings sometimes observed. In "the Rat problem of the Ancients" Parsee books are referred to which speak of the good or meritoriousness of killing noxious creatures that do harm to the good creation. This would include all reptiles or noxious creeping creatures. Other Indians object to any life being taken. The Parsees have their own marriage and funeral rites, also the religious Hamazor, or hand-joining, performed after certain other ceremonies. There is much to be learnt of Indian life from these papers, which Mr. Modi should continue to write and publish.

Wills and Testaments

The Romance of Wills and Testaments. By EDGAR VINE HALL. (T. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.)

IT is unnecessary to tell the confirmed novel enthusiast, or even the person who turns to novels only occasionally as a relaxation, how often the theme of the last will and testament is chosen by the imaginative writer as the pivot on which his plot turns. Fiction is indeed strange; yet the old adage tells us that truth is still stranger. If this is not altogether proved by Mr. Vine Hall in the volume under notice, he certainly shows how very strange truth can be, especially in the matter of the final distribution of one's property. Mr. Vine Hall has culled from innumerable sources, at the expenditure of vast toil and research, a host of details relating to wills. These he has co-ordinated and arranged, so that we are regaled by different chapters which treat of "Wills Not Fulfilled," "Death-bed Dispositions," "Wills of Fancy and of Fantasy," "Strife," "Love and Gratitude," and many others. His treatment of the subject is exhaustive. He narrates stories that are pathetic, others that are humorous, and others still that are tragic. His subject is an integral part of human nature, and, therefore, is as wide as human nature itself. If one wished, one could quote pages of anecdotes from this fascinating volume, for it is a veritable mine. But it seems hardly fair to do so. Especially touching are the wills executed by victims of the Plague, shunned by all except a faithful few, aware that their action is not long to be delayed.

Many of these are wills by word of mouth, sometimes spoken from an open window to the witnesses gathered in the street below. Then there are the cases of undiscovered wills which come to light after intervals short or long. Thus the will of a Mr. Minet, who died in 1874, was not discovered until thirty-one years later, when it was found in an old neglected case. Under this will the testator directed that his estate should be entailed. It had, however, been sold, but it was repurchased, and the desires of the testator in that respect are now being fulfilled. Another testator, in the course of a codicil executed in Granada, in the West Indies, in 1795, mentioned that his will had been buried, so that it should not be burnt by the enemy. Many are the curious conditions attached to legacies. Forty shillings was left to Jane Mering, in 1547, "of this condition, that she shall profess and knowledge herself not to have done her duty to me and my wife, before Mr. Parson and four or five of the honester men in the parish." Threepence-halfpenny was bequeathed to a son for the purchase of a rope for his wife, to be used as soon as possible. Another left £50 to "Elizabeth, whom through my foolish fondness I made my wife, without regard to family fame or fortune, and who in return has not spared most unjustly to accuse me of every crime regarding human nature, save highway robbery."

Perhaps the reticence of Sir Humphrey Style, in apparently similar circumstances, is to be preferred. He bequeathed £20 to his wife to buy mourning for him if she pleased, together with a further sum of five shillings "for good reasons best known unto myself, but not for her honour to be published." Very gruesome is the will of an American citizen who directed his executors to have buttons made out of his bones, pouches from his skin, and violin strings from other parts of his body, and to present these objects to his friends. Very curious are many of the conditions attached to legacies. In some cases there is an attempt to enjoin perpetual celibacy, although this condition would be upset by the courts as contrary to public morality. Mr. Vine does not mention this. Legacies are also dependent on non-marriage with a person named, or one not approved by the testator's wife and sister-in-law, or a first cousin, or an Irishman, or an actor, or a divorcé. Not long ago a legacy was dependent on the marriage of the legatee with a lady in society. It is not generally known that it is illegal to bequeath money for the upkeep of a grave, or for the recital of prayers for the repose of one's soul, and, although the author does not mention it, it is not many years since the illegality of bequeathing money for the purposes of Jewish religious education was removed. Until 1846 this object was in the eyes of the law also a "superstitious trust."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The Progress of Social Reform

The Path of Social Progress. By MRS. GEORGE KERR. (T. Nelson and Sons. 2s. net.)
Social Insurance in Germany, 1883-1911. By W. HARBUTT DAWSON. (T. Fisher Unwin. 6s. net.)
Woman Suffrage. By HEBER HART, LL.D. With a Preface by the Rt. Hon. LEWIS HARCOURT, M.P. (P. S. King and Son. 1s. net.)

MRS. GEORGE KERR'S extensive experience of poor-law and charitable organisation entitles her to speak with no little authority upon the subject of social reform, and the author of the second of the above-mentioned works is well known as a writer upon German social affairs. "The Path of Social Progress" repeats the substance of lectures delivered by the authoress in Edinburgh during the last two years, and its purpose is to emphasise the conditions of certain problems in social reform. The opening chapter contains a résumé of Dr. Chalmers' notable experiments in relief, demonstrating the value of encouraging the principle of self-support within the limits of the community. The second, third, and fourth chapters show the incalculable harm wrought by ill-considered legislation and indiscriminate almsgiving. Subsequent chapters deal with the report of the Royal Commission on the Poor Laws, and with the principal topic of the work—namely, the problem of the training, both theoretical and practical, necessary for volunteers in the cause of social amelioration. The results of one of the most interesting social experiments ever carried out, which were contained in the Edinburgh School Report, and dealt with by Professor Karl Pearson and Miss Elderton, are briefly summarised. A knowledge of those results is essential to an understanding of the problems which confront social reformers at the present day.

Mr. Dawson has aimed at presenting to "the large and growing class of publicists and students who are seriously interested in social reform movements abroad" an epitome of the provisions of the German laws relating to sickness, accident, and old-age insurance. For the purposes of comparison he has appended in the form of footnotes the corresponding provisions of the National Insurance Act, the Old Age Pensions Act, and the Workmen's Compensation Act. The author deals with such questions as the cost of such insurance in Germany, the relative burdens borne by employers, employees, and the State, and the attitude of employers and workpeople towards insurance legislation generally. He does not attempt to conceal his predilection in favour of compulsory insurance, but his avowed bias does not, in fact, in any way detract from the value of the information imparted. We are specially pleased to note the emphasis laid upon the importance of preventive measures in the chapter entitled "The Crusade against Disease," for, > after all, what the self-reliant workman values more highly than distress benefits is a fair and full use of his faculties. What he wants is not sickness pay, but a healthy life; not accident compensation, but sound limbs and unimpaired energies; not infirmity pensions, but the opportunity and the power to follow his employment as long as possible.

Later on we find a quotation from the address delivered by the president of a large association of employers in the iron and steel industry, as follows:—

> The Insurance Laws have influenced the condition of life of the working classes in that they are free from anxiety by reason of sickness, infirmity and accidents. It cannot be denied that in many cases the workman's feeling of confidence increases his productive power and his efficiency.

At a time when one hears such a babel of vituperation concerning our own insurance legislation it is an agreeable diversion to sit down and calmly read a carefully presented apologia, such as that of Mr. Dawson, on behalf of the much-maligned Legislature.

Mr. Heber Hart's little book is purely controversial in character. The contention which he seeks to affirm is that the grant of Female Suffrage would be disastrous to the country as a whole. In support of that contention he adduces a number of more or less specious arguments, the most cogent of which, apparently, is that all society depending, as it does, for the maintenance of peace upon the mailed fist, and the fists of males being, as they are, more potent than those of females, the latter could not, in the last resort, make good their claim to political equality with the former. We are also told categorically that female suffrage would undermine popular government, endanger the Empire, impair the vitality of the race, and produce various other unpleasant consequences of a similar kind. Women, in fact, are now, as they have ever been, the root of all evil, only more so, for Tennyson's "meek unconscious dove, who sittest 'ranging golden hair," is nowadays occupied with the more vigorous task of smashing windows and wrestling with the minions of the law. But is the influence of women upon human affairs quite so wholly evil as Mr. Heber Hart would have us believe? Alas and alack for ancient chivalry!

The Italians at Home

The Italians of To-Day. By RICHARD BAGOT. (Mills and Boon. 2s. 6d. net.)

MR. RICHARD BAGOT is an ardent admirer of Italy and her people, and in his latest volume he has set out to reveal the characteristics of the Italians of to-day, beginning with the peasant and leading up to the professional classes and the aristocracy. He writes in an enthusiastic, and often in a didactic, manner; but his lucid style and his whole-hearted zeal carry us along with him. We are ready to admit, after his forcible argument, that most of us who think anything at all about Italy are chiefly concerned with her art, that our admiration is æsthetic, and perhaps sentimental, and that we are entirely ignorant of the fact that the modern Italians are an "energetic, virile, and courageous people which has made, and is still making, the Italy of to-day." Before the whirlwind of Mr. Bagot's enthusiasm we lay aside our Baedeker, and forget about the very existence of barrel-organs and ice-cream vendors, for we are aware that we are being led by one who knows and loves Italy, and who is particularly qualified to understand the complex Italian temperament.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Mr. Bagot informs us, with no little sarcasm, that our general impression of the Italian peasant is very far from the truth, and that in our ignorance we have relied too implicitly on certain novelists who have been chiefly concerned with dragging in stilettos and poisons, and giving us a picture of a villain on the one hand and a piece of colossal laziness on the other. The Italian peasant is very far from being either a villain or a lazy vagabond. He works with an energy and a power of endurance that would put to shame the British workman, if he were not so occupied in striking and making arrangements to shorten his working day. Indeed, the Italian peasant is a most estimable fellow, and is superior to our own in that he can quote poetry of an evening after a long day's work. He has a sense of refinement and innate courtesy that we scarcely ever find in English cottages. We talk about our simple country folk as if simplicity were the greatest of all virtues, instead of being the most elementary. The Italian peasants are not simple; on the contrary, they are very complex, and this is particularly true in regard to the Tuscans. But the poorer folk are not the only people who quote poetry. Mr. Bagot tells an amusing story of a doctor who, on his way to catch a train, chanced to hear a colleague shout a line of improvised verse. A poetic contest followed, lasting three hours, which was eagerly listened to by the whole village!

The author makes some very interesting statements in regard to the religious views of the rural classes, and comes to the conclusion that they are essentially sceptical:—

> If we examine carefully those superstitions to which the peasant is, as a rule, most devoted, and which cause him to be regarded as devoted to his Church, we shall find that in every case the observance and upholding of such superstitions are acts which contribute very largely to the furtherance of his own purely material and worldly advantages.

At the same time, though naturally sceptical, he has an inward fear that the priest may be right after all, and acts accordingly, thinking it wiser to put something on religion than to ignore it entirely.

We must, for want of space, pass over the chapters devoted to the professional classes, Government and aristocracy, and the Church and State, and turn to a few pages relating to modern Italian literature. Mr. Bagot is probably right in stating that we regard Gabriele D'Annunzio "as representing contemporary Italian literature." He points out our error in laying too much emphasis on this author, but does not seem to be aware that only a few are acquainted with translations from D'Annunzio's work, while many thousands are familiar with the remarkable novels of Foggazzaro. Italian publishers come in for a good deal of adverse criticism, for they seem to be principally engaged in reproducing exotic French literature. With well-deserved scorn the author observes:—

> In the meantime Italian literary geniuses, except a limited few whose names are sufficiently popular to ensure the publishers against loss, remain neglected in their own country, and therefore neglected in other countries where they would find appreciation.

Mr. Bagot's pages devoted to anti-Italian calumnies will attract considerable attention, and he does not mince his words in dealing with certain newspaper correspondents who sent home sensational accounts of atrocities supposed to have been perpetrated by the Italian soldiers. He loudly contradicts the statements so widely circulated in the Press, and with remarkable vigour portrays the Italian soldier as exemplary in every way. When he has done so, he proceeds to deal with the fearful barbarities of the Arabs. As this subject has been fully discussed in THE ACADEMY, we need not go into the matter now. Suffice it to say that Mr. Bagot, in the spirit of a dauntless champion, has corrected a great many misconceptions, and has revealed, with considerable force and insight, the Italians of to-day.

Shorter Reviews

The Science of the Sea

The Depths of the Ocean. By SIR JOHN MURRAY and DOCTOR JOHAN HJORT. Illustrated. (Macmillan and Co. 28s. net.)

THE events which were in the first place responsible for the production of this notable work are explained in a preface by Dr. Johan Hjort. Sir John Murray was the chief British delegate in 1899 at the International Congress for the Exploration of the Sea which was held at the time in Stockholm. In the year 1909 he chanced to visit Copenhagen when another of the meetings of this same International Congress was being held; on that occasion Sir John Murray expressed his conviction of the great possibilities of the Atlantic as a field for systematic observations.

Subsequently the famous British scientist wrote to Dr. Hjort, and offered, if the Norwegian Government would lend the Michael Sars and her scientific staff for a four months' summer cruise in the North Atlantic, to pay all the other expenses. The Norwegian Government received this proposal in the same generous fashion as that in which it was made. Hence this important expedition, the operations of which extended as far as Newfoundland, and which was responsible for the establishment of one hundred and twenty observing stations. In the hands of Sir John Murray, and with the co-operation of a most distinguished group of Norwegian scientists, it is needless to say that the cruise proved a brilliant success. Indeed, had it been followed by no other result than the production of this book that alone would have justified the expedition to the full. It is certain that to the student of oceanography the work comes as one of the great milestones in that science.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

One of the most commendable features of this notable contribution to oceanography is its comprehensiveness. As regards its tabular and historical matter alone the book is valuable, and the account of the voyage itself of the Michael Sars is not only profoundly instructive—as, indeed, could not fail to be the case—but teems with matter which is of interest even to the non-scientific reader. As may be imagined, the scope of this learned work is very large, including as it does the phenomena of North Atlantic depths, deposits, plant-life, fishes from the sea-bottom, and invertebrate fauna. Perhaps none of its observations are more to be treasured than those on the distribution of different species of fish; but in any case there is certainly no portion of the book which could well have been spared—a remark which applies to the generous measure of illustrations and diagrams with which it is supplied. In this instance it may be said without fear of contradiction that an astonishing area of the "Depths of the Ocean" has been brought to the surface for all who care to see!

The Ridge of the White Waters. By WILLIAM C. SCULLY. Illustrated. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s. net.)

MR. SCULLY, a Resident Magistrate of Cape Colony, treats us to some impressions of Delagoa Bay, Durban, and South-East Africa generally, including the Transkei, from the point of view of a man who knew and hunted the country thirty years ago and more. His name stands on the roll of pioneers, with those of Selous and others, for he knew the mighty men of Gun and Spoor when there was little beside veldt inland from the southern ports. His reminiscences of this time are fascinating, possibly because we realise that he is not attempting to tell a story, but is merely telling the truth. We could wish that he had devoted more pages to the story of his approach to the Rand. As it is, he reaches the Rand early in the book, and gets down to business, the said business being a critique of the mining industry. Here, again, Mr. Scully is exceedingly interesting, witty, and unfortunately—for the Rand—true, we fear. Out of the sixty mines which make up this backbone of South Africa, he prophesies a moderately long life for about fifteen, and swift extinction, consequent on rapidly falling grades of ore, for the remainder. The evidence which he adduces in support of his statements is of such a nature that we feel compelled to believe him, and also feel that it is lucky for Mr. Scully that he is in close touch with law and order, for, if a mining magnate got hold of him at any point where law and order were suspended, we fear that the unpleasant truths which he has to tell would bring his career to an abrupt termination—and possibly a painful one. He gives fairly full details of the appalling toll of lives taken by the mines, the tragedies consequent on miners' phthisis—that curse of the Rand—and the flagrant disregard of mining regulations by managers and shift-bosses in the attempt to keep up the output, in face of a consistent fall in the grade of ore.

If we may believe Mr. Scully, Johannesburg is doomed within the next ten years. There will remain a few paying mines, and the shell of the gold metropolis, but there will be no reason for the existence of the great unhealthy town of to-day. We feel, on closing this book, that such a calamity would be a blessing in disguise, remembering, as we do, the statement made by Mr. Scully, and corroborated by many great medical authorities, that the Transvaal miners' working life is on the average seven years only—after that phthisis carries him off, if he survives the hundred and one chances of death due to disregarded mining regulations. The book is short and not too well illustrated, but deserving of a very wide circulation. Its author is to be congratulated on a fearless exposure of evils almost unbelievable in this humane twentieth century.

The True Traveller. By W. H. DAVIES. (Duckworth and Co. 6s.)

THERE is in Mr. Davies' prose the same lack of variety that marks his poetry, the same smallness, with the same freshness and purity of expression. Moreover, it is all wrought out of the same stretch of material. It began with the "Autobiography of a Super-Tramp," it continued in "Beggars," it took the variant of a story in "The Weak Woman," and now in "The True Traveller" it has a renewed form in a series of sketches that are his experiences as a tramp in America and in England. Ingenuousness, when it fails from artistry, in the better sense of the word, is apt to become uncomfortably naïf. It is the supreme difference between the childlike and the childish. On several occasions in these various sketches we had cause to feel this rather acutely; but in the main the book is freer of this note than its predecessor. Being absolved from the necessity of bearing a continued narrative, it can avoid those uninspired moments that only a finished artistry can conceal, or, if possible, obviate.

The consequence is that in "The True Traveller" Mr. Davies has a play for the cleanness and directness of his ideas that give it a high value. That the various sketches are largely concerned with women who ply an unhappy calling will deter only the unnaturally minded. The engaging frankness of his mind, together with the simplicity of his style, makes it clean beyond all question. And he is so splendidly right, too, in his approach. In each sketch our common humanity is reached, with an unfailing honesty of touch. We are brought so near the essential brightness of the heart of woman, that seems to shine so much more simply in circumstances that compel her to have done with the artificialities that wrap the lives of her conventional sisters, in seeing these waifs of womanhood spontaneously doing kindness to those who need it most. It is as though, by a curious paradox, she can realise her womanhood best when she has sold the dearest honour of it.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Of course, all these sketches are not concerned with the one theme. But they are chiefly so. Whatever the author touches he makes human in this way, and it is this that gives its chief and illuminating charm to a very delightful book.

L'Ether Vivant, et le Réalisme Supra-Nerveux. By PAUL RICHARD. (H. Daragon, Paris. 3 fr. 50.)

THE theories of M. Richard require some measure of initiation before their full import can be weighed. He believes in a long tradition of psychic revelation, which has had its great moments, at the foundation of certain religions, for instance, but has also had its periods of effacement. He has many admirable qualities fitting him for his task of exegesis, but he is too didactic to be wholly convincing or sympathetic, and even a golden age needs a poet to make it habitable. One of the fundamental theories is that the key to all mystery lies in the number four. All our categories, it appears, stop short at the number three, and knowledge and revelation lie just beyond. Analogy is made to do hard service in illustration of this theory. The central theory of the book is closely connected with this Pythagorian leitmotiv. The ether, which is the substance of life, has its four states or stages, like everything else. The supra-nervous ingredients, which are found blending with the physical in every stage, from the atom to the universe, are the key to the problem of life. The supra-nervous life "est dans l'homme comme la porte ouverte sur l'infini et la perfection, ou bien comme l'écran fermé devant toute lumière et tout idéal." We cannot refrain from noting a curious passage, where it is said that, at the moment of the conception of a human being, "dans le cas des êtres les plus grossiers, la perception supra-nerveuse se traduira par l'image d'un essaim de mouches autour d'une proie," while "dans le cas des privilégiés de l'atavisme et du milieu," the spectacle will be that of a slow crystallisation of "éléments supra-nerveux semblables à des flocons de neige." The book is in the highest degree interesting and sincere.

Scottish Prose of the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries. By JOHN HEPBURN MILLAR. (J. Maclehose and Sons, Glasgow. 10s. net.)

THIS work, which consists of lectures given in the University of Glasgow, is an industrious attempt to make the most of a dull subject, and certainly Professor Millar's effort is far from colourless. He admits that the seventeenth century is practically barren in the field of letters, partly owing to the perpetual ecclesiastical controversy engendered by the brooding nightmare of the appalling Solemn League and Covenant; more because, as Beattie said, Scotchmen, if they wrote English, wrote it like a dead language, which they understood, but could not speak. In the eighteenth century period Professor Millar discusses "The Three Great Figures—Hume, Robertson, and Smith," adding a few other writers more or less obscure, though Lord Monboddo is interesting for his estimate of Dr. Johnson as "the most invidious and malignant man I have ever known," while the "praise and admiration bestowed upon him by so many of the English nation is one of the greatest disgraces that ever befell them." If we mistake not, the dark-looming shadow of Ruskin's youthful Sundays was caused by a pious aunt who read aloud Dr. Hugh Blair's sermons. To men like Henry Mackenzie, Smollett, and Boswell there are merely passing references. In their case we should hardly have thought more lengthy treatment "waste of time," even if it did involve a refutation of Macaulay's "antithetical ineptitudes" about Johnson's biographer, or "a new toot on an auld horn."

The literary value of this book lies in its delineation—after the decline of Scottish dialect—of the gradual growth of English writing through the period of pompous pedantry and macrology to the later days when the "indefatigable Scot," if "decently educated," found his strenuous pertinacity crowned by the ability "to write tolerable English free from Scotticisms in phrase and vocabulary."

W. B. Yeats. By JETHRO BITHELL. Translated by FRANZ HELLENS. (Editions du Masque. Paris and Brussels. 2 francs.)

M. BITHELL has written a very vigorous piece of criticism. He is a very Samson among the Philistines, and a stern judge among the poets. If his feats in the temple of Dagon are a little unconvincing, they are redeemed by the warmth of his sympathy and the discernment of his critical methods. We are at one with him in his surprise at the preferential treatment accorded by the English Government and public to Mr. Yeats, for, "de tous les poètes anglais vivants, Yeats est le dernier qui soit à la portée du public." M. Bithell's analyses of Irish literature in general and Mr. Yeats' poems in particular are sound and helpful. He insists on the peculiar sense that certain English words bear on Celtic lips; he notices the peculiar colour effects obtained and the moods expressed by the use of words like "silver" and "obscure." He sees the vagueness of this particular symbolism, and observes that it is ready to greet a double interpretation. On Yeats as a story-teller he justly remarks, "Il lit une histoire, l'oublie à moitié, et la refait ensuite." The translations of the illustrative poems are for the most part admirable.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Fiction

The Anglo-Indians. By ALICE PERRIN. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

MRS. PERRIN has given us a very delightful volume, and one that will add to her reputation as a distinguished novelist. She possesses a keen sense of humour that gives a touch of geniality to her delightful old ladies that reminds us not a little of Dickens. We are introduced to Fay Fleetwood, a young girl who admires Akbar so much that she names her kitten after him. While Fay is gazing upon the glories of the Himalayas, she meets Captain Somerton. The experienced novel-reader will at once foresee that these two young people will marry each other and live happy ever after. A cleverly drawn character is that of the Rajah of Rotah, a youth who, forgetful of his wife, falls in love with Fay and makes her a present of a white Persian kitten, a gift scarcely tolerated by the kindly but highly respectable Mrs. Fleetwood. This good lady, in spite of her volubility, is a lovable soul, and compares very favourably with her two elder daughters, Marion and Isabel, who make frantic efforts to get married, and succeed in the end, without awakening very much interest on the part of the reader. After numerous jolly parties, much matrimonial angling by the hopeful Mrs. Fleetwood, and a vivid scene in the zenana, where the Rajah puts his little foot down and defies his wicked mother, the Fleetwood family return to England.

Mr. Fleetwood, once so vigorous and efficient, becomes a pathetic figure, portrayed now and again with a light humorous touch. His big-game shooting days are over, and he has to content himself with pottering about his club and occasionally ordering soles from the local fishmonger. The fortunes of the Fleetwood family are on the wane. They give up their expensive flat, and live in a small house most appropriately called "Combe Down." Fay still dreams of India, but she combines her dreams with considerable domesticity, and eventually takes up typewriting and shorthand in the office of a weekly journal. The Rajah and his wife, accompanied by Somerton, come to London, and it is not long before the gallant Captain proposes to Fay and is accepted by her.

Those who want a light novel that will counteract the horrors of a tempestuous summer, a volume with plenty of quiet humour, not a little poetry, and considerable skill in the handling of character, will find much to entertain them in "The Anglo-Indians."

His Lordship's Baby. By HOPE PROTHEROE. (The Century Press. 6s.)

"HIS LORDSHIP'S BABY" is a story shrouded in mysteries of the most gloomy character. What did the castle moat conceal beneath its dark and oily waters? Why was the confidential servant pale? What cry was that which echoed so strangely from the dungeons at midnight? Why was the earl troubled in countenance? What did he discover behind the secret panel? What was in the secret packet? Such are the questions which the reader asks, and he is not kept long in suspense. It is not Hope Protheroe's way to keep us on tenter-hooks. Explanations of his mysteries are flung forth with a generous hand. Barely is the question asked before it is answered; barely is it answered before another as pressing rises to the lips, only to be resolved with equal dispatch, and to give place to further vistas of dark intrigue. There is no material wasted in this book. Few of the characters are what they seem. Does the under-gardener appear to be an under-gardener and no more? Vain thought! He is far otherwise, and dark is his past. The doctor is not merely a doctor, nor the lady's maid merely a lady's maid. Gather these persons from the utmost corners of the earth, if you will. The precaution is useless. As soon as they set foot in the castle, they are recognised. Someone is in the power of someone else, a helpless tool in villainous deeds. These folk have no peace; they are not allowed to live like other people. One doubts if they ever eat. They are forever flitting about the corridors and descending to the rat-infested foundations. Sensations flock upon them riotously. If it is not the howl of a ghost, it is an illegitimate infant; if it is not the long-delayed revenge of an outraged brother, it is a rusty dagger; if it is not a poisoned ring, it is a changed baby. We may smile if we will at our author's effects, since we are not so greedy of shocks as we were once, but we cannot withhold a tribute for his ingenuity. His story is a pageant of the unreal, but its intensity and intricacy are amazing.

The Child of His Adoption. By GEORGE EVANS. (Herbert and Daniel. 6s.)

DICKIE RAEBURN is an idealist of eighteen. And Dickie lives in lodgings somewhere near St. Martin's Church. One night Dickie goes out, and he sees a man ill-treating a woman. With the chivalrous instinct of an English gentleman, he rushes to the rescue. The girl, it appears, is a music-hall singer. And her name is Glory. The reader will not be slow to divine something at least of the sequel. He will be prepared for the revelation that Dickie falls in love with Glory and that Glory falls in love with Dickie. Such, indeed, happens; and Dickie, with a sublime disregard of the conventions, invites Glory to share his humble lodgings. The relations between these two lovers are innocent in everything—except appearances. But the idyll soon turns to tragedy. Glory has one secret that she has resolutely kept from Dickie. She is married. Her husband is a brute and a jail-bird. He is, indeed, no other than the man from whose clutches Dickie rescued Glory at the beginning of the tale. And the time comes when Glory must be a mother. She flies—is rescued—and brought home to Dickie's lodgings—to die. A little daughter is born.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Here the story might have ended. Here, however, it has scarcely begun. Mr. Evans essays the almost impossible task of attempting to transfer our interest from Glory to Glory's daughter. There is a perceptible hiatus in the narrative, and it is some time before we can capture the new centre of interest. But Mr. Evans is a leisurely writer, and he ambles along in a pleasant and discursive fashion. A chapter or two more, and he has our attention once again, to hold it this time until the end of the story. The book is full of surprises. Its chief charm, however, lies in the tenderness with which the author has invested the two principal characters. To irradiate "la vie de Bohême" with the light of a pure and exalted idealism is no mean achievement. And this Mr. Evans has done.

Lamora. By MRS. ALFRED SIDGWICK. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

IN Lamora and her cousin Pansy we have two women, both of whom possess in varied degrees the artistic temperament, yet in how different a manner is this, sometimes unwelcome, possession shown in each of the two cases. Lamora is an artist with a beauty of soul and an unsatiable longing to give real expression to her feelings upon canvas. She lives with her relations, and their claims upon her time and talents, which they utilise for trivial matters in connection with household affairs, hinder her from her dream of long days spent with pallet and brush. Pansy, on the other hand, is simply winsome and attractive, with, at times, a coaxing and alluring manner; but here the artist in her ends, unless a general peevishness and restlessness are to be accounted to her as part of the equipment of this much-maligned disposition. Lamora coming into an unexpected legacy, the two girls go abroad, under the chaperonage of a prosaic old couple, and Pansy, having little or no depth of character, brings tragedy into her life and trouble to all those with whom she is concerned. Up this point the book is interesting, and the story well told. When the girls come back to England, however, the fine character-drawing gives place to the working out of the complications of the story. The studios are no longer used as the meeting-places for artists and their discussions; they serve merely as rooms where the actors in the drama can have tea. Also, Lamora's great longing to be a painter of pictures seems to have been overlooked in dealing with the second part of the story—in fact, everybody is made subservient to the development of the plot, with the result that, taking the book as a whole, it is something of a disappointment.

The Marble Aphrodite. By ANTHONY KIRBY GILL. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

